PREFACE

TO

HENRY'S COMMENTARY.

Commentaries on the Bible may be conveniently divided into two kinds, the critical and practical. The first, by a grammatical analysis of the words and phrases of the original text, endeavour to ascertain the literal meaning of each passage; and to enable others to judge of the correctness of the interpretation, the whole critical process is spread before the reader. Helps of this sort are very important to the learned, for, in all cases, the literal sense must be determined before any proper use can be made of the text, or any other interpretation founded on it. The propriety, force, and meaning of a metaphor, or an allegory, can only be known by first understanding the literal meaning of the words employed; and the same is true in regard to what may be called the mystical, or spiritual, meaning, of any passage of Scripture. But, however necessary this critical analysis may be, it can be useful to none but the learned. Commentaries of another kind, therefore, are required for common readers, who have as deep an interest involved in the truths of the Bible, as the critical scholar; and who are as much bound in duty to search the Scriptures: for as every man must give account of himself, both of his faith and practice, he must have the right to judge for himself. The best helps ought, therefore, to be provided, to enable all classes of men to form correct opinions on the all important subject of religion. For this reason, many practical expositions, not only of detached passages and single books, but of the whole Bible, have been composed, and have been extensively useful in elucidating the Scriptures; and in teaching how the truths of Revelation may be applied to regulate the hearts and direct the lives of men. In this class, Henry's Exposition holds a distinguished place. This work has now been before the Christian community for more than a hundred years, and has, from its first publication, been so well received, and is so generally approved, that all recommendation of the work itself seems to be now superfluous. It has, indeed, become a standard work in theology; not with the people of one denomination only, but with the friends of sound piety and evangelical religion, of every name. Many other valuable commentaries, it is true, have been given to the public since this work was first edited, and have deservedly gained for themselves a high estimation and extensive circulation. But it may be safely said, that Henry's Exposition of the Bible has not been superseded by any of these publications; and in those points in which its peculiar excellence consists, remains unrivalled. For some particular purposes, and in some particular respects, other Commentaries may be preferable; but, taking it as a whole, and as adapted to every class of readers, this Commentary may be said to combine more excellencies than any work of the kind which was ever written, in any language. And this is not the opinion of one, or a few persons, but thousands of judicious theologians have been of the same mind; and it may be predicted, that as long as the English language shall remain unchanged, Henry's Exposition will be highly appreciated by the lovers of true religion.

Our object in this Preface is, to endeavour to point out some of the more distinguishing characteristics of this great work, and to offer some motives to induce Christians of our country to study it. Before I proceed farther, however, I would remark, that the principal excellence of this Exposition does not consist in solving difficulties which may be found in Scripture. On this ground, complaint is sometimes heard from those who consult this Commentary, that they may obtain light on obscure and perplexed passages, of being disappointed in their expectations; and that, while plain passages are largely expounded, those which are difficult are briefly touched, or passed over without notice. To this objection it may be answered, that to exhibit the use and application of those parts of Scripture which are not involved in difficulty, is far more important for practical purposes, than the elucidation of obscure passages. It is a general, and surely it is a comfortable fact, that those parts of Scripture which are most obscure are least important. But the same objection might be made, and indeed has been made, to all Commentaries, that they leave the difficult texts as obscure as they found them; from which the only legitimate inference is, that, in regard to a large portion of texts of difficult interpretation, the learned and unlearned stand very much on the same level; yet, doubtless, much light has been shed on many things in the Scriptures, by the labours of the learned. And although we do not claim for this Commentator the highest place among Biblical critics, yet we have a right to say, that Henry was a sound and ripe scholar; and especially, is said by his biographers to have been an excellent Hebrew scholar. We are not to suppose, because no parade of critical learning is exhibited in these volumes, that the Author did not critically examine every text. As the Orator is said to practise the art of eloquence most perfectly, when all appearance of art is concealed; so we may say, that he makes the best use of the critical art in the instruction of the people, who furnishes them with the results, without bringing at all into view the learned process by which they were arrived at. One fact is certain from internal evidence, that Mr. Henry wrote his Commentary on the Old and New Testaments, with the learned compilation of Pool, called Criticorum Synopsis, open before him; as, in all difficult passages, he has judiciously selected that opinion from the many presented in this work, which, upon the whole, seems to be most probable.

But, while we contend that our Author is a sound and ingenious Expositor, as it relates to the literal interpretation of Scripture; yet we do not find his claim to preeminence on his critical acumen, or profound erudition, but on qualities which shall now be distinctly brought into view.

1. To begin, then, with the style of this work, I would remark, that two qualities, not often united, are here combined, perspicuity and conciseness. That the style is perspicuous needs no other proof than the examination of any page of the Exposition. And when I attribute perspicuity to this composition, I use the word in direct reference to the capacity and apprehension of the unlearned reader. A style chiefly formed of words of a foreign origin, may be as perspicuous to a learned man as any other; but not so to the common reader, who is only familiar with that kind of language which is commonly used in conversation. For the most part, Mr. Henry’s style is made up of pure old English words, and therefore it is plain to every class of people; and is also familiar, because the words are the same as those all are accustomed to hear every day.

But it will not be so readily granted that the style is concise. The number and size of the volumes seem to lead to a different conclusion. And, indeed, when we see six folio volumes, written by one hand, the presumption is very natural and strong, that he must be a diffuse writer. This, however, in regard to our Expositor, is not the fact. There are few books, in the English language, written in a more concise, sententious style, than Henry’s Exposition. On examination, very few expletives will be found. Every word speaks, and every sentence is pregnant with meaning; so that I do not know how the book could be abridged in any other way than by leaving out a part of its contents. And we must distinguish between a long discourse and one which is diffuse: a short work may be very diffuse, while one of great length may not have a superfluous word.

2. Another quality of the style of this Commentary is vivacity. This word does not exactly express the idea which I wish to convey, but it comes as near it as any one I can think of at present. I mean that pleasant turn of thought, in which we meet with unexpected associations of ideas, expressed in that concise and pointed form which, on other subjects, would be termed wit. Indeed, if I were permitted to invent a phrase to indicate the quality of which I am now speaking, I would call it spiritual wit. It has, by some, been called a cheerful style; and certainly, the reading of this work has a tendency not only to keep the attention awake, but to diffuse a cheerful emotion through the soul. He must be a very bad man who would become gloomy by the perusal of Henry's Commentary. Now, I need not say how important this quality is in a composition of such extent. Without it, however excellent the matter, weariness would take hold of the reader a thousand times before he had finished the work. This seems to have been the natural turn and complexion of the pious author’s thoughts. There is no affectation; no unnatural comparisons, or strained antitheses. It is true there is an approach to what is called quaintness, and a frequent play on words and phrases of similar sound, but different meaning; but, although these things are not conformable to the standard of modern taste, yet they are very agreeable to the great mass of the people, and give such a zest in the perusal of the work, that we can scarcely allow ourselves to indulge a wish, that the style were in any respect different from what it is.

3. But a characteristic of this Exposition of a more important kind than any that have been mentioned is, the fertility and variety of good sentiment, manifest throughout the work. The mind of the author seems not only to have been imbued with excellent spiritual ideas, but to have teemed with them. It is comparable to a perennial fountain, which continually sends forth streams of living water. In deriving rich instruction and consolation from the sacred oracles, adapted to all the various conditions and characters of men, the author displays a fecundity of thought, and an ingenuity in making the application of divine truth, which strikes us with admiration. The resources of most men would have been exhausted in expounding a few books of the Bible: after which little more could have been expected, than common-place matter, or the continual recurrence of the same ideas: but the riches of our Expositor’s mind seem to have been inexhaustible. He comes to every successive portion of the sacred Scriptures with a fulness and freshness of matter, and with a variety in his remarks, which while it instructs, at the same time refreshes us. Even in his exposition of those books which are very similar in their contents, as the gospels for example, we still find a pleasing variety in the notes of the commentator. It is difficult to conceive how one man should have been able to accomplish such a work, without any falling off in the style of execution.

It is true, indeed, that Mr. Henry did not live to put a finishing hand to the exposition. He had made ample preparations for the completion of the work; but while it was in the press, to the regret of all good men, he was called away from the field of labour. But the providence of God, though mysterious, is always wise. It should be matter of lively gratitude, that this eminent servant of God was permitted to remain so long in our world, and to accomplish so much for the edification of the church, not only in his own, but in all future ages. The commentary was completed by the author, as far as to the end of the Acts of the Apostles: the remaining books were expounded by certain of his friends, who were eminent for their theological knowledge and piety; and who, doubtless, availed themselves of the assistance of his papers, in executing the work, which they respectively undertook. Their names are prefixed to the books on which they severally wrote the commentary; and although the reader will be sensible of the want of Mr. Henry’s peculiar vivacity and happy turn of thought; yet he will find the continuation of the Exposition executed in an able and judicious manner; and with as near an approximation to the author’s inimitable style, as could be expected from other hands.

4. There is perhaps no one thing which gives a more distinctive character to this performance, than the weighty, pithy, pointed sayings, with which it abounds. Whether these apothegms were, generally, the production of the author’s ingenuity, or were collected from the common stock of English proverbs, current in his day, their value is the same to us.

The ancients appear to have understood, better than the moderns, the importance of the method of instruction by proverbs, or aphorisms. It was considered by them the highest effort of wisdom to invent proverbs, parables, or fables, which, in few words, convey much meaning. Several of those, called by way of eminence the wise men of Greece, are celebrated for no other productions, but a few sayings which met with general approbation, and which passed into proverbs. The value of a stock of good proverbs to a nation cannot easily be too highly appreciated. These are kept in constant use and circulation, and are learned by all classes of people, without effort; and become, to the vulgar, the maxims by which life is regulated. Nothing is more common, when a man's judgment has been suspended for a while, than to come to a decision, by the recollection of some proverb, or general maxim. Men are actually influenced by the knowledge which is present to their minds, at the moment when their purpose is formed, and this gives an advantage to apothegms over every other form in which useful knowledge is treasured up. While other learning is like treasure hoarded up, which cannot always be put into circulation at a moment's warning, these are comparable to the current coin of a nation, which is always ready, and always in circulation. Perhaps a man might often be as useful to his country by inventing and putting into general circulation, a few pithy, pointed, moral or prudential maxims, as by writing an elaborate work on moral science, or political economy. It is a fact worthy of notice, that the peasantry or common people in some places, carry on their conversation very much by recollecting and repeating appropriate proverbs; and such people will generally be found to be more than usually discerning and prudent. In the instruction of youth, this easy method of furnishing and fortifying their minds, ought not to be neglected. A father who instils into his children a large stock of sound, practical, moral, and prudential aphorisms, really leaves them a richer inheritance, than if he provided for them as many jewels. We have, moreover, the highest authority for this mode of instruction. The Bible is replete with aphorisms of the most important kind; and one whole book, written by the wisest of men, contains nothing else but proverbs. Besides, many of our Lord's instructions were delivered in this form.

One of the most useful and esteemed works of the celebrated Erasmus, is, a collection of aphorisms, from all the writings of the Greek and Roman authors; and he who should judiciously make a collection of useful English apothegms, would confer a favour on the public at large. But it has occurred to the writer, many years since, that an excellent and useful little volume of choice sayings, might be collected from Henry's Commentary alone; and if any reader of this work should take the pains to make such a collection for his own use and that of his children or friends, he would never have occasion to repent of his labour. The exuberance of our author's mind in composing such apothegms; or his diligence in collecting them, gives a peculiar stamp to his work, which distinguishes it from all other expositions; and ever will render it valuable, as the repository of a most useful species of learning, not to be found in such abundance, any where else.

5. The next characteristic of the following Exposition, is, the felicity and frequency with which the text, at any time under consideration, is elucidated by parallel passages. If there were no more than a frequent and copious reference to such similar texts, it would not deserve particular notice as forming a distinguishing trait of this performance; for other commentators have exceeded Mr. Henry in this respect; and, indeed, a good concordance, with patient labour, is all that is requisite for the accomplishment of such a work. But in Mr. Henry's references, there is often an ingenuity which borrows light from points where it was not perceived by others to exist. By an unexpected association and comparison of different passages, while he instructs us in that knowledge of the Scriptures which is derived from comparing spiritual things with spiritual, he, at the same time, fills us with an agreeable surprise, at the unlooked for coincidence of points apparently remote from each other.

No one, I think, can read this commentary without being fully satisfied, that the word of God dwelt richly in the mind of its author, in all wisdom and spiritual understanding. Indeed, it would seem that the contents of the Bible were constantly present to his mind, not merely in the way of recollecting them, but by a deep knowledge of their meaning and various bearings; so that he was able to survey each text by the aid of the concentrated light of the whole Bible.

I need not pause to recommend this mode of interpreting Scripture; for it recommends itself to every reflecting mind, and has the authority of apostolic precept. I will only remark, that it affords a double satisfaction to the lover of truth; for while he is thus enabled to understand a particular text more clearly, he, at the same time, discovers the harmony which subsists between all the parts of divine revelation.

The only other thing which I shall mention, as characteristic of this work, is, its evangelical, spiritual, and practical cast. The truths of God are here presented simply, without being complicated with human philosophy, or encumbered with the technical distinctions of scholastic theology, or obscured by the mists of unintelligible metaphysics. Neither is the truth presented in a controversial form, but mostly, as if no controversy existed. No doubt controversy is necessary in its place, but the more it is excluded from the pulpit, and from books intended for the edification of the people at large, the more probability will there be, that the truth will produce its genuine effect.

It has been objected, that the author does not give sufficient prominence to some important truths taught in the word of God;—but, if he has given a sound exposition of those passages in which these doctrines are contained, he has allowed them the same comparative length and breadth which they occupy in the Bible; and has preserved that proportion between the different parts of divine revelation, which the Holy Ghost has established. Indeed, this course is made necessary to the expositor of the whole Bible, unless he would leave his exposition to discuss particular points of doctrine.
Besides, some truths, not more important than many others, occupy a large space in systems of polemic theology, because they have often been opposed or disputed.

No man who has written so much, and expressed so many opinions, as Mr. Henry has done in this commentary, will be likely to have the concurrence of any one thinking man, on every minute point; but it would be extremely difficult to find a book of such extent, which unites so many minds in its approbation. Men, who seem to differ considerably in doctrinal views, read this work respectively, with pleasure and edification. It is no difficult matter, indeed, to ascertain the author's theological opinions which are freely expressed, when the exposition of Scripture requires it; but he is moderate, and cautious of giving offence to those who differ from him; and by his unceasing effort to give a practical turn to every passage, he conciliates the pious reader's mind, even while he delivers opinions which he cannot adopt.

The end at which the author aimed, and of which he never lost sight in expounding a single text, was, to make men wise unto salvation; and the whole tendency of the work is to produce spiritual wisdom, an ardent love of holiness, and a conscientious and diligent regard to all the revealed will of God, in the performance of public and private duties.*

It is an excellency; in this commentary, that the truths of Scripture are adapted, with great spiritual skill, to the various afflictions, conflicts, and temptations which are incident to the Christian life. The erring will here find reproof and direction, the sluggish excitement, the timid encouragement, the mourner comfort, and the growing Christian, confirmation, and increase of knowledge and assurance.

It may be more necessary for the unlearned to read such works as this, than for the learned; yet I am persuaded, that there is no man living, however learned, but might derive much practical instruction from Henry's Exposition of the Bible: and if ministers of the gospel would spend much time in perusing this work, it would manifest itself by the richness and spirituality of their sermons and lectures. The celebrated George Whitefield states, when speaking of his preparation for the work of the ministry, that he had read the whole of Henry's Exposition of the Bible, on his knees. One principal reason why young clergymen, who possess this work, derive less benefit from it than they might, is, that they are in the habit, probably, of merely consulting the work, occasionally, when they want some aid in composing a sermon, or preparing an expository lecture for their people. But the full value of this commentary will never be perceived by those who thus use it. It should be carefully read, in course, and with a view to personal improvement. It is a melancholy fact, that our intellect may be vigorously exercised in discovering and arranging truths of the most important and practical kind, without the least personal edification. This is one of the many snares to which preachers of the gospel are liable, and from which it results, that their hearers often derive much more benefit from their studies, than they do themselves. It would be a great point gained, if ministers could learn the art of studying their sermons with the heart as well as the head; and I know of few things which would more effectually tend to bring this about, than a frequent and serious perusal of Henry's Commentary, especially if fervent prayer were combined with the reading.

But after all that I have said, with the view of exhibiting the characteristics of this work, I am sensible that such general description can, at best, afford but inadequate ideas of the spirit and style of an author, so peculiar in his manner. There is in good writing, as in the human countenance, an expression, which mere words cannot depict. There is a penetrating savour,—a diffusive spirit, which takes hold of the feelings of the reader, and for the time, assimilates his emotions and sentiments to those of the writer. To understand how this effect is produced by the tones of the living voice, accompanied with the animated expression of the countenance of a public speaker, is not so difficult; but to explain how the composition of one, long since dead, should still retain that penetrating, spirit-stirring energy, which we find in the writings of men, whose hearts were warm with holy affections, is not easy. The fact, however, is certain; we experience the salutary effect, when we peruse their works. In reading for edification, therefore, it is of much greater utility to apply ourselves to the writings of men, who, while they wrote, felt the sacred flame of divine love glowing in their breasts, than to such as excel in mere intellectual vigour, or in elegance of style.

My principal object in this preface is, to persuade those who may take the trouble to read it, to enter seriously and resolutely on the perusal of the following work. Whatever other books of this kind may be possessed, still Henry's Exposition will prove a treasure to any family, if it be diligently studied; without which no book can be useful.

Hitherto, this commentary has not been in general use in this country, because copies were not abundant; and the price of the work placed it beyond the reach of many, who would have been much pleased to possess it: but now, when a cheap, handsome American edition is issuing from the press, there is the best reason to hope, that it will be widely circulated and extensively read. It is worthy of notice, also, that the work is now presented to the public, not only in a very clear type, but also in a portable and convenient form. Many persons, who have not much leisure for reading, are intimidated at the sight of folio volumes; and to every one their use is inconvenient. But I am still apprehensive, that the number and bulk of the volumes, will be a formidable obstacle to many. They will be apt to think, that they have neither time nor patience to finish such a task, and therefore will be disposed to decline the undertaking. But such persons ought to reflect, that it will not be necessary to read the whole, to obtain the benefit of a part; a single book perused with care, will not be without its advantage. There is no solid reason, however, for those persons, who sincerely wish to study the Scriptures, to be discouraged by the extent of the work: for, although viewed in mass, it may seem to be an almost endless labour to those who can devote but little time to reading; yet, if any one would form a simple calculation, he would find, that the task can be accomplished with ease, in a very reasonable time.
Let us suppose, that only one half hour be appropriated to the perusal of this commentary in each of the days of the week, except the Lord’s day, on which two hours might be conveniently spent in this exercise; and at this moderate rate of progress, the whole work would be finished in less than three years.

But although we have spoken of this undertaking as a “labour” and “a task,” yet we are confident, that to the reader who thirsts for an increase of divine knowledge, it would be found, on experiment, to be a very precious privilege. Such a person would experience so much pleasure in the contemplation of scriptural truth, as here exhibited, and would find his mind so enriched with spiritual thoughts, that he would contract a lively relish for the exercise, and would be drawn to his work, when the season of performing it occurred, with something of the same strength of appetite, as that which urges him to partake of his daily food; and would feel the privation as sensibly when debarred from it, as when prevented from taking his usual bodily repast.

Citizens, who have been long accustomed to spend an hour, in the morning, in reading the news of the day, when, by any circumstance, this gratification is abstracted from them, appear really to feel as much uneasiness, as if prevented from breaking their fast. And why may not a spiritual taste become as lively, as that which is experienced for the contents of a newspaper? Why may we not enjoy the contemplation of divine things with as strong a zest, as knowledge of another kind? Surely nothing is wanting to produce this effect, but a right disposition in ourselves. And the person who thus contracts a taste for the contents of these volumes, will find means for redeeming more time for reading than we have specified; so that the work, for which we have allowed three years, would, by many, be completed in one. And this exposition is not a composition of that kind, which when once read, leaves no desire for a second perusal, but the spiritual reader will be led to mark many passages for a repertusal; not because they were not understood at first, but because they afforded him so much delight, or communicated such seasonable instruction, that he desires to come again and again to the fountain that he may be refreshed and strengthened.

But while we wish to raise in the minds of our readers a high estimation of the value of Henry’s Commentary, we would not dismiss the subject without observing, that whatever lustre the work possesses, it is all borrowed. The light with which it shines is reflected light. The whole value of this or any other similar work, consists merely in holding up clearly and distinctly, the truth which is contained in the sacred records. And whatever of spiritual wisdom, or of the savour of piety, is found in these pages, was all derived from the influence of that Holy Spirit, who inspired the prophets and apostles to write the Scriptures, and who still bestows grace and spiritual endowments on his chosen servants, by which they are qualified, to preach and write, in such a manner, as to promote the edification of his church. In every age, God raises up men for the defence of the gospel, and also for the exposition of his word; and some of these are honoured not only with usefulness while they live, but with more abundant and extensive usefulness after their decease; so that being dead they still speak. It is impossible to calculate how much good has been, and will still be effected by the pious labours of such men as Henry and Scott. Their works will be read in regions so remote and obscure, that they never came to the knowledge of the pious writers. They will be read in the distant islands of the Pacific, and in the central regions of Africa, as well as in the most retired recesses of our own country. What an encouragement is this for men, who have the ability, to labour indefatigably in the communication and diffusion of divine truth? Of books we have a superabundance, but of books of the proper kind, we have not half enough. Copies of works of undisputed excellence ought to be multiplied, until all who can read are supplied with the precious treasure.

But let God have the glory of every invention, of every gift, and of every work, by which the progress and diffusion of truth are promoted or facilitated; and let all that is said in praise of men, be so spoken, as to redound to the honour and glory of the Triune God!—Amen.

REV. MATTHEW HENRY.

MOST readers of a work which has acquired any degree of celebrity, feel a desire to know something of the author; and that desire is increased, in proportion as they find themselves interested in the work itself. It may therefore be presumed, that the readers of Mr. Henry's writings, which have long been in high repute in the religious world, will wish for some information concerning the character and life of that excellent man, whose pen produced so many admirable performances. This is not merely an innocent, but a laudable curiosity, which we are happy to have the present opportunity of gratifying, on the republication of his smaller pieces, as well as his larger work on the Bible; most of which pieces have long been out of print; and we are persuaded, that the more the author is known, the greater pleasure pious readers will feel in the perusal of his writings.

A Life of Mr. Henry was published, shortly after his decease, by his intimate friend, the Rev. Mr. Town, but it is now become exceedingly scarce; and though it contains a just character and a faithful narrative, drawn from personal knowledge, as well as from private papers, the manner in which it is drawn up is not the most pleasing, the writer being then far advanced in life; and it is rendered prolix, and even tedious, by the insertion of too many extracts from his diary, and too many articles relative to Mr. Henry's acquaintance and his own, as well as various other particulars, which at this distance of time are become uninteresting. On these accounts it was judged advisable, instead of reprinting that work, to compose a new one. In this, however, all that appeared interesting in the former is retained, and whatever else could be collected, is inserted, particularly in relation to his settlement at Hackney, where some persons were living when the writer of this first came to that place, who had the happiness to be Mr. Henry's hearers, and remembered him well.

Mr. Matthew Henry was the second son of the eminently pious and excellent Mr. Philip Henry, whose Life, published by him, is an admirable piece of biography, and who was ejected by the Act of Uniformity from his living in the parish of Worthenbury, in Flintshire, A. D. 1662. This his son was born October 28, in the same year, which also, he observes with pleasure in his diary, gave birth to many other ministers of his acquaintance, to whom God had appointed more peaceful days than their predecessors, whom their brethren, who hated them, had cast out. His birthplace was Broad-Oak, in Iscoyld, Flintshire, within the parish of Malpall, which is in Cheshire; a district signalized in the British annals for the famous monastery of Bangor. Hither his father removed but a fortnight before his birth, not being suffered any longer to continue in the place of his former ministry; and here he spent the remainder of his days. Mr. Henry's mother was Mrs. Katharine Matthews, the daughter and heiress of Mr. Daniel Matthews, a gentleman of an ancient family and a considerable estate, which, upon his death, came into the possession of Mr. Philip Henry, by which he was enabled to live in comfort after his ejectment, and not only preach the gospel gratis, as he had opportunity, but likewise to relieve several of his necessitous brethren. But his wife proved to him a greater treasure, as she was a woman equally pious and of every other endowment. Her son has done ample justice to her character, in an excellent discourse, occasioned by her death, on Prov. xxxi. 28. Her children arise up, and call her blessed. It is subjoined to the Life of his father.

The circumstances of Mr. Henry's birth were rather remarkable. Besides its being premature, (as the writer of this has been credibly informed,) his mother's labour was so sudden, that she was delivered before any assistance could be procured; and he was so weakly a child that no one expected him to live. He was therefore baptized the next day after he was born, by Mr. Holland, the minister of the parish, without godfather or godmother; and his father desired the sign of the cross might not be used, but the minister said he durst not omit it.

When he was about five years old, he had the meases, by which his brother, who was a year older than himself, was cut off; a circumstance which deeply affected him, and which he noticed with great seriousness, in a paper written on his birth day, when he had completed his thirteenth year, wherein he drew out a list of the mercies which he had received, with lively expressions of gratitude to the Author of them. He long continued weakly, subject to agues and other complaints; but he very early discovered a good mental capacity, and a thoughtful turn, so that it was remarked his childhood had less of vanity than that of most children, and that at an earlier period than is usual, he put away childish things. He was able to read a chapter in the Bible distinctly when he was but about three years old, and was used to make pertinent remarks on what he read.

His first abiding convictions of religion, according to his own written account, in the paper above referred to, were wrought when he was ten years of age, in consequence of a sermon preached by his excellent father on Psalm li. 17. The sacrifices of God are a broken spirit; a broken and a contrite heart, O God, thou wilt not despise. "I think it was that," says he, "that melted me: afterward I began to inquire after Christ." He was early accustomed to make memorandums of the sermons which he heard, and of the effect they had upon his mind. From one of these papers, dated December 17, 1673, it appears that he heard a sermon on the signs of true grace, which put him upon the strict examination of himself by the rules which had been laid down; and, after opening his mind to his father, he was encouraged to draw a favourable conclusion respecting his spiritual state. He particularly mentions his repentance for sin, according to the scripture account of it, in many passages which he transcribes; his solemn dedication of himself to the service of God, according to covenant, and his love to God and to his fellow men, evidenced by his love to the people of God, whom he chose as his best companions; and his love to the word of God, concerning which he expresses himself thus: "I esteem it above all; I desire it as the food of my soul; I greatly delight both in reading and hearing it; and my soul can witness subscription to it, in some measure; I think I love the word of God for the purity of it; I love the ministers and messengers of it; I rejoice in the good success of it; all which were given as marks of true love to the word, in a sermon I lately heard, on Psalm cxix. 140. Thy word is very pure, therefore thy servant loveth it.

In the same paper, which contains a catalogue "of the mercies of God to him, both temporal and spiritual," he mentions it as matter of peculiar thankfulness that he was blessed with pious parents, who took so much pains in his education, and by whose means he was brought so early to devote himself to God. After noticing with thankfulness his recovery from an ague which had hung long upon him, he mentions his first application to learning. It will be pleasing to the reader to see his own words.

"After this sickness, in the year 1669, I had health, and began to learn my grammar. Blessed be God that gave me an understanding! Mr. Turner entered me little into the principles of grammar, and my father has carried me on in it; the Lord grant that he may live to perfect it!" As a proof of his affection to this his excellent father, as well as of his piety to God, the following addition is here subjoined: "In March, 1669, my dear father had a sore fever; we thought he would have died; but our extremity was God's opportunity, and he arose and helped us."

It was observed by all who knew him, that he was remarkably quick in learning any thing, and that he possessed a strong memory to retain it. He was early carried to close application to his studies, and remarkably provident of his time; so that his good mother, fearful lest he should injure his health, was sometimes obliged to call him down from his closet and advise him to take a walk in the fields.

His whole conduct, in the happy family of which he was a member, was amiable and exemplary. As he ever manifested the greatest duty and deference to both his pious parents, so he exercised the utmost affection and kindness towards his sisters. They all lived together in the most delightful unity: and he made it his business and his pleasure to promote their interests, both by his admonitions and his prayers. His father recommended it to them to spend an hour together every Saturday afternoon, in religious exercises, with a view to their preparation for the sabbath; and he conducted them with great propriety, to their mutual advantage.

He was always very regardful of his father's instructions, and with uncommon diligence he attended to his preaching; with which he was sometimes so deeply affected, that, as soon as the service was ended, he would retire to his closet, to weep and pray over what he had been hearing, and would hardly be prevailed upon to come down to dinner, lest the memory and impression of it should be effaced. He sometimes took an opportunity, especially in walking with his father, to relate to him the impressions which his discourses made upon him, and to open to him freely any difficulties that occurred to his mind; with what advantage for his further instruction and encouragement, it is not easy to give an account.

It seems that Mr. Henry had an inclination to the ministry from his childhood. This partly appeared in his fondness for imitating preaching, which he did with a great degree of propriety and gravity beyond his years; as also in his frequent attendance at the private meetings of good people, with whom he would pray, and repeat sermons, and sometimes expound the scriptures, to the surprise of all present. One of them once expressed to his father some concern lest his son should be too forward, and fall into the snare of spiritual pride; to whom the good man replied, "Let him go on; he fears God and designs well, and I hope God will keep him and bless him."

Mr. Philip Henry was used generally to have some young student in his house, previous to his entrance into the ministry, who, while he was a pupil to Mr. Henry, acted as a tutor to his children. One of these was Mr. William Turner, who was born in that neighbourhood, and had studied at Edmund Hall, Oxford. He was afterward many years vicar of Walburton, in Sussex, and was the author of a work in folio, on the History of remarkable Providences. He lived with Mr. Henry at the time his son entered on his grammar, and was the person referred to by him in the papers quoted above, as having initiated him into the Latin language; and it may be supposed, from his great piety and studious turn, that he was in other respects useful to him. Mr. M. Henry remained under his father's eye and tuition till he was about eighteen years of age, from which he enjoyed singular advantage for both literary and religious attainments, to qualify him for the ministerial office; and he soon afforded ample proof that he had made good use of the advantage with which his growing years, his mind also improved in knowledge, grace, and holiness, so that he was richly furnished betimes for the important office to which he had devoted his life, and seemed not to need any further assistance than he had enjoyed, or might yet enjoy, under the tuition, and from the example, of such a father, who was not only an excellent scholar himself, but had an admirable method of communicating knowledge to others. He was desirous, however, that his son might enjoy some further advantages in his education at some more public seminary.

to me a most desirable friend, and I love heaven the better since he went thither." Mr. Bury observes, however, that "he had an almost inconceivable quickness in his speech, but that he afterward happily corrected it, as well for his own sake, as for the benefit of others."

Another of Mr. Henry's fellow-students was Mr. Henry Chandler, afterward an eminient minister at Bath, and father of the learned Dr. Chandler, of the Old Jury, London. In a letter to Mr. Tong, he speaks of Mr. Henry in the following laudatory terms: "It is now thirty-five years since I had the happiness of being his fellow student, and it is impossible I should recollect the several [particulars] that fixed in me such an honourable idea of him, that nothing can efface while life and reason last. This I perfectly well remember; that, for serious piety and the most obliging behaviour, he was universally beloved by all the house. We were near thirty pupils when Mr. Henry grasped and entertained the family, and I remember not that ever I heard one of the number speak a word to his disapprobation. I am sure it was the common opinion, that he was as sweet tempered, courteous, and obliging a gentleman as could come into a house; his going from us was universally lamented."

How long he continued with Mr. Dowlittle is not quite certain. Such was the persecuting temper of the times, that this good man was obliged to leave Islington, [upon which he removed to Battersea,) and speaks of his pupils into private families at Clapham, to which place does not appear that Mr. Henry followed them. It is certain, however, that when he quitted this academy, he returned to his father's house, where he pursued his studies with great assiduity. Among his papers is one dated Broad-Oak, 1682, (about which time it seems probable that he returned thither,) which is a memorial of the mercies which he had received from the hand of God from his birth to that time, which was his birthday: it consists of twenty six particulars, and discovers a lively spirit of devotion.

Mr. Henry was now twenty years of age, and had made great improvement in all the branches of science, which tended to fit him for appearing with great advantage under the ministerial character. But it does not appear that he had yet begun to exercise his talents in public. He was, however, frequently engaged in social exercises of devotion among the good people of his father's acquaintance; and particularly who resorted to that house of prayer. His company was much coveted by them, and they were highly gratified by his visits, which he was ever ready to make to the meanest of them; when he was used to pray with them, and converse with great freedom, affection, and judgment, on their spiritual concerns. Greatly delighted were they to see such a son treading so closely in the steps of such a father; and his memory was long precious in that neighbourhood, and in the adjacent country, where Mr. Philip Henry used frequently to preach in the houses of those pious gentlemen who entertained the ejected ministers, though they generally attended the worship of the established church.

As the times were dark, and the circumstances of dissenting ministers were very discouraging, Mr. Henry had no prospect of a pastoral settlement with a congregation; he therefore, with the advice of friends, directed his thoughts to another and very different employment. He had formed an intimacy with Rowland Hunt, Esq. of Borecaton, who married the daughter of Lord Paget, and at whose house Mr. P. Henry used to preach once a quarter, and administer the Lord's supper. This worthy gentleman advised his father to enter him in one of the Inns of court, for the study of the law. His view in this was not to divert him from his design of pursuing the work of the ministry, but to find him some present employment of his time, as he was but young, which might hereafter be advantageous to him, not only in a temporal view, as he was heir to a handsome estate, but as it might be subservient to his usefulness as a minister. Accordingly, Mr. Henry went to Gray's-Inn, about the end of April, 1685.

Some of his friends discovered painful apprehensions lest this situation, and the connexions he might here form, should prove unfavourable to his religious interest, and, in the issue, divert him from the sacred office to which his former studies had been directed, and for which he discovered such peculiar qualifications. But their fears happily proved groundless; his heart was fully bent for God, and established with grace; so that he still maintained his steadfastness amidst all the temptations with which he was surrounded. He happily formed an acquaintance with several young gentlemen, then students of the law, who were exemplary for sobriety, diligence, and religion, who were glad to receive him as an intimate associate, and with whom a mutual friendship continued to the last. Here his diligence in study and active spirit were quickly discovered by his tenacious memory, and his ready utterance, induced some of the profession to think of him who would have been eminent in the practice of the law, and who applied himself to it as his business. But he felt himself under no temptation to relinquish the object of his first resolution, and he continually kept that in his view, habituating himself to those exercises which might further his preparation for it. He heard the most celebrated preachers in town; among whom he seemed to be best pleased with Dr. Stillingleft, at St. Andrew's, Holborn, for his serious, practical preaching; and with Dr. Tillotson, at Lawrence Jewry, for his admirable sermons against popery. He accustomed himself to take notes of what he heard; and he constantly sent a short scheme of the sermons to his father, to whom he generally wrote twice every week, giving him an account of all remarkable occurrences with great judgment, yet with all the caution and prudence which the difficulties of the times required.

During his residence in London, Mr. Henry not only attended with constancy on the public worship of God, but he promoted social prayer and religious conference with his particular friends, and he sometimes expanded the scripture to them. When he was about to leave them he delivered to them an excellent and affecting discourse, on 2 Thess. ii. 1. By the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ, and our gathering together unto him; recommending to himself and them the hope of that blessed meeting, as their greatest comfort, now they were about to part. The letters which he wrote to his friends while he continued at Gray's-Inn, discover the lively sense of divine things which he preserved upon his removal thence, and which he published in the following letter to Mr. G. Ilridge, of Nantwich, whose father's Memoirs he hereafter printed: from whence it appears he could not persuade a correspondent he was, and how much he aimed at usefulness, in his letters as well as in his conversation.

But though his time was not unprofitably spent in London, he sometimes complained of the want which he felt of those opportunities which he had enjoyed in his father's house; his "Broad-Oak sabbaths, and the heavenly manna," which he had tasted there; and expressed his earnest wishes to return. Accordingly in the month of June, 1686, he went down to Broad-Oak, and continued several months in the country; when he made it appear that his residence in London, and his study of the law, had been no way prejudicial to his religious temper, or his ministerial qualifications. He now began to preach frequently as a candidate for the ministry, and he every where met with great acceptance.

About this time he went to visit his friend Mr. Illidge, at Nantwich, who had been in a remarkable manner brought to a sense of his own sin by the doctrine of Mr. P. Henry, and who was very zealous in procuring the spiritual benefit of his neighbours. Mr. M. Henry spent several days with him, and preached in his house every evening to a considerable number of people, of whom several dissenting persons appeared to be deeply impressed with what they heard. One instance was very remarkable. The last evening, Mr. Henry preached on Job xxxvii. 22. With God is terrible majesty. Mr. Illidge, observing one man present whom he knew to be notoriously wicked, went the next morning to his house, to see what impression this alarming discourse had made upon him; when he found him in tears, under a deep conviction of sin, and the apprehension of misery. He found his wife also weeping with him, on account of her husband's distress. Mr. Illidge gave him the best instruction he could, and prayed with him to find the comfort he sought for. The next day the man came to Mr. Illidge, and said that he had been induced to seek after a new and better course of life; and shortly after he was received into the Broad Oak congregation. He had been a drunkard, and now appeared a great change in him. He manifested a deep and abiding concern about his eternal state, and that of his wife, whom he taught to read. He set up prayer in his family, went often to the meeting at Broad-Oak, and at length was admitted to the Lord's supper. He sometimes spoke of the joy he felt at the remembrance of what God had done for him, and he maintained a hopeful profession of religion for some years. His wife also gave proof of her conversion, and died, to all appearance, a good Christian. But he afterward relapsed into sin, to the great grief of his best friends, and the dishonour of religion. Whether he was effectually recovered does not appear.

Mr. Henry's great acceptance and success, at the commencement of his ministry, encouraged him to prosecute it with increasing ardour. Having occasion to take a journey to Chester, some good people there, who had heard of his fame, desired him to preach to them one evening in a private house; liberty for public worship not being yet granted. He readily consented, and preached three evenings successively at different houses in the city. The specimen which these good people had now received of his talents excited in them an earnest desire to have him settle with them; having about two years before, lost two aged and faithful ministers; and another in the city, Mr. Harvey, being far advanced in years, and preaching very privately. Being encouraged by a prevailing report that government was disposed to grant indulgence to dissenters, some of them went about the latter end of the year to Broad-Oak, to express to him their wish that he would accept of their offer and settle among them. He returned to his father, and thinking there was the voice of Providence in the affair, he gave them some encouragement to hope for a compliance with their invitation, if liberty should be granted, provided Mr. Harvey consented, and they would wait till his return from London, where he was going to reside some months. They expressed their readiness to receive him upon his own terms, and in his own time. On the 24th of January, 1687, he set out for London with the only son of his friend Mr. Hunt. At Coventry he heard that there had been a fire at Gray's-Inn, and at Holborn's-Court, where he had a chamber; upon which he wrote to his father, that he expected that the effects which he had left there were all lost; but on his arrival, he had the pleasure to find that, by the care of a chamber-fellow, most of his books were saved. The first of February, Mr. Harvey arrived. The news was soon after communicated to the dissenters, and had empowered certain gentlemen to give out licenses; the price of one for a single person was ten pounds; but if several joined, sixteen pounds; and eight persons might join in taking out one license.

Not many dissenters took out these licenses; but the disposition of the court being sufficiently understood, many began to meet publicly. About the end of February, Mr. Henry wrote to his father, that Mr. Falde, a congregational minister, had preached, both morning and afternoon, to many hundred people, at Mr. Schater's meeting in Moorfields. The people of Chester now reminded him of his engagements to them, the propriety of which he had some reason to doubt; he therefore requested and learned Mr. Woodcock came to him, and told him that he wished to engage him in a lecture which was set up chiefly for young persons; but thanking him for his respect, he modestly declined the offer, and said that his service was most wanted in the country, and might be most suitable there.

Mr. Henry now began to think seriously on the business of ordination, and consulted some ministers about it, particularly Mr. Tallents, of Salep, who had some time in London, and Mr. James Owen, who was lately come up from Oswestry, both of whom had known him from his childhood, and they gave him all possible encouragement in this design. He viewed the ministerial office in so awful a light, that he set himself to consider the engagement into which a person enters in his ordination to it, with that seriousness. He drew up, on this occasion, chiefly for his own use, a discourse on 1 Tim. iv. 15. Give thyself wholly to them; in which he stated the nature and several parts of the ministerial work, and what it is for a man to be wholly in them, (as it is in the Greek,) and then proceeded thoroughly to examine his own heart, with respect to his fitness for them. The paper is entitled, "Serious Self-examination before Ordination;" with this text prefixed: Search me, O God, and know my heart, &c. "It is worth while," says he, "for a man at such a time, deliberately to ask himself, and conscientiously to answer, the six following questions: 1. What am I? 2. What have I done? 3. From what principles do I act in this undertaking? 4. What are the ends I aim at in it? 5. What will be the end of it? 6. What will be your interest in the whole of this?" To each of these questions he gives a distinct answer, in several particulars, at a very considerable length, which fill more than four large folio pages. The whole discovers the utmost seriousness, humility, and conscientious regard to truth and duty. About this time a respectable person, whom he had consulted about his ordination, intimated to him an apprehension that he might possibly obtain it from one of the bishops, without those oaths and declarations to which the dissenters objected. This probably took its rise from the moderation which the clergy were now disposed to show towards the nonconformists, in consequence of the king's declaration for liberty of conscience, which they knew originated in his intention to promote property. Whether there was any solid ground for the apprehension or not, it appeared that the inclination of his friend induced Mr. Henry to investigate the question with the utmost care and impartiality, "Whether it be advisable for one that hath devoted himself to the service of God in the work of the ministry, but is by no means satisfied with the terms of conformity, to choose ordination by episcopal hands (if it may be had without any oaths and subscriptions) rather than ordination by presbyters." Having fairly stated, in writing, (dated April 28, 1667,) the arguments which occurred to him on both sides, with earnest prayer for direction, he determined for the negative, and applied to those ministers in London to whom he was best known, for their assistance in the solemn service.

On the 5th of May, these ministers met on the occasion, but where it was we have no account. The times were such as rendered a private ordination most ineligible, in the opinion of the ordinaries, who were all of the Presbyterian denomination, and who conducted the service in the manner which was common among the Presbyterians of that day, and long after. We have no information respecting either a sermon or a charge delivered, as is usual on such occasions; but among Mr. Henry's papers was found the Latin Thesis which he delivered on the question—An justificemur Fide absque offeribus Legis? Affirmata.—Mr. Tong has given an abstract of it, and has subjoined Mr. Henry's confession of faith, which perfectly agrees with the Assembly's Catechism.

For the same reason, the ordinaries chose to have the service performed in private, they declined giving a certificate of the ordination in the usual form, (which seemed to be an excess of caution,) and only gave this brief testimonial:

"We, whose names are subscribed, are well assured that Mr. Matthew Henry is an ordained minister of the gospel.

Sic Tector, W. Wickens, FRAN. TALLENTS, EDM. LAWRENCE, NATH. VINCENT JAMES OWEN, RICH. STEELE,"

Of so much importance was a regular certificate of Presbyterian ordination esteemed in those days, that Mr. Henry, after he had been settled many years, and had many living witnesses to witness for him, applied to the ordinaries then living to give him a certificate in form; which had the signatures of Mr. Tallents and Mr. Owen, dated Dec. 17, 1702. It was remarkable, that one of the above ministers who engaged in Mr. Matthew Henry's ordination, was also employed in the ordination of his excellent father, Mr. Philip Henry, near thirty years before. This was Mr. Richard Steele, the author of that valuable work on Cato.

Mr. Henry, soon after his ordination, hastened down to Chester, to enter upon his pastoral charge. He left London the latter end of May, and went first to Broad-Oak, where he stayed but a short time. Several persons of the congregation came to meet him there, and conducted him to Chester, where it is needless to say how joyfully he was received, especially on account of the liberty which was now granted to the dissenters, though the object of the king in granting it was sufficiently known. Worship had hitherto been kept up in the house of Mr. Henthorne, which was large and commodious, but only between and after the hours of public service at the established church, where most of the people attended to hear Dr. Fogg and Dr. Hancock, whose ministry they highly approved. Their attendance, however, so much increased, that it was found necessary to provide a larger place. With this Mr. Henthorne, who was zealous in the cause, soon accommodated them against the time of Mr. Henry's coming; having a large out-building belonging to the Friary, which was in his possession. The work of fitting it up was begun on a Monday, and it was in sufficient forwardness to be opened for worship the next Lord's day. But Mr. Henry did not arrive till the Thursday following, which was the lecture-day, when he preached his first sermon, on 1 Cor. ii. 2. I determined not to know any thing among you, save Jesus Christ, and him crucified. Mr. Tong, who was present on the occasion, says, "I am a witness that they received him as an angel of God." But before he would preach, such was his respect to the aged and worthy Mr. Harvey, that he made him a visit, in order to be satisfied that his coming to Chester was with his approbation. After it, he assured him that he would return. The good old man soon satisfied him on this head, telling him that there was work enough in Chester for them both. They afterward lived in the most perfect harmony. Mr. Henry constantly attended his Tuesday lecture, and always behaved towards him as a son to a father. He also advised all his friends to show him all possible respect, as a faithful minister of Christ, who had many years laboured there in the gospel, and had also been a sufferer for it.

Mr. Henry's situation at Chester proved highly agreeable to him, on account of the valuable society he met with there, and it was soon rendered the more so, as three of his sisters were providentially brought to reside in that place, in consequence of their being married to respectable and pious men, who belonged to his congregation, (Mr. Radford, Mr. Holten, and Dr. Tilston,) to whom he conducted himself with a truly fraternal affection. But a yet more agreeable and important circumstance was his entrance into the conjugal state, with a lady who was possessed of every qualification to render that state happy. This was Mrs. Katharine, daughter of Mr. John Hardware, of Moldsworth. On his first proposal, some obstacles lay in the way, but they were so completely removed, that the match was as agreeable to her parents as it was to his, so that they came to reside at Chester, and they all lived together. But this pleasing scene, like many earthly ones, was of very short continuance: for within a year and a half Mrs. Henry was seized, in childbed, with the smallpox; and died, Feb. 14, 1689, though the child was spared. Mr. Tong, who lived within eighteen miles, came to visit this house of mourning; who, having described the manner in which the tender mother was affected, says of Mr. Henry, the first words he spoke to him, with many tears were these: "I know nothing could support me under such a loss as this, but the good hope I have that she is gone to heaven, and that in a little time I shall follow her thither."

It was no small alleviation of his grief, that the child was spared. His good father came to visit him on the occasion, when he baptized the child in public, and the scene was peculiarly solemn and affecting. Mr. Henry, on presenting his child in baptism, (whom he named after her mother,) professed his faith and renewed his covenant, in a most affecting manner, and then added, "Although my house be not so with God, yet he hath made with me an everlasting covenant, &c. I offer up this my child to the great God, a plant out of a dry ground, desiring it may be implanted into Christ." Every heart was full, and few dry eyes were seen.
Under this severe affliction, God strengthened his heart and his hands, so that he pursued his work with his usual diligence and vivacity. At length a kind providence repaired his loss, and the mother of his deceased child was enabled to procure his another. She made a present to the daughter of Robert Warburton, Esq. of Grange, the son of Peter Warburton, Esq. serjeant at law, and one of the judges of the common pleas. He was a gentleman fond of retirement, who constantly had the Bible and Baxter’s “Saint’s Rest” on the table before him, and whose house was a sanctuary to the silenced ministers.

Mr. Henry’s marriage to this lady was consummated, July 8th, the same year, at Grange, when both his father and mother were present, who were greatly pleased with the new relation, and blessed God who had thus filled up the breach. Mr. and Mrs. Hardware now left Chester, and retired to an estate which they had in Wirral, but their affection for Mr. Henry as a son continued.

From a particular wish to keep a regular journal of all material occurrences and useful passages to the end of his life; a practice which he had lately recommended to his friends, in a discourse on Redeeming the time. From this diary of his the following part of his history is principally taken.—We shall now give some account of his family by this second marriage, and the manner in which he governed it.

In the space of twenty two years he had nine children, eight of which were daughters. Three of them, namely, the first, second, and fourth, died in their infancy. The first of these children was born, April 12, 1691, on which occasion he made his will; but she died in about a year and a half. In his diary he makes many pious remarks on this event, and the night of her funeral he writes thus: I have been this day doing a work I never did before—burying a child. A sad day’s work! But my good friend, Mr. Lawrence, preached very sweetly and excellently, from Psalm xxxix. 9. I was dumb, I opened not my mouth, because thou didst it.

On the birth of the fourth of these children, he writes, June 24, 1697, “This child has come into a world of tears;” for his pious father, who had taken a pleasure in coming to baptize his grandchildren, (which he did in a peculiarly interesting manner,) was now dead, and he was particularly affected at the recollection of that event, as it happened the very same day of the month the preceding year. But says he, “God has set the one over against the other, that I may sing of mercy and judgment.” But this child was taken away in less than a year and a half; upon which occasion he writes, “My desire is to be sensible of the affliction, and yet I am at present under it. It is a smarting rod; God calls my sins to remember, and now with more than ordinary sensibility of love, my absence of spiritual comforts.” But he adds, “Tis a rod in the hand of my Father. I desire to see a father’s authority, who may do what he will; and a father’s love, who will do what is best. We resign the soul of the child to Him who gave it. I am in deaths often; Lord, teach me how to die daily.” &c.

On May 3, 1700, God was pleased to give him a son. But his birth was attended with such uncommon danger both to the mother and the child, that he mentions it as a miracle of mercy that their lives were spared. This child Mr. Henry himself baptized on the lecture day, in the following week, by the name of Philip,* when he preached on the occasion from 2 Sam. vii. 14. 15. When this child was about a month old, he was so ill that there was but little hope of his recovery; and Mrs. Henry continued in such weakness, increased by her anxiety about her infant, that she, and all her friends, expected her speedy dissolution. But God mercifully interposed, and restored both her and her child. On this occasion Mr. Henry made a new will, which he did with exemplary prudence and seriousness, earnestly begging divine direction in this matter, as he did in every other, respecting himself, his family, and his friends. His diary affords ample proof how he acknowledged God in all his ways, and what an affectionate interest he took in the concerns of all with whom he was connected.

We shall now notice his conduct in his family, which was in a great measure regulated by the example of his pious father, of whose absence those who were more attached to it were ready to say, This is no other than the house of God, and the gate of heaven. Mr. Henry was constant in the worship of God in his family, morning and evening, which nothing was suffered to prevent. He called all the members of it together as early in the morning as circumstances would permit; and he did not delay it to a late hour in the evening, lest drowsiness should prevent devotion. He was never tedious, but always full and comprehensive, performing much in a little time, which seldom exceeded half an hour. He began with a short invocation for assistance and acceptance. He then read a portion of scripture, (in the morning from the Old Testament, and from the New in the evening,) giving a short exposition, in a plain and familiar manner, so as to render it both intelligible and pleasant, and added practical reflections. To engage the greater attention, he used to examine some of his family how they understood, and what they remembered of what they had heard. After this, some part of a psalm was constantly sung, from a collection which he himself made, entitled, “Family Hymns,” selected from different translations of the psalms; and every one had a book, to prevent the interruption occasioned by reading the lines. After singing, he prayed with great affection and propriety, noticing every particular case in his family, and not omitting the state of the nation and the church. This variety prevented the service from being tedious, and his whole family attended it with pleasure. When the whole was ended, the children came to him for his blessing, which he gave with solemnity and affection.

Beside his stated family worship, he occasionally kept family fasts, as special circumstances required; which were sometimes assisted with the attendance of his friends, whose respective cases and trials were committed to God with his own.

On the Lord’s day he did not omit any part of his ordinary family worship, but rising earlier on that day, after his private devotion he began it somewhat sooner. On returning from the public morning service, after he had dined, he sung a psalm, offered a short prayer, and then retired till the time of the afternoon service. In the evening he usually repeated the substance of both his sermons, in his family, when many of his neighbours came in: this he followed with singing and prayer, and concluded with singing verses two more, previous to the benediction. Before supper, he preached the 16th Psalm, and catechised the elder children and servants; examined them as to what they remembered of the sermons, and concluded the day with prayer. Having a happy constitution both of body and of mind, he went through all this service with constancy and comfort, beside all

* It appears that he took the name of Warburton, upon inheriting the estate of his maternal grandfather; and there was too great a propriety in his relinquishing the name of Henry, as he had departed from the spirit of his pious ancestors of that name. But his father, who often tenderly mentions him in his diary, did not live to witness the unhappy change.
his ministerial work in public, which he performed without any assistance, and which we now proceed to notice.

Mr. Henry having chosen the christian ministry as the grand business of his life, set himself to discharge the duties of it, as soon as he obtained a suitable situation with indefatigable industry and with equal delight, being willing to spend and be spent in the service of Christ, and for the good of souls. His stated public services in his own congregation, which were far from the whole of his labours, were such as few other persons could have gone through. His method of proceeding in them was as follows:

He began the public worship exactly at nine o'clock, with singing the 106th Psalm; then offered a short prayer, and next read some portion of the Old Testament in course, and expounded it in the same manner as appears in his printed Exposition. He went through the Bible twice while he was at Chester, and on his lecture-day he expounded all the Psalms not less than five times. After his public expension was ended, he sung a second time, and prayed for about half an hour. After which he preached about an hour longer, and sometimes he used the 117th Psalm twice, and again at the close of the afternoon, excepting that he then expounded the New Testament, and at the close sung the 134th Psalm, or some verses of the 136th. In singing, he always made use of David's Psalms, or other scripture hymns, which he preferred to such as are wholly of human composition, the latter being generally liable to this exception: "that the fancy is too high, and the matter too low, and sometimes such as a wise and good man may not be able, with entire satisfaction, to offer up as a sacrifice to God." In this work of praise he took great delight, as appeared from the manner in which he engaged in it.

In prayer, Mr. Henry's gifts and graces eminently appeared. He had a wonderful faculty of engaging the attention of his hearers, and raising the affections of the worshippers. Though in his second prayer he was always copious, yet he was not tedious. It was always suited to the congregation, to the sermon, to the state of the nation, and to the church of God. His petitions for the afflicted were very particular, pertinent, and affectionate. In regard to public affairs, he was never guilty of profaning the worship of God by introducing any thing obnoxious to government, or offensive to persons of any party; nor, on the other hand, by giving flattering titles to any description of men. The state of the reformed churches abroad was much upon his heart, and he was a fervent intercessor for those of them that suffered persecution for righteousness' sake.

How great a talent he had in preaching, is sufficiently known, from the many sermons of his which are published in the public. He was very happy in his choice of subjects, and of apposite texts, especially on particular occasions and occurrences, public or private, which he was always ready to improve. His method in his sermons was just and easy; his language plain, sententious, and scriptural; his exegesis natural, and free from any odd or affected tone; his address was popular, earnest, and affectionate; both he himself and his auditory were often transported into tears. The strain of his preaching was spiritual, evangelical, and practical. He shunned not to declare the whole counsel of God. He delighted in preaching Christ and the doctrines of free grace; but with equal zeal he preached up holiness in all its branches, constantly affirming it to be a faithful saying, That they who believe in God should be careful to maintain godly conversation. He was indeed so practical a preacher, and sometimes used such a phraseology in treating on practical subjects, that some were convinced him as being too legal; but he was no more of a legalist than the apostle James, whom he knew well how to reconcile with the apostle Paul.

It was a common custom with Mr. Henry to preach a series of sermons upon a particular subject, which sometimes took up several years. But he did not follow the practice of several old divines, who delivered a great number of discourses on the same text: his method was, to prevent the tediousness of such a practice, to fix upon different texts for all the different parts of the subject which he discussed. By thus treating upon the various branches of faith and practice in this connected view, as well as by his exposition of the Bible in course, his hearers had peculiar advantage for improving in scripture knowledge, above those who were accustomed to pass through the same text in the same week. He was much remarked, that Mr. Henry's people in general greatly excelled in judgment and spiritual understanding.

Mr. Tong has given a list of the subjects which Mr. Henry thus discussed in their connexion, which would here occupy too much room. The following is a brief specimen. Soon after he settled at Chester, he delivered a set of sermons on the guilt and misery of an unconverted state, from several texts: in another, he treated on conversions. After these, he preached a series of discourses on a well ordered conversation, beginning with one on Psalm I. 23. Each sermon contained a distinct direction, grounded on a separate text. A brief sketch of these may be acceptable and useful. 1. Fix a right principle of grace in the heart, 2 Cor. i. 12. latter part. 2. Eye the gospel of Christ as your great rule, Phil. i. 27. 3. Set the Lord always before you, Ps. xvi. 8. 4. Keep your hearts with all diligence, Prov. iv. 23. 5. Abide under the fear of God, Prov. xxiii. 17. 6. Be not conformed to the world, Rom. xii. 2. 7. Live in constant dependence upon Christ, Col. iii. 17. 8. Take off your affections from present things, 1 John ii. 15. 9. Be always upon your watch, Matt. xxiv. 33. 10. Keep a consciousness void of offence, Acts xxxiv. 16. 11. Live by faith, Gal. ii. 20. 12. Commune much with your own hearts, Ps. iv. 13. 13. Watch the door of your lips, Ps. xxxix. 14. 14. Follow the steps of the Lord Jesus, 1 Pet. ii. 21. 15. Set before you the example of the saints, Heb. vi. 12. 16. Be very cautious of your company, Prov. xiii. 20. 17. Make conscience how you spend your time, Eph. v. 16. 18. Pray to God for holy wisdom, James v. 1. 19. Offer up the name of death and judgment in your public prayers, 2 Cor. xi. 1. 20. Consider of the riches of Christ, Col. i. 22. 21. Conversion of heart, 2 Cor. iii. 10. 22. He next delivered a set of sermons for the consolation of God's people, on the covenant of grace: e. g. God in the covenant; a Father; a Husband; a Shepherd; a King; &c. Christ in the covenant; our Righteousness; our Life; our Peace; our Hope: in all his offices; Redeemer, High Priest, Captain, Forerunner, and Friend. The Holy Spirit in the covenant; a Teacher—a Comforter—a Spirit of adoption—an Earnest. Blessings in the covenant; pardon—peace—grace—access to God—ordinances—providences—creatures—death—heaven. These took him nearly a year and a half. He next treated on sanctification, in all its branches; which sermons were followed by another set, on divine worship, public and private, and on various directions concerning each. After this, he delivered another series, on relative duties in all their extent. These, with some others in connexion with them, brought him to the year 1698, when he began a body of divinity, which (with occasional discourses) occupied him till the year 1712. Those who wish to see the whole plan, which is very extensive and methodical, are referred to Mr. Tong's Life of the author; where may be seen a sketch of his lectures on a weekday, and his sacramental discourses.

Another part of Mr. Henry's constant work was catechising, in which he engaged with peculiar delight, from his affection to the young; for which he was eminently qualified, by his happy talent for adapting his instructions to the weakest capacities. The time which he set apart for this service was the Saturday afternoon, when many besides the catechumenæ were used to attend, and esteemed it a profitable exercise. He usually spent about an hour in it, and both began and ended with prayer, in which his expressions were such as are affective. He used the Assembly's Catechism with the elder children; but did not content himself with hearing them repeat the answers, but divided them into several short propositions, and put a distinct question to each, explaining every part in a familiar manner, and supporting it by a suitable text of scripture. His method of catechising may be seen in the addition of the Assembly's Catechism which he published, which is entitled, "A Scripture Catechism in the method of the Assembly's;" a text of scripture being annexed to the answer to every subordinate question, grounded on the general answer in that system; by which means children had a large collection of scripture passages treasured up in their memories.

But it is to be observed, that one of the most excellent, and judicious friends of Mr. Henry, "Mr. Charlton of Manchester, thinking even the Shorter Catechism of the Assembly too long for children, and some parts of it too abstruse, and quite above their capacity, desired and pressed Mr. Henry to draw up a shorter and plainer catechism for children very young," which accordingly he did; and in the collection of his works it is prefixed to the former. Its title is, "A Plain Catechism for Children." To which is added, "An other for the instruction of those who are to be admitted to the Lord's Supper."

In this work of catechising, Mr. Henry was remarkably blessed of God: for he had the desire of his soul, in seeing the good work of grace begun in many of his young people, in whom he afterward had much pleasure, as they proved honourable and useful members of his church; though some, of whom he had expected much, turned out unsuitable; yet very many others proved "exemplars of others." The ordnance of the Lord's Supper Mr. Henry was used constantly to administer on the first Lord's day in every month, not merely as this was customary in most other churches, but in conformity to the practice of the Jews, who observed the beginnings of their months as holy, though he did not think their law about the new moons, &c. to be obligatory on Christians. In the manner of administering this ordinance he was particularly excellent, and is said herein to have excelled himself. On his lecture-days in the week before the sacrament, he had a series of subjects adapted to that institution. And he followed his father's judgment and practice in encouraging young persons to come to the table of the Lord, to fulfill their baptismal covenant. Among his catechumenæ he marked those whom he looked upon as intelligent and serious, with this view; when he had a competent number of such in his eye, he appointed them separately to come to him, to converse with them about their spiritual state; and if he perceived good evidence of their real piety, he recommended it to them to give themselves up to the Lord and his church. For several Lord's days he catechised them publicly concerning this ordinance; and the week preceding the administration, he preached a sermon adapted to their circumstances, accompanied with suitable prayers for them, and then they were all received into the church together. This Mr. P. Henry considered as the proper confirmation, or transition into a state of adult and complete church membership; and his son, in all that was material, adopted his method, in which he had much satisfaction, from observing the great utility of it.

The other positive institution, that of baptism, he administered with equal solemnity, and he always desired to have it in public, unless there was some peculiar reason against it. Mr. Henry had as little of the spirit of a sectarian about him as any man, and he lived in great friendship and affection with many good men, who differed from him in regard to this controverted subject. But he was firm in his opinion about infant baptism, and thought it a matter of no small importance, though by no means one of the essentials of religion; as he considered it to be capable of being applied to very good purpose in a practical view, which was his grand object in his administration of it.

Mr. Tong, in this part of Mr. Henry's Life, says, "His thought upon this subject) he has with great judgment markèd out one, which well deserves to be made public, and I hope will be in a little time. The doctrinal, historical, and practical part of the ordinance are stated and discussed with great perspicuity, seriousness, and spirituality." The writer of this narrative can attest the justice of Mr. Tong's account of the work, having had the pleasure of perusing the manuscript. It may seem surprising that so elaborate a performance, by so eminent a writer, should have been suffered to lie so long in obscurity; especially as it is written not merely in a controversial manner, but for the most part practical, and very much in the spirit of his "Treatise on the Lord's Supper." One chief reason might probably be, its proximity; and another, his laying on some things more stress than they will bear. These considerations, with it highly desirable that the work should be abridged. This was accordingly undertaken, at the urgent desire of some judicious persons who were acquainted with the manuscript, by the Rev. Thomas Robins, when tutor of the academy at Daventry, who had been the pastor of some of the author's descendants, at West Bromwich; and he executed the work with such propriety, that the abridgment is better adapted to answer the worthy author's end, as a useful family book, than the original, and well deserves to be republished. This treatise is particularly calculated to lead those who approve infant baptism, both parents and children, to make the best practical use of the ordinance.

Visiting the sick Mr. Henry considered as an important part of ministerial duty, and he was diligent in the work. He never refused to visit the sick, whether resident in the town, or travellers, among whom were many passengers to or from Ireland; or whether they were persons of his own communion, or of the established church, among the latter of whom many desired his attendance in their illness. He often inquired of his friends whether they knew of any who were sick; and when bills were put up, desiring the prayers of the congregation, he requested that those who sent them would make themselves known, in order that he might properly attend to their cases. His prayers and conversation with sick persons were pertinent, affective, and useful. And if they recovered, he assisted them in their expressions of gratitude, reminded them of their sickbed thoughts and promises, faithfully exhorting them to improve their renewed lives to the best purposes.
Mr. Henry was considered by his people as a wise and faithful counsellor; they therefore often sent for him, to consult with him on affairs of importance relating to themselves or their families, on which occasions he was always ready to interest himself in their concerns, and to give them his best advice, which he followed with his prayers for their direction and success. But it was not merely on special occasions that he visited his flock; he maintained habitual intercourse with them, and promoted Christian conference among them. Some of the more considerable and intelligent of his congregation had meetings at their own houses, to partake of a friendly entertainment, and enjoy rational and useful conversation. On these occasions, Mr. Henry was usually of the party, and he was one of the best companions in the world. His extensiveness and knowledge of his great province of the world, were so remarkable a subject of conversation, that what was entertaining and useful, together with his unaffected piety and humility, rendered his conversation highly agreeable; and these interviews contributed greatly to promote knowledge, Christian friendship, and real religion; for they were always closed with prayer, and he had no relish for any visits without it.

But besides these friendly meetings, he had others more stated, especially appointed for Christian conference and prayer, particularly with young persons of his congregation, in which he always presided. The subjects of these conferences "were not unprofitable questions, or matters of doubtful disputations, but points of faith and cases of conscience; and care was taken to prevent all vain jangling, and whatsoever might weaken the minds of young people, or make them despise (or even lose confidence)" which, as Mr. Tong observes, "every one who has made the trial, has found to require much wisdom."

That wisdom Mr. Henry (as appears from his diary) was very desirous to obtain; and as his heart was much set upon this business, so he was very prudent and successful in it.

He was also a great example of ministerial wisdom and fidelity in general. He carefully watched over his flock, and attended with diligence to the respective cases of individuals in it. When he heard an ill report of any, he would go to them, or send for them, and inquire impartially into the truth of the case. If he found the persons guilty, he would deal plainly and faithfully with them in his admonitions, and urge a speedy repentance, in which he was in most instances happily successful; and there were many instances of reformation and great good which depended on his interference. When any such case occurred, his diary shows how much his soul was grieved, and what a discouragement it was to him in his ministerial labours. But his sorrow for such awful instances of apostasy was abundantly overbalanced by the joy he felt on the success of the ministry with the far greater part of his people, whom he saw growing up in wisdom and holiness, adorning the doctrine of God their Saviour, and strengthening the hands of their pastor.

One uncommon instance of his zeal, and his love to souls, was, the pains he took in visiting the prisoners and malefactors in the jail of Chester castle; which, it is said, he was first led to do on the request of the jailer's wife, who was a pious woman, and was much concerned at the remissness of those whose province it was to attend. From whom some of the objects, to whom he showed so much tenderness of compassion upon other instances, that they yielded to her proposal to send for Mr. Henry to instruct and pray with them. This he did with constancy, and the most tender compassion, for the space of twenty years. And sometimes he preached to them, especially to the condemned malefactors, not without some good appearance of success. The subjects on which he discoursed were admirably appropriate to their condition. At one time three women were under sentence of condemnation for the murder of their bastard children, when he preached on James i. 5. Then when lust hath conceived, itbringeth forth sin: and sin, when it is finished, bringeth forth death. The persons who attended on this occasion (as many were wont to do) were dissolved in tears, and the poor wretches themselves trembled exceedingly. He repeated his visits to them till the day of their execution, and they thanked him for his compassion to their souls; as also many other prisoners did, who were acquitted or pardoned. The last time he performed this humane office, was in the year 1710, when he was sent for by one who was condemned to death, and by the desire of the other prisoners. He had consented to go in the morning, but the curate of St. Mary's, in order to prevent it, sent word that he would go and preach himself, which he accordingly did. However, Mr. Henry went in the evening, and preached respecting the thief upon the cross. Upon which the governor of the castle was prevailed with to interpose, and prevent any more preaching there, except by the proper chaplain; and thus Mr. Henry was discharged from the arduous service which he had so long performed, without any after recompense than the pleasure of doing good to the souls of these wretched creatures, who greatly lamented their loss, a less which was never made up, for no man in like manner ever cared for their souls.

Another useful service in which Mr. Henry zealously engaged in Chester, (beside many occasional discourses on fast days, and others relative to public affairs, in which he took great interest,) was, his concurrence with the clergy in forming a society for the reformation of manners, similar to that in London. This good work was promoted by the bishop and the dean, who had the interest of religion much at heart. A monthly lecture on a Friday was set up at St. Peter's church, which Mr. Henry constantly attended. The good bishop preached the first sermon, which was a short discourse on an instance of the sin of cursing and railing, delivered by Mr. Henry. The dean concluded the lecture on Wednesday, and Mr. Henry wrote, "It was an excellent discourse, much to the purpose." I bless God for this sermon; and as I have from my heart forgiven, so will I endeavour to forget, all that the dean has at any time said against dissenters, and me in particular. Such preaching against sin, and such endeavours to suppress it, will contribute, as much as any thing, to heal differences among those that fear God." Mr. Henry, the same year, began a course of reformation sermons on his lecture-day; and the dissenting ministers in Chester settled a reformation lecture in several parts of the country, the first of which was at Macclesfield, when Mr. Henry preached on the sanctification of the sabbath. Though the monthly sermons were carried on for some time at St. Peter's in Chester, the godly minister of that place and some of whom began openly to deride it, and form parties against it. Mr. Henry Newcomb, of Manchester, (though a son of the eminent nonconformist,) in a sermon which he preached at that church, broke out into severe invectives against the dissenters; suggesting, that because they did not conform to the church, they hardened the profane, and disabled themselves to reform them. On which Mr. Henry writes, "The Lord be Judge between us: perhaps it will be found that the body of dissenters have been the strongest bulwark against profaneness in England." The bishop and dean much lamented such obstructions to the work of reformation, but met with such discouragements from the misconduct of those who should have been most active in promoting the design, that at length it was resolved to adjourn this lecture sine die. This was matter of much grief to Mr. Henry, but it did not discourage him from proceeding in his own lecture, or uniting with his brethren in adjacent parts, in prosecuting this great object, though they laboured under great discouragement, for want of power to enforce the laws against profaneness.

But Mr. Henry's sphere of activity and attempts for usefulness were yet more extensive. Though his own flock was never neglected, he had a care for all the churches within his line, and readily lent his assistance to his brethren in all the adjacent parts; sometimes taking a compass of thirty miles, preaching every day in the week, but always returning home at the end of it. The towns and villages which lay near Chester enjoyed a large share of his visitation; in which he held public meetings of the ministry twice a year, he was frequently called upon to attend ordinations, to preach funeral sermons for his deceased brethren and other respectable persons at a distance: and he never refused complying with invitations to preach on any occasion, when he was able to do it; the great strength of his constitution, and the vigour of his mind, rendering these uncommon exertions easy and pleasant to him.

He was used to take a yearly journey to Nantwich, Newcastle, &c. preaching wherever he came; and another into Lancashire, to preach at Manchester, Chorwheat, Warrington, &c. where he was highly valued; but he performed all within the week, choosing at any labour or expense rather than not to be with his own people. He was then in his 69th year, and he hired a house near London, in the first sabbath in the month, but once, for twenty-four years, and that was when he was in London, after a long absence from it: for though he had many connexions in the metropolis, he rarely visited it, as he had no apprehension that his services were there needed so much as in the country, where they had been eminently useful in the revival of religion all around him, both among ministers and people, but particularly in his own congregation, where he had the pleasure of seeing the Redeemer's interest greatly to flourish, and many families rising up to call him blessed.

In the year 1700, Mr. Henry's congregation built a new meeting-house for him, which was decent, large, and commodious. On the first opening of it, August 8, it was attended an appropriate and excellent sermon, which had been prepared by the Lord God of hosts, and Israel shall he know, if it be in rebellion, or if it be in transgression against the Lord, that we have built an altar. This sermon, which is entitled, "Separation without Rebellion," was not published by the author, though fairly transcribed; most probably by reason of his great solicitude to avoid giving offence to any members of the established church. It was printed in the year 1725, with a preface written by Dr. Watts, who bestows a high encomium upon the author, but hints at some expressions in the sermon which may not gain the entire assent of some of his present readers; referring, doubtless, to what relates to national establishments of religion, to which the worthy author was not averse. It is rather extraordinary that this discourse was not included in the folio edition of Mr. Henry's separate publications, which was thrice in the year 1726, in the preface to which it is said, 'that this volume contains them all.' In the year 1781, the writer of this narrative published "Select Sermons of Mr. Henry," in a large octavo volume, in which this valuable discourse was inserted.

After the building of this new meeting house, the congregation much increased, especially by the accession of the greatest part of the people that had attended Mr. Harvey, who, in the year 1706, desisted from preaching in Chester, on account of the declining state of his health, and some difficulties about his place of worship; so that Mr. Henry's was now too strait for his hearers, and required a new gallery to be built. It was rather a singular circumstance, that Mr. Harvey's congregation (according to the tradition still current at Chester) occupied this new gallery, and there continued by themselves. But it seems that this was a very different case, for the year 1698. In consequence of his preaching at several principal meetings in the city, for instance, Mr. Doelittle's and Mr. Howe's, he became better known than he had been before, and acquired a considerable degree of fame and reputation as a preacher. It was at this time that he preached the excellent discourse, which was published, on "Christianity not a Sect, yet everywhere spoken against."

The following year a vacancy took place in the congregation at Hackney, (where a great number of wealthy dissenters resided,) by the death of Dr. William Bates, a man of distinguished piety, learning, and abilities, who had refused a bishopric, and would have honoured the first episcopal see in the kingdom. The first person thought to succeed him was Mr. Matthew Henry; and it was unanimously agreed that he should have become their pastor, though they had no ground to suppose that he was at all dissatisfied with his present situation; and they desired Mr. Shower, an eminent minister at the Old Jewry, to give him a letter, in order to apprise him of their intention. Mr. Shower accordingly wrote; but Mr. Henry, by the next post, sent a strong negative to the application, assigning, as a principal reason, his affection for the people at Chester, and theirs for him; and they desired that he might have no further solicitation to leave them. The congregation at Hackney, however, not satisfied with this peremptory answer, wrote to him themselves, and sent him a most pressing invitation to accept their proposal. Mr. Henry, after taking a few days to deliberate upon the matter, wrote them a very respectful letter, in which he assured them, that he had been disappointed in their expectations from Mr. Chorley of Norwich, and being much divided about an application to another minister, they unanimously agreed to make a vigorous effort to obtain Mr. Henry. Accordingly, letters were written to him by Mr. Howe, Mr. (afterward Dr.) Williams, and Dr. Hamilton, urging this among other arguments, that by coming to this place he would unite both sides, between whom there had been some contests. These letters occasioned him some serious and uneasy thoughts, as appears from his diary, in which he expresses himself willing to be determined by the will of God, if he did but know it, whatever it might be. He afterward took occasion of an allegro con brio sermon to beseech him to desire that he would not leave them, to whom he answered, that he had once and again given a denial to this invitation, and that it was his present purpose not to leave them, though he could not tell what might happen hereafter.

In the review of this year, he takes particular notice of his invitation to Salters-hall, as what surprised him; and he adds as follows: "I begged of God to keep me from being lifted up with pride by it. I sought of God the right way. Had I consulted my own fancy, which always had a kindness for London even since I knew it, or the worldly advantage of my family, I had closed with it. And I was sometimes tempted to think it might open me a door of greater usefulness. I had also reason to think Mr. John Evans [then in Westminster, afterward Dr. Evans of London, author of the "Christian Temper"] might have been had here, and might have been more acceptable to some, and more useful than I. But I had not courage to break through the opposition of the affections of my friends here to me, and mine to them, nor to venture upon a new and unknown place and work, which I feared myself unfit for. I bless God, I am well satisfied in what I did in that matter. If it ever please God to call me from this place, I depend upon him to make my way clear. Lord, lead me in a plain path!" No candid person, after reading this, will be disposed to question Mr. Henry's integrity in the future part of his conduct, in quitting Chester, especially considering other invitations from the great city.

In the year 1704, Mr. Henry took another journey to London, accompanied by Mrs. Henry, to visit two of her sisters then in town, one of whom was dangerously ill. He takes notice of the pleasure he had in hearing Mr. Howe preach, on the morning of June 21. In the afternoon of the same day he preached at Salters-hall, where Mr. Tong was then minister, who mentions his text, Prov. xvi. 16. After visiting many friends, and preaching many sermons, he returned home with great satisfaction, and thankfully recorded some dangers which he had escaped in travelling, the roads being so bad, that in one place the coach was set fast; not apprehending or wishing for another call to the metropolis.

He had hitherto enjoyed a great share of health, but this year he had a very dangerous illness. As he was reading the scripture on Lord's day morning, August 27, he suddenly fainted away, but soon recovered so as to go on with his work. In the evening, however, feeling himself unwell, he writes, "A fever is coming on me; let me have future work of my Lord comes." He had a very restless night; and, having an appointment at Nantwich the next day, he went and preached on Psalm cx. 3. "And then," says he, "I was well." The following day, he went to Haslington Chapel, to preach the funeral sermon of Mr. Cope, an aged minister, who had spent some years there, and who had requested this of him. Mr. Egerton, the Rector, gave his consent. But this, Mr. Henry remarks, was likely to be the last sermon preached there by a dissenter; and it was like to have proved his last; for, on his return home, the fever came on with great violence, and confined him for more than three weeks.

It was soon after his recovery from this severe illness, that he began his elaborate work on the Bible. A friend has communicated the following passage, extracted from his diary, which Mr. Tong had overlooked, but which will appear to most readers both curious and interesting. "Nov. 12, 1704. This night, after many thoughts of heart, and many prayers concerning it, I began my Notes on the Old Testament. 'Tis not likely I should live to finish it; or, if I should, that it should be of [much] public service, for I am not par negativus. Yet, in the strength of God, and I hope with a single eye to his glory, I set about it, that I may be endeavouring something, and spend my time to some good purpose; and let the Lord make what he pleaseth of me. I go about it with fear and trembling, lest I exercise myself in things too high for me. The Lord help me to set about it with great humility." Many passages in his diary, written during the progress of this great work, would be pleasing and edifying to the reader, but the space does not permit of the insertion of the greater part of them.

In the year 1709, Mr. Henry received a letter, dated February 18, informing him that the congregation in which Mr. Howe and Mr. Spademan had been joint pastors, in Silver-street, (both of them now deceased,) had chosen him to succeed the latter, as co-pastor with Mr. Rosewell, and that some of them purposed to go down to Chester to treat with him on this business. He also received many letters from ministers and gentlemen, pressing his acceptance of this call, with a view to his more extensive usefulness. Sufficient to say, he still remained inmoveable, "his affection for his people prevailing" (as he expressed it, in his letter to Mr. Rosewell) "above his judgment, interest, and inclination." After this, we might naturally have expected to find that Mr. Henry would have ended his days at Chester; but, believing the meeting to be attended by the congregation at Hackney being again vacant, by the death of the worthy Mr. Billio, (who died of the smallpox, in the year 1710,) they determined upon renewing their application to Mr. Henry, which they did with increased importunity; and after a long negociation, and repeated denials, they at length prevailed. As the best justification of his conduct in yielding to their desires, and as a further illustration of his integrity and piety, as well as his regard to his affectionate friends at Chester, the reader shall have the account of the transaction in his own words, extracted from his diary.

"About Midsummer, 1710, I had a letter from the congregation at Hackney, signifying that they had unanimously chosen me to be their minister, and that I should find them as the importunate widow, that would not be moved. I was glad the Lord had thought fit to make this to be the case. I went down hither; to prevent which, (not being unwilling to take a London journey in the interval between my third and fourth volume,) I wrote them word I would come up to them, and did so. Then I laid my self open to the temptation, by increasing my acquaintance in the city. They followed me, after I came down again, with letters to me and the congregation. In October I wrote to them, that if they would stay for me till next spring, (which I was in hopes they would not have done,) I would come up, and make a longer stay, for mutual trial. They wrote, they would wait till then. In May, 1711, I went to them, and stayed till the end of July, and, before I parted with them, signified my acceptance of their invitation, and my purpose to come to them, God willing, the next spring. However, I [should have] denied them.
but that Mr. Gunston, Mr. Smith, and some others, came to me from London, and begged me [not to refuse] for the sake of the public—which was that thing that turned the scales. By this determination I have brought upon myself more grief and care than I could have imagined, and have many a time wished it undone; but, having opened my mouth, I could not go back. I did with the utmost impartiality (if I knew any thing of myself) beg of God to be so inclined a heart that we might do what our Lord first taught glory, and I trust I have a good conscience, willing to be found in the way of my duty. Wherein I have done amiss, the Lord forgive me for Jesus' sake, and make this change concerning the congregation to work together for good to it!

Another paper, dated Hackney, July 13, 1711, written after fervent prayer to God, contains the reasons which occurred to him why he should accept his invitation, which he wrote to be a satisfaction to him afterward. The following is a brief epitome of them: “1. I am abundantly satisfied that it is lawful for ministers to remove, and in many cases expedient. 2. My invitation to Hackney is not only unanimously, but pressingly; and, upon many weeks' trial, I do not perceive any thing discouraging, but every thing that promises comfort and usefulness. 3. The Provost of London has met me before. 4. There is manifestly a wider door of opportunity to do good opened to me at London than at Chester, which is my main inducement. 5. In drawing up and publishing my Exposition, it will be a great convenience to be near the press—also to have books at hand to consult, and learned men to converse with, for my own improvement. 6. I have followed Providence in this affair, and referred myself to its disposal. 7. I have asked the advice of many ministers, and judicious Christians. 8. I have some reason to hope that my poor endeavours may be more useful to those to whom they are new. 9. I have not been without my discouragements at Chester, which have tempted me to think my work there in a great measure done; many have left us, and few been [of late] added. 10. I am not able to ride long journeys, as formerly, to preach, which last winter brought illness upon me, so that my services could be confined within the walls of Chester. 11. The congregation, though unwilling to part with me, have left the matter under their hands to my own conscience.”

It appears from Mr. Henry's diary, that his journey to London at the time here referred to was very uncomfortable, by reason of the badness of the roads, but especially by his great indisposition and pain, which much discouraged him. "I begged," says he, "that these frequent returning illnesses might be sanctified to me; I see how easily God can break our measures, and disappoint us, and make that tedious which we hoped would be pleasant." However, he arrived safe, May 12; when he writes thus: "And now I look back upon the week with thankfulness for the mercies of God, and the rebukes I have been under; such as give me cause to be jealous of myself, whether I be in my way. Lord, show me where for thou dost correct me, and wherefore thou relievest me.—Lord's day, 13. I had but a bad night, yet better in the morning. Preached, 2 Pet. i. 4. Partake of a divine nature. Administered the Lord's supper to the congregation at Hackney. Not a hundred communicants. I was somewhat enlarged in preaching, but at the Lord's supper very much straitened, and not as I used to be at Chester.—14. A very good night, and perfectly well, blessed be God. Mr. Tong and Mr. Evans came, and staid with me most of the day. We talked much to and fro of my coming hither, but brought it to no issue. The congregation seems very unanimous.

During this visit at Hackney, Mr. Henry preached frequently in the city, and several of his sermons at Salters-hall were published; viz. Faith in Christ.—Oh Forgiveness of Sin as a Debt—Hope and Fear balanced. Many entertaining articles appear in his journal respecting the visits he made, and the occurrences he met with, during his stay at Hackney, which must be passed over. On the whole, he seems to be better reconciled by it to the thoughts of returning. In one place he says, "Blessed be God, I meet with a praying people, and that love prayer." His last entry is July 29. "Preached, 1 John iii. 25. This is the promise, &c. Administered the Lord's supper. We had a very full congregation, which is some encouragement, at parting, to think of coming again. This he did much sooner than he expected; for it appears from his MS. now before me, that, in the next January, he had a subpoena to be a witness in a cause to be tried in the Queen's Bench. The minute of Providence in the west Hackney, and the great expense of their coming again on the 30th, being the lecture-day; when he writes, that he "met some of the most of the congregation, earnestly begging them, with tears, to release him from his promise," who told him that "they could not in conscience do it, because they thought his coming was for the public good." On February 4, he had a fit of the stone. On the 18th, he set off very willingly for Chester, and arrived in better health than when he set out. But he had frequent returns of that complaint soon afterward which however did not occasion him to spare his labours.

The time now approached for him to fulfil his engagement with the people at Hackney, but the thought of leaving his friends at Chester proved a very severe trial to him, and pressed down his spirit beyond measure, as appeared by many and passagings in his diary written about this time. On May 11, 1712, when he took leave of his flock, he expounded the last chapter of Joshua in the morning, and of Matthew in the afternoon, and preached on 1 Thess. iv. 17, 18. After this service he writes, "A very sad day—I see I have been unkind to the congregation, who love me too well.—May 12. In much heaviness I set out in the coach for London, not knowing the things that shall befall me there. 15. Came to London.—But Lord, am I in my way? I look back with sorrow for leaving Chester; I look forward with fear; but unto thee, O Lord! do I look up."

Mr. Henry commenced his pastoral work at Hackney on the Lord's day, May 18. The appearance of the meeting-house, which then stood on the opposite side of the way to the present, where three houses now stand, was very striking, either without or within. It was an old irregular building, originally formed out of dwelling-houses; but it was large, and the congregation was in a flourishing state, both in point of numbers and of wealth; for it is said, no less than thirty gentlemen's carriages constantly attended the meeting, and that the annual collection for the Presbyterian Fund for poor ministers was three hundred pounds. This being the case, it seems surprising that in Mr. Henry's time a better place of worship should not have been erected. What his salary was does not appear, doubtless it was something considerable; but that was with him no object in his removal. His grand motive was usefulness to the church of God; and of this he had here a very encouraging prospect.

* How much they were increased afterward, does not appear; but it is probable that they were never very numerous, as many dissenters, who live in the villages near London, keep up their connexion with the churches of which they had been members when they resided there.
MEMOIRS OF THE REV. MATTHEW HENRY.

On his first appearance as the minister in this congregation, in the morning he expounded Genesis i. and in the afternoon Matthew i. thus beginning as it were, the world anew. He preached on Acts xvi. 9. Crete. and this is a ruin," says he, "may be done to precious souls! But I am sad in spirit, lamenting my departure from my friends in Chester. And yet if they be well provided for, I shall be easy, whatever discouragements I may meet with here."

Mr. Henry conducted his ministerial work at Hackney in much the same manner as he had done at Chester. He began the morning service on the Lord's day, (as the writer has heard some of his hearers relate,) at nine o'clock. Though the people had not been accustomed to so early an hour, they came into it without reluctance, and many of them were well pleased with it. The only difference in the order of service was, that he began with a short prayer, which it is supposed had been the custom, as it is to this day. In labours he was most abundant here even than he had been at Chester, excepting that he did not stay with the same congregation, as the same soon made it appear that he did not remove with a view to his own ease and pleasure. Though his bodily strength was abated, and some disorders began to grow upon him, his zeal and activity continued the same, in expounding, catechising, and preaching, both to his own congregation and in various other places. As he found here a larger field of service, his heart was equally enlarged. He sometimes preached the Lord's day morning lecture at Little St. Helen's, at seven o'clock, and afterward went through the whole of his work at Hackney; and frequently, after both these services at home, he preached the evening lecture to the charity school at Mr. Lloyd's meeting, in Shakspeare's Walk, Wapping; and, at other times, he preached in the evening at Redriff, after which he performed the whole of his family worship as usual. Sometimes he was employed in preaching at one place or other every day in the week, and even twice or thrice on the same day. He showed himself ready to every good work, as if he had a secret impression that his time would be short; and the nearer he came to the end of his course, the swifter was his progress in holiness and all useful services. Nor did he appear to labour in vain, for he had many pleasing proofs of success. He had great encouragement soon after his coming to Hackney, from the usefulness of some sermons which he preached, on Matth. xvi. 26. What is a man profited, &c.; many of his hearers were greatly affected, and some of them said they were resolved never to pursue the world so eagerly as they had before done. This was preaching to good purpose, as which Mr. Henry had to preach in and about London, and so ready was he to comply with them, that he sometimes appears in his diary to think that he needed an apology, and to excuse it to himself, that he preached so often. After opening an evening lecture near Shadwell church, January 25, 1712, when his text was Psalm lxxiii. 28. he writes thus: "I hope, through grace, I can say, the reason why I am so much in my work is, because the love of Christ constrains me, and I find, by experience, it is good for me to draw near to God."

Beside catechising on Saturday at Hackney, which he began to do the second month after his coming thither, he had a catechetical lecture in London, which he undertook at the request of some serious christians in the city, but not without the approbation of several of his brethren. Such was his humility, and his concern for the interests of his masters in this particular, that he declined giving an answer to the proposal till he had consulted them on the subject; when they all expressed their cordial approbation of the plan: several of them, of different denominations, sent their sons to attend his instructions, and often attended themselves. The place fixed upon for this service, was Mr. Wilcox's meeting-house, in Monkwell-street, where his tutor, Mr. Doolittle, formerly preached, and had been used to catechise. The time was Tuesday evening, when considerable numbers, besides the catechumens, were used to attend; and there was great reason to believe that Mr. Henry's labours on these occasions were very useful to numbers of both. It may not be amiss here to introduce an anecdote which he records of a robbery, after one of his evening lectures, for the sake of his pious reflections upon it. As he was coming home, he was stopped by a gentleman, who took him to the extent of fifteen shillings; upon which he writes, "What reason have I to be thankful to God, that having travelled, as much as I was, I was never robbed before! What abundance of evil this love of money is the root of, that four men should venture their lives and souls for about half a crown apiece! See the vanity of worldly wealth, how soon we may be stript of it, how loose we ought to sit to it."

Mr. Henry's tender concern for the best interests of young persons, made him very desirous that they might enjoy all proper means for instruction in the knowledge of divine things. With this view, he exerted himself to increase the number of charity schools, for the promoting of which he drew up the following paper: "It is humbly proposed that some endeavours may be used to form and maintain charity schools among the dissenters, for the teaching of poor children to read and write, &c. to clothe them, and teach them the Assembly's Catechism. It is thought advisable, and not impracticable." He then went on to prove both, and produces a series of arguments at some considerable length, which it is unnecessary here to specify, and answers some objections which might be urged against his plan.

While he was thus laying himself out for the good both of old and young, in and about London, his mind was deeply affected with the state of his congregation at Chester, which was yet destitute of a settled minister; and the disappointment they had met with in their applications to several cost him many prayers and tears. When he took his leave of his old friends, he promised them that he would make them a visit every other year, and specially desired to go with them. This his friends at Hackney not only consented to, but recommended. Accordingly, July 20, 1713, he set out on a journey to Chester in the coach, and in his diary he records the particulars of it, with many pious and benevolent remarks, and the sermons which he preached at the different places he visited. An extract may be acceptable, as it discovers his unabated zeal, and his unwearyed diligence, in doing good wherever he went; in comparison with which, he says, The charge and the trouble of the journey shall be as nothing to me. "July 23. Came to Whitchurch: a wet day, but many friends met me there, to my great rejoicing. In the afternoon, went to Broad-Oak, and preached from Rom. i. 11. I long to see you, &c. Next day went to Chester, where my friends received me with much affection and respect. Lord's day, preached from 1 Tim. vi. 12. Lay hold on eternal life. It was very pleasant for me to preach in the old place, where I have often met with God, and been owned by Him. On Wednesday kept a congregational fast. The next Lord's day preached..." and administered the Lord's supper to my beloved flock: a great congregation. Monday went to Middle-wich: preached from Matt. xxxiv. 12. Iniquity abounds. The next day to Knutsford, to a meeting of ministers: preached from Col. ii. 8. Though absent in the flesh, yet present in the spirit. Lord's day August 9, preached at Chester, Tit. ii. 13. Looking for the blessed hope. I took an affectionate farewell of my friends; prayed with many of them: the next day set out, with much ado, for Nantwich, where Mr.
Mottershead is well settled: preached from Jos. i. 5, 6. As I was with Moses, I will be with thee, &c. From thence, that night, went to Whixley-wood, and preached there from John i. 48; from thence to Dan-mouth, and preached at Whitchurch, on 1 Pet. v. 10; took leave of my dear friends there, and went in the coach about. Came to London the 13th, and found my tabernacle there.

The following day being the sabbath, he preached twice at Hackney, as usual, and administered the Lord's supper. But it appeared that his late great exertions in preaching and travelling were too much for him; so that it was no wonder he should, on the day following, have complained of great weariness, which was attended with drowsiness. Sir Richard Blackmore, being sent for, perceived symptoms of a diabetes, which obliged him to confine himself to the house. The doctor absolutely forbid his going out the next Lord's day: upon which he writes—"A melancholy day: yet not without some communion with God. Perhaps I have been inordinately desirous to be at my study and work again." By the blessing of God, however, he went on the sabbath, his minister was enabled, for a few days after this, and the following sabbath he went on in his ordinary work. "Blessed be my God," says he, "and he carried me through it with ease and pleasure."

The next month, September 20, he had a severe fit of the stone, and it happened to be on the Lord's day: but it did not prevent his going through his public work. That evening, and the day following, he avoided several stones, and rather large ones. He went, however, on the Tuesday, to catechise in London, and on Wednesday preached his weekly lecture at Hackney; on Thursday evening a lecture in Spitalfields, and on Friday joined in the service of a fast, at Mr. Fleming's Meeting, at Founder's-hall, where he expounded the chapter concerning his being the supreme governor of the church and the house of God. However on the Saturday he writes—"I bless God, I have now my health well again." But the painful disorder several times returned. Early on Lord's day morning, December 13, he was seized with another fit, but the pain went off in about an hour, and, notwithstanding the fatigue it had occasioned, he ventured to London, to preach the morning lecture, before it was light, when he took that text, John xx. 1. The first day of the week early, while it was yet dark, &c.; and after this, he performed the whole service at Hackney. Having related these circumstances, he says—"Blessed be God for help from on high!" On the following Thursday he had another very violent fit of the stone, of which his constitution was so strong, his accustomed exertions must have tended to weaken it; and his close application of the soul, his discouraging and his nephritic complaint. It was also said, by those who knew him at Hackney, that after his settlement there, he yielded to the many invitations he had to sup with his friends, when he was under the temptation, though not to any unbecoming excess, yet to eat and drink what was unfavourable to the health of so studious a man, and one who had been used to a more abstinent mode of life, and had grown corpulent, as his portrait shows him to have been. It is not improbable that this circumstance tended to shorten his days.

At the beginning of this his last year (for so it proved to be) Mr. Henry's mind appears from his diary to have been under a violent and dangerous, on account of public affairs. The bill which had passed for supporting the schools of the dissenters he looked upon not only as a heavy grievance in itself, but as a prerogative to further severities. On this occasion he preached an excellent discourse at Mr. Bush's meeting, on 2 Chron. xx. 12. Neither know we what we do, but our eyes are up unto thee.

The following week he took his journey to Chester, from whence he never returned. On May 30, he administered the Lord's supper, as the best way of parting with his friends at Hackney. In the month he expounded Exodus xxxviii., in the afternoon Luke vii, and preached on Rev. v. 9. For thou wast slain, &c. On the next day he took the coach for Chester. Mr. Tong, and some other friends, going to Coventry, accompanied him as far as St. Albans, and there they parted with him, never to see his face any more! From a letter to Mrs. Henry, dated June 7, it appeared that he bore the journey well, and that his friends told him he looked better than he did when they saw him the last year. In the same letter he expressed much joy on account of his old congregation being well settled with a minister, with whom he had communicated at the Lord's table the day preceding, much to his satisfaction.
With pleasure he remarks—"They had a full communion: none of the congregation are gone off: if none have left it while it was unsettled, I hope none will leave it now."

From a subsequent article in Mr. Tone's narrative, it appears that Mr. Gardiner was not the sole minister of this congregation: Mr. Witham, who was united with him. How long the church and congregation continued in the flourishing state in which Mr. Henry now beheld it, is uncertain; but it is well known that, whatever was the cause, Mr. Gardiner lived to see it greatly decline. This, however, was no just reflection upon him: it has been the common affliction of the best of ministers, however they have been advanced in years. Mr. Henry, however, was gone to a better world before the sad change took place, the knowledge of which would have occasioned him inexpressible regret, on the recollection of his being at all necessary to it.

As he continued to interest himself in the welfare of that society to the very last, so likewise he did in whatever concerned the other congregations in that neighbourhood, with which he had been so long con-ected; and in this his last journey he visited several of them, to the great injury of his health: indeed he may be said to have sacrificed his life in their service. On Tuesday, June 8, he went to Wrexham, and, having preached there, returned to Chester that night; he says, "not at all tired:" but it seems he had some apprehension of a return of the diabetes, and drank some of the Bristol water, by way of prevention. On the 14th, he went to visit his brother Warburton, at Grange, and from thence to Knutsford, whether Mr. Gardiner accompanied him, and where he met several of his brethren. From thence he rode, on the Tuesday evening, to Chowbent in Lancashire, and the next day returned to Chester. Though he did not perceive himself to be greatly fatigued, some of his friends could not but fear that he must have injured his health by riding so many miles in so short a time, and by preaching at every place where he came, especially in so hot a summer. Indeed he himself, in a letter written at this time to Mrs. Henry, complains of the heat of the weather, which, he says, made him as faint and feeble as he was when he came up last from the country; and, from a subsequent passage, it seems as if he found himself, after his late hasty tour, far from being well. "If God bring me home in safety," says he, "I believe it will do well to use the most prudence, unless for more indeed is wanted. I have committed myself this far, but I am best." He adds, "Though I am here among my old friends, yet I find my new ones lie near my heart, among whom God has now cut out my work."

In the last letter which Mrs. Henry received from him, dated June 19, he informed her that he had taken the coach for Wednesday, the 23d, and that he was to get into it at Whitchurch, from whence he was pleased to think he should have the company of Mr. Yates of that place; and as the following Wednesday was the day for the quarterly fast at Hackney, he expressed his desire that due care might be taken to engage the assistance of some of his brethren.

The next day after he wrote this letter was a Sabbath, which he spent at Chester; and it was the last he spent in the remarkable circumstance, that Providence should so order it that his last labours should be bestowed where they were begun, and where the most of his days had been spent. It was also singular and pleasing that, on this his last Sabbath in the church below, he was directed to a subject so peculiarly adapted to the occasion, namely, that of the eternal Sabbath in heaven, on which he was so soon to enter; for on the preceding Lord's day, he had preached twice on Heb. iv. 9. There remaineth a rest for the people of God; which he considered, agreeably to the original, under the idea of a sabbath, which he illustrated in a variety of particulars. On the Lord's day following, he kept the same idea in view, while he treated on that solemn caution, for the improvement of the reader, of the saying, "He that entered into his rest, rested from his labour and his 'sight -'") the circumstances of Mr. Henry's closing his ministry in this remarkable manner, induced Mr. Tong, in his Life, to give his readers the substances of both these discourses.

The next day after delivering them he set off, in his journey homeward, without feeling any inconvenience from the past day's labours; indeed he thought he had found relief from his late indisposition, by his excursion to Knutsford and Lancashire; so that he was encouraged (not very prudently) to make an appointment for preaching at Nantwich that day, in his way to London. But all his friends observed that he appeared very heavy and drowsy; though, when asked how he did, he always answered, "Well." An apothecary, however, Mr. Sudlow, a good friend of Mr. Henry, said, before he left Chester, they should never see him again. His friends therefore should have dissuaded him from this undertaking, especially on horseback. As he passed Dodden he drank a glass of the mineral water there. Before he came to Torporley, his horse stumbled in a hole, and threw him off. He was a little wet, but said he was not hurt, and felt no inconvenience from the fall. His companions pressed him to alight at Torporley, but he resolved to go on to Nantwich, and there he preached on Jer. xxxii. 18; but all his hearers noticed his want of his usual vivacity, and, after dinner, he was advised to lose a little blood. He consented to this, though he made no complaint of indisposition. After bleeding he fell asleep, and slept so long, that some of his friends thought it right to awaken him, at which he expressed himself rather displeased.

His old intimate friend, Mr. Illidge, was present, who had been desired by Sir Thomas Delves and his lady to invite him to their house, at Doddington, whither their steward was sent to conduct him. But he was not able to proceed any further, and went to bed at Mr. Mottershed's house, where he felt himself so ill that he said to his friends, "Pray for me, for now I cannot pray for myself." While they were putting him to bed, he spoke of the excellence of spiritual comforts in a time of affliction, and blessed God that he enjoyed them. To his friend, Mr. Illidge, he addressed himself in these memorials, saying, that "It is not possible the comfort of the sayings of dying men—this is mine. That a life spent in the service of God, and communion with him, is the most clear and pleasant life that a man can live in the present world." He had a restless night, and about five o'clock on Tuesday morning he was seized with a fit, which his medical attendants agreed to be an apoplexy. He lay speechless, with his eyes fixed, till about eight o'clock, June 22, and then expired.

A near relation of his wrote on this occasion, "It was most acceptable to him to have so short a passage from his work to his reward. And why should we envy him? It is glorious to die in the service of so great and good a Master, who, we are sure, will not let any of his servants lose by him." Yet it was not wholly regretted, that any of them should, by an inordinate zeal, shorten their days, and, by this means, prevent themselves from enduring longer labors.

On Thursday, before the corpse was removed from Nantwich, Mr. Reynolds, of Salop, preached an excellent sermon on the sad occasion, which was printed. Six ministers accompanied it to Chester, who were met by eight of the clergy, ten coaches, and a great many persons on horseback. Many dissenting ministers followed the mourners, and a universal respect was paid to the deceased by persons of distinction had been laid before him. Mr. Withington delivered a suitable discourse, for the improvement of the people at the Thursday lecture, and another on the Lord's day morning after the funeral, as Mr. Gardiner also did, in the afternoon. Mr. My father's return of the cool weather should make me dissatisfied with what I said before. Yet I shall follow me afterward. This discourse was published, and afterward subjoined to the folio edition of Mr. Henry's Works.

THOUGH it is most my concern, that I be able to give a good account to God and my own conscience, yet, perhaps, it will be expected, that I give the world also some account of this bold undertaking; which I shall endeavour to do with all plainness, and as one who believes, that if men must be reckoned with in the great day, for every vain and idle word they speak, much more for every vain and idle line they write.

And it may be of use, in the first place, to lay down those great and sacred principles which I go upon, and am governed by, in this endeavour to explain and improve these portions of holy writ; which endeavour I humbly offer to the service of those (and to those only I expect it will be acceptable) who agree with me in these six principles.

I. That religion is the one thing needful; that to know, and love, and fear God our Maker, and in all the instances both of devout affection, and of a good conversation, to keep his commandments, (Eccles. 12. 13.) is, without doubt, the whole of man; it is all in all to him. This the wisest of men, after a close and copious argument in his Ecclesiastes, lays down as the conclusion of his whole matter (the Quod erat demonstrandum of his whole discourse); and therefore I may be allowed to lay it down as a postulatum, and the foundation of this whole matter.

It is necessary to mankind in general, that there should be religion in the world, absolutely necessary for the preservation of the honour of the human nature, and no less so for the preservation of the order of human societies. It is necessary to each of us in particular, that we be religious; we cannot otherwise answer the end of our creation, obtain the favour of our Creator, make ourselves easy now, or happy for ever. A man that is endued with the powers of reason, by which he is capable of knowing, serving, glorifying, and enjoying his Maker, and yet lives without God in the world, is certainly the most despicable and the most miserable animal under the sun.

II. That divine revelation is necessary to true religion, to the being and support of it. That faith without which it is impossible to please God, cannot come to any perfection by seeing the works of God, but it must come by hearing the word of God, Rom. 10. 17. The rational soul, since it received that fatal shock by the Fall, cannot have or maintain that just regard to the great Author of its being, that observance of him, and expectation from him, which are both its duty and felicity, without some supernatural discovery made by himself of himself, and of his mind and will. Natural light, no doubt, is of excellent use, as far as it goes; but it is necessary that there be a divine revelation, to rectify its mistakes, and make up its deficiencies, to help us out there where the light of nature leaves us quite at a loss, especially in the way and method of man's recovery from his lapsed state, and his restoration to his Maker's favour; which he cannot but be conscious to himself of the loss of, finding, by sad experience, his own present state to be sinful and miserable. Our own reason shows us the wound, but nothing short of a divine revelation can discover to us a remedy to be confided in.

The case and character of those nations of the earth which had no other guide in their devotions than that of natural light, with some remains of the divine institution of sacrifices received by tradition from their fathers, plainly show how necessary divine revelation is to the subsistence of religion; for those that had not the word of God, soon lost God himself, became vain in their imaginations concerning him, and prodigiously vile and absurd in their worship and divinations. It is true, the Jews, who had the benefit of divine revelation, lapsed sometimes into idolatry, and admitted very gross corruptions; yet, with the help of the law and the prophets, they recovered and reformed: whereas the best and most admired philosophy of the Heathen could never do any thing toward the cure of the vulgar idolatry, or so much as offered to remove any of those barbarous and ridiculous rites of their religion, which were the scandal and reproach of the human nature. Let men therefore pretend what they will, deists are, or will be, atheists; and those that, under colour of admiring the oracles of reason, set aside as useless the oracles of God, undermine the foundations of all religion, and do what they can to cut off all communication between man and his Maker, and to set that noble creature on a level with the beasts that perish.

III. That divine revelation is not now to be found or expected any where but in the scriptures of the Old and New Testament; and there it is. It is true, there were religion and divine revelation before there was any written word; but to argue from thence, that the scriptures are not now necessary, is as absurd as it would be to argue that the world might do well enough without the sun, because in the Creation the world had light three days before the sun was made.

Divine revelations, when first given, were confirmed by visions, miracles, and prophecy; but they were to be transmitted to distant regions and future ages, with their proofs and evidences, by writing, the surest way of conveyance, by which the knowledge of other memorable things is preserved and propagated. We have reason to think that even the Ten Commandments, though spoken with such solemnity at Mount Sinai, would have been, long before this, lost and forgotten, if they had been handed down by tradition only, and never had been put in writing: it is that which is written, that remains.

The scripture indeed is not compiled as a methodical system or body of divinity, secundum artem—according to the rules of art, but in several ways of writing, (histories, laws, prophecies, songs, epistles, and even proverbs,) at several times, and by several hands, as Infinite Wisdom saw fit. The end is effectually obtained; such things are plainly supposed and taken for granted, and such things are expressly revealed and made known, as, being all put together, sufficiently inform us of all the truths and laws of the holy religion we are to believe, and be governed by.

That all scripture is given by inspiration of God, (2 Tim. 3. 16.) and that holy men spake and wrote as they were moved by the Holy Ghost, (2 Pet. 1. 21.) we are sure; but who dare pretend to describe that inspiration? None knows the way of the Spirit, nor how the thoughts were formed in the heart of him that was inspired, any more than we know the way of the soul into the body, or how the bones are formed in the womb of her that is with child, Eccles. 11. 5. But we may be sure that the blessed Spirit did not only habitually prepare and qualify the penmen of scripture for that service, and put it into their hearts to write, but did likewise assist their understandings and memories in recording those things which they themselves had the knowledge of, and effectually secure them from error and mistake; and what they could not know but by revelation, (as for instance, Gen. 1. and John 1.) the same blessed Spirit gave them clear and satisfactory information of. And, no doubt, as far as was necessary to the end designed, they were directed by the Spirit, even in the language and expression; for there were words which the Holy Ghost taught; (1 Cor. 2. 13.) and God saith to the prophet, Thou shalt speak with my words, Ezek. 3. 4. However, it is not material to us, who drew up the statute, nor what liberty he took in using his own words: when it is ratified, it is become the legislator's act, and binds the subject to observe the true intent and meaning of it.

The scripture proves its divine authority and original both to the wise and to the unwise: even to the unwise and least-thinking part of mankind, it is abundantly proved by the many incontestable miracles wrought by Moses and the prophets, Christ and his apostles, for the confirmation of its truths and laws: it would be an intolerable reproach to eternal Truth, to suppose this divine seal affixed to a lie. Besides this, to the more wise and thinking, to the more considerate and contemplative, it recommends itself by those innate excellencies which are self-evident characteristics of its divine original. If we look wisely, we shall soon be aware of God's image and superscription upon it. A mind rightly disposed by a humble sincere subjection to its Maker, will easily discover the image of God's wisdom in the awful depth of its mysteries; the image of his sovereignty in the commanding majesty of its style; the image of his unity in the wonderful harmony and symmetry of all its parts; the image of his holiness in the unspotted purity of its precepts; and the image of his goodness in the manifest tendency of the whole to the welfare and happiness of mankind in both worlds; in short, it is a work that fathers itself.

And as atheists, so deists, notwithstanding their vain-glorious pretensions to reason, as if wisdom must die with them, run themselves upon the grossest and most dishonourable absurdities imaginable; for if the scriptures be not the word of God, then there is no divine revelation now in the world, no discovery at all of God's mind concerning our duty and happiness: so that let a man be ever so desireful and solicitous to do his Maker's will, he must, without remedy, perish in the ignorance of it, since there is no book but this, that will undertake to tell him what it is; a consequence which can by no means be reconciled to the idea we have of the Divine goodness. And (which is no less an absurdity) if the scriptures be not really a divine revelation, they are certainly as great a cheat as ever was put upon the world: but we have no reason to think them so; for bad men would never write so good a book, nor would Satan have so little subtlety as to help to cast out Satan; and good men would never do so wicked a thing as to counterfeit the broad seal of Heaven, and to affix to it a patent of their own framing, though in itself ever so just. No, These are not the words of him that hath a devil.

IV. That the scriptures of the Old and New Testament were purposely designed for our learning. They might have been a divine revelation to those into whose hands they were first put, and yet we, at this distance, have been no way concerned in them; but it is certain that they were intended to be of universal and perpetual use and obligation to all persons, in all places, and all ages, that have the knowledge of them, even unto us upon whom the ends of the world are come, Rom. 15. 4. Though we are not under the law as a covenant of innocency, for then, being guilty, we should unavoidably perish under its curse; yet it is not therefore an antiquated statute, but a standing declaration of the will of God concerning good and evil, sin and duty, and its obligation to obedience is in as full force and virtue as ever: and unto us is the gospel of the ceremonial law preached, as well as unto them to whom it was first delivered, and much more plainly, Heb. 4. 2. The histories of the Old Testament were written for our admonition and direction, (1 Cor. 10. 11.) and not barely for the information and entertainment of the curious. The prophets, though long since dead, prophesy again by their writings, before nations and nations; (Heb. 12. 5.) and Solomon's exhortation speaketh unto us as unto sons.

The subject of the holy scripture is universal and perpetual, and therefore of common concern. It is intended, 1. To revive the universal and perpetual law of nature, the very remains of which (or ruins rather) in natural conscience, give us hints that we must look somewhere else for a fairer copy. 2. To reveal the universal and perpetual law of grace, which God's common beneficence to the children of men, such as puts them into a better state than that of devils, gives us some ground to expect. The divine authority likewise, which in this book commands our belief and obedience, is universal and perpetual, and knows no limits, either of time or place; it follows, therefore, that every nation and every age, to which these sacred writings are transmitted, are bound to receive them with the same veneration and pious regard that they commanded at their first entrance.

Though God hath, in these last days, spoken to us by his Son, yet we are not therefore to think that what he spake at sundry times and in divers manners to the fathers, (Heb. 1. 1.) is of no use to us, or that the Old Testament is an almanack out of date; no, we are built upon the foundation of the prophets, as well as of the apostles, Christ himself being the Corner-stone, (Eph. 2. 20.) in whom both these sides of this blessed building meet and are united: they were those ancient records of the Jewish church, which Christ and his apostles so oft referred to, so oft appealed to, and commanded us to search and to take heed to. The preachers of the gospel, like Jehoshaphat's judges, wherever they went, had this book of the law with them, and found it a great advantage to them to speak to them that knew the law, Rom. 7. 1. That celebrated translation of the Old Testament in the Greek tongue by the Seventy, between two and three hundred years before the birth of Christ, was to the nations a happy preparative for the entertainment of the gospel, by spreading the knowledge of the law: for as the New Testament expounds and completes the Old, and thereby makes it more serviceable to us now than it was to the Jewish church; so the Old Testament confirms and illustrates the New, and shows us Jesus Christ, the same yesterday that he is to-day, and will be for ever.

V. That the holy scriptures were not only designed for our learning, but are the settled standing rule of our faith and practice, by which we must be governed now and judged shortly: it is not only a book of general use, (so the writings of good and wise men may be,) but it is of sovereign and commanding authority; the statute-book of God's kingdom, which our oath of allegiance to him, as our supreme Lord, binds us to the observance of. Whether we will hear, or whether we will forbear, we must be told, that this is the oracle we are to consult, and to be determined by; the touchstone we are to appeal to, and try doctrines by; the rule we are to have an eye to, by which we must in every thing order our affections and conversations, and from which we must always take our measures. This is the testimony, this is the law which is bound up and sealed among the disciples, that word, according to which if we do not speak, it is because there is no light in us, Isa. 8. 16, 20.

The making of the light within, our rule, which by nature is darkness, and by grace is but a copy of, and conformable to, the written word, is setting the judge above the law; and making the traditions of the church rivals with the scripture, is no better: it is making the clock, which every one concerned puts backward or forward at pleasure, to correct the sun, that faithful measurer of time and days. These are absurdities, which, being once granted, thousands follow, as we see by sad experience.

VI. That therefore it is the duty of all Christians diligently to search the scriptures, and it is the office of ministers to guide and assist them therein. How useful soever this book of books is in itself, it will be of no use to us, if we do not acquaint ourselves with it, by reading it daily, and meditating upon it, that we may understand the mind of God in it, and may apply what we understand to ourselves for our direction, rebuke, and comfort, as there is occasion. It is the character of the holy and happy man, that his delight is in the law of the Lord; and, as an evidence thereof, he converses with it as his constant companion, and advises with it as his most wise and trusty counsellor, for in that law doth he meditate day and night, Ps. 1. 2.

It concerns us to be ready in the scriptures, and to make ourselves so by constant reading and careful observation, and especially by earnest prayer to God, for the promised gift of the Holy Ghost, whose office it is to bring things to our remembrance which Christ hath said to us; (John 14. 26.) that thus we may have some good word or other at hand for our use in our addresses to God, and in our converse with men; in our resistance of Satan, and in communing with our own hearts; and may be able, with the good householder, to bring out of this treasury things new and old, for the entertainment and edification both of ourselves and others. If any thing will make a man of God perfect in this world, will complete both a Christian and a minister, and thoroughly furnish him for every good work, it must be this. 2 Tim. 3. 17.

It concerns us also to be mighty in the scriptures, as Apollos was, (Acts 18. 24.) that is, to be thoroughly acquainted with the true intent and meaning of them, that we may understand what we read, and may not misinterpret or misapply it, but by the conduct of the blessed Spirit may be led into all truth, (John 16. 13.) and may hold it fast in faith and love, and put every part of scripture to that use for which it was intended. The letter, either of law or gospel, profits little without the Spirit.

The ministers of Christ are herein ministers to the Spirit for the good of the church; their business is to open and apply the scriptures; thence they may fetch their knowledge, thence their doctrines, devotions, directions, and admonitions, and thence their very language and expression. Expounding the scriptures was the most usual way of preaching in the first and purest ages of the church. What have the Levites to do but to teach Jacob the law; (Deut. 33. 10.) not only to read it, but to give the sense, and cause them to understand the reading? Neh. 8. 8. How shall they do this, except some man guide them? Acts 8. 31. As ministers would hardly be believed without Bibles to back them, so Bibles would hardly be understood without ministers to explain them; but if, having both, we perish in ignorance and unbelief, our blood will be upon our own head.

Being fully persuaded therefore of these things, I conclude, that whatever help is offered to good Christians in searching the scriptures, is real service done to the glory of God, and to the interests of his kingdom among men; and that is it which hath drawn me into this undertaking, which I have gone about in weakness, and in fear, and much trembling, lest I should be found exercising myself in things too high for me, (1 Cor. 2. 3.) and so laudable an undertaking should suffer damage by an unskilful management.

If any desire to know how so mean and obscure a person as I am, who in learning, judgment, felicity of expression, and all advantages for such a service, am less than the least of all my Master's servants, came to venture upon so great a work, I can give no other account of it than this: It has long been my practice, what little time I had to spare in my study, from my constant preparations for the pulpit, to spend it in drawing up expositions upon some parts of the New Testament, not so much for my own use, as purely for my own entertainment, because I knew not how to employ my thoughts and time more to my satisfaction. Tractis sua quemque volutus—Every man that studies, hath some beloved study, which is his delight above any other; and this is mine. It is that learning which it was my happiness from a child to be trained up in, by my ever honoured father, whose memory must always be very dear and precious to me: he often reminded me that a good textuary is a good divine; and that I should read other books with this in my eye, that I might be the better able to understand and apply the scripture.

While I was thus employing myself, came out Mr. Burkill's Exposition, of the Gospels first, and afterward of the Acts and the Epistles, which met with very good acceptance among serious people, and no doubt, by the blessing of God will continue to do great service to the church. Soon after he had finished that work, it pleased God to call him to his rest; upon which I was urged, by some of my friends, and was myself inclined, to attempt the like upon the Old Testament, in the strength of the grace of Christ. This upon the Pentateuch is humbly offered as a specimen: if it find favour, and be found any way useful, it is my present purpose, in dependence upon Divine aids, to go on, so long as God shall continue my life and health, and as my other work will permit.

Many helps, I know, we have of this kind in our own language, which we have a great deal of reason to value, and to be very thankful to God for: but the scripture is a subject that can never be exhausted. Semper habet aliquid relegentibus—However frequently we read it, we shall always meet with something new. When David had amassed a vast treasure for the building of the temple, yet saith he to Solomon, Thou mayest add thereto, 1 Chron. 22. 14. Such a treasure is scripture-knowledge; it is still capable of increase, till we all come to the perfect man.

The scripture is a field or vineyard which finds work for variety of hands, and about which may be employed a great diversity of gifts and operations, but all from the same Spirit, (1 Cor. 12. 4, 6.) and for the glory of the same Lord. The learned in the languages and in ancient usages have been very serviceable to the church, (the blessed occupant of this field,) by their curious and elaborate searches into its various products, their anatomies of its plants, and the entertaining lectures they have read upon them. The philosophy of the critics hath been of much more advantage to religion, and lent more light to sacred truth, than the philosophy of the school-divines. The learned also in the arts of war have done great service in defending this garden of the Lord against the violent attacks of the powers of darkness, successfully pleading the cause of the sacred writings against the spiteful cavils of atheists, deists, and the profane scoffers of these later days. Such as these stand in the posts of honour, and their praise is in all the churches; yet the labours of the vine-dressers and the husbandmen, (2 Kings 25. 12.) though they are the poor of the land who till this ground, and gather in the fruits of it, are no less necessary in their place, and beneficial to the household of God, that out of these precious fruits every one may have his portion of meat in due season. These are the labours which, according to my ability, I have here set my hand unto. And as the plain and practical expositors would not, for a world, say of the learned critics, There is no need of them; so, it is hoped, those eyes and heads will not say to the hands and feet, There is no need of you; 1 Cor. 12. 21.

The learned have of late received very great advantage in their searches into this part of holy writ, and the books that follow, (and still hope for more,) by the excellent and most valuable labours of that great and good man, bishop Patrick, whom, for vast reading, solid judgment, and a most happy application to these best of studies, even in his advanced years and honours, succeeding ages, no doubt, will rank among the first three of commentators, and bless God for him.

Mr. Pool's English Annotations (which, having had so many impressions, we may suppose, got into most hands) are of admirable use, especially for the explaining of scripture-phrases, opening the sense, referring to parallel scriptures, and the clearing of difficulties that occur: I have therefore all along been brief upon that which is there most largely discussed, and have industriously declined, as much as I could, what is to be found there; for I would not actum agere—do what is done; nor (if I may be allowed to borrow the apostle's words) boast of things made ready to our hand, 2 Cor. 10. 16.

Those and other annotations which are referred to the particular words and clauses they are designed to explain, are more easy to be consulted upon occasion; but the exposition which (like this) is put into a continued discourse, digested under proper heads, is much more easy and ready to be read through for one's own or others' instruction. And, I think, the observing of the connexion of each chapter (if there be occasion) with that which goes before, and the general scope of it, with the thread of the history or discourse, and the collecting of the several parts of it, to be seen at one view, will contribute very much to the understanding of it, and will give the mind abundant satisfaction in the general intention, though there may be here and there a difficult word or expression which the best critics cannot easily account for. This, therefore, I have here endeavoured.

But we are concerned not only to understand what we read, but to improve it to some good purpose, and, in order thereunto, to be affected with it, and to receive the impressions of it. The word of God is designed to be not only a light to our eyes, the entertaining subject of our contemplation, but a light to our feet and a lamp to our paths, (Ps. 119. 106.) to direct us in the way of our duty, and to prevent our turning aside into any by-way: we must therefore, in searching the scriptures, inquire, not only What is this? but, What is this to us? What use may we make of it? How may we accommodate it to some of the purposes of that divine and heavenly life which, by the grace of God, we are resolved to live? Inquiries of this kind I have here aimed to answer.

When the stone is rolled from the well's mouth by a critical explication of the text, still there are those who would both drink themselves, and water their flocks; but they complain that the well is deep, and they have nothing to draw; how then shall they come by this living water? Some such may, perhaps, find a bucket here, or water drawn to their hands; and pleased enough shall I be with this office of the Gibeonites, to draw water for the congregation of the Lord out of these wells of salvation.

That which I aim at in the exposition, is, to give what I thought the genuine sense, and to make it as plain as I could to ordinary capacities, not troubling my reader with the different sentiments of expositors: which would have been to transcribe Mr. Pool's Latin Synopsis, where this is done abundantly to our satisfaction and advantage.

As to the practical observations, I have not obliged myself to raise. doctrines out of every verse or paragraph, but only have endeavoured to mix with the exposition such hints or remarks as I thought improbable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, and for instruction in righteousness, aiming in all to promote practical godliness, and carefully avoiding matters of doubtful disputation and strides of words. It is only the prevalency of the power of religion in the hearts and lives of christians, that will redress our grievances, and turn our wilderness into a fruitful field.

And since our Lord Jesus Christ is the true Treasure hid in the field of the Old Testament, and was the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world, I have been careful to observe what Moses wrote of him, to which he himself oft appealed. In the writings of the prophets we meet with more of the plain and express promises of the Messiah, and the grace of the gospel; but here, in the books of Moses, we find more of the types, both real and personal, figures of Him that was to come; shadows, of which the substance is Christ, Rom. 5. 14. Those to whom to live is Christ, will find in these that which is very instructive and affecting, and will give great assistance to their faith, and love, and holy joy. This, in a particular manner, we search the scriptures for—to find what they testify of Christ and eternal life: John 5. 39.

Nor is it any objection against the application of the ceremonial institutions of Christ and his grace, that they to whom they were given, could not discern this sense, or use of them; but it is rather a reason why we should be very thankful that the vail which was upon their minds in the reading of the Old Testament, is done away in Christ, 2 Cor. 3. 13, 14, 18. Though they then could not steadfastly look to the end of that which is abolished, it does not therefore follow but that we who are happily furnished with a key to these mysteries, may in them, as in a glass, behold the glory of the Lord Jesus. And yet, perhaps, the pious Jews saw more of the gospel in their ritual, than we think they did; they had at least a general expectation of good things to come, by faith in the promises made to the fathers, as we have of the happiness of heaven, though they could not of that world to come, any more than we can of this, form any distinct or certain idea. Our conceptions of the future state, perhaps, are as dark and confused, as short of the truth, and as wide from it, as theirs then were of the kingdom of the Messiah: but God requires faith, only according to the revelation he gives. They then were accountable for no more light than they had; and we now are accountable for that greater light which we have in the gospel, by the help of which we may find much more of Christ in the Old Testament than they could.

If any think our observations sometimes take rise from that which to them seems too minute, let them remember that maxim of the Rabbins, Non est in lege vel una litera a qua non pendet magni montes—The law contains not a letter but what bears the weight of mountains We are sure there is not an idle word in the Bible.
I would desire the reader not only to read the text entire, before he reads the exposition, but, as the several verses are referred to in the exposition, to cast his eye upon them again, and then he will the better understand what he reads. And if he have leisure, he will find it of use to him to turn to the scriptures, which are sometimes only referred to for brevity's sake, comparing spiritual things with spiritual.

It is the declared purpose of the Eternal mind, in all the operations both of providence and grace, to magnify the law, and to make it honourable; (Isa. 42. 21.) nay, to magnify his word above all his name; (Ps. 138. 2.) so that when we pray, Father, glorify thy name, we mean this, among other things, Father, magnify the holy scriptures; and to that prayer, made in faith, we may be sure of that answer which was given to our blessed Saviour when he prayed it, with particular respect to the fulfilling the scriptures in his own sufferings, I have both glorified it, and I will glorify it yet again, John 12. 28. To this great design I humbly desire to be some way serviceable, in the strength of that grace by which I am what I am, hoping that what may help to make the reading of the scriptures more easy, pleasant, and profitable, will be graciously accepted by Him that smiled on the widow's two mites cast into the treasury, as an intention to magnify it, and make it honourable; and if I can but gain that point, in any measure, with some, I shall think my endeavours abundantly recompensed, however, by others, I and my performances may be vilified and made contemptible.

I have now nothing more to add, than to recommend myself to the prayers of my friends, and them to the grace of the Lord Jesus; and so rest an unworthy dependent upon that grace, and, through that, an expectant of the glory to be revealed.

EXPOSITION,
WITH

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS,

OF THE FIRST BOOK OF MOSES, CALLED

GENESIS.

I. We have now before us the Holy Bible, or Book; for so Bible signifies. We call it the Book, by way of eminency; for it is incomparably the best book that ever was written, the Book of books, shining like the sun, in the firmament of learning; other valuable and useful books, like the moon and stars, borrowing their light from it. We call it the Holy Book; because it was written by holy men, and indited by the Holy Ghost; it is perfectly pure from all falsehood and corrupt intention; and the manifest tendency of it is to promote holiness among men. The great things of God's Law and Gospel are here written to us, that they might be reduced to a greater certainty, might spread further, remain longer, and be transmitted to distant places and ages, more pure and entire than possibly they could be by report and tradition; and we shall have a great deal to answer for, if these things which belong to our peace, being thus committed to us in black and white, be neglected by us as a strange and foreign thing, Hos. viii. 12

The Scriptures, or Writings of the several inspired penmen, from Moses down to St. John, in which divine light, like that of the morning, shone gradually, (the sacred Canon being now completed,) are all put together in this blessed Bible, which, thanks be to God, we have in our hands, and they make us perfect a day as we are to expect on this side heaven. Every part was good, but altogether very good. This is the light that shines in a dark place, 2 Peter i. 19, and a dark place indeed the world would be, without the Bible.

II. We have before us that part of the Bible which we call the Old Testament, containing the acts and monuments of the church, from the creation almost to the coming of Christ in the flesh, which was about four thousand years, the truths then revealed, the laws then enacted, the devotions then paid, the prophecies then given, and the events which concerned that distinguished body, so far as God saw fit to preserve to us the knowledge of them. This is called a Testament, or Covenant, (סֵתָבָן,) because it was a settled declaration of the will of God concerning man in a Federal way, and had its force from the designed death of the great Testator, the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world, Rev. xiii. 8. It is called the Old Testament, with relation to the New, which does not cancel and supersede it, but crown and perfect it, by the bringing in of that better hope which was typified and foretold in it: the Old Testament still remains glorious, though the New far exceeds in glory, 2 Cor. iii. 9.

III. We have before us that part of the Old Testament, which we call the Pentateuch, or five Books of Moses, that servant of the Lord who excelled all the other prophets, and typified the Great Prophet. In our Saviour's distribution of the books of the Old Testament into the Law, the Prophets, and the Psalms, or Hagiographa, these are the Law; for they contain not only the laws given to Israel, in the four last, but the laws given to Adam, to Noah, and to Abraham, in the first. These five books were, for ought we know, the first that ever were written; for we have not the least mention of any writing in all the book of Genesis, nor till God bid Moses write, Exod. xvii. 14; and some think Moses himself never learned to write, till God set him his copy in the writing of the Ten Commandments upon the tables of stone. However, we are sure these books are the most ancient writings now extant, and therefore best able to give us a satisfactory account of the most ancient things.

IV. We have before us the first and longest of those five books, which we call Genesis; written, some think, when Moses was in Midian, for the instruction and comfort of his suffering brethren in Egypt. I rather think he wrote it in the wilderness, after he had been in the Mount with God, where, probably, he received full and particular instructions for the writing of it. And as he framed the tabernacle, so he did the more excellent and durable fabric of this book, exactly according to the pattern shown him in the mount; into which it is better to resolve the certainty of the things herein contained, than into any tradition which possibly might be handed down from Adam to Methuselah, from him to Shem, from him to Abraham, and so to the family of Jacob. Genesis is a name borrowed from the Greek. It signifies the original, or generation; fitly is this book so called, for it is a history of originals—the creation of the world, the entrance of sin and death into it, the invention of arts, the rise of nations, and especially the planting of the church, and the state of it in its early days. It is also a history of generations—the generations of Adam, Noah, Abraham, &c. not endless, but useful genealogies. The beginning of the New Testament is called Genesis too, Matt. i. 1. と思ってい。The Book of the Genesis, or Generation, of Jesus Christ. Blessed be God for that Book which shows us our remedy, as this opens our wound. Lord, open our eyes, that we may see the wondrous things both of thy Law and Gospel.
CHAP. I.

The foundation of all religion being laid in our relation to God as our Creator, it was fit that that book of divine revelation which was intended to be the guide, support, and rule, of religion in the world, should begin, as it does, with a plain and full account of the creation of the world—in answer to that first inquiry of a good conscience: Where is God my Maker? Job 35. 10. Concerning this, the pagan philosophers wretchedly blundered, and became vain in their imaginations; some asserting the world's eternity and self-existence, others ascribing it to a former world; some chose atoms; thus the world by wisdom knew not God, but took a great deal of pains to lose him. The holy scripture, therefore, designing by revealed religion to maintain and improve natural religion, to repair the deceptions of it, and supply the deficiencies of it in the reviving and preserving the light of the law of nature; lays down, at first, this principle of the unclouded light of nature. That this world was, in the beginning of time, created by a Being of infinite wisdom and power, who was himself before all things, and all worlds. The entrance into God's word gives this light, Ps. 119. 130. The first verse of the Bible gives us a surer and better, a more satisfying and useful knowledge of the origin of the universe, than all the volumes of the philosophers. The lively faith of humble Christians understands this matter better than the elevated fancy of the greatest wis, Heb. 11. 3.

We have three things in this chapter, I. A general idea given of the creation, v. 1. II. A particular account of the several days' work, registered, as in a journal, distinctly and in order. The creation of the light, the first day, v. 3. 5.; of the firmament, the second day, v. 6. of the earth and sea, the third day, v. 9. 13. of the lights, the fourth day, v. 14. 19. of the fish and fowl, the fifth day, v. 20. 25.; of the beasts, v. 24. 25.; of man, v. 26. 28.; and of food for both, the sixth day, v. 29. 30. III. The review and approbation of the whole work, v. 31.

1. IN the beginning God created the heaven and the earth. And the earth was without form, and void; and darkness was upon the face of the deep. And the Spirit of God moved upon the face of the waters.

In this verse we have the work of creation in its ejitome, and in its embryo.

1. In its ejitome, v. 1. where we find, to our comfort, the first article of our creed, that God the Father Almighty is the Maker of heaven and earth, and as such we believe in him. Observe, in this verse, four things.

1. The effect produced, the heaven and the earth, that is, the world, including the whole frame and furnishing of the universe the world and all things therein, Acts 17. 24. The world is a great house, consisting of upper and lower stories, the structure stately and magnificent, uniform and convenient, and every room well and wisely furnished. It is the visible part of the creation that Moses here designs to account for; therefore, he mentions not the creation of angels; but as the earth has not itself such a foundation as the heavens and the seas, but also its bowels enriched with metals and precious stones which partake more of its solid nature and are more valuable, though the creation of them is not mentioned here; so the heavens are not only beautified to our eye with glorious lamps which garnish its outside, of whose creation we here read, but they are within replenished with glorious beings, out of our sight, more celestial, and more surpassing in worth and excellency, than the gold or sapphires do the lilies of the field. In the visible world it is easy to observe, (1.) Great variety; several sorts of beings vastly differing in their nature and constitution from each other. Lord, how manifold are thy works, and all good! (2.) Great beauty; the azure sky and verdant earth are charming to the eye of the curious spectator, much more the ornaments of both. How transcendest then must the beauty of the Creator be! (3.) Great exactness and accuracy; to those that, with the help of microscopes, narrowly lock into the works of nature, they appear far more fine than any of the works of art. (4.) Great finery; it is not a lump of dry, lifeless matter, but there is virtue more or less, in every creature; the earth itself has a magnetic power. (5.) Great order; a mutual dependence of being, an exact harmony of motions, and an admirable chain and connexion of causes. (6.) Great mystery; there are phenomena in nature, which cannot be solved, secrets which cannot be fathomed or accounted for. But from what we see of heaven and earth, we may easily enough inferences the eternal wisdom and power of the great Creator, and may furnish ourselves with abundant matter for his praises. And let us make and place, as men, remind us of our duty as Christians, which is, always to keep heaven in our eye, and the earth under our feet.

3. The manner in which this work was effected; God created, that is, made it out of nothing; there was not any pre-existent matter out of which the world was produced. The fish and fowl were indeed produced out of the waters, and the beasts and man out of the earth; but that earth and those waters were made out of nothing. By the ordinary power of nature, it is impossible that something should be made out of nothing; no artificer can work, unless he has something to work on. But by the almighty power of God, it is not only possible that something should be made of nothing, (the God of nature is not subject to the laws of nature,) but in the creation, it is impossible it should be otherwise, for nothing is more injurious to the honour of the Eternal Mind than the supposition of eternal matter, and thus the excellency of the power is of God, and all the glory to him.

4. When this work was produced; In the beginning, that is, in the beginning of time, when that clock was first set a going: time began with the production of those beings that are measured by time. Before the beginning of time there was none but that Infinite Being that inhabits eternity. Should we ask why God made the world no sooner, we shall but be the more amazed by work without knowledge; for how could there be sooner or later in eternity? And he did make it in the beginning of time, according to his eternal counsels before all time. The Jewish Rabbins have a saving, that there were seven things which God created before the world, by which they only mean to express the excellency of these things—The Law; Repentance; Paradise; Hell; the throne of Glory; the House of the Sanctuary; and the Name of the Messiah. But to us it is enough to say, In the beginning was the Word, John 1. 1.

Let us learn hence, (1.) That atheism is folly, and atheists are the greatest fools in nature; for they see there is a world that could not make itself, and yet they will not own there is a God that made it. Doubtless, they are without excuse, but the god of this world has blinded their minds. (2.) That God is sovereign Lord of all, by an incontestible right. If he be the Creator, no doubt, he is the Owner and Possessor, of heaven and earth. (3.) That with God all things are possible, and therefore happy are the people that have him for their God, and whose help and hope stand in his name, Ps. 121. 2. 3. 37. 4. (4.) That the God we serve, is worthy of, and yet is exalted far above, all blessing and praise, Neh. 9. 5. 6. If he made the world, he needs not our services, nor can be benefited by them, Acts 17. 24, 25, and yet he justly requires them, and deserves our praise, Rev. 4. 11. If all of him, all must be to him.

II. Here is the work of creation in its embryo, (v. 2.) where we have an account of its first matter, and first Mover.

1. A chaos was the first matter; it is here called the earth, (though the earth, properly-taken, was not made till the third day, v. 10.) because it did most resemble that which afterward was called earth, mere earth, destitute of its ornaments, such a heavy unwieldy mass was it; it is also called the deep, both for its vastness, and because the waters which were afterward separated from the earth, were now mixed with it. This immense mass of matter was it, out of which all bodies, even the firmament and visible heavens themselves, were afterward produced by the power of the Eternal Word. The Creator could have made his work perfect at first, but by this gradual proceeding he would show what is, ordinarily, the method of his providence and grace. Observe the description of this chaos. (1.) There was nothing in it desirable to be seen, for it was without form, and void. Tohu and Bohu, confusion and emptiness; so those words are rendered, Isa. 34. 11. It was shapeless, it was useless, it was without inhabitants, without ornaments, the shadow or rough draught of things to come, and not the image of the things, Heb. 10. 1. The earth is almost reduced to the same condition again by the sin of man, under which the creation groans, Rom. 8. 22. 23. I beheld the earth, and it was without form, and void. Those who have their hearts in heaven, this lower world, in comparison with that upper, still appears to be nothing but confusion and emptiness. There is no true beauty to be seen, no satisfying fulness to be enjoyed, in this earth, but in God only. (2.) If there had been anything desirable to be seen, yet there was not light: darkness, thick darkness, was upon the face of the deep. God did not create this darkness, (as he is said to create the darkness of affliction, Isa. 45. 7,) for it was only the want of light, which yet could not be said to be wanted, till something was made, that might be seen by it; nor needs the want of it be much complained of, when there was nothing to be seen but confusion and emptiness. If the work of grace in the soul is a new creation, the state of an unredeemed graceless soul; there is disorder, confusion, and every evil work; it is empty of all good, for it is without God; it is dark, it is darkness itself; this is our condition by nature, till almighty grace effects a blessed change.

2. The Spirit of God was the first Mover; he moved upon the face of the waters. When we consider the earth without form, and void, methinks, it is like the valley full of dead and dry bones. Can these live? Can this confused mass of matter be formed into a beautiful world? Yes, if a spirit of life from God enter into it, Ezek. 37. 9. Now there is hope concerning this thing; for if the Spirit of God begins to work, and if he work, who or what shall hinder? God is said to make the world by his Spirit, Ps. 33. 6. Job. 26. 13, and by the same Mighty Word creation is effected. He moved upon the face of the deep, and Edged himself upon the dead child; as the hen gathers her chickens under her wings, and hovers over them, to warm and cherish them, Matt. 23. 37, as the eagle stirs up her nest, and flutters over her young, (it is the same word that is here used,) Deut. 52. 11. Learn hence, That God is not only the Author of all being, but the Fountain of life, and Spring of operation. Deceive the actions of the dead, and they are ever dead, if he did not quicken it. And this makes it credible to us, that God should raise the dead. That power which brought such a world as this, out of confusion, emptiness, and darkness, at the beginning of time, can, at the end of time, bring our vile bodies out of the grave, though it be a land of darkness as darkness itself, and without any order, Job. 10. 22, and can make them glorious bodies.

3. And God said, Let there be light: and there was light. 4. And God saw the light that it was good: and God divided the light from the darkness. 5. And God called the light Day, and the darkness he called Night. And the evening and the morning were the first day.

We have here a further account of the first day's work. In which observe, I. That the first of all visible beings which God created, was light; not that by it he himself might see to work, (for the darkness and light are both alike to him,) but that by it we might see his works, and his glory in them, and might work our works while it is day. The works of Satan and his servants are works of darkness; but he that doeth truth, and doeth good, cometh to the light, and coveteth it, that his deeds may be made manifest, John 3. 21. Light is the great beauty and blessing of the universe: like the first-born, it does, of all visible beings, most resemble its great Parent in purity and power, brightness and beneficence; it is of great affinity with a spirit, and is next to it; though we may see other things, and are sure that it is, yet we know not its nature, nor can describe what it is, or by what way the light is parted, Job 38. 19. 24. By the sight of it let us be led to, and assisted in, the believing contemplation of Him who is Light, infinite and eternal Light, 1 John 1. 5, and the Father of Lights, James 1. 17, and who dwell in inaccessible light, 1 Tim. 6. 16. In the new creation, the things which have been created in light; the blessed Spirit captivates the will and affections by enlightening the understanding, so coming into the heart by the door, like the good shepherd whose own it is, while sin and Satan, like thieves and robbers, climb up some other way. They that by sin were darkness, by grace become light in the Lord.

II. That the light was made by the word of God's power; he said, Let there be Light; he willed and appointed it, and it was done immediately; there was light, such a copy as exactly answered the original idea in the Eternal Mind. O the power of the word of God! He spoke, and it was done; done really, effectually, and for perpetuity, not in show only, and to serve a present turn, for he commanded, and it stood fast: with him it was dictum, fac tum—a word, and a world. The word of God, that is, his will and the good pleasure of it, is quick and powerful. Christ is the Word, the essential eternal Word, and by him the light was produced, for in him was light, and he is the right Light, the Light of the world, 1 John 9.—5. 3. The divine light which was together or received into the world, is the power of God, the power of his word, and of the Spirit of wisdom and revelation, opening the understanding, scattering the mists of ignorance and mistake, and giving the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Christ, as, at first, God commanded the light to shine out of darkness, 2 Cor. 4. 6. Darkness had been perpetually upon the face of fallen man, if the Son of God had not come, and given us an eye to see. 20. 5.

III. That the light which God willed, when it was produced, he approved of; God saw the light that it was good. It was exactly as he designed it, and it was fit to answer the end for which he designed it. It was useful and profitable; the world, which now is a palace, would have been a dungeon without it. It was amiable and pleasant; truly light is sweet, Eccles. 11. 7, it rejoiceth the heart, Prov. 15. 19. The heavens are all his. He graciously accepted of, and he well pleased with the work of his own hands. That is good indeed, which is so in the sight of God, for he sees not as man sees. If the light be good, how good is he that is the Fountain of light, from which we receive it, and to whom we owe all praise for it, and all the services we do by it!

IV. That God divided the light from the darkness, so put them asunder, as that they could never be joined together or reconciled; for what fellowship has light with darkness? 2 Cor. 6. 14. And yet he divided time between them, the day for light, and the night for darkness, in a constant and regular succession to each other. Though the darkness was now scattered by the light, yet it was not condemned to a perpetual banishment, but takes its turn with the light, and has its place, because it has its use; for as the light of the morning befriends the business of the day, so the shadows of the evening befriend the repose of the night, and draw the curtains about us, that we may sleep the better; See Job 7. 2. God has thus divided time between light and darkness, because he would daily remind us that this is a world of mixtures and changes. In heaven there is perfect and perpetual light, and no darkness at all; in hell, utter darkness, and no gleam of light. In this world, between these two there is a great gulf fixed; but in this world, they are counterchanged, and we pass daily from one to another; that we may learn to expect the like vicissitudes in the providence of God, peace and trouble, joy and sorrow, and may set the one over against the other, and accommodate ourselves to both, as we do to the light and darkness, bidding both welcome, and making the best of both.

V. That God divided them from each other, distinguishing the day, which he called Day, and the darkness he called Night. He gave them names, as Lord of both; for the day is his, the night also is his, Ps. 74. 16. He is the Lord of time, and will be so, till day and night shall come to an end, and the stream of time be swallowed up in the ocean of eternity. Let us acknowledge God in the constant succession of day and night, and consecrate both, to his honour, by working for him every day, and resting in him every night, and meditating in his law day and night.

VI. That this was the first day’s work, and a good day’s work it was; the evening and the morning were the first day. The darkness of the evening was before the light of the morning, that it might serve for a foil to it, to set it off, and make it shine the brighter. This was not only the first day of the world, but the first day of the week. I observe it, to the honour of that day, because the new world began on the first day of the week likewise, in the resurrection of Christ, as the Light of the world, early in the morning. In him, the day-spring from on high has visited the world; and happy and ever happy, if that Day-star arise in our hearts.

6. And God said, Let there be a firmament in the midst of the waters, and let it divide the waters from the waters. 7. And God made the firmament, and divided the waters which were under the firmament, from the waters which were above the firmament: and it was so. 8. And God called the firmament Heaven. And the evening and the morning were the second day.

We have here an account of the second day’s work, the creation of the firmament: in which we observe,

I. The command of God concerning it; Let there be a firmament, and expansion, so the Hebrew word signifies, like a sheet spread, or a curtain drawn out. This includes all that is visible above the earth, between it, and the third heaven; the air, its higher, middle, and lower regions; the celestial globe, and all the spheres and orbs of light above it. This reaches as high as the place where the stars are fixed, for that is called here the firmament of Heaven, v. 14, 15, and as low as the place where the birds fly, for that also is called the firmament of Heaven, v. 20. When God had made the light, he appointed the air to be the receptacle and vehicle of its beams, and to be as a medium of communication between the invisible and the visible world; for though between heaven and earth there is an inconceivable distance, yet there is not an impassable gulf, as there is between heaven and hell. This firmament is not a wall of partition, but a way of intercourse. See Job 26. 7—57. 18. Ps. 104. 3. Amos 9. 6.

II. The creation of it. Lest it should seem as if God had only commanded it to be done, and some one else had done it, he adds, And God made the firmament. What God requires of us, he himself works in us, or it is not done. He that commands faith, holiness, and love, creates them by the power of his grace going along with his word, that he may have all the praise. Lord, give what thou commandest, and then command what thou pleasest. The firmament is said to be the work of God’s fingers, Ps. 8. 3. Though the vastness of its extent declares it to be the work of his arm stretched out, yet the admirable fineness of its constitution shows that it is a curious piece of art, the work of his fingers.

III. The use and design of it; to divide the waters from the waters, that is, to distinguish between the waters that are wrappt up in the clouds, and those that cover the sea; the waters in the air, and those in the earth. See the difference between these two, carefully observed, Deut. 11. 10, 11, where Canaan is, upon this account, preferred to Egypt; that it not withered and made fruitful, with the waters that are under the firmament; but Canaan with waters from above, out of the firmament; even the dew of heaven, which tarteth not for the sons of men, Mic. 5. 7. God has, in the firmament of his power, chambers, store-chambers, whence he watereth the earth, Ps. 104. 13.—65. 9, 10. He has also treasures, or magazines, of snow and hail, which he hath reserved against the day of battle and war, Job 38. 22, 23. O what a great God is he, who has thus provided for the comfort of all that serve him, and the confusion of all that hate him! It is good having him our friend, and bad having him our enemy.

IV. The naming of it; He called the firmament Heaven. ‘It is the visible heaven, the pavement of the holy city; above the firmament God is said to have his throne, Ezek. I. 26, for he has prepared it in the heavens; the heavens therefore are said to rule, Dan. 4. 33. ‘But not God of the earth:’ Job 22. 12. Yes, he is, and we should be led by the contemplation of the heavens that are in our eye, to consider Our Father which is in heaven. The height of the heavens should remind us of God’s supremacy, and the infinite distance that is between us and him; the brightness of the heavens and their purity should remind us of his glory and majesty, and perfect holiness; the vastness of the heavens, their encompassing of the earth, and the influence they have upon it, should remind us of his immensity and universal providence.

9. And God said, Let the waters under the heaven be gathered together unto one place, and let the dry land appear: and it was so. 10. And God called the dry land Earth; and the gathering together of the waters called he Seas: and God saw that it was good. 11. And God said, Let the earth bring forth grass, the herb yielding seed, and the fruit tree yielding fruit after his kind, whose seed is in itself, upon the earth: and it was so. 12. And the earth brought forth grass, and herb yielding seed after his kind, and the tree yielding fruit, whose seed was in itself, after his kind: and God saw that it was good. 13. And the evening and the morning were the third day.

The third day’s work is related in these verses; the forming of the sea and the dry land, and the making of the earth fruitful. Hitherto the power of the Creator had been exerted and employed about the upper part of the visible world; the light of heaven was kindled, and the firmament of heaven fixed; but now he descends to this lower world, the earth, which was designed for the children of men, designed both for their habitation, and for their maintenance; and here we have an account of the fitting of it for both, the building of their house, and the spreading of their table. Observe,

I. How the earth was prepared to be a habitation for man; by the gathering of the waters together, and the making of the dry land to appear; thus, instead of that confusion which was, v. 2, when earth and water were mixed in one great mass, behold, now, there is order, by such a separation as rendered them both useful. God said, Let it be so, and it was so; no sooner said than done. 1. The waters, which had covered the earth, were ordered to retire, and to gather into one place, namely, those hollows which were fitted and appointed for their reception and rest: the waters, thus cleared, thus collected, and thus lodged in their proper place, he called Seas; for though they are many, in distant regions, and washing several shores, yet either above ground, or under ground, they have communication with each other, and so they are one, and the common receptacle of waters, into which all the rivers flow, Ecc. I. 7. Waters and seas often, in scripture, signify troubles and afflictions, Ps. 147. 38. God’s people are not exempted from these in this world; but it is a comfort, that they are only waters under the heaven, (there is none in heaven,) and that they are all in the place that God has appointed them, and within the bounds that he has set them. How the waters were gathered together, at first, and how they are still bound and limited by the same Almighty Hand that first confined them, is elegantly described, Ps. 104. 5, 6... For the sea, and every thing therein, was there mentioned as matter of praise. They that go down into the sea in ships, ought to acknowledge daily the wisdom, power, and goodness, of the Creator, in making the great waters serviceable to man for trade and commerce; and they that tarry at home, must own themselves indebted to him that keeps the sea with bars and doors in its decreed place, and stays its proud waves, Job 38. 19, 11. 2. The dry land was made to appear, and emerged out of the waters, and was called Earth, and given to the children of men. The earth, it seems, was in being, before; but it was of no use, because it was under water: thus many of God’s gifts are received in vain, because they are buried; make them to appear, and they become serviceable. We who, to this day, enjoy the benefit of the dry land, (though, since this, it was once deluged, and dried again,) must own ourselves tenants to, and dependents upon, that God whose hands filled the dry land, and the seas, with fruit and herbs, Gen. 1. 2.

II. How the earth was furnished for the maintenance and support of man, v. 11, 12. Present provision was now made, by the immediate products of the upstart earth, which in obedience to God’s command, was no sooner made, than it became fruitful, and brought forth grass for the cattle, and herb for the service of man. Provision was likewise made for time to come, by the perpetuating of the several kinds of vegetables, which are numerous, various, and all curious, and every one having its seed in itself after its kind, that, during the continuance of man upon the earth, food might be fetched out of the earth, for his use and benefit. Lord, what is man, that he is thus visited and regarded—that such care should be taken, and such provision made, for the support and preservation of those guilty and obnoxious lives which have been, a thousand times, before committed to the earth? but not only the earth is the Lord’s, but the fruitfulness hereafter is the rightful Owner and sovereign Disposer, not only of it, but of all its furniture. The earth was emptines, v. 2: but now, by a word’s speaking, it is become full of God’s riches, and his are they still; his corn and his wine, his wool and his flax, Hos. 2. 9. Though the use of them is allowed to us, the property still remains in him, and to his service and honour they must be used. 2. That common providence is a continued creation, and in it, our Father worketh hitherto. The earth still remains, under the efficacy of this command, to bring forth grass, and herbs, and its annual products; though, being according to the common course of nature, they are not standing miracles, yet they are standing instances of the unexercised power, and unexhausted goodness, of the world’s great Maker and Master. That the earth, ordinarly, makes use of the agency of second causes, as it is called, nature, yet he neither needs them, nor is tied to them, though the precious fruits of the earth are usually brought forth by the influences of the sun and moon, Deut. 33. 14, yet here we find the earth bearing a great abundance of fruit, probably ripe fruit, before the sun and moon were made. 4. That it is good to provide things necessary, before we have occasion to use them: before the beasts and man were made, here were grass and herb prepared for them. God thus dealt wisely and graciously with man; let not man then be foolish and unwise for himself. 5. That God must have the glory of all the benefit we receive from the products of the earth, either for food or physic. It is he that hears the heavens, when they hear the earth, Hos. 2, 21, 22. And if we have, through grace, an interest in him who is the Fountain, when the streams are dried up, and the fig-tree doth not blossom, we may rejoice in him.

14. And God said, Let there be lights in the firmament of the heaven, to divide the day from the night; and let them be for signs, and for seasons, and for days, and years: 15. And let them be for lights in the firmament of the heaven, to give light upon the earth: and it was so. 16. And God made two great lights; the greater light to rule the day, and the lesser light to rule the night: he made the stars also. 17. And God set them in the firmament of the heaven, to give light upon the earth. 18. And to rule over the day and over the night, and to divide the light from the darkness: and God saw that it was good. 19. And the evening and the morning were the fourth day.

This is the history of the fourth day's work, the creating of the sun, moon, and stars, which are here accounted for, not as they are in themselves, and in their own nature, to satisfy the curious, but as they are in relation to this earth, to which they serve as lights; and this is enough to furnish us with matter for praise and thanksgiving. Holy Job mentions this as an instance of the glorious power of God, that by his Spirit he hath garnished the heavens; Job 26, 13; and here we have an account of that garniture, which is not only so much the beauty of the upper world, but so much the blessing of this lower; for though heaven is high, yet it hath respect to this earth, and therefore should have respect from it. Of the creation of the lights of heaven we have an account.

I. In general, v. 14, 15, where we have, 1. The command given concerning them; Let there be lights in the firmament of heaven. God had said, v. 3. Let there be light, and there was light: but that was, as it were, a chaos of light, scattered and confused; now it was collected and modelled, and made into several luminaries, and so rendered both more glorious, and more serviceable. God is the God of order, and not of confusion; and as he is Light, so he is the Father and Former of lights. Those lights were to be in the firmament of heaven, that vast expanse which encloses the earth, and is copious to all; for no man can light a candle, puts it under a bushel, but on a candlestick; Luke 8, 16; and a stately golden candlestick the firmament of heaven is, from which these candles give light to all that are in the house. The firmament itself is spoken of as having a brightness of its own, Dan. xii, 3, but that was not sufficient to give light to the earth; and perhaps, for that reason it was not expressly said of the second day's work, in which the firmament was made, that it was good, because, till it was adorned with these lights on the fourth day, it was not become serviceable to man. 2. The use they were intended to be of to this earth. (1.) They must be for the distinction of times, of day and night, summer and winter, which are interchanged by the motion of the sun; whose rising makes day, his setting night; his approach towards our tropic makes summer, his recession to the other, winter: and thus, under the sun, there is a season to every purpose, Eccl. 3, 1. (2.) They must be for the direction of actions. They are for signs of the change of weather, that the husbandman may order his affairs with discretion; for if he does not know what has begun to happen, the firmament. How ungrateful and inexcusable are we, if, when God has set up these lights for us to work by, we sleep, or play, or trifle away the time of business, and neglect the great work we were sent into the world about! The lights of heaven are made to serve us, and they do it faithfully, and shine, in their season, without fail: but we are set as lights in this world to serve God; and do we in like manner shine in our lights? No, the most serviceable lights of heaven do not shine before God, as his lights shine before us, Matt. v. 14. We burn our Master's candles; but do not mind our Master's work.

II. In particular, v. 16, 17. The lights of heaven are, the sun, moon, and stars; and these are all the work of God's hands. 1. The sun is the greatest light of all, one hundred and sixty-six times greater than the earth, and the most glorious and useful of all the lamps of Heaven: a noble instance of the Creator's wisdom, power, and goodness, and an invaluable blessing to the creatures of this lower world. Let us learn from Ps. 19, 1, 6, how to give unto God the glory due to his name, as the Maker of the sun. 2. The moon is a lesser light, and yet is here reckoned one of the greater lights, because, though, in regard of its magnitude and borrowed light, it is inferior to many of the stars, yet, by virtue of its office, as ruler of the night, and in respect of its usefulness to the earth, it is more excellent than they. Those are most valuable, that are most serviceable; and those are the greater lights, not that have the best gifts, but that humbly and faithfully do the most good with them. Whosoever will be great among you, let him be your minister, Matt. 20, 26. 3. He made the stars also; which are here spoken of, as they appear to vulgar eyes, with no particular distinction of any sort, as the fixed stars, or accounting for their number, nature, place, dignity, motions, or influences; for the scriptures were written, not to gratify our curiosity, and make us astronomers, but to lead us to God, and make us saints. Now these lights are said to rule, v. 16, 18, not that they have a supreme dominion, as God has, but they are deputy governors, rulers under him. Here the lesser light, the moon, is said to rule the night; but, in Eccl. 9, 10, the stars are mentioned as sharers in that government, the moon and stars to rule by night. No more is meant, than that they give light, Jer. 31, 35. The best and most honourable way of ruling is, by giving light, and doing good: those command, respect, that live a useful life, and so shine as lights.

Learn from all this, (1.) The sin and folly of that great idolatry, that venerate the sun, the moon, and stars. Who, some think, took rise, or countenance at least, from some broken traditions in the patriarchal age, concerning the rule and dominion of the lights of heaven. But the account here given of them plainly shows they are both God's creatures, and man's servants; and therefore it is both a great affront to God, and a great reproach to ourselves, to make deities of them, and give them divine honours; see Deut. 4. 19. (2.) The duty and wisdom of daily worshipping God who made all these things, and made them to be that to us, which they are. The revolutions of the day and night oblige us to the solemn sacrifice of prayers and praises, every morning and evening.

20. And God said, Let the waters bring forth abundantly the moving creature that hath life, and fowl that may fly above the earth in the open firmament of heaven.

21. And God created great whales, and every living creature that moveth, which the waters brought forth abundantly, after their kind, and every winged fowl after his kind; and God saw that it was good. 22. And God blessed them, saying, Be fruitful, and multiply, and fill the waters in the seas, and let fowl multiply in the earth.

23. And the evening and the morning were the fifth day.

Each day, hitherto, has produced very noble and excellent beings, which we can never sufficiently admire; but we do not read of the creation of any living creature, till the fifth day, which these verses gives us an account of. The work of creation not only proceeded gradually from one thing to another, but rose and advanced gradually from that which was less excellent to that which was more so, teaching us to press toward perfection, and endeavour that our last works may be our best works. It was on the fifth day that the fish and fowl were created, and both out of the waters; though there is one kind of flesh, of fishes, and another, of birds, yet they were made together, and both out of the waters; for the power of the first Cause can produce very different effects from the same second causes.

I. The making of the fish and fowl, at first, v. 20, 21. God commanded them to be produced; he said, Let the waters bring forth abundantly; not as if the waters had any productive power of their own, but, "Let them be brought into being, the fish in the waters, and the fowl out of them." This command he himself executed; God created great whales, &c. Insects, which perhaps, are as various and as numerous as any species of animals, and their structure as curious, were part of this day's work, some of them being allied to the fish, and others to the fowl. Mr. Boyle (I remember) says, he admires the Creator's wisdom and power as much in an ant as in an elephant. Notice is here taken of the various sorts of fish and fowl, each after their kind; and of the great numbers of both that were produced, for the waters brought forth abundantly; and particular mention is made of great whales, the largest of fishes, whose bulk and strength, exceeding that of any other animal, are remarkable proofs of the power and greatness of the Creator. The express notice here taken of the whale, above all the rest, seems sufficient to determine what animal is meant by the Leviathan, Job 41. 1. The curious formation of the bodies of animals, their different sizes, shapes, and natures, with the admirable powers of the sensitive life with which they are endued, when duly considered, serve, not only to silence and shame the objections of atheists and infidels, but to raise high thoughts and high praises of God in pious and devout souls, Ps. 104, 25, &c.

II. The blessing of them, in order to their continuance. Life is a wasting thing; its strength is not the strength of stones, it is a candle that will burn out, if it be not first blown out; and therefore the wise Creator not only made the individuals, but provided for the propagating of the several kinds, v. 22. God blessed them, saying, Be fruitful, and multiply. God will bless his own works, and not take them; and what he doeth it shall be for a perpetuity, Eccl. 3. 14. The providence preserves all things, as, at first, his creating power produced them. Fruitfulness is the effect of God's blessing, and must be ascribed to it; the multiplying of the fish and fowl, from year to year, is still the fruit of this blessing. Well, let us give to God the glory of the continuance of these creatures to this day for the benefit of man. See Job 12. 7, 9. It is plain that fishing and fowling, recreations innocent in themselves, should be ever abused to divert any from God and their duty, while they are capable of being improved to lead us to the contemplation of the wisdom, power, and goodness of him that made all these things, and to engage us to stand in awe of him, as the fish and fowl do of us.

24. And God said, Let the earth bring forth the living creature after his kind, cattle, and creeping thing, and beast of the earth after his kind; and it was so. 25. And God made the beast of the earth after his kind, and cattle after their kind, and every thing that creepeth upon the earth after his kind; and God saw that it was good.

We have here the first part of the sixth day's work. The sea was, the day before, replenished with its fish, and the air with its fowl; and, this day, were made the beast of the earth, cattle, and the creeping things that pertain to the earth. Here, as before, 1. The Lord gave the word; he said, Let the earth bring forth, not as if the earth had any such prolific virtue as to produce these animals, or as if God resigned his creating power to it; but, "Let these creatures now come into being upon the earth, and out of it, in their respective kinds, conformable to the ideas of them in the divine counsels concerning their creation." 2. He also did the work; he made them all after their kind, not only of divers shapes, but of various natures; the earth furnished meats, fruits, and vegetables, of all kinds; the sea, fishes; and the air, birds. 3. It was good; for the Creator, in all which appears the manifold wisdom of the Creator.

26. And God said, Let us make man in our image, after our likeness; and let them have dominion over the fish of the sea, and over the fowl of the air, and over the cattle, and over all the earth, and over every creeping thing that creepeth upon the earth.

27. So God created man in his own image, in the image of God created he him; male and female created he them. 28. And God blessed them, and God said unto them, Be fruitful, and multiply, and replenish the earth, and subdue it; and have dominion over the fish of the sea, and over the fowl of the air, and over every living thing that moved upon the earth.

We have here the second part of the sixth day's work, the creation of man, which we are, in a special manner, concerned to take notice of, that we may know ourselves. Observe,

I. That man was made last of all the creatures, that it might not be suspected that he had been, any way, a helper to God in the creation of the world, for whose sake he must be for ever humbling and mortifying to him, Where wast thou, or of any thy kind, when I laid the foundations of the earth? Job 38.

4. Yet it was both an honour and a favour to him, that he was made last; an honour, for the method of the creation was, to advance from that which was less perfect to that which was more so; and a favour, for it was not fit he should be lodged in the palace designed for him, till it was completely finished, upan the occasion of his reception. Man, as soon as he was made, had the whole visible creation before him, both to contemplate, and to take the comfort of. Man was made the same day that the beasts were, because his body was made of the same earth with theirs; and while he is in the body, he inhabits the same earth with them: God forbid that by indulging the body and the desires of it, we should make our selves like the beasts that perish! As if he were made a more signal and immediate act of divine wisdom and power than that of the other creatures. The narrative of it is introduced with something of solemnity, and a manifest distinction from the rest: hitherto, it had been said, Let there be light, and Let there be a firmament; or, "Let the earth, or waters, bring forth such a thing;" but now the word of command is turned into a word of consultation, Let us make man. The wisdom of the creatures were made: this is a work we must take into our own hands. In the former, he speaks as one having authority, in this as one having affection, for his delights were with the sons of men, Prov. 8. 31. It should seem as if this were the work which he longed to be at; as if he had said, "having at last settled the preliminaries, let us now apply ourselves to the business of the world." Man was to be a creature different from all that had been hitherto made. Flesh and spirit, heaven and earth, must be put together in him, and he must be allied to both worlds. And therefore God himself not only undertakes to make, but is pleased so to express himself, as if he called a council to consider of the making of him; Let us make man. The three persons of the Trinity, Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, counsel about it, and concur in it, because man, when he was made, was to be dedicated and devoted to Father, Son, and Holy Ghost. Into that Great Name we are, with good reason, baptised, for to that Great Name we owe our being. Let them rule man, who said, Let us make man.

III. That man was made in God's image, and after his likeness; two words to express the same thing, and making each other the more expressive; image and likeness denote the likest image, the nearest resemblance of any of the visible creatures. Man was not made in the likeness of any creature that went before him, but in the likeness of his Creator; yet still, between God and man there is an infinite distance. Christ only is the express image of God's person, as the Son of his Father, having the same nature. It is only some of God's honour, that is put upon man, who is God's image, only as the shadow in the glass, or the king's impress upon the coin. God's image upon man consists in these three things. 1. In his nature and constitution, not those of his body, (for God has not a body,) but those of his soul. This honour indeed God has put upon the body of man, that the Word was made flesh, the Son of God was clothed with a body like unto our's, and will shortly clothe our's with a glory like unto his. And this we may safely say, That he by whom God made the worlds, not only the great world, but man the little world, formed the human body, at the first, according to the platform he designed for himself in the fulness of time. But it is the soul, the great soul, of man, that does especially bear God's image. The soul is a spirit, an intelligent, immortal spirit, an influencing active spirit, herein resembling God, the Father of Spirits, and the Soul of the world. The spirit of man is the candle of the Lord. The soul of man, considered in its three noble faculties, understanding, will, and active power, is perhaps the brightest clearest looking-glass in nature, wherein to see God.

2. In his place and authority. Let us make man in our image, and let them have dominion. As he has made the government of the inferior creatures, he is, as it were, God's representative, or viceroy, upon earth; they are not capable of fearing and serving God, therefore God has appointed them to fear and serve man. Yet his government of himself by the freedom of his will, has in it more of God's image than his government of the creatures. 3. In his fury and rectitude. God's image upon man consists in knowledge, righteousness, and true holiness, Eph. 4. 17. The point God aimed at in creating Adam, was, to make him a living soul; Gen. 2. 3. 29. He had an habitual conformity of all his natural powers to the whole will of God. His understanding saw divine things clearly and truly, and there were no errors or mistakes in his knowledge: his will complied readily and universally with the will of God; without reluctance or resistance: his affections were all regular, and he had no inordinate appetites or passions: his thoughts were easily brought, and fixedly placed, to the best uses; and his actions, according to the unerring and unvanity ungovernableness in them. All the inferior powers were subject to the dictates and directions of the superior, without any mutiny or rebellion. Thus holy, thus happy, were our first parents, in having the image of God upon them. And this honour put upon man, at first, is a good reason why we should not speak ill one of another, Jam. 3. 9, nor do ill one to another, Gen. 9. 6, and a good reason why we should not speak ill, The service of sin, and why we should devote ourselves to God's service. But how art thou fallen, O son of the morning! How is this image of God upon man defaced! How small are the remains of it, and how great the ruins of it! The Lord renew it upon our souls by his sanctifying grace!

IV. That man was made male and female, and blessed with the blessing of fruitfulness and increase. God said, Let us make man; and immediately it follows, So God created man; he performed what he resolved. With us, saying and doing are two things, but they are not so with God. He created him male and female, Adam and Eve; Adam, first out of earth, and Eve out of his side. ch. 2. It should seem that of the rest of the creatures, God made many couples, but of man, did not he make one? (Mo. 12. 49) make man, and immediately it follows, So God created man; he performed what he resolved. This is the way that God works; He gathers the argument against divorce, Matth. 19. 4, 5. Our first father, Adam, was confined to one wife; and if he had put her away, there was no other for him to marry, which plainly intimated that the bond of marriage was not to be dissolved at pleasure. Angels were not made male and female, for they were not to propagate their kind, (1 John 3. 20, 24, 25) but man was made so, that the nature might be propagated, and the race continued. Fires and candles, the luminaries of this lower world, because they waste, and go out, have a power to light more; but it is not so with the lights of heaven, stars do not kindle stars. God made but one male and one female, that all the nations of men might know themselves to be made of one blood, descendants from one common stock, and might thereby be induced to love one another. God, having made man, put in hints to complete the art, and so, receiving, said to them, Be fruitful, and multiply, and replenish the earth. When he gave them, 1. A large inheritance; 2. A numerous, lasting, family; 3. That the power of God and the providence of God's grace have given to the saints a new and better title to the creatures than that which was forfeited by sin; for all is our's, if we are Christ's, 1 Cor. 3. 22.

29. And God said, Behold, I have given you every herb bearing seed, which is upon the face of all the earth, and every tree, in the which is the fruit of a tree yielding seed; to you it shall be for meat. 30. And to every beast of the earth, and to every fowl of the air, and to every thing that creepeth upon the earth, wherein is life, I have given every green herb for meat: and it was so.

We have here the third part of the sixth day's work which was, not any new creation, but a gracious provision of food for all flesh, Ps. 136. 25. He that made man and beast, thus took care to preserve both, Ps. 36. 6. Here is,

1. Food provided for man, v. 29. Herbs and fruits, which are the best provision for man, and all the products of the earth; these were allowed him, but (it should seem) not flesh, till after the flood, ch. 9. 3. And before the earth was deluged, much more, before it was cursed, for man's sake, its fruits, no doubt, were more pleasing to his taste, and more strengthening and nourishing to the body, than marrow and fatness, and all the portion of the king's meat, are now. See here, 1. That which should make us humble. As we are made out of the earth, so we are maintained out of it. Once indeed, man did eat angels' food, bread from heaven; but they died, John 6. 49: it was to them as they did eat out of the earth, Ps. 104. 14. There is meat that endures to everlasting life; the Lord evermore give us that. 2. That which should make us thankful. The Lord is the body; from him receive all the supports and comforts of this life, and to him we must give thanks. He gives us all things richly to enjoy, not only for necessity, but plenty, dainties, and varieties, for ornament and delight. How much are we indebted! How careful should we be, as we live upon God's bounty, to live to his glory! 3. That which should make us temperate, and content with our lot. Though Adam had dominion given him over fish and fowl, and over the fruit of the ground, to him, to his seed, to his sons, to the earth, and to all the beasts thereof, and to every fowl of the air, and to every thing that creepeth upon the earth; yet he never saw any of these as turns in God's providence, and so he never saw any of these in God's providence, and so he never saw that of the fruit of the ground, and to every beast of the earth, and to every fowl of the air, and to every thing that creepeth upon the earth; wherein is life, I have given every green herb for meat: and it was so.
God reviewed his work, and it was very good. He did not pronounce it 'good,' till he had seen it so; to teach us, not to answer a matter before we hear it. The work of creation was a very good work. All that God made, was well made, and there was no flaw or defect in it. 1. It was good. Good, for it is all agreeable to the mind of the Creator, just as he would have it to be; when the transcript cannot be brought to the great original, it was found to be exact, no errata in it; not one misplaced stroke. Good, for it answers the end of its creation, and is fit for the purpose for which it was designed. Good, for it is serviceable to man, whom God had appointed lord of the visible creation. Good, for it is all for God's glory; there is that in the whole visible creation, which is a demonstration of God's being and perfections, and which tends to beget, in the soul of man, a religious regard to him, and veneration of him. 3. It was very good. Of each day's work, (except the second,) it was said that it was good, but now, it is very good. For, 1. Now, man was made, who was the chief of the ways of God, who was designed to be the visible image of the Creator's glory, and the mouth of the creation in his praises. 2. Now, all was made; every part was good, but altogether, very good. The glory and goodness, the beautiful and happy, of God's works, both of providence and grace, as this of creation, will best appear, when they are perfected. When the top stone is brought forth, we shall cry, Grace, grace, unto it, Zech. 4. 7. Therefore judge nothing before the time.

III. The time when this work was concluded.

The evening and the morning were the sixth day. So that in six days God made the world. We are not to think but that God could have made the world in an instant. He that said, Let there be light, and there was light, could have said, "Let there be a world," and there would have been a world, in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, as at the resurrection. 1 Cor. 15. 52. But he did it in six days, that he might show himself a free-agent, doing his own work, both in his own way, and in his own time; that his wisdom, power, and goodness, might appear to us, and be meditated upon by us, the more distinctly, than if he had made the world in a moment. He therefore appointed six days, for working, six days, and resting, the seventh; it is therefore made the reason of the fourth commandment. So much would the sabbath conduce to the keeping up of religion in the world, that God had an eye to it, in the timing of his creation. And now, as God reviewed his work, let us review our meditations upon it, and we shall find them very lame and defective, and our praises low and flat; let us therefore stir us up ourselves, and all that is within us, to worship him that made the heaven, earth, and sea, and the fountains of waters, according to the tenor of the everlasting Gospel which is preached to every nation, Rev. 14. 6, 7. All his works, in all places of his dominion, do bless him; and therefore, bless thou the Lord, O my soul.

CHAP. II.

This chapter is an appendix to the history of the creation, more particularly explaining, and enlarging upon, that part of the history, which relates immediately to man, the favoured of this lower world. We have in it, 1. The institution and sanctification of the sabbath, which was made for man, to further his holiness and comfort, v. 1. 3. II. A more particular account of man's creation, as the centre and foundation of the whole world, v. 4-7. III. A description of the garden of Eden, and the placing of man in it under the obligations of a law and covenant, v. 8. 17. IV. The creation of the woman, her marriage to the man, and the institution of the ordinance of marriage, v. 18. 22.

2. And on the seventh day God ended his work which he had made; and he rested on the seventh day from all his work which he had made. 3. And God blessed the seventh day, and sanctified it; because that in it he had rested from all his work, which God created and made.

We have here,

I. The settlement of the kingdom of nature, in God's resting from the work of creation, v. 1. 2. Where observe, 1. That the creatures, made both in heaven and earth, are the hosts, or armies of them, which denotes them to be numerous, but marshalled, disciplined, and under command. How great is the sum of them! And yet every one knows and keeps his place. God uses them as his hosts for the defence of his people, and the destruction of his enemies; for he is the Lord of hosts, of all these hosts, Dan. 4. 35. 2. That the heavens and the earth are finished pieces, and so are all the creatures in them. So perfect is God's work, that nothing can be added to it, or taken from it, Excl. 3. 14. God that began to build, showed himself well-able to finish. 3. That after the end of the first six days, God ceased from all work. He here says, "As I made, so I saw; but I saw it was very good," even as he was wont, in his providence, he worketh hitherto, (John 5. 17.) preserving and governing all the creatures, and particularly forming the spirit of man within him, yet he does not make any new species of creatures. In miracles, he has controlled and over-ruled nature, but never changed its settled course, or repealed, or added to, any of its establishments. 4. That the eternal God, though infinitely happy in the enjoyment of himself, yet took a satisfaction in the work of his creature, and made the sabbath, as I, that, though in his providence, he worketh hitherto, as one weary, but as one well-pleased with the instances of his own goodness, and the manifestations of his own glory.

II. The commencement of the kingdom of grace, in the sanctification of the sabbath-day, v. 5. He rested on that day, and took a complacency in his creatures, and then sanctified it, and appointed us, on that day, to rest and take a complacency in the holy sabbath, as a time of rest and recreation, and made a reason for our's, after six days' labour. Observe, 1. That the solemn observation of one day in seven, as a day of holy rest, and holy work, to God's honour, is the indispensable duty of all those to whom God has revealed his holy sabbaths. 2. That the way of sabbath-sanctification, is the good old way, Jer. 6. 16. Sabbaths are as ancient as the world; and I see no reason to doubt that the sabbath, being now instituted in innocency, was religiously observed by the people of God throughout the patriarchal age. 3. That the sabbath of the Lord is truly honourable, and we have reason to honour it; honour it, for the sake of its antiquity, its great Author, the sanctification of the first sabbath by the holy God himself, and, in obedience to him, by our first parents in innocency. 4. That the sabbath-day is a blessed day, for God blessed it; and in which he blesses is blessed indeed. God has put an honour upon it, has appointed us, on that day, to bless him, and has promised, on that day, to meet us and bless us. 5. That the sabbath-day is a holy day, for God has sanctified it. He has separated and distinguished it from the rest of the days of the week, and has consecrated it, and set it apart to himself and his own service and honour. Though it is not only a day of rest, but that sabbath we do not rest, serve, reckoning from the creation, is not the seventh but the first day of the week, yet being a seventh day, and we, in it, celebrating the rest of God the Son, and the finishing the work of our redemption, we may and ought to act faith upon this.
original institution of the sabbath-day, and to commemorate the work of creation, to the honour of the great Creator, who is therefore worthy to receive, and on that day, blessing, and honour, and praise, from all religious assemblies.

4. These are the generations of the heavens and of the earth when they were created, in the day that the Lord God made the earth and the heavens. 3. And every plant of the field before it was in the earth, and every herb of the field before it grew: for the Lord God had not caused it to rain up-onth the earth, and there was not a man to till the ground. 6. But there went up a mist from the earth, and watered the whole face of the ground. 7. And the Lord God formed man of the dust of the ground, and breathed into his nostrils the breath of life; and man became a living soul.

In these verses,
I. Here is a name given to the Creator, which we have not yet met with, and that is Jehovah; the LORD in capital letters, which is constantly used in our English translation, to intimate that in the original it is Jehovah. All along, in the first chapter, he was called Elohim, a God of power, but now Jehovah Elohim, a God of power and perfection, a united God and earth. As we shall find him known by his name Jehovah, when he appeared to perform what he had promised, Exod. 6. 3, so now we have him known by that name, when he had perfected what he had begun.
Jehovah is that great and, incomunicable name of God, which denotes his having his being of himself, and his giving his being to all things; fitly therefore is he called by that name, now that heavens and earth were made.

II. Further notice taken of the production of plants and herbs, because they were made and appointed tobe food for man, v. 5, 6, where observe, 1. The everdied not bring forth its fruits of itself, by any innate virtue of its own, but purely by the almighty power of God, which formed every plant and every herb, before it grew in the earth. Thus grace in the soul, that plant of renown, grows not of itself in nature’s soil, but is the work of God’s own hands.
2. Rain also is the gift of God; it came not of the Lord God caused it to rain. If rain be wanted, it is God that withholds it; if rain come plentifully in its season, it is God that sends it; if it come in a distinguishing way, it is God that causeth it to rain upon one city, and not upon another, Amos 4. 7. 3.
Though God, ordinarily, works by means, yet he is not tied to them, but when he pleases, he can do his own work without them. As the plants were produced before the sun was made, so they were before there was either rain to water the earth, or man to till it. Therefore, though we must not tempt God in the neglect of means, yet we must trust God in the want of means. 4. Some way or other, God will take care to water the plants that are of his own plating.
Though, as yet, there was no rain, God made a mist equivalent to a shower, and with it watered every herb of the earth. 5. He chose to fulfi l his purpose by the weakest means, that the excellency of the power might be of God.
Divine grace descends like a mist or silent dew, and waters the church without noise, Deut. 32. 2.

III. A more particular account of the creation of man, v. 7. Man is a little world, consisting of heavlen and earth, soul and body; now here we have an account of the original of both, and the putting of both together: let us seriously consider it, and say, to our Creator’s praise. We are fearfully and wonderfully made, Ps. 139. 14. Eluh, in the patriarchal age, refers to this history, when he says, Job 33. 6.
I also am formed out of the clay, and v. 4.
The breath of the Almighty hath given me life, and Ps. 192. 8. 9. God’s spirit came. Observe the
1. The mean original, and yet the curious structure, of the body of man. (1.) The matter was despicable. He was made of the dust of the ground, a very unlikely thing to make a man of; but the same Infinite Power that made the world of nothing, made man, its master-piece, of next to nothing. He was made of the dust, the small dust, such as is upon the surface of the earth. Probably, not dry dust, but dust moistened, and with which the earth was mixed. He was not made of gold-dust, powder of pearl, or diamond dust, but common dust, dust of the ground.
Hence he is said to be of the earth, vomis.—dusty, 1 Cor. 15. 47. And we also are of the earth, for we are of his offspring, and of the same mould. So near an affinity is there between the earth and the earthly parents, that our mother’s womb, out of which we were born, is called the earth; (1s. 159. 15.) and the earth, in which we must be buried. It was the Lord God who made us, and he gathered us, Genesis 32. 7.

2. The high original, and yet the admirable serviceableness, of the soul of man. (1.) It takes its rise from the dust of the earth, or as the Word of Proverbs says, out of the earth. Christ says, John 12. 24. Whosoever believeth on him receiveth the anointing of God. The anointing is the Spirit of Christ, the soul of the earth. It was, not the soul of the earth, that was our soul,
but God breathed into us the soul of the earth, and it is given to be partaker of Christ’s natures.

3. It is not only the soul that was formed of the earth, but the body also. See 1 Cor.
15. 47. But we have not yet spoken of the body of the Christ. It was formed of the earth, and it was formed of the same earth as the soul.

4. It is not only the human body, and the human soul, that are formed of the earth; but all the creatures which do walk upon the earth are formed of the earth.

5. Some suppose that godliness is only a quality of the soul; but this is not true. Godly work is the soul’s work, as other work is the body’s work. 6. God is the first cause of all work, whether it be body’s, or soul’s, or body’s and soul’s work.

7. The earth, which was made of the dust of the earth, is so made, that it may be made use of by all the creatures that walk upon it. It is the earth, and the other creatures, that are the axis of the oval of God’s work.
When our Lord Jesus anointed the blind man's eyes with clay, perhaps he intimated that it was he who first formed the man out of the clay; and when he breathed on his disciples, saying, Receive ye the Holy Ghost, he intimated that it was he who first breathed into man's nostrils the breath of life. He that made the soul, is alone able to new-make it.

8. And the Lord God planted a garden eastward in Eden; and there he put the man whom he had formed. 9. And out of the ground made the Lord God to grow every tree that is pleasant to the sight, and good for food: the tree of life also in the midst of the garden, and the tree of knowledge of good and evil. 10. And a river went out of Eden to water the garden; and from thence it was parted, and became into four heads.

11. The name of the first is Pison: that is it which compasseth the whole land of Havilah, where there is gold. 12. And the gold of that land is good: there is bdellium and the onyx-stone. 13. And the name of the second river is Gihon: the same is it that compasseth the whole land of Ethiopia. 14. And the name of the third river is Hiddekel: that is it which goeth toward the east of Assyria. And the fourth river is Euphrates.

15. And the Lord God took the man, and put him into the garden of Eden, to dress it and to keep it.

Man consisting of body and soul, a body made out of the earth, and a rational immortal soul the breath of heaven, we have, in these verses, the provision that was made for the happiness of both; he that made him, took care to make him happy, if he could but have kept himself so, and known when he was well off. That part of man by which he is allied to the world of sense, was made happy; for he was put in the paradise of God: that part by which he is allied to the world of spirits, was well provided for; for he was taken into covenant with God. Lord, what is man, that he should be thus dignified? Man that is a worm! Here we have,

16. The description of the garden of Eden, which was intended for the mansion and demesne of this great lord, the palace of this prince. The inspired penman, in this history, writing for the Jews first, and calculating his narratives for the infant-state of the church, describes things by their outward sensible appearances, and leaves us, by further discoveries of the divine light, to be led into the divine understanding of the mysteries couched under them. Spiritual things were strong meat, which they could not yet bear; but he writes to them as unto carnal, 1 Cor. 3. 1. Therefore he does not so much insist upon the happiness of Adam's mind, as upon that of his outward estate. The Mosaic history, as well as the Mosaic law, has rather the patterns of heavenly things, than the heavenly things themselves, Heb. 9. 23.

17. Observe,

The palace appointed for Adam's residence was a garden; not an ivy house, or a palace overlaid with gold, but a garden furnished and adorned by nature, not by art. What little reason have men to be proud of stately and magnificent buildings, when it was the happiness of man in innocency, that he needed none! As clothes came in with sin, so did houses. The heaven was the roof of Adam's house; and never was any roof so curiously ceiled and paint-assuring him of the continuance of life and happiness, even to immortality and everlasting bliss, through the grace and favour of his Maker, upon condition of his perseverance in this state of innocency and obedience.

The tree of this life, Christ is now to us the Tree of Life, Rev. 2. 7—22, and the Bread of Life, John 6. 48. 53. (2) There was the Tree of the knowledge of good and evil, so called, not because it had any virtue in it to begot or increase useful knowledge, surely then it would not have been forbidden; but, First, Because there was an express positive revelation of the will of God concerning this tree, so that by it he might know moral good and evil. What is good? It is good not to eat of this tree. What is evil? It is evil to eat of this tree. The distinction between all other moral good and evil was written in the heart of man by nature; but this which resulted from a positive law, was written upon this tree. Secondly, Because, in the event, it proved to give Adam an experimental knowledge of good by the loss of it, and of evil by the sense of it. As the covenant of grace has in it, not only, Believe and be saved, but also, Believe not, and be damned, Mark 16. 16, so the covenant of innocency had in it, not only, 'Do this and live,' which was sealed and confirmed by the tree of life, but, 'Fall and die,' which man was assured of by this other tree; 'Touch it at your peril!' so that, in these two trees, God set before Adam good and evil, the blessing and the curse, Deut. 30. 19. These two trees were as two lives.

5. The rivers with which this garden was watered, v. 10. 14. These four rivers (or one river branched into four streams) contributed much both to the pleasantness and the fruitfulness of this garden. The land of Sodam is said to be well-watered everywhere as the garden of the Lord, ch. 13. 10. Observe, That which God plants, he will take care to keep watered. That which is planted in righteousness are set by the rivers, Ps. 1. 3. In the heavenly paradise there is a river infinitely surpassing these; for it is a river of the water of life, not coming out of Eden, as this, but proceeding out of the throne of God, and of the Lamb, Rev. 22. 1. a river that makes glad the city of our God, Ps. 46. 4. Hiddekel and Euphrates are rivers of Babylon, which we read of elsewhere; by these the captive Jews sat down and wept, when their captivity was expired. Ps. 137. 1. but methinks they had much more reason to weep, and (so have we,) at the remembrance of Eden; Adam's paradise was their prison; such wretched work has sin made. Of the land of Havilah, it is said, v. 11. 12, that the gold of that land was good, and that there was bdellium, and the onyx-stone: surely this is mentioned, that the wealth which the land of Havilah boasted of, might be as a foil to that which was the glory of the land of Eden now mentioned. Ps. 133. 3. gold, and silver, and precious stones; but Eden had that which was Preeminently better, the tree of life, and communication with God. So we may say of the Africans and Indians; 'They have the gold, but we have the gospel. The gold of their land is good, but the riches of ours are infinitely better.'

II. The placing of man in this paradise of delight, v. 15, where observe, 1. How God put him in possession of it. The Lord God took the man and put him into the garden of Eden; so v. 8. 15. Note here, (1.) That man was made out of paradise; for, after God had formed him, he put him into the garden: he was made of common clay, not of paradise-dust. He lived in the garden of Eden before he lived in it, that he might see that all the comforts of his paradise-state were owing to God's free grace. He could not plead a tenant right to the garden, for he was not born upon the premises, nor had any thing but what he received; all boasting was hereby for ever excluded. (2.) The same God that was the Author of his being, was the Author of his bliss: the same hand that made him a living soul, planted the tree of life for him, and set him in a garden to eat of every tree of it, is alone to make us happy; he that is the Father of our bodies, and the Father of our spirits; he, and none but he, can effectually provide for the felicity of both. (3.) It adds much to the comfort of any condition, if we have plainly seen God going before us, and putting us into it. If we have not forced providence, but followed it, and taken the hints of direction it has given us, we may hope to find a paradise there, where otherwise we could not have expected it; see Ps. 47. 4.

2. How God appointed him business and employment; he put him there, not like Leviathan into the waters, to play therein, but to dress the garden, and to keep it. Paradise itself was not a place of exemption from work. Note here, (1.) That we were none of us sent into the world to be idle. He that made us these souls and bodies, has given us something to work with; and he that gave us this earth for our habitation, has made us something to work on. If either a high extraction, or a great estate, or a large dominion, or perfect innocency, or a genius for pure contemplation, or a small family, could have given a man a writ of ease, Adam had not been set to work; but he that gave us being, has given us business, to serve him and our generation, and to work for our own salvation: if we do not mind our business, we are unworthy of our being and maintenance. (2.) That secular employment will very well consist with a state of innocency, and a life of communion with God. The sons and heirs of heaven, while they are here in this world, have something to do about this earth, which must have its share of their time and thoughts; and if they do it with an eye to God, they are as truly serving him in it, as when they are upon their knees. (5.) That the husbandman's calling is an ancient and honourable calling; it was needful even in paradise. The garden of Eden, though it needed not to be weeded, (for thorns and thistles were not yet a nuisance,) yet it must be dressed and kept. Nature, even in its primitive state, left room for the improvements of art and industry. It was a calling fit for a state of innocency, making a provision for life, and not for such a world; and giving man an opportunity of admiring the Creator, and acknowledging his providence; while his hands were about his trees, his heart might be with his God. (4.) There is a true pleasure in the business which God calls us to, and employs us in; Adam's work was so far from being an alway, that it was an addition, to the pleasures of paradise; he could not have been happy, if he had been idle: it is the highest pleasure that God has given us. He that will not work, has no right to eat. 2 Thess. 3. 10.

III. The command which God gave to man in innocency, and the covenant he then took him into. Hitherto, we have seen God, man's powerful Creator, and his bountiful Benefactor; now he appears as his Ruler and Lawgiver. God put him into the garden of Eden, not to live there as he might list, but to be under government. As we are not allowed to be God's work, and to do nothing, so we are not allowed to be his world, and to do what we please. When God had given men a dominion over the creatures, he would let him know that still he himself was under the government of his Creator.

16. And the Lord God commanded the man, saying. Of every tree of the garden thou mayest freely eat. 17. But of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, thou of sin. In the day thou eatest, thou shalt die, that is, "Thou shalt become mortal and capable of dying, the grant of immortality shall be recalled, and that defence shall depart from thee. Thou shalt be come obnoxious to death, like a condemned male factor that is dead in law." (only because Adam was to be the root of mankind, he was reproved;) "nay, the harbingers and forerunners of death shall immediately seize thee, and thy life, henceforward, shall be a dying life:" and this surely, it is a settled thing, that "he that sinneth, it shall die." (2.) Adam is tried with a positive law, not to eat of the fruit of the tree of knowledge. Now it was very proper to make trial of his obedience by such a command as this, [1.] Because the reason of it is fetched purely from the will of the Law-maker. Adam had in his nature an aversion to that which was evil in itself, and therefore he is tried in a thing which was evil, only because it was forbidden; and being in a small thing, it was the more fit to prove his obedience by [2.] Because the restraint of it is laid upon the desires of the flesh and of the mind, which, in the corrupt nature of man, are the two great fountains of sin. This prohibition checked both his appetite towards sensitive delights and his ambition of curious knowledge; that his body might be ruled by his soul, and his soul by his God.

Thus easy, thus happy, was man in his state of innocency; what could death or the world wish to have made him so. How good was God to him! How many favours did he lend him with! How easy were the laws he gave him! How kind the covenant he made with him! Yet man, being in honour, understood not his own interest, but soon became as the beast that perish.

18. And the Lord God said, It is not good that the man should be alone; I will make him an help meet for him. 19. And out of the ground the Lord God formed every beast of the field, and every fowl of the air, and brought them unto Adam to see what he would call them: and whatsoever Adam called every living creature, that was the name thereof. 20. And Adam gave names to all cattle, and to the fowl of the air, and to every beast of the field; but for Adam there was not found an help meet for him.

Here we have,

1. An instance of the Creator's care of man, and his fatherly concern for his comfort, v. 18. Though God had let him know that he was a subject, by giving him a command, v. 16, 17; yet here he lets him know also, for his encouragement in his obedience, that he was a friend, and a favourite, and one whose satisfaction he was tender of. Observe, 1. How God graciously pitied his solitude; It is not good that man, this man, should be alone. Though there was an upper world of angels, and a lower world of brutes, and he between them, yet giving him a command, v. 16, 17, yet here he lets him know also, for his encouragement in his obedience, that he was a friend, and a favourite, and one whose satisfaction he was tender of. Observe, 1. How God graciously pitied his solitude; It is not good that man, this man, should be alone.
choly man must he needs be: Perfect solitude would turn a paradise into a desert, and a palace into a dungeon. These therefore are foolish who are selfish, and would be placed alone in the earth. (2.)
It is not for the increase and continuance of his kind; God could have made a work of men, as first, to replenish the earth, as he replenished heaven with a world of angels: but the place would have been too straight for the designed number of men to live together at once; therefore God saw it fit to make up that number by a succession of gegenations, which, as God had formed man, must be from two, and those male and female; one will be ever wanting for the society of another.

2. How God graciously resolved to provide society for him. The result of this reasoning concerning him, was, this kind resolution, I will make a help meet for him; a help like him, (so some read it,) one of the same nature, and the same rank of beings; a help near him, (so others,) one to cohabit with him, and to be always at hand; a help before him, (so others,) one that he should look upon with pleasure and delight. Note hence, (1.) That in our present state in this world, we have need of one another's help; for we are members one of another, and the eye cannot say to the hand, I have no need of thee, 1 Cor. 12. 21. We must therefore be glad to receive help from others, and give help to others, as there is occasion. (2.) That it is God only who perfectly knows our wants, and is perfectly able to supply them all, Phil. 4. 19. In him alone our help consists; and from him shall we find help (3.) That a suitable wife is a help meet, and is from the Lord. The relation is then likely to be comfortable, when meetness directs and determines the choice, and mutual helpfulness is the constant care and endeavour, 1 Cor. 7. 33, 34. (4.) That family society, if that is agreeable, is a redress sufficient for the grievance of solitude. He that has a good good wife, a good companion, a good companion, to converse with, and yet complains he wants conversation, would not have been easy and content in paradise:
for Adam himself had no more: yet even before Eve was created, we do not find that he complained of being alone, knowing that he was not alone, for the Father was with him. Those that are most satisfied in God and his favour, are in the best way, and in the best frame, to receive the good things of this life, and shall be sure of them, as far as Infinite Wisdom sees good.

II. An instance of the creatures' subjection to man, and his dominion over them, v. 19, 20. Every beast of the field, and every fowl of the air, God brought to Adam; either by the ministry of angels, or by a special instinct, directing them to come to man as their master, teaching the ox betimes to know his owner. Thus God gave man liberty and seisin of the fair estate he had granted him, and put him in possession of his dominion over the creatures. God brought them to him, that he might name them, and so might give, 1. A proof of his knowledge, as a creature endued with the faculties both of reason and speech, and so, taught more than the beasts of the earth, and made wiser than the fowls of heaven, Job. 35. 11. And 2. A proof of his power and authority; for the names all the endi-genders, (Dan. 1. 7.) and of subjection to receive them.
The inferior creatures did now, as it were, do homage to his prince at his inauguration, and swear fealty and allegiance to him. If Adam had con-lined faithful to his God, we may suppose the creatures themselves would so well have known and remembered the names Adam now gave them, as to be able, at any time, to trace them up again to their names. God gave names to the day and night, to the firmament, to the earth, and sea; and he calleth the stars by their names, to show that he is the supreme Lord of these; but he gave Adam leave to name the beasts and fowls, as their subordinate lord; for, having made him in his own image, he thus puts some of his honour upon him.

III. An instance of the creatures' insufficiency to be a happiness for man; but among them all, for Adam there was not found a help meet for him.
Some make these to be the words of Adam him-sell; observing all the creatures come to him by couples to be named, he thus intimates his desire to his Maker. "Lord, these have all helps meet for them; but what shall I do? Never, never a one, for me. It is rather God's judgment upon the review. He brought them all together, to see if there were even a suitable match for Adam in any of the numerous families of the inferior creatures; but there was none. Observe here, 1. The dignity and excellency of the human nature; on earth there was not its like, nor its peer to be found among all visible creatures; they were all looked over, but it could not be matched among them all. 2. The vanity of this world and the things of it; put them all together, and they will not make an help meet for man. The filthy creature, it is true, could supply their needs, nor satisfy its just desires, nor run parallel with its never-failing duration. God creates a new thing to be an help meet for man—not so much the woman, as the Seed of the woman.

21. And the Lord God caused a deep sleep to fall upon Adam, and he slept:
and he took one of his ribs, and closed up the flesh instead thereof. 22. And the rib which the Lord God had taken from man, made he a woman, and brought her unto the man. 23. And Adam said, This is now bone of my bones, and flesh of my flesh:
she shall be called Woman, because she was taken out of Man. 24. Therefore shall a man leave his father and his mother, and shall cleave unto his wife: and they shall be one flesh. 25. And they were both naked, the man and his wife, and were not ashamed.

Here we have,
1. The making of the woman, to be an help meet for Adam. This was done upon the sixth day, as was also the placing of Adam in Paradise, though it is here mentioned after an account of the seventh day's rest; but what was said in general, (ch. 1. 27.)
that God made man male and female, is more distinctly related here. Observe,
1. That Adam was first formed, then Eve, (1 Tim.
2. 3.) and she was made of the man, and for the man, (1 Cor. 11. 9.) all which is for one reason, reasons for the humility, modesty, silence, and submissiveness, of that sex in general, and particularly the subjection and reverence which wives owe unto their own husbands. Yet man being made last of the creatures, as the best and most excellent of all, Eve's being made after Adam, and out of him, puts an honour upon that sex, as the glory of the man, 1 Cor. 11. 9. Woman is in the man; the man is the nature of the thing; a crown to her husband, the crown of the visible creation. The man was dust refined, but the woman was dust double-refined, one remove further from the earth.

2. That Adam slept while his wife was making, that no room might be left to imagine that he had herein directed the spirit of the Lord, or been his coun-seller, Isa. 40. 13. He had been made sensible of his want of a help meet; but God having undertaken to provide him one, he does not afflict himself with any care about it, but lies down and sleeps sweetly, as one that had cast all his care on God, with a cheerful resignation of himself and all his affairs, to his Maker's will and wisdom; Jehovah-jireh, let the Lord provide when and whom he pleases. If we graciously rest in God, God will graciously work for us, and work all for good.

3. That God caused a sleep to fall on Adam, and it made him a deep sleep, that so the opening of his side might be no grievance to him; while he knew not of it, God will take care he shall feel no pain. When God, by his providence, does that to his people, which is grievous to flesh and blood, he not only consults their happiness in the issue, but, by his grace, he can so quiet and compose their spirits, as to make them easy under the sharpest operations.

4. That the woman was made of a rib out of the side of Adam; not made out of his head to top him, not out of his feet to be trampled upon by him, but of his side to be equal with him, under his arm to be protected, and near his heart to be beloved. Adam lost a rib, and without any diminution to his strength or comeliness; for doubtless, the flesh was closed without a scar, but, in lieu thereof, he had a help meet for him, which abundantly made up his loss: what God takes away from his people, he will, one way or other, restore with advantage. In this, (as in many other things,) Adam was a figure of him that was to come of the side of Christ. The second Adam, his spouse the church was formed, when he slept the deep sleep, the deep sleep, of death upon the cross; in order to which, his side was opened, and there came out blood and water, blood to purchase his church, and water to purify it to himself. See Eph. 5. 25, 26.

II. The marriage of the woman to Adam. Marriage is honorable, but this surely was the most honorable marriage that ever was, in which God himself had all along an immediate hand. Marriages (they say) are made in Heaven: we are sure this was; for the man, the woman, the match, were all God's own work: he, by his power, made them both, and now, by his ordinance, made them one. This was a marriage made in perfect innocency, and so was never any marriage since.

1. God, as her Father, bestowed upon the woman to the man, as his second self, and an help meet for him; when he had made her, he did not leave her to her own disposal; no, she was his child, and she must not marry without his consent. These are likely to settle to their comfort, who, by faith and prayer, and a humble dependence upon Providence, put themselves under a divine conduct. That wife that is of God's making by special grace, and of God's bringing by special providence, is likely to prove a help meet for a man.

2. From God, as his Father, Adam received her, v. 23. "This is now bone of my bone, Now I have what I wanted, and which all the creatures could not furnish me with, an help meet for me." God's gifts to us are to be received with a humble and thankful acknowledgment of his wisdom in suitting them to us, and his favour in bestowing them upon us. Perhaps he had set his heart upon a woman prepared to Adam in a vision, when he was asleep, that this lovely creature, now presented to him, was a piece of himself, and was to be his companion, and the wife of his covenant. Hence some have fetched an argument to prove that glorified saints in the heavenly paradise shall know one another. Further, in token of his acceptance of her, he gave her a name, not peculiar to her, but common to her sex; she shall be called Woman, Ishan, a she-man, differing from man in sex only, not in nature; made of man, and joined to man.

III. The institution of the ordinance of marriage, and the settling of the law of it, v. 24. The sábado and marriage were two ordinances instituted in innocency; the former for the preservation of the church, the latter, for the preservation of the world of mankind. It appears by Mat. 19. 4, 5, that it was God himself who said there, "A man must leave all his relations, to cleave to his wife;" but whether he spake it by Moses, the penman, or by Adam, who spake, v. 23. is uncertain; it should seem, they are the words of Adam, in God's name, laying down this law to all his posterity. 1. See here how God, by the word of Adam, made man's woman: and here, it seems, God made these ordinances of marriage, which of it are stronger even than those of nature. To whom can we be more firmly bound than to the fathers that begat us, and the mothers that bare us? Yet the son must quit them, to be joined to his wife, and the daughter forget them, to cleave to her husband, Ps. 43. 10, 11. 2. See how necessary it is that children should take their parents' consent along with them in their marriage; and how unjust they are to their parents, as well as unprofitable, if they marry without it; for they rob them of their right to them, and interest in them, and alienate it to another, fraudulently and unrighteously. 3. See what need there is both of prudence and prayer in the choice of this relation, which is so near and so lasting. That had need be well-done, which is to be done for life. 4. See how firm the bond of marriage is, not to be divided and weakened by having many wives, (Mal. 2. 14.) nor to be broken or cut off by divorce, for any cause, but firmation, or voluntary desertion. 5. See how dear the affection ought to be between husband and wife; such as there is to our own bodies, Eph. 5. 28. They two are one flesh; let them then be one soul.

IV. An evidence of the purity and innocency of that state wherein our first parents were created, v. 25. They were both naked; they needed no clothes to cover their nakedness. Adam was not more subject to temptation against cold or heat, for neither could be injurious to them; they needed none for ornament, Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed like one of these; nay, they needed none for decency, they were naked, and had no reason to be ashamed; They knew not what shame was, so the Chaldee reads it. Blushing is now the colour of virtue, but it was not then the colour of innocency. They that had no sin in their conscience, might well have no shame in their faces, though they had no clothes to their backs.

CHAP. III.

The story of this chapter is perhaps as sad a story (all things considered) as any we have in all the Bible. In the foregoing chapters, we have had the pleasures of the holiness and happiness of our first parents, and the grace and favour of God, and the peace and beauty of the whole creation, all good, very good; but here the scene is altered. We have here an account of the sin and misery of our first parents, the wrath and curse of God against them, the peace of the creation disturbed, and its beauty stained and sullied, all bad, very bad. How is the gold become dim, and the most fine gold changed? O the hearts sorer when the account bears not this record! For we are all nearly concerned in it; let it not be to us as a tale is told. The general contents of this chapter we have, Rom. 5. 12. By one man sin entered into the world, and death passed upon all men, for that all have sinned. More particularly, we have here, I. The innocent tempted, v. 1. 5. II. The tempted transgressing, v. 6. 8. III. The transgressors arraigned, v. 9. v. 14. IV. Upon their conviction, sentenced, v. 14. 19. VI. After sentence, reprieved, v. 20. 21. VII. Notwithstanding their reprieve, executed in part done, v. 22. 24. Thus inwardly, as the Jews were taught the given of redemption by the promised Seed, they, and all their degenerate guilty race had been left in endless despair.

1. And the serpent was more subtile than any beast of the field which the Lord God had made. And he said unto the woman, Yea, hath God said, Ye shall not eat of every tree of the garden? 2. And the woman said unto the serpent, We may eat of the fruit of the trees of the garden: 3. But of the fruit of the tree which is in the midst of the garden, God hath said, Ye shall not eat of it, neither shall ye touch it, lest ye die. 4. And the serpent said unto the woman, Ye shall not surely die. 5. For God doth know that in the day ye eat thereof, then your eyes shall be opened, and ye shall be as gods, knowing good and evil.

We have here an account of the temptation with which Satan assaults our first parents, to draw them to sin, and which proved fatal to them. And here observe,

I. The tempter, and that was the Devil, in the shape and likeness of a serpent. 1. It is certain it was the Devil that beguiled Eve, and Satan is the old serpent, Rev. 12. 9, a malignant spirit, by creation an angel of light, and an immediate attendant upon God, Gen. 3. 1; and a rebel against God's crown and dignity. Multitudes of them fell; but this that attacked our first parents, was surely the prince of the devils, the ringleader in rebellion: no sooner was he a sinner than he was a Satan, no sooner a traitor than a tempter, as one enraged against God and his glory, and envious of man and his happiness. He knew he could not destroy man, but by deceiving him, Balaam could not curse Israel, but he could tempt Israel, Rev. 2. 14. The game therefore which Satan had to play, was, to draw our first parents to sin, and so to separate between them and their God. Thus the Devil was, from the beginning, a murderer, and the great mischief-maker. The whole race of mankind had here, as it were, but one neck, and at that Satan struck. The adversary and enemy is thus described:

2. It was the Devil in the likeness of a serpent. Whether it was only the visible shape and appearance of a serpent, as some think these were of which we read, Exod. 7. 12, or whether it was a real living serpent, actual and possessed by the Devil, is not certain: by God's permission it might be either. The Devil chose to act his part in a serpent, (1.) Because it is a specious creature, has a spotted duplied skin, and then went erect. Perhaps it was a flying serpent, which seemed to come from on high as a messenger from the upper world, one of the Seraphim; for the fiery serpents were flying, Isa. 14. 29. Many a dangerous temptation comes to us in gay fine colours that are but skin-deep, and seems to come from above; for Satan can seem an angel of light. And, (2.) Because it is a subtle creature; that is, it can operate with depth. Many instances are given of the subtility of the serpent, both to do mischief, and to secure himself in it when it is done. We are bid to be wise as serpents. But this serpent, as actuated by the Devil, no doubt, was more subtle than any other; for the Devil, though he had lost the sanctity, retains the sagacity, of an angel, and is wise to do evil. He knew of more advantage by making use of the serpent, than we are aware of. Observe, there is not any thing by which the Devil serves himself and his own interest more than by unsanctified subtlety. What Eve thought of this serpent speaking to her, we are not likely to tell, when I believe she herself did not know what to think of it. At first, perhaps, she supposed it might be a good angel, and yet, afterward, might suspect something amiss. It is remarkable that the Gnostics did many of them worship the Devil in the shape and form of a serpent; thereby avowing their adherence to that apostate spirit, and wearing his colours.

II. The person tempted was the woman, now alone, and at a distance from her husband, but near the forbidden tree, Gen. 3. 6. It was to assault the weaker vessel with his temptations; though perfect in her kind, yet we may suppose her inferior to Adam in knowledge, and strength, and presence of mind. Some think Eve received the command, not immediately from God, but at second hand by her husband, and therefore might the more easily be persuaded to discredit it. 2. It was his policy to entice her heathen, where many of his profrs were alone. Had she kept close to the side out of which she was lately taken, she had not been so much exposed. There are many temptations to which solitude gives great advantage; but the communion of saints contributes much to their strength and safety. 3. He took advantage by finding her near the forbidden tree, and, probably, gazing upon the fruit of it, only to satisfy her curiosity. They that would not eat the forbidden fruit, came near to see it. Satan, near the forbidden trees, AVOID IT, FORSAKE IT, Prov. 4. 15. 4. Satan tempted Eve, that by her he might tempt Adam; so he tempted Job by his wife, and Christ by Peter. It is his policy to send temptations by unsuspected hands, and their's that have most interest in us and influence upon us.

III. The temptation itself, and the artificial management of it. We are often, in scripture, told of our danger by the temptations of Satan; his devices, 2 Cor. 2. 11. His seductions, Rev. 2. 24; his wiles, Eph. 4. 11. The greatest instances we have of them, were in his tempting of the two Adams, here, and Matth. 4. In this, he prevailed; but in that, he was baffled. What he spake to them of whom he had no hold by any corruption in them, he speaks in us by our own deceitful hearts and carnal reasonings, which make his assaults on us less discernible, but not less dangerous. That which the Devil aimed at, was to persuade Eve to eat forbidden fruit; and, to do this, he took the same method that he does still. 1. He questions whether it were a sin or no, v. 1. 2. He denies that there was any danger in it, v. 4. 3. He suggests much advantage by it, v. 5. And these are his common topics.

1. He questions whether it were a sin or no, to eat of this tree, and whether really the fruit of it were forbidden. Yea, saith God said, Ye shall not eat? The first word intimated something said before, introducing this, and with which it is connected; perhaps some discourse Eve had with herself, which Satan took hold of, and crafted this question upon. In the chain of thoughts, one thing strangely brings in another, and perhaps something bad at last. Observe here, (1.) He does not discover his design at first, but puts a question which seemed innocent; (2.) He first of necessity had to speak of the Devil's subtlety. Thus he would begin a discourse, and draw her into a parley, that she would be safe, need to be suspicious, and shy of talking with the tempter. (2.) He quotes the command Falsely, as if it were a prohibition, not only of this tree, but of all; God had said, Of every tree ye may eat, except one. He, by aggravating the exception, made it appear to be the less the less wonderful. How God said, Ye shall not eat of this tree? The divine law cannot be reproached, unless it be first misrepresented. (3.) He seems to speak it tauntingly, upbraiding the woman with her ignorance of meddling with that tree; as if he had said, You are so nice and cautious, and so very precise, because God has said, Ye shall not eat. The Devil, as he is a liar, so he is a scoffer, from the begin
2. He denies that there was any danger in it; though it might be the transgression of a precept, yet it would not be the incurring of a penalty, v. 4. Ye shall not surely die. Ye shall not dying, so the word is, in direct contradiction to what God had said. Either, 1. It is not certain that ye shall die, so some. It is not so sure as ye are made to believe it is. Thus Satan endeavours to shake that which he cannot overthrow, and invalidates the force of divine threatenings by questioning the certainty of them; and when once it is supposed possible that there may be falsehood or fallacy in any word of God, a door is then opened to downright infidelity. Satan teaches men first to doubt, and then to deny; he makes sceptics first, and so by degrees makes them atheists. Or, 2. It is certain ye shall not die, so others. He avers his contradiction with the same phrase of assurance that God hath used in ratifying the threatening. He began to call the precept in question, v. 1, but finding that the woman adhered to that, he quitted that babbling, and made his second onset upon the threatening, where he perceived her to waver; for he is quick to spy all advantages, and to attack the wall where it is weakest, Ye shall not surely die. This was a lie, a downright lie; for, 1. It was contrary to the word of God, which we are sure is true; see 1 John 2. 21, 27. It was such a lie as gave the lie to God himself. 2. It was, contrary to his own knowledge; when he told them there was no danger in disobedience and rebellion, he said that which he knew, by woful experience, to be false. He had broken the law of his creation, and had found, to his cost, that he could not prosper in it; and yet he tells us his first parents they shall not die. He conceals his own misery, that he might draw them into the like: thus he still deceives sinners into their own ruin. 3. It was to his own advantage, not only to them, but gains credit rather than God, who tells them, The wages of sin is death. Now hope of impurity is a great support to all iniquity, and impetuousity in it: I shall have peace, though I walk in the imagination of my heart, Deut. 29. 19.

3. He promises them advantage by it, v. 5. Here he follows his blow, and it was a blow at the root, a fatal blow to the tree we are branches of. He not only would have the tree cut to the root, but bind himself to save them from harm; but (if they would be such fools as to venture upon the security of one that was himself become a bankrupt) he undertakes they shall be gainers by it, unspeakable gainers. He could not have persuaded them to run the hazard of ruining themselves, if he had not suggested to them a great probability of mending themselves. (1.) He insinuates to them the great improvements they would make by eating of this fruit. And he suits the temptation to the pure state they were now in, proposing to them, not any carnal pleasures or gratifications, but intellectual delights and satisfactions. These were the baits with which he covered his hook. [1.] Your eyes shall be opened; you shall have much more of the power and pleasure of contemplation than you now have; you shall catch a larger compass of things, and your intellectual view will be furthered than now. He speaks as if now they were but dim-sighted, and short-sighted, in comparison of what they would be then. [2.] You shall be as gods, as Elohim, mighty gods; not only omniscient, but omnipotent too: or, You shall be as God himself, equal to him, rivals with him; you shall be sovereigns, and no longer subjects; self-sufficient and independent, to think and act as you list without absurd suggestion! As if it were possible for creatures of yesterday to be like their Creator that was from eternity. [3.] You shall know good and evil, that is, every thing that is desirable to be known. To support this part of the temptation, he abuses the name given to this tree: it was intended to teach the practical knowledge of good and evil, that is, of duty and disobedience; and it would teach the experimental knowledge of good and evil, that is, of happiness and misery. In these senses, the name of the tree was a warning to them not to eat of it; but he perverts the sense of it, and wrests it to their destruction, as if this tree would give them a speculative notional knowledge of the natures, kinds, and originals, of good and evil. And, [4.] All this presently; In the day ye eat thereof, you shall find a sudden and immediate change for the better. Now, in all these insinuations, he aims to beguile in them. First, Discontent with their present state, as if it were not so good as it might be, and should be Note, No condition will of itself bring contentment, unless the mind be brought to it. Adam was not
...no not in paradise, nor the angels in their first state; Jude 6. Secondly, Ambition of preeminence, as if they were fit to be gods. Satan had ruined himself by desiring to be like the Most High, Isa. 14. 12. 14, and therefore seek to infect our first parents with the same desire, that he might do them too.

"For God doth know how much it will advance you; and therefore, in envy and ill-will to you, he hath forbidden it": as if he durst not let them eat of that tree, because then they would know their own strength, and would not continue in an inferior state, but be able to cope with them; or as if he begrudged them the honour and happiness which their eating of that tree would prefer them to. Now, [1.] This was a great affront to God, and the highest indignity that could be done him; a reproach to his power, as if he feared his creatures; and much more a reproach to his goodness, as if he hated the work of his own hands, and would not have those whom he has made, to be made happy. Shall the best of men think it strange to be misrepresented and evil spoken of, when God himself is so? Satan, as he is the accuser of the brethren before God, so he accuses God before the brethren; thus he sows discord, and is the father of them that do so. [2.] It was a most dangerous snare to our first parents, as it tended to alienate their affections from God, and so to withdraw them from their allegiance to him. Thus still the Devil draws people into sin, and wastes his interests by suggesting to them hard thoughts of God, and false hopes of benefit and advantage by sin. Let us therefore, in opposition to him, always think well of God as the best good, and think ill of sin as the worst of evils; thus let us resist the Devil, and he will flee from us.

6. And when the woman saw that the tree was good for food, and that it was pleasant to the eyes, and a tree to be desired to make one wise, she took of the fruit thereof, and did eat, and gave also unto her husband with her, and he did eat. 7. And the eyes of them both were opened, and they knew that they were naked; and they sewed fig-leaves together, and made themselves aprons. 8. And they heard the voice of the Lord God walking in the garden in the cool of the day: and Adam and his wife hid themselves from the presence of the Lord God amongst the trees of the garden.

Here we see what Eve’s parable with the tempter ended in; Satan, at length, gains his point, and the strong hold is taken by his wiles. God tried the obedience of our first parents by forbidding them the tree of knowledge, and Satan does, as it were, join issue with God, and in that very thing undertakes to seduce them into a transgression; and here we find how the prevailed, God permitting it for what he cry a calamity (Col. 2. 20).

1. We have here the inducements that moved them to transgress. The woman being deceived by the tempter’s artful management, was ringleader in the transgression, 1 Tim. 2. 14. She was first in the fault; and it was the result of her consideration, or rather, her incorporation.

1. She saw no harm in this tree, more than in any of the rest. It was said of all the rest of the fruit trees with which the garden of Eden was planted, that they were pleasant to the sight, and good for food, ch. 2. 9. Now, in her eye, this was like all the rest; it seemed as good for food as any of them, and she saw nothing in the colour of its fruit, that threatened death or danger; it was as pleasant to the sight as any of them, and therefore, "What hurt could it do to them? Why should this be forbidden them rather than any of the rest?"

2. Note, When there is thought to be no more harm in forbidden fruit than in other fruit, sin lies at the door, and Satan soon carries the day. Nay, perhaps, it seemed to her to be better for food, more grateful to the taste, and more nourishing to the body, than any of the rest, and to her eye it was more pleasant than any. We are often betrayed into shares by an inordinate desire to have our senses gratified. Or, if it had nothing in it more inviting than the rest, yet it was the more coveted, because it was prohibited. Whether it were so in her or not, we find that in us, that is, in our flesh, in our corrupt nature, there dwells a strange spirit of contradiction, Nituam in vetitum—We desire what is forbidden.

2. She imagined more virtue in this tree than in any of the rest; that it was a tree not only not to be dreaded, but to be desired to make one wise, and therein excelling all the rest of the trees. This she saw, that is, she perceived and understood it by what the Devil had said to her; and some think that she saw the serpent eat of that tree, and that he told her he thereby had gained the faculties of speech and reason; but it is rather to be supposed she made to one wise, and was persuaded to think, "If it made a brute creature rational, why might it not make a rational creature divine?" See here how the desire of unnecessary knowledge, under the mistaken notion of wisdom, proves hurtful and destructive to many. Our first parents, who knew so much, did not know this, that they knew enough. Christ is a Tree to be desired to make one wise, and the Devil is a serpent to make one wise; see 2 Cor. 11. 3; let us, therefore, by faith, be seduced from the wicked serpent, and not fall upon him, that we may be wise to salvation. In the heavenly paradise, the tree of knowledge will not be a forbidden tree; for there, we shall know as we are known; let us therefore long to be there, and, in the mean time, not exercise ourselves in things too high, or too deep for us, nor covet to be wise above what is written.

11. The steps of the transgression; no steps upward, but from step downward toward the pit—steps that took hold on hell. 1. She saw: she should have turned away her eyes from beholding vanity; but she enters into temptation, by looking with pleasure on the forbidden fruit. Observe, A great deal of sin comes in at the eye. At these windows Satan throws in these fiery darts which pierce and poison the heart. The eye affects the heart with guilt as well as grief. Let us therefore, with holy Job, mind our eyes, not to look on that which we are in danger of lustings after, Prov. 23. 31. Matth. 5. 28. Let the fear of God be always to us for a covering of the eyes, ch. 20. 16.

2. She took: it was her own act and deed. The Devil did not take it, and put it into her mouth, whether she would or no; but she herself took it. Satan may not have been, but he made a covenant with our eyes, to not to look on that which we are in danger of lustings after, Prov. 23. 31. Matth. 5. 28. Let the fear of God be always to us for a covering of the eyes, ch. 20. 16.

3. She did eat: when she looked, perhaps she did not intend to take, or when she took, not to eat; but it ended in that. Note, The very root of sin is treacherous; a man cannot stop himself when he will: the beginning of it is as the breaking forth of water, which it is hard to say, "Hitherto thou shalt come..."
and no further." Therefore it is our wisdom to suppress the first motion of sin, and to leave it off, before it be meddled with. *Obstā prīncipīs—Nīhānī mischief in the bud.

4. She gave also to her husband with her; it is probable that she was not with her when she was tempted; surely if he had, he would have interposed to prevent the sin; but he came to her when she had eaten, and was prevailed with by her at last; for it is easy to learn that which is bad, than to teach that which is good. She gave it to him, persuading him with the same arguments that the serpent had used with her, adding this to all the rest, that she herself had eaten of it, and found it so far from being deadly, that it was extremely pleasant and grateful: *stolen waters are sweet. She gave it to him, under colour of kindness; she would not eat these delicious morsels alone; but really it was the greatest unkindness she could do him. Or perhaps she gave it to him, that if it should prove hurtful, he might share with her in the misery; which indeed looks strangely unkind, and yet may, without difficulty, be supposed to enter into the heart of one that had eaten forbidden fruit. Note, Those that have themselves done ill, are commonly willing to draw in others to do the same. As was the Devil, so was Eve, no sooner a sinner than a tempter.

And *eaten, overcome by his wife's importunity. It is needless to ask, "What would have been the consequence, if Eve only had transgressed?" The wisdom of God, we are sure, would have decided the difficulty according to equity; but, alas, the case was not so; Adam also did eat. And what great harm if he did? say the corrupt and carnal reasonings of a vain mind. What harm? Why, there was it dishonour to God; an affront to God, to glut his rage in the Devil's discontent with his present state; pride in his own merits; an ambition of the honour which comes not from God; envy at God's perfections; and indulgence of the appetites of the body. In neglecting the tree of life which he was allowed to eat of, and eating of the tree of knowledge which was forbidden, he plainly showed a contempt of the favours which God had bestowed on him, and a preference given to those God did not give. Great the contradictions in the Devil's; discontent with his present state; pride in his own merits; an ambition of the honour which comes not from God; envy at God's perfections; and indulgence of the appetites of the body. In neglecting the tree of life which he was allowed to eat of, and eating of the tree of knowledge which was forbidden, he plainly showed a contempt of the favours which God had bestowed on him, and a preference given to those God did not give.

11. The immediate consequences of the transgression. Shame and fear seized the criminals, *ifso fact—in the fact itself, these came into the world along with sin, and still attend it. *Shame seized them unseen, v. 7, where observe,

2. The strong convictions they fell under, in the same bosoms; *The eyes of both were opened. It is not meant of the eyes of the body; those were opened before, as appears by this, that the sin came in at them; Jonathan's eyes were enlightened by eating forbidden fruit, 1 Sam. 14. 27, that is, he was refreshed and revived by it; but their's were not so. Nor is it meant of any advances made hereby in true knowledge; but the eyes of their consciences were opened, their hearts smote them for what they had done. Now, when it was too late, they saw the folly of eating forbidden fruit. They saw the happiness they had fallen from, and the misery they were fallen into. They saw a loving, God provoked, his grace and favour forfeited, his likeness and image lost, dominion over the creatures gone. They saw their natures corrupted and depraved, and felt a disorder in their own spirits which they had never before been conscious of. They saw that in their members warring against the law of their minds and against God; for they were both to sin and wrath. They saw, as Balaam, when his *eyes were opened, (Numb. 22. 31) the angel of the Lord standing in the way, and his sword drawn in his hand; and perhaps they saw the serpent that had abused them, insulting over them. The text tells us, they saw that they were naked, that is, [1.] That they were stripped, deprived of all the honours and joys of their paradise state, and exposed to all the calamities and miseries which are to be expected from an angry God; they were disarmed, their defence was departed from them. [2.] That they were shamed, for ever shamed, before God and angels; they saw themselves disrobed of all their ornaments and ensigns of honour, degraded from their dignity, and disgraced in the highest degree, laid open to the contempt and reproach of heaven, and earth, and all the world.

Firstly, What a dishonour and disquietment sin is; it makes mischief wherever it is admitted, sets men against themselves, disturbs their peace, and destroys all their comforts: sooner or later, it will have shame, either the shame of true repentance which ends in glory, or that shame and everlasting contempt, to which the wicked shall rise at the great day; it is a reproach to any people. Secondly, What a deceived Satan is; he told our first parents, when he tempted them, that their eyes should be opened; and so they were, but not as they understood it; they were opened, to their shame and grief, not to their honour or advantage. Therefore, when he speaks fair, believe him not. The most malicious usurpers of his liars often excuse themselves with this, that they are only equivocations; but God will not so excuse them.

3. The sorry shift they made, to palliate these convictions, and to arm themselves against them; they sewed, or platted fig-leaves together; and to cover, at least, part of their shame from one another, they made themselves aprons. See here what is commonly the folly of these that have sinned. [1.] That they are more solicitous to save their credit before men, than to obtain their pardon from God; they are backward to confess their sin, and to lay aside the garments which the devil had put upon them. [2.] That the excuses men make, to cover and extenuate their sins, are vain and frivolous; like the aprons of fig-leaves, they make the matter never the better, but the worse; the shame, thus hid, becomes the more...
shameful; yet thus we are all apt to cover our transgressions as Adam, Job 31. 33. 2. Fear seized them immediately upon their eating the forbidden fruit, ch. 3. 1. Observe here,

1. What was the cause and occasion of their fear; they heard the voice of the Lord God walking in the garden in the cool of the day. It was the approach of the Judge, that put them into a fright: and yet he came in such a manner, as made it formidable only to guilty consciences. It is supposed that he came in a human shape, and that he who judged the world now, was the same that shall judge the world at last. Let us not laugh at sinners, even should God appear to them only as a flame of fire, in garden, that now terrified them.

Adam, Isa. 11. 8. How shall I give thee up? Or rather, they heard him calling for them, and coming toward them.

2. What was the effect and evidence of their fear; they hid themselves from the presence of the Lord God: a sad change! Before they had sinned, if they had heard the voice of the Lord God coming toward them, they would run to meet him, and with a humble joy welcome his gracious visit; but now that it was otherwise, God was become a terror to them, and then, no marvel that they were become a terror to themselves, and full of confusion; their own consciences accused them, and set their sin before them in its colours; their fig-leaves failed them, and would do them no service; God was come forth against them as an enemy, and the whole false state of their condition, and as yet, they knew not of any mediator between them and an angry God, so that nothing remained but a certain fearful looking for of judgment. In this fright, they hid themselves among the bushes; having offended, they fled for the same. Knowing themselves guilty, they durst not stand a trial, but abandoned, and fled from justice. See here,

The false goal of the tempter, and the frauds and the fallacies of his temptation, which misled them they should be safe, but now they cannot be so much as think themselves so; he said they should not die, and yet now they are forced to fly for their lives; he promised them they should be knowed, but they see themselves abased, and never did they seem so little as now; he promised them they should be happy, but they see themselves a wretches; he promised them they should be as gods, and yet they hold, and during, but they are as criminals discovered, trembling, pale, and anxious to escape: they would not be subjects, and so they are prisoners.

GENESIS, III. 41

[2.] The folly of sinners, to think it either possible, or desirable, to hide themselves from God: can they conceal themselves from the Father of lights? Ps. 36. 5, 7, &c. Jer. 23. 24. Will they withdraw themselves from the Fountain of Life, who alone can give help and happiness? Jon. 2. 8. [3.] The fears that attend sin; all that amazing fear of God's appearances, the accusations of conscience, the approaches of trouble, the assaults of inferior creatures, and the arrests of death which is common among men, all these are the effect of sin. Adam and Eve, who were partners in the sin, were sharers in the shame and fear that attended it; and though hand joined in hand, (hands so lately joined in marriage,) yet could they not animate or fortify one another: miserable comforters they were become to each other!

3. And the Lord God called unto Adam, and said unto him, Where art thou? 10. And he said, I heard thy voice in the garden, and I was afraid, because I was naked; and I hid myself.

We have here the arraignment of these deserters before the righteous judge of heaven and earth, who, though he is not tied to observe formalities, yet proceeds against them with all possible firmness, that he may be justly feared when he appears. Observe here,

1. The startling question with which God pursued Adam, and arrested him, Where art thou? as God did not know where he was; but thus he would have the entrance against him. "Come, where is this foolish man?" Some make it a bemoaning question, "Poor Adam, what is become of thee?" "Alas for thee!" (so some read it.) "How art thou fallen, Lucifer, son of the morning? Thou that wast my friend and favourite, whom I have done so much for, and would have done so much more for; hast thou now forsaken me, and ruined thyself? Is it come to this? It is rather an upbraiding question, in order to his correction and humiliation. Where art thou? Not, In what place, but, In what condition? "Is this all thou hast gotten by eating forbidden fruit? Thou that wouldst vie with me, dost thou now fly from me?" Note, (1.) Those who by sin have given estray from God, should seriously consider where they are; they are afar off from all good, in the midst of their sorrows, in bondage to Satan, and in the high road to utter ruin. This inquiry, "Where art thou?" may be looked upon as a gracious pursuit in kindness to him, and in order to his recovery. If God had not called to him, to reclaim him, his condition had been as desperate as that of fallen angels; this lost sheep had wandered endlessly, if the good shepherd had not sought after him, to bring him back, and in order to that, reminded him where he was, where he should not be, and where he could not be, either happy or easy. Note, (2.) If sinners will be considered where they are, they will not rest till they return to God.

2. The trembling answer which Adam gave to this question, v. 10, I heard thy voice in the garden, and I was afraid; he does not own his guilt, and yet in effect confesses it, by owning his shame and fear. But it is the case where he could not be, either happy or easy. Note, (2.) If sinners will be considered where they are, they will not rest till they return to God.
of our nakedness. Let us therefore put on the Lord Jesus Christ, and draw near with humble boldness.

11. And he said, Who told thee that thou wast naked? Hast thou eaten of the tree, whereof I commanded thee not to eat? 12. And the man said, the woman whom thou gavest to be with me, she gave me of the tree, and I did eat.

13. And the Lord God said unto the woman, What is this that thou hast done? And the woman said, The serpent beguiled me, and I did eat.

We have here the offenders found guilty by their own confession, and yet endeavouring to excuse and extenuate their fault; they could not confess and justify what they had done, but they confess and palliate it. Observe,

I. How their confession was extorted from them: God put it to the man, v. 11, Who told thee that thou wast naked? "How camest thou to be sensible of thy shame," thou wast naked? Note, Though God knows all our sins, yet he will know them from us, and requires from us an ingenuous confession of them; not that he may be informed, but that we may be humbled. In this examination, God reminds him of the command he had given him: "I commanded thee not to eat of it, I thy Maker, I thy Master, I thy Benefactor; I commanded thee to the contrary." Sin appears most plain, and most sinful, in the glass of the commandment, therefore God here sets it before Adam; and in it we should see our faces. The question put to the woman, was, v. 13, What is this that thou hast done? "Wilt thou also own thy fault, and make confession of it? And wilt thou see what an evil thing it was?" Note, It concerns those who have eaten forbidden fruit themselves, and especially those who have enticed others to it likewise, seriously to consider what they have done. In eating forbidden fruit, we have offended a great and gracious God, broken a just and righteous law, violated a sacred and most solemn covenant, and wronged our own precious souls by forfeiting God's favour, and exposing ourselves to his wrath and curse: in enticing others to it, we do the Devil's work, make ourselves guilty of other men's sins, and account to their ruin. What is this that we have done?

II. How their crime was extenuated by them in their confession. It was to no purpose to plead not guilty; the show of their counterfeits testified against them, therefore they became their own accusers. I did eat, says the man, "And so did I," says the woman: for when God judges, he will overcome: but these do not look like penitent confessions of sin, as if they were confessing the sin, and taking shame to themselves, they excuse the sin, and lay the shame and blame on others.

1. Adam lays all the blame upon his wife. "She gave me of the tree, and pressed me to eat it, which I did, only to oblige her;" a frivolous excuse. He ought to have taught her, not to have been taught by her; and it was no hard matter to determine which of the two he must be guilty of, he his wife. Learn hence, never to be brought to sin by that which will not bring us off in the judgment; let not that bear us up in the commission, which will not bear us out in the trial; let us therefore never be overcome by impertinency to act against our consciences, nor ever despise God, to please the best friend we have in the world. But this is not the worst of it; he not only lays the blame upon his wife, but expresses it so as tacitly to reflect on God himself: "It is the woman which thou gavest me, and gavest to be with me as my companion, my guide, and my acquaintance; she gave me of the tree, else I had not eaten of it." Thus he insinuates that God was accessory to his sin: he gave him the woman, and she gave him the fruit; so that he seemed to have it, but not one respect of God had. Note, There is a strange proneness in those that are tempted, to say they are tempted of God; as if our abusing of God's gifts would excuse our violation of God's laws. God gives us riches, honours, and relations, that we may serve him cheerfully in the enjoyment of them; but if we take occasion from them to sin against him, instead of blaming Providence for putting us into such a condition, we must blame ourselves for prevailing the gracious designs of Providence therein.

2. Eve lays all the blame upon the serpent; The serpent beguiled me. Sin is a brat that nobody is willing to own; a sign that it is a scandalous thing. Those that are willing enough to take the pleasure and profit of sin, are backward enough to take the blame and shame of it. "The serpent, that subtle creature of thy making, which thou didst permit to come into thy presence, this, he beguiled me," or, made me to err; for our sins are our errors. Learn hence, (1.) That Satan's temptations are all beguilements, his arguments are all fallacies, his allurements are all cheats; when he speaks fair, believe him not. Sin deceives us, and, by deceiving, cheats us. It is by the deceitfulness of sin, that the heart is hardened; see Rom. 11. Heb. 3. 13. (2.) That though Satan's subtlety drew us into sin, yet it will not justify us in sin; though he is the tempter, we are the sinners; and indeed it is our own lust that draws us aside and entices us, Jam. 1. 14. Let it not therefore lessen our sorrow and humiliation for sin, that we are beguiled into it; but rather let it increase our self-indignation, that we should suffer ourselves to be beguiled by a known cheat and a sworn enemy. Well, this is all the prisoners at the bar have to say, why sentence should not be passed, and execution awarded, according to law; and this all is next to nothing, in some respects, worse than nothing.

14. And the Lord God said unto the serpent, Because thou hast done this, thou art cursed above all cattle, and above every beast of the field; upon thy belly shalt thou go, and dust shalt thou eat, all the days of thy life. 15. And I will put enmity between thee and the woman, and between thy seed and her seed; it shall bruise thy heel, and thou shalt bruise his heel.

The prisoners being found guilty by their own confession, beside the personal and infallible knowledge of the Judge, and nothing being offered in arrest of judgment, God immediately proceeds to pass sentence; and, in these verses, he begins (where the sin began) with the serpent. God did not examine the serpent, nor ask him what he had done, or why he did it; but immediately sentenced him, 1. Because he was already convicted of rebellion against God, and his malice and enmity against innocence was openly avowed and declared as Sodom's. 2. Because he was to be for ever excluded from all hope of pardon; and why should any thing be said to convince and humble him, who was to find no place for repentance? His wound was not searched, because it was not to be cured. Some think the condition of the fallen angels was
The wickedness, about 91. reduction against is expression consequently, in, departed of horses’ name, Suljtle along, with shall higher; made Israel to sin. Now, 1. The serpent is here laid under the curse of God; Thou art cursed above all cattle; even the creeping things, when God made them, were blessed of him, ch. 1. 22, but sin turned the blessing into a curse. The serpent was more subtle than any beast of the field, v. 1, and here, cursed above every beast in the field; unsanctified subtlety often proves a great curse to a man; and the more crafty men are to do evil, the more mischief they do, and, consequently, the greater damnation. Subtle tempters are the most accursed creatures under the sun.

2. He is here laid under man’s reproach and enmity. (1.) He is to be for ever looked upon as a vile and despicable creature, and a proper object of scorn and contempt; “Upon thy belly shalt thou go, no longer upon feet, or half erect, but thou shalt crawl along, thy belly cleaving to the earth;” an expression of a very abject miserable condition, Ps. 44. 25; “and thou shalt not avoid eating dust with thy meat.” His crime was, that he tempted Eve to eat that which she should not; his punishment was, that he was necessitated to eat that which he would not. Dust thou shalt eat; denoting not only a base and despicable condition, but a mean and pitiful spirit: it is said of those whose courage is defiled by them, that they feel the dust like a serpent, Mic. 7. 17. The Psalmist, and sad it is, that the serpent’s curse should be the covetous worldling’s choice, whose character it is, that they pant after the dust of the earth! Amos 2. 7. These choose their own deusions, and so shall their doom be. (2.) He is to be for ever looked upon as a venomous noxious creature, and a proper object of hatred and detestation; I will put enmity between thee and the woman. The inferior creatures being made for man, it was a curse upon any of them, to be turned against man, and man against them; and this is part of the serpent’s curse. The serpent is hurtful to man, and often bruises his heel, because it can reach no higher; nay notice is taken of his biting the horses’ heels, ch. 49. 17. But man is victorious over the serpent, and bruises his head, that is, gives him a mortal wound, owing to destroy the whole race of vipers. It is the effect of this curse upon the serpent, that though that creature is subtle and very dangerous, yet it prevails not, (as it would if God gave it commission,) to the destruction of mankind; but this fear of serpents is much reduced by that promise of God to his people, Ps. 91. 13, Thou shalt tread upon the lion and the adder, and that of Christ to his disciples, Mark 16. 18, Thou shalt tread upon the serpent. This was unfruitful, he viper that fastened upon his hand. Observe here, that the serpent and the woman had just now been very familiar and friendly in discourse about the forbidden fruit, and a wonderful agreement there was between them; but here they are irreconcilably set at variance. Note, Sinful friendships justly end in mortal feuds: those that unite in wickedness, will not unite long.

II. This serpent may be considered as levelled at the Devil, who only made use of the serpent, as his vehicle in this appearance, but was himself the principal agent. He that spoke through the serpent’s mouth, is here struck at through the serpent’s side, and is principally intended in the sentence, which, like the pillar of cloud and fire, has a dark side toward the Devil, and a bright side toward our first parents and their seed. Great things are contained in these words.

1. A perpetual reproach is here fastened upon that great enemy both to God and man. Under the cover of the serpent, he is here sentenced to be, (1.) Degraded and accursed of God. It is supposed that pride was the sin that turned angels into devils, which is here justly punished by a great variety of mortifications couched under the mean circumstances of a serpent crawling on his belly, and licking the dust. How art thou fallen, O Lucifer! He that would be above God, and would have rebellion against him, is justly exposed here to contempt, and lies to trodden on; a man’s pride will bring him low, and God will humble those that will not humble themselves. (2.) Detested and abhorred of all mankind; even those that are really seduced into this interest, yet profess a hatred and abhorrence of him. There is no sign that he is born of God, make it their constant care to keep themselves from that wicked one touch them not, 1 John 5. 18. He is here condemned to a state of war and irreconcilable enmity. (3.) Destroyed and ruined, at last, by the great Redeemer, signified by the breaking of his head; his subtle politics shall be all baffled, his usurped power shall be entirely crushed, and he shall be forever a captive to the injured honour of the divine sovereignty: by being told of this now, he was tormented before the time.

2. A perpetual quarrel is here commenced between the kingdom of God, and the kingdom of the Devil among men; war is proclaimed between the Seed of the woman and the seed of the serpent. That war in Heaven between Michael and the Dragon began now, Rev. 12. 7. It is the fruit of this vanity, (1.) The continual conflict between grace and corruption in the hearts of God’s people: Satan, by their corruptions, assaults them, buffets them, sifts them, and seeks to devour them; they, by the exercise of their graces, resist him, wrestle with him, quench his fiery darts, force him to flee from them. Heaven and hell can never be reconciled, nor light and darkness; no more can Satan and a sanctified soul, for these are contrary the one to the other. The Devil is likewise a continual struggle between the wicked angel and the grace in this world. They that love God, account those their enemies, that hate him, Ps. 139. 21, 22. And all the rage and malice of persecutors against the people of God, are the fruit of this enmity, which will continue while there is a godly man on this side heaven, and a wicked man on this side hell; Marvel not therefore, if the world hate you, 1 John 3. 13.

3. A gracious promise is here had of Christ, as the Deliverer of fallen man from the power of Satan; though it was expressed to the serpent, yet it was expressed in the hearing of our first parents, who, doubtless, took the hints of grace here given them, and saw a door of hope opened to them; else, the following sentence upon themselves would have had no meaning to them. Here was the dawning of the gospel-day: no sooner was the wound given, than the remedy was provided and revealed; here, in the head of the book, as the word is, (Heb. 10. 7.)
in the beginning of the Bible, it is written of Christ, that he should do the will of God. By faith in this promise, we have reason to think, our first parents, and the patriarchs before the flood, were justified and saved; and to this promise, and the benefit of it, instantly serving God day and night, they hoped to come. Notice is here given them of three things concerning Christ.

(1.) His incarnation; that he should be the Seed of the woman, the Seed of that woman; therefore he genealogy, Luke 3, goes so high as to show him to be the son of Adam, but God does the woman the honour to call him rather her seed, because she it was whom the Devil had beguiled, and on whom Adam had laid the blame; herein God magnifies his grace, in that though the woman was first in the transgression, yet she shall be saved by child-bearing, (as some read it,) that is, by the promised Seed which shall descend from her; 1 Tim. 2. He was likewise to be the seed of a woman only, a virgin; that he might not be tainted with the corruption of our nature; he was sent forth, made of a woman, Gal. 4. 4, that this promise might be fulfilled. It speaks great encouragement to sinners, that their Saviour is the Seed of the woman, bone of our bone, Heb. 2. 11. 14. Man is therefore sinful and unclean, because he is born of a woman, (Job 25. 4,) and therefore his days are full of trouble. Job 14. 1. But the Seed of the woman was made sin and a curse for us, so saving us from both.

(2.) His sufferings and death; pointed at in Satan's bruising his heel, that is, his human nature. Satan tempted Christ in the wilderness, to draw him into sin; and some think it was Satan that terrified Christ in his agony, to have driven him to despair. It was the Devil that put it into the heart of Judas to betray Christ, of Peter to deny him, of the chief priests to prosecute him, of the false witnesses to accuse him, and of Pilate to condemn him; aiming in all this, by destroying the Saviour, to ruin the salvation; but, on the contrary, it was by death that Christ destroyed him that had the power of death, Heb. 2. 14. Christ's heel was bruised, when his feet were pierced and nailed to the cross, and Christ's sufferings are continued in the sufferings of the saints for his name. The Devil tempts them, casts them into prison, persecutes and slays them; and so Satan finds himself his own destruction in their afflictions. But while the heel is bruised on earth, it is well that the Head is safe in heaven.

(3.) His victory over Satan thereby. Satan had now trampled upon the woman, and insulted over her; but the Seed of the woman should be raised up in the fulness of time to avenge her quarrel, and to trample upon him, to spoil him, to lead him captive, and to triumph over him, Col. 2. 15. He shall bruise his head, (as it is,) he shall destroy all his political and his powers, and give a total overthrow to his kingdom and interest. Christ baffled Satan's temptations, rescued souls out of his hands, cast him out of the bodies of people, dispossessed the strong man armed, and divided the spoil; by his death, he gave a fatal and incurable blow to the Devil's kingdom, a wound to the head of this beast, that can never be healed. As his gospel gets ground, and Satan is trampled on, Rev. 2. 10. 16. By his grace, he trembles Satan under his people's feet, Rom. 16. 20, and will shortly cast him into the lake of fire, Rev. 20. 10. And the Devil's perpetual overthrow will be the complete and everlasting joy and glory of the chosen remnant.

16. Unto the woman he said, I will greatly multiply thy sorrow, and thy conception; in sorrow thou shalt bring forth children; and thy desire shall be to thy husband, and he shall rule over thee.

We have here the sentence passed upon the woman for her sin: two things she is condemned to, a state of sorrow, and a state of subjection; proper punishments of a sin in which she had gratified her pleasure in unbridled pride.

1. She is here put into a state of sorrow; one particular of which only is specified, that, in bringing forth children; but it includes all these impressions of grief and fear which the mind of that tender sex is most apt to receive, and all the common calamities which they are liable to. Note, Sin brought sorrow into the world; that was it that made the world a vale of tears, brought showers of trouble upon our heads, and opened springs of sorrows over hearts. But had we known no guilt, we should have known no grief. The pains of child-bearing, which are great to a proverb, a scripture-proverb, are the effect of sin; every pang and every groan of the travelling woman, speak aloud the fatal consequences of sin: this comes of eating forbidden fruit. Observe, 1. The sorrows are here said to be multiplied, greatly multiplied; all the sorrows of this present time are but a sample of what Christ's affliction is liable to, of various kinds, and often repeated, the clouds returning after the rain; no marvel that our sorrows are multiplied, when our sins are; both are innumerable evils. The sorrows of child-bearing are multiplied; for they include, not only the travelling throes, but the indispositions before, (it is sorrow from the conception,) and the nursing toils and vexations after; and after all, if the children prove wicked and foolish, they are, more than ever, the sorrows of child-bearing. Thus it is, the sorrows are multiplied; as one grief is over, another succeeds in this world. 2. It is God that multiplies our sorrows; I will do it. God, as a righteous Judge, does it, which ought to silence us under all our sorrows; as many as they are, we have deserved them all, and more; nay, God, as a tender Father, does it for our necessary correction, that we may be humbled for sin, and weaned from the world by all our sorrows, and thereby the greater comfort we have under them, will abundantly balance all our sorrows, how greatly severer they are multiplied.

II. She is here put into a state of subjection; the whole sex, which, by creation, was equal with man, is, for sin, made inferior, and forbidden to usurp authority, 1 Tim. 2. 11, 12. The wife particularly is hereby put under the dominion of her husband, and is not sui juris—act her own disposal, of which see an instance in that law, Numb. 30. 6, 8, where the husband is empowered, if he please, to disannul the vows made by the wife. This sentence amounts only to that command, Wives, be in subjection to your own husbands; but the entrance of sin has made that duty a punishment, which otherwise it would not have been. If man had not sinned, he would always have ruled with wisdom and love; and if the woman had not sinned, she would always have obeyed with humility and meekness, and then the dominion had been no grievance: but our own sin and folly make our yoke heavy. If Eve had not eaten forbidden fruit herself, and tempted her husband to it, she had never complained of her subjection; therefore it ought never to be complained of, though harsh; but sin must be complained of, that made it so. These wives, who no idle desiring and disobeis their husbands, but dominion over them, do not consider that they not only violate a divine law, but thwart a divine sentence.

Lastly, Observe here, how mercy is mixed with wrath in this sentence: the woman shall have sorrow, but it shall be in bringing forth children, and the thing shall be forgotten for joy that a child is born, John 16. 21. She shall be subject, but it shall be to her own husband that loves her, not to a stranger, or an enemy: the sentence was not a curse, to bring her to ruin, but a chastise-ment, to bring her to repentance. It was well that eminy was not put between the man and the woman, as there was between the serpent and the woman.

17. And unto Adam he said, Because thou hast hearkened unto the voice of thy wife, and hast eaten of the tree, of which I commanded thee, saying, Thou shalt not eat of it: cursed is the ground for thy sake; in sorrow shalt thou eat of it all the days of thy life. 18. Thorns also and thistles shall it bring forth to thee; and thou shalt eat the herb of the field. 19. In the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread, till thou return unto the ground; for out of it wast thou taken; for dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return. We have here the sentence passed upon Adam, which is prefaced with a recital of his crime, v. 17. Because thou hast hearkened to the voice of thy wife. He excused the fault, by laying it on his wife, She gave it me; but God does not admit the excuse; she could but tempt him, she could not force him; though it was her fault to persuade him to eat it, it was his fault to hearken to her. Thus men's frivolous pleas will, in the day of God's judgments, have more weight, but shall be remonstrated against, and made the grounds of their sentence, Out of thine own mouth will I judge thee. God put marks of his displeasure on Adam in three instances.

1. His habitation is, by this sentence, cursed. Cursed is the ground for thy sake; and the effect of that curse is, Thorns and thistles shall it bring forth unto thee. It is here intimated that his habitation should be changed; he should no longer dwell in a delightful habitation, paradise, but should be removed to common ground, and that, cursed. The ground, or earth, is here put for the whole visible creation, which, by the sin of man, is made subject to vanity, the several parts of it being not so serviceable to man's comfort and happiness, as they were designed to be when they were made, and would have been if he had not sinned. God gave the earth to the children of men, designing it to be a comfortable dwelling to them; but sin has altered the property of it, it is now cursed for man's sin; that is, it is a dishonourable habitation, it bespeaks man mean, that his foundation is in the dust; it is a dry and barren habitation, its spontaneous productions are now weeds and briars, something nauseous or noxious; what good fruits it produces, must be extorted from it by the ingenuity and industry of man. Fruitfulness was its blessing, for man's service, ch. 1. 11. 29; and now barrenness was its curse, for man's punishment. It is not what it was in the day it was created. Sin turned a fruitful land into barrenness; and man, being become as the wild ass's colt, has the wild ass's lot, Job 39. 6; the wilderness for his habitation, and the barren land his dwelling, Ps. 68. 6. Had not this curse been, in part, removed, for aught I know, the earth had been more fruitful of barren, and had never produced any thing but thorns and thistles. The ground, cursed, that is, doomed to destruction, at the end of time, when the earth, and all the works that are therein, shall be burnt up for the sin of man, the measure of whose iniquity will then be full, 2 P. 3. 7; 10. But observe a mixture of mercy in this sentence: 1. Adam is not hereby cut off; the serpent was, v. 14, but only the ground for his sake. God had blessed in him, even the holy seed; Destroy it not, for that blessing is in it, Isa. 65. 8. And he had blessings in store for him; therefore he is not directly and immediately cursed, but, as it were, at second hand. 2. He is yet above ground; the earth does not open, and swallow him up, as it did Adam, if it was: as he continues alive, notwithstanding his degeneracy, this primitive purity and rectitude, so the earth continues to be his habitation, notwithstanding its degeneracy from its primitive beauty and fruitfulness. 3. This curse upon the earth, which cut off all expectations of a happiness in things below, might direct and quicken him to look for bliss and satisfaction only in things above.

His employments and enjoyments are all im-bittered to him.

1. His business shall from henceforth become a toil to him, and he shall go on with it in the sweat of his face, v. 19. His business, before he sinned, was a constant pleasure to him: the garden was then dressed without any uneasy labour, and kept without any uneasy care; but now, his labour shall be a weariness, and shall waste his body; his care must be a toil, and shall afflict his mind. The curse upon the ground, which caused thorns and thistles, made his employment about it much more difficult and toilsome. If Adam had not sinned, he had not sweat. Observe here, (1.) That labour is our duty, which we must faithfully perform: we are bound to work, not as creatures only, but as criminals; it is part of our sentence, which alienness daringly defies. (2.) That meanness and weariness with labour are our just punishments, for we have sinned, and not complained of, since they are less than our iniquity deserves. Let not us, by inordinate care and labour, make our punishment heavier than God has made it; but rather, study to lighten our burthen, and wipe off our sweat, by observing Providence in all, and expecting rest shortly.

2. His food shall from henceforth become (in comparison with what it had been) unpleasant to him, (1.) The herbs of the field, which he might have eaten, must now eat the herb of the field, and must no longer be feasted with the delicacies of the garden of Eden: having by sin made himself like the beasts that perish, he is justly turned to be a fellow-commoner with them, and to eat grass as oxen, till he know that the heavens do rule. (2.) There is a change in the manner of his eating it; in sorrow, (v. 17.) and in the sweat of his face, (v. 19.) he must eat it. Adam could not but eat in sorrow all the days of his life, remembering the forbidden fruit he had eaten, and the guilt and shame he had contracted by it. Observe [1.] That human life is exposed to many miseries and calamities, which very much imbitter the poor remains of its pleasure and delights: some never eat with pleasure, (Job 21. 23.) through sickness or melancholy; all, even the best, have cause to eat with sorrow for sin; and 21. even the happiest of this world, have some allays to their joy: troops of diseases, disasters, and deaths, in various shapes, entered the world with sin, and still ravage it. [2.] That the righteous-ness of God is to be acknowledged in all the sad consequences of sin; Wherefore then should a living man complain? Yet, in this part of the sentence, there is also a mixture of mercy: he shall sweat, and work hard, and have his toil; but he shall have the more welcome when he returns to his earth, as to his bed; he shall grieve, but he shall not starve; he shall have sorrow, but in that sorrow he shall eat bread, which shall strengthen his heart under his sorrows. He is not sentenced to eat dust as the serpent, only to eat the herb of the field.

3. His life also is but short; considering how full of troubles his days are, it is in favour to him, that they are few; yet death being dreadful to nature, the close of it is himself. But there is included in this sentence. "Thou shalt return to the ground out of which thou wast taken; thy body, that part of thee which was taken out of the ground, shall return to it again: for dust thou art." That points to,

(1.) The first original of his body; it was made of the dust, nay, it was made dust, and was still so; so that there needed no more than to recall the grant of immortality, and to withdraw the power which was put into it to maintain it, so it would, of course, return to dust. Or,

(2.) To the present corruption and degeneracy of his mind; Dust thou art, that is, Thy precious soul is now lost and buried in the dust of the body, and the mire of the flesh; it was made spiritual and heavenly, but it is become carnal and earthy. His doom is therefore read; "To dust thou shalt return. Thy body shall be taken by thy soul, and become itself a lump of dust; and then it shall be lodged in the grave, the proper place for it, and mingle itself with the dust of the earth," our dust, Ps. 104. 29. Earth to earth, dust to dust. Observe here, [1.] That man is a mean frail creature, little as dust, the small dust of the balance; light as dust, altogether lighter than vanity; weak as dust, and of no consistency, his strength not the strength of stones; he that made us, considers that we are dust. Ps. 103. 14. Man is indeed the chief part of the dust of the world, Prov. 8. 26, but still he is dust. [2.] That he is a mortal dying creature, and hastening to the grave. Dust may be raised, for a time, into a little cloud, and may seem considerable while it is held up by the wind that raised it; but when the force of that is spent, it falls again, and returns to the earth out of which it was raised; such a thing is man; a great man is but a great mass of dust, and must return to his earth. [3.] That sin brought death into the world; if Adam had not sinned, he had not died, Rom. 5. 12. God intrusted Adam with a spark of immortality, which he, by a patient continuance in well-doing, might have blown up into an everlasting flame; but he foolishly blew it out by wilful sin; and now death is the wages of sin, and sin the sting of death.

Very good is this sentence upon our first parents, which we are all so nearly concerned in, and feel from, to this day, till we have considered two things.

First, How fitly the sad consequences of sin upon the soul of Adam and his sensual race, were represented and figured out by this sentence, and perhaps were more intended in it than we are aware of. Though that misery only involved itself a lump and collection of dust, and a pattern of spiritual miseries, the curse that entered into the soul. 1. The pains of a woman in travail represent the terrors and pangs of a guilty conscience, awakened to a sense of sin; from the conception of lust, these sorrows are greatly multiplied, and, sooner or later, will come upon the sinner like pain upon a woman in travail, which cannot be avoided. 2. The state of slavery and weariness which is required to present that loss of spiritual liberty and freedom of will, which is the effect of sin. The dominion of sin in the soul is compared to that of a husband, Rom. 7. 1. 5; the sinner's desire is towards it, for he is fond of his slavery, and it rules over him. 3. The curse of barrenness which was brought upon the earth, and its produce of briers and thorns, are a fit representation of the barrenness of a corrupt and sinful soul in that which is good, and its fruitfulness in evil. It is all grown over with thorns, and nettles cover the face of it; and therefore it is nigh unto cursing, Heb. 6. 8. 4. The toil and sweat bespeak the difficulty which, through the infirmity of the flesh, man labours under, in the service of God, and the work of religion; so hard is it now become to enter into the kingdom of heaven.

5. The embittering of his food to him bespeaks the soul's want of the comfort of God's favour, which is life, and the bread of life. 6. The soul, like the body, returns to the dust of this world, its tendency is that way; it has an earthy taint, John 3. 31. Secondly, How admirably the satisfaction our Lord Jesus made by his death and sufferings, answered the power of this first parents! 1. Did travelling pains come in with sin? We read of the travail of Christ's soul, Isa. 53. 11, and the pains of death he was held by, are called First, Acts, 2. 24, the pains of a woman in travail. 2. Did subjection come in with sin? Christ was made under the law, Gal. 4. 4. 3. Did the curse come in with sin? Christ was made a curse for us, died a cursed death, Gal. 3. 13. Did thorns come in with sin? He is wounded for us. He was made sin for us. 5. Did sweat come in with sin? He sweat for us, as it had been great drops of blood. 6. Did sorrow come in with sin? He was a man of sorrows, his soul was, in his agony, exceeding sorrowful. 7. Did death come in with sin? He became obedient unto death. Thus is the platter as wide as the wound; blessed be God for Jesus Christ!

20. And Adam called his wife's name Eve; because she was the mother of all living.

God having named the man, and called him Adam, which signifies red earth; Adam, in further token of domination, named the woman, and called her Eve, that is, life. Adam bears the name of the dying body, Eve of the living soul. The reason of the name is here given, some think, by Moses the historian, others, by Adam himself, because she was, that is, to be, the mother of all living. He had before called her Adah, women, as a wife: here he calls her Ewah, life, as a mother. Now, 1. If this was done by divine direction, it was an instance of God's favour, and, like the new naming of Abraham and Sarah, it was a seal of the covenant, and an assurance to them, that, notwithstanding their sin and his displeasure against them for it, he had not reversed that blessing wherewith he had blessed them, Be fruitful and multiply; it was likewise a confirmation of the promise now made; with this the Seed of the woman, of this woman, should break the serpent's head. 2. If Adam did it of himself, it was an instance of his faith in the word of God: doubtless it was not done, as some have suspected, in contempt or defiance of the curse, but rather in a humble confidence and dependence upon the blessing; (1.) The blessing of a reprove, admiring the virtues of the woman, and yet that woman who see the Seed to be the parents of all living, and that it did not immediately shut up those fountains of the human life and nature, because they could send forth no other than polluted, poisoned, streams; (2.) The blessing of a Redeemer, the promised Seed, to whom Adam had an eye, in calling his wife Eve, life; for he should be the life of all the living, and in him all the families of the earth should be blessed, in hope of which he thus triumphs.

21. Unto Adam also, and to his wife, did the Lord God make coats of skins, and clothed them.

We have here a further instance of God's care concerning our first parents, notwithstanding the
And the Lord God said, Behold, the man is become as one of us, to know good and evil. A goodly godd he makes! Does he not? See what he has got, what preferences, what advantages, by eating forbidden fruit!

This was said, to awaken and humble them, and to bring them to a sense of their sin and folly, and to repentance for it, that seeing themselves thus wretchedly deceived by following the Devil's counsel, they might henceforth pursue the happiness of which our Lord should say, in the way he should provide it, that God thus fills their faces with shame, that they may seek his name, Ps. 83. 16. He puts them to this confusion, in order to their conversion. True penitents will thus upbraid themselves, "What fruit have I now by sin? Rom. 6. 21. Have I gained what I foolishly promised myself in a sinful way? No, no, it never proved what it pretended to, but the contrary.

I. They were justly discarded, and shut out of paradise, which was a part of the sentence implied in that, Thou shalt eat the herb of the field. Here we have,

1. The reason God gave why he shut him out of paradise; not only because he had put forth his hand, and taken of the tree of knowledge, which was his sin; but lest he should again put forth his hand, and take also of the tree of life, and eat thereof, and therefore be as God, by the law, and should dare to eat of that tree, and so profane a divine sacrament, and defy a divine sentence, and yet flatter himself with a conceit that thereby he should live for ever. Observe,

(1.) There is a foolish prominence in those that have rendered themselves unworthy of the substance of Christian privileges, to catch at the signs and shadows of them. Many that like not the terms of the covenant, yet for their reputation's sake, are fond of the seal of it. (2.) It is not only justice, but kindness, to such, to be denied them; for by usurping that which they have no title to, the affront God, and make their sin the more heinous; and by building their hopes upon a wrong foundation, they render their conversion the more difficult, and their ruin the more deplorable.

2. The method God took, in giving him this bill of divorce, and expelling him from excluding him from this garden of pleasure. He turned him out, and kept him out.

(1.) He turned him out, from the garden to the common. This is twice mentioned, v. 23, he sent him forth, and then, v. 24, he drove him out. God bade him go out; told him that that was no place for him, he should no longer occupy and enjoy that garden; but he liked the place too well to be willing to part with it, and therefore God drove him out, whether he would or no. This signified the exclusion of him, and all his guilty race, from that communion with God, which was the bliss and glory of paradise; the token of God's favour to him, and his delight in the sons of men, which he had in his innocent estate, were now suspended; the communications of his grace were withheld, and Adam himself was chased, as Simon when the Spirit of the Lord was departed from him; his acquaintance with God was lessened and lost, and that correspondence which had been settled between man and his Maker, was interrupted and broken off. He was driven out, as one unworthy of this honour, and incapable of this service. Thus he and all mankind, by the fall, for feitit and lost communion with God. But whither did he send him, when he turned him out of Eden? He might justly have chased him out of the world, Job 18. 18, but he only chased him out of the garden. He might justly have cast him down to hell, as the angels that sinned were, when they were shut out from the heavenly para d'Ex, 2 Pet. 2, 4. But man was only sent to till the ground, out of which he was taken. He was sent to a place of toil, not to a place of torment. He was sent to the ground, not to the grave; to the work-house, not to the dungeon, not to the prison-house; to not to the chariot of death. His tillage of the ground would be recompensed by his eating of its fruits; and his converse with the earth whence he was taken, was impreovable to good purposes, to keep him humble, and to remind him of his latter end. Observe then, that thou and thine first parents were excluded from the privileges of their state of innocence, yet they were not abandonned to despair; God's thoughts of love designing the second state of probation upon a new term.

2. He kept him out, and forbade him all hopes of a re-entry; for he placed at the east of the garden of Eden a detachment of cherubims. God's hosts, armed with a dreadful and irresistible power, represented by flaming swords which turned every way, on that side the garden which lay next to the place whither Adam was sent, to keep the way that led to the tree of life, so that he could not either steal or force his way into the garden. No one who can make a pass against an angel on his guard, or gain a pass made good by such a force? Now this intimated to Adam, [1.] That God was displeased with him; though he had mercy in store for him, yet, at present, he was angry with him, was turned to be his enemy, and fought against him, for here was a sword drawn, Num. 22, 23, and he was to him a consuming fire, for it was a flaming sword. [2.] That the angels were at war with him, and no person with the heavenly hosts, while he was in rebellion against their Lord and ours. [3.] That the way to the tree of life was shut up, namely, that way which, at first, he was put into, the way of spotless innocence. It is not said that the cherubims were set to keep him and his for ever from the tree of life: (thanks be to God, there is a paradise set before us, and a tree of life in the midst of it, which we rejoice in the hopes of) but they were set to keep that way to the tree of life, which hitherto they had been in, that is, it was henceforward in vain for him and his to expect righteousness, life, and happiness, by virtue of the first covenant, for it was irreparably broken, and could never be pleaded, nor any benefit taken by it. The command of that covenant being broken, the curse of it is in full force; it leaves no room for repentance, but we are all under it, if we are not preserved by the new covenant. Rejoice in this to Adam, not to drive him to despair, but to do him a service by quickening him to look for life and happiness in the promised Seed, by whom the flaming sword is removed. God and his angels are reconciled to him, and a new and living way into the holiest is consecrated and laid open for us.

CHAP. IV.

1. In this chapter, we have both the world and the church in a family, in a little family, in Adam's family; and a specimen given of the character and state of both of after-days, and the church of Christ. As mankind were represented in Adam, so that great distinction of mankind into saints and sinners, godly and wicked, the children of God and the children of the wicked one, was an especial representation in Cain and Abel, and an early instance is given of the ennui which was lately put between the seed of the woman and the seed of the serpent. We have here, I. The birth, names, and calling of Abel. II. The death of Abel. III. The record of this to Adam, not to drive him to despair, but to do him a service by quickening him to look for life and happiness in the promised Seed, by whom the flaming sword is removed. God and his angels are reconciled to him, and a new and living way into the holiest is consecrated and laid open for us.

1. AND Adam knew Eve his wife; and she conceived, and bare Cain, and said, I have gotten a man from the Lord. 2. And she again bare his brother Abel: and Abel was a keeper of sheep, but Cain was a tiller of the ground.

Adam and Eve had many sons and daughters, ch. 5. 4. But Cain and Abel seem to have been the two eldest; and some think they were twins, and, as Esau and Jacob, the elder hated, and the younger loved. Though God had cast them out of paradise, he did not write them childless, but to show that he had other blessings in store for them, he preserved to them the benefit of that first blessing of increase. Though they were sinners, nay, though they felt the humiliation and sore of penitents, they did not write themselves comfortless, having the promise of a Saviour to support themselves with. We have here,

1. The names of their two sons. 1. Cain signifies possession; for Eve, when she bare him, said, with joy and thankfulness, and great expectation, I have gotten a man from the Lord. Observe, Children are God's gifts, and he must be acknowledged in the building up of our family. It doubles and sanctifies our comfort in them, when we see them coming to us from the hand of God, who will not forsake the works and gifts of his own hand. Though Eve bare him with the sorrows that were the consequence of sin, yet she did not lose the sense of the mercy in her pains. Comforts, though allayed, are more than we deserve; and therefore our complaints must not drown our thanksgivings. Man hopes that Eve had a covert that this son was the promised Seed, and that therefore she thus triumphed in him; it may indeed be read, I have gotten a man, the Lord; God-man. If so, she was wretchedly mistaken, as Samuel, when he said, Surely the Lord's anointed is before me, 1 Sam. 16. 6. When children are born, who can foresee what they will prove? He that was thought to be a man, the Lord, or, at least, a man from the Lord, and in his semblance; and in his service and by his instrumentality, is an enemy to the Lord. The less we expect from creatures, the more tolerable will disappointments be.

2. Abel signifies vanity; when she thought she had obtained the promised Seed in Cain, she was so taken up with that possession, that another son was as vanity to her. To those who have an interest in Christ, and make him their all, other things are as nothing at all. It intimates likewise, that the longer we live in this world, the more we may see of the vanity of it; what, at first, we are fond of, as a possession, afterward we see cause to be dead to, as a trifle. The name given to this son is put upon the whole race, Ps. 39. 5. Every man is at his best estate, Abel, vanity. Let us labour to see both ourselves and others so. Childhood and youth are vanity.

II. The employments of Cain and Abel. Observe, 1. They both had a calling. Though they were heirs apparent to the world, their birth noble, and possessions large; yet they were not brought up in idleness. God gave their father a calling, even in innocence, and he gave them one. Note, It is the will of God that we should every one of us have something to do in this world. Parents ought to bring up their children to business: Give them a Bible, and a calling; (said good Mr. Dodd) and God be with them. 2. Their employments were differ ent, that they might trade and exchange with one another, as there was occasion. The members of the bord, politicke have need one of another; and mutual love is helped by mutual commerce. 3. Their employments belonged to the husbandman's calling, their father's profession; a needful calling, for the king himself is served of the field, but a laborious calling, which required constant care and attendance: it is now looked upon as a mean calling, the floor of the land serve for vine-dressers, and husbandmen, 52. 16. But the calling was far from being a dishonour to them; rather, they might have been an honour to it. 4. It should seem, by the order of the story, that Abel, though the younger brother, yet entered first into his calling, and, probably, his example drew in Cain. 5. Abel chose that employment which most befriended contemplation and devotion, for, to these a pastoral life has been looked upon as being peculiarly favourable. Moses and David kept sheep, and in their solitudes conversed with God. Note, That calling and that condition of life are best for us, and to be chosen by us, which are best for our souls; that which least exposes us to sin, and gives us most opportunity of serving and enjoying God.

3. And in process of time it came to pass, that Cain brought of the fruit of the ground an offering unto the Lord. 4. And Abel, he also brought of the firstlings of his flock and of the fat thereof. And the Lord had respect unto Abel and to his offering: 5. But unto Cain and to his offering he had not respect. And Cain was very wroth, and his countenance fell.

Here is,

1. The devotion of Cain and Abel. In process of time, when they had made some improvement in their respective callings, Heb. At the end of days, either at the end of the year, when they kept their feasts of in-gathering, or, perhaps, an annual fast in remembrance of the fall; or, at the end of the days of the week, the seventh day, which was the sabbath— at some set time, Cain and Abel brought to Adam, the head of the family, each of them an offering to the Lord; for the service of which he had reason to think there was a divine appointment given to Adam, as a token of God's favour to him, and his thoughts of love toward him and his, notwithstanding their apostasy. God would thus try Adam's faith in the promise, and his obedience to the remedial law; he would thus settle a correspondence again between heaven and earth, and give shadows of good things to come. Observe here 1. That the religious worship of God is no novel invention, but an ancient institution. It is that which was from the beginning, (1 John 1. 1.) it is the good old way, Jer. 6. 16. The city of our God is indeed that joyous city whose antiquity is of ancient days, Isa. 23. 7. Truth got the start of error, and piety of profaneness. 2. That it is a good thing for children to be well-taught when they are young, and trained up betimes in religious services, that when they become to be capable of acting for themselves, they may, of their own accord, bring an offering to God. In this nurture of the Lord parents must bring up their children, Eph. 6. 4. ch. 18. 19. 3. That we should every one of us honour God with what we have, according as he has prospered us. According as their employments and possessions were, so they brought their offering. See 1 Cor. 16. 1. 2. Our merchandise and our hire, whatever it is, must be holiness to the Lord, Isa. 23. 18. He must have his dute of it in works of piety and charity, the support of religion and the relief of the poor; thus we must now bring our offering with an upright heart; and with such sacrifices God is well-pleased. 4. That hypocrites and evil doers may be found going as far as the best of God's people in the external services of religion. Cain brought an offering with Abel; nay, Cain's offering is mentioned first, as if he were the more forward of the two. A hypocrite may, possibly, hear as many sermons, say as many prayers, and give as much alms, as a good christian; and yet, in some short of acceptance with God. The Pharisee and Publican went to the temple to pray, Luke 18. 10.

II. The different success of their devotions. That which is to be aimed at in all acts of religion, is, God's acceptance; we speak well if we attain that, but in vain do we worship if we miss of that, 2 Cor. 3. 9. Perhaps to a stand-by, the sacrifices of Cain and Abel would have seemed both alike good. Adam accepted them both, but God did not, who sees not as man sees. God had respect to Abel and to his offering, and showed his acceptance of it, probably, by fire from heaven; but to Cain and to his offering he had not respect. We are sure there was a good reason for this difference; the Governor of the world, though an absolute sovereign, does not act arbitrarily in dispensing his smiles and frowns. 1. There was a difference in the characters of the persons offering. Cain was a wicked man, led a bad life, under the reigning power of the world and the flesh; and there was his sacrifice, and of it to the Lord, Prov. 15. 8, a vain oblation, Isa. 1. 13. God had no respect to Cain himself, and therefore no respect to his offering, as the manner of the expression intimates. But Abel was a righteous man, he is called righteous Abel, Matth. 23. 35, his heart was upright, and his life was pious; he was one of those whom God's countenance, beholds, Ps. 11. 7. and whose prayer is therefore his delight, Prov. 15. 8. God has no respect to the vain offerings of the ungodly; and God has no respect to them who offer themselves for a holie offering, as they offer to God, before his offering as a holy offering. The tree must be good, else the fruit cannot be pleasing to the heart-searching God. 2. There was a difference in the offerings they brought. It is expressly said, Heb. 11. 4, Abel's was a more excellent sacrifice than Cain's: either, (1.) In the nature of it. Cain's was only a sacrifice of acknowledgement offered to the Creator; the meat-offering was all that he offered, and no more, and, for aught I know, might have been offered in innocency: but Abel brought a sacrifice of atonement, the blood whereof was shed in order to remission; thereby owning himself a sinner, deprecating God's wrath, and imploring his favour in a Mediator; or, (2.) In the qualities of the offering. Cain brought of the fruit of the ground, any thing that came next to hand, what he had not occasion for himself, or what was not marketable; but Abel was curious in the choice of his offering; not the lame, or the lean, or the refuse, but the firstlings of the flock, the best he had, and the fat thereof, the best of those best. Hence the Hebrew doctors give it for a general rule, that every thing that is for the name of the good God, must be the goodliest and best. It is fit that he who is the first and best should have the first and best of our time, strength, and senses.

3. The great difference was this, that Abel offered in faith, and Cain did not. There was a difference in the principle upon which they went. Abel offered with an eye to God's will as his rule, and God's glory as his end, and in dependence upon the promise of a Redeemer: but Cain did what he did, only for company's sake, or to save his credit, not in faith, and so it turned into sin to him. Abel was a believing believer, like the Publican that went away justified: Cain was unshamed; his confidence was within himself; he was like the Pharisee who glorified himself, but was not so much as justified before God.

III. Cain's displeasure at the difference God made between his sacrifice and Abel's. Cain was very wroth, which presently appeared in his very looks, for his countenance fell; which bespeaks, not so much his grief and discontent, as his malice and rage. His sullen churlish countenance, and a down-look, betrayed his passionate resentments: he carried ill nature in his face, and the show of his countenance witnessed against him. This anger bespeaks, 1. His enmity to God, and the indignation he had conceived against him for making such a difference between his offering and his brother's. He should have been angry at himself for his own infidelity and hypocrisy, by which he had forfeited God's acceptance; and his countenance should have fallen in repentance and holy shame, as the Publican's, who would not lift up so much as their eyes to heaven. Luke 18. 13.

But instead of that, he flies out against God, as if he were partial and unfair in distributing his smiles and frowns, and as if he had done him a deal of wrong. Note, It is a certain sign of an unhumbled heart, to quarrel with those rebukes which we have, by our own sin, brought upon ourselves. The foolishness of man perverteth his way, and then, to make bad worse, his heart fretteth against the Lord, Prov. 19. 3. 2. His envy of his brother was so rooted in his heart, to be publicly owned. Though his brother had no thought of having any slur put upon him, nor did now insult over him to provoke him, yet he conceived a hatred of him as an enemy, or, which is equivalent, a rival. Note, (1.) It is common for those who have rendered themselves unworthy of God's favour by their presumptuous sins, to have indignation against those who are dignified and distinguished by it. The Pharisees walked in this way of Cain, when they neither entered into the kingdom of God themselves, nor suffered those that were entering, to go in, Luke 11. 55. Their eye is evil, because their master's eye, and the eye of their fellow-servants, are good. (2.) Envy is a sin that commonly carries with it, both its own discovery in the paleness of the looks, and its own punishment in the t rottenness of the bones.

6. And the Lord said unto Cain, Why art thou wroth? And why is thy countenance fallen? 7. If thou dost well, shalt thou not be accepted? And if thou dost not well, sin lieth at the door. And unto thee shall be his desire, and thou shalt rule over him.

God is here reasoning with Cain, to convince him of the sin and folly of his anger and discontent, and to bring him into a good temper again, that further mischief might be prevented. It is an instance of God's patience and condescending goodness, that he would deal thus tenderly with so bad a man, in so bad an affair. He is not willing that any should perish, but that all should come to repentance. Thus the fulness of the provoking aggravated the case with the elder son, Luke 15. 28, &c. And God with those Israelites, who said, The way of the Lord is not equal, Ezek. 18. 25. God puts Cain himself upon inquiring into the cause of his discontent, and considering whether it were indeed a just cause, Why is thy countenance fallen? Observe,

I. That God takes notice of all our sinful passions and discontents. There is not an angry look, an envious look, or a fretful look, that escapes his observing eye.

II. That most of our sinful heats and disquietudes would soon vanish before a strict and impartial inquiry into the cause of them. "Why am I wroth? Is there a real cause, a just cause, a proportionable cause for it? Why am I so soon angry? Why so very angry, and so implacable?" To reduce Cain to his right mind again, it is here made evident to him, 1. That he had no reason to be angry at God, for that he had preceded according to the settled and invariable rules of government, suited to a state of sin and misery, and had been bountifully blessed and the curse; and then renders to them according to their works, and differencethem according as they differencethemselves—so shall thorn docome. The rules are just, and therefore his ways, according to these rules, must needs be equal, and he will be justified when he speaks.

(1.) God sets before Cain life and a blessing, "If thou dost well, shalt thou not be accepted? No doubt, thou shalt, say, then knewest thou not, either, [1.] "If thou hast done well, as thy brother did, thou shouldest have been accepted, as he was," God is no respecter of persons, hates nothing that he has made, denies his favour to none but those who have forfeited it, and is an enemy to none but those who, by sin, have made him their enemy: so that if we come short of acceptance with him, we must thank ourselves, the fault is wholly our own; if we have not been suffered to enjoy his favour, it is our own fault. This will justify God in the destruction of sinners, and will aggravate their ruin; there is not a damned sinner in hell, but, if he had done well, as he might have done, had been a glorified saint in heaven. Every month will shortly be stopped with this. Or, [2.] If thou dost do well, if thou repent of thy sin, reform thy heart and life, and bring thy sacrifice of a better manner, if then not only do that which is good, but do it well, then shalt thou be accepted, thy shall be pardoned, thy comfort and honour restored, and all shall be well." See here the effect of a Mediator's intercessions between God and man; we do not stand upon the footing of the first covenant, which left no room for repentance, but God is come upon new terms with us. Though we have offended, if we repent and return, we shall find mercy. See how early the gospel was preached, and the benefit of it here offered even to one of the chief of sinners.

(2.) He sets before him death and a curse. "But if not well," that is, "Seeing thou didst not do well, not offer in faith, and in a right manner; sin lieth at the door," that is, "sin was imputed to thee, and thou wast frowned upon and rejected as a sinner. So high a charge had not been laid at thy door, if thou hadst not brought it upon thyself, by not doing well." Or, as it is commonly taken, "If thou dost not do well, if thou persist in this wrath, and, instead of humbling thyself before God, harden thyself against him; sin lieth at the door," that is, [1.] Further sin. "Now that anger is in thy heart, murder is at the door." The way of sin is downhill, and men go from bad to worse. They who do not sacrifice well, but are careless and remiss in their devotion to God, expose themselves to the most temptation, and perhaps the most scandalous sin lies at the door. They who do not keep God's ordinances, are in danger of committing all abominations, Lev. 18. 30. Or, [2.] The punishment of sin. So near akin are sin and punishment, that the same word in Hebrew signifies both. If sin be harboured in the house, the curse waits at the door, like a bailiff, ready to arrest the sinner when ever he looks out. It lies as if it sleeps, but it lies at the door so, that if it will sleep, it will startle and appear; it will appear that the damnation nimbly lies. Sin will find thee out, Numb. 32. 23. Yet some choose to understand this also as an intimation of mercy. "If thou dost not well, sin, that is, the sin-offering, lies at the door, and thou mayest take the benefit of it.” The same word signifies sin, and a sacrifice for sin. “Though thou hast not done well, yet do not despise; the remedy is at hand; the proposition is in a titer to seek; lay hold on it, and the sincerity of the holy things shall be forgiven thee.” Christ, the great sin-offering, is said to stand at the door, Rev. 3. 20. And those well deserve to perish in their sins that will not go to the door in the sin-offering. All this considered, Cain had no reason to be angry at God, but at himself only.

2. He shows him that he had no reason to be angry at his brother; “Unto thee shall be his desire, he shall continue his respect to thee as an elder brother, and thou, as the first-born, shalt rule over him as much as ever.” God’s acceptance of Abel’s offering did not transfer the birthright to him, (which Cain also possessed,) but put Abel up in the reputation of dignity and excellency of power which are said to belong to it, ch. 49. 3. God did not so intend it; Abel did not so interpret it; there was no danger of its being improved to Cain’s prejudice; why then should he be so much exasperated? Observe here, (1.) That the difference which God’s grace makes, does not alter the distinctions which God’s providence makes, but preserves them, and enriches them, up to such an extent that exalting believing servants must be obedient to unbelieving masters. Dominion is not founded in grace, nor will religion warrant disloyalty or disrespect in any relation. (2.) That the jealousies which civil powers have sometimes conceived of the true worshipers of God as dangerous to their government, enemies to Caesar, and hurtful to kings and provinces, (on which suspicion persecutors have grounded their rage against them,) are very unjust and unreasonable. Whatever may be the case with some who call themselves christians, it is certain that christians indeed are the best subjects, and the quiet in the land; their desire is toward their governors, and they shall rule over them.

8. And Cain talked with Abel his brother: and it came to pass, when they were in the field, that Cain rose up against Abel his brother, and slew him.

We have here the progress of Cain’s anger, and the issue of it in Abel’s murder; which may be considered two ways.

1. As Cain’s sin; and a scarlet, crimson sin it was, a sin of the first magnitude, a sin against the light and law of nature, and which the consciences even of bad men have startled at. See in it, 1. The sin and effects of sin’s entrance into the world, and into the hearts of men. See what a root of bitterness the corrupt nature is, which bears this gall and wormwood. Adam’s eating forbidden fruit seemed but a little sin, but it opened the door to the greatest. 2. A fruit of the enmity which is in the seed of the serpent against the seed of the woman. As Abel leads the way in the noble army of martyrs, Matth. 23. 35, so Cain stands in the front of the ignoble army of persecutors, Jude 11. So early did he that was after the flesh, persecute him that was after the spirit; and so it is now, more or less, Gal. 4. 29, and soit be, till the war shall end in eternal salvation of all the saints, and the eternal perdition of all that hate them. 3. See also what comes of envy, hatred, malice, and all uncharitableness; if they be indulged and not stopped in the soul, they are danger in involving men in the horrid guilt of murder itself. Rash anger is heart-murder, Matth. 5. 21, 22. Much more is malice so; he that hates his brother, is already a murderer before God: and if God leave hime to himself, he wants nothing but an opportunity of being a murderer before the world.

Many were the aggravations of Cain’s sin. (1.) It was his brother, his own brother, that he murdered; his own sister’s son, Ps. 50. 20, whom he ought to have loved; his younger brother, whom he ought to have protected. (2.) He was a good brother; one who had never done him any wrong, nor given him the least provocation, in word or deed, but one whose desire had always been to destroy, in instances, dishonourable and respectful to him. (3.) He had fair warning given him, before, of this; God himself had told him what would come of it, yet he persisted in his barbarous design. (4.) It should seem that he covered it with a show of friendship and kindness. He talked with Abel his brother, freely and familiarly, lest he should suspect danger, and keep out of his reach. Thus Joab kissed Abner, and then killed him. According to the light of grace, he ought not to have heard; for in killing his brother, he directly struck at God himself; for God accepting of Abel was the provocation pretended; and for that very reason he hated Abel, because God loved him. (7.) The murder of Abel was the more inhuman, because there were now so few men in the world to replenish it. The life of a man is precious at any time; but it was in a special manner precious now, and could ill be spared. (2. As Abel’s suffering. Death reigns ever since Adam sinned, but we read not of any taken captive by him till now; and now, 1. The first that dies, is a saint, one that was accepted and beloved of God; to show that though the promised Seed was so far to destroy him that had the power of death, as to save believers from its sting, yet that still they should be exposed to its stroke. The first that went to the grave went to heaven; God would secure to himself the first fruits, the first-born to the dead body that first opened the womb into another world. Let this take off the terror of death, that it was betimes the lot of God’s chosen, which alters the property of it. Nay, 2. The first that dies, is a martyr, and dies for his religion; and of such it may more truly be said than of soldiers, that they die in the field of honour. Abel’s death has not only no curse in it, but it has a crown in it; so admirably well is the property of death altered, that it is not only to become innocent and inoffensive to those that die in Christ, but honourable and glorious to those that die for him. Let us not think it strange concerning the fiery trial, nor shrink if we be called to resist unto blood; for we know there is a crown of life for all that are faithful unto death.

9. And the Lord said unto Cain, Where is Abel thy brother? And he said, I know him. It may be proper to state, for the information of some readers, that the Jewish interpreters of the Old Testament, supposed to be the work of seventy-two Jews who are usually called in a round number, the Seventy, and who made this version, at the desire of Proteus, Philadelphia: about 900 years before Christ,—Christ and his Apostles usually quote from this version. Ed.
not: Am I my brother's keeper? 10. And he said, What hast thou done? The voice of thy brother's blood crieth unto me from the ground. 11. And now art thou cursed from the earth, which hath opened her mouth to receive thy brother's blood from thy hand. 12. When thou tillest the ground, it shall not henceforth yield unto thee his strength; a fugitive and a vagabond shalt thou be in the earth.

We have here a full account of the trial and condemnation of the first murderer; civil courts of judicature not being yet erected for this purpose, as they were afterward, ch. 9. 6. God himself sits Judge; for he is the God to whom vengeance belongs, and who will be sure to make inquisition for blood, especially the blood of saints.

Observe, I. The arraignment of Cain; The Lord said unto Cain Where is Abel thy brother? Some think Cain was thus examined, the next sabbath after the murder was committed, when the sons of God came, as usual, to present themselves before the Lord, in a religious assembly, and Abel was missing, whose place did not use to be empty; for the God of heaven takes notice who is present at, and who is absent from, public ordinances. Cain is asked, not only because there was just cause to suspect him, but because a notice against Abel, and having been last with him, but because God knew him to be guilty; yet he asks him, that he might draw from him a confession of the crime; for those who would be justified before God, must accuse themselves; and the penitent will do so.

II. Cain's plea; he pleads not guilty, and adds rebellion to his sin. For, 1. He endeavours to cover his crime with a deliberate murder, with a deliberate lie: I know not. He knew well enough what was become of Abel, and yet had the impudence to deny it. Thus, in Cain, the Devil was both a murderer, and a liar, from the beginning. See how sinners' minds are blinded, and their hearts hardened by the deceitfulness of sin: those are strangely blind, that think it possible to conceal their sins from a God that sees all; and those are strangely hard, that think it their own business to be able to conceal them from a God who pardons those only who confess them. He imputedly charges his Judge with folly and injustice, in putting this question to him. Am I my brother's keeper? He should have humbled himself, and have said, Am not I my brother's murderer? But he flies in the face of God himself, as if he had asked him an impertinent question, which he was no way obliged to give an answer to. Am I my brother's keeper? Surely he is old enough to take care of himself, nor did I ever take the least care for him. Some think he reflects on God and his providence, as if he had said, Art thou not his keeper? If he be missing, on thee be the blame, and not on me, who never undertook to keep him. Note, a charitable concern for our brethren, as their keepers, is a great duty, which is strictly required of us, but is generally neglected by us. They who are un concerned about the welfare of their poor, have none to blame but themselves. When they have opportunity, to prevent their hurt in their bodies, goods, or good name, especially in their souls, do, in effect, speak Cain's language. See Lev. 19. 17. Phil. 2. 4.

III. The conviction of Cain, v. 10. God gave no direct answer to his question, but rejected his plea as false and frivolous; "What hast thou done? Thou makest a light matter of it; but hast thou considered what an evil thing it is; how deep the stain, how heavy the burthen, of this guilt is? Thou thinkest to conceal it; but it is to no purpose, the evidence against thee is clear and incontestable, the world will have thee a murderer." He speaks as if the blood itself were both witness and accuser; because God's own knowledge testified against him, and God's own justice demanded satisfaction. Observe here, 1. Murder is a crying sin, none more so. Blood calls for blood, the blood of the murderer for the blood of the murderer; it cries, in the dying words of Zech. 2. 24. And 24. The Lord look upon it, and require it; or in those of the scales under the law, Rev. 6. 10. How long, Lord, holy and true? The patient sufferers cried for pardon, Father, forgive them; but their blood cries for vengeance. Through they hold their peace, their blood has a loud and constant cry, which the ear of the righteous God is always open to. 2. The blood is said to cry from the ground, the earth, which is said, v. 11, to open her mouth to receive his brother's blood from his hand. The earth did, as it were, blush to see her own face stained with such blood and, therefore, opened her mouth to hide that which she could not hinder. When the heaven revealed his iniquity, the earth also rose up against him, Job 20. 27. and groaned for being thus made subject to vanity, Rom. 8. 20. 22. Cain, it is likely, buried the blood and the body, to conceal his crime; but murder will out. He did not bury them so deep but the cry of them reached heaven, 3. In the original. The word bespeaks the desire of Cain to hide not only his blood, but the blood of all those that might have descended from him. Or, the blood of all the seed of the woman, who should, in like manner, seal the truth with their blood: Christ puts all on one score, Matt. 23. 35. Or, because account was kept of every drop of blood shed. How well is it for us, that the blood of Christ speaks better things than that of Abel! Heb. 12. 24. Abel's blood cried for vengeance, Christ's blood makes atonement.

IV. The sentence passed upon Cain, And now art thou cursed from the earth, v. 11. Observe here, 1. He is cursed, separated to all evil, laid under the wrath of God, as it is revealed from heaven against all ungodliness and unrighteousness of men, Rom. 1. 18. Who knows the extent and weight of a divine curse, how far it reaches, how deep it pierces? God's pronouncing a man cursed makes him under the curse; his sentence is executed. The curse for Adam's disobedience terminated on the ground, Cursed is the ground for thy sake; but that for Cain's rebellion fell immediately upon himself, Thou art cursed; for God had mercy in store for Adam, but none for Cain. We have all deserved this curse, and it is only in Christ that believers are saved from it, and inherit the blessing. Gal. 3. 10, 15. 2. He is cursed from the earth. Thence the cry came up to God, thence the curse came upon Cain. God could have taken vengeance by an immediate stroke from heaven, by the sword of an angel, or by a thunderbolt; but he chose to make the earth the avenger of blood; to continue him upon the earth, and not immediately to cut him off, and yet to make even that his curse. The earth is always near us, we cannot fly from it; so that if that be the execution of divine wrath, it is unavoidable, it is sin, that is, the punishment of sin, lying at the door. Cain found his punishment there, where he chose his portion, and set his heart.

Two things we expect from the earth; and by this curse both are denied to Cain, and taken from him, sustenance and settlement. (1.) Sustenance out of the earth is here withheld from him. It is a curse upon him in his enjoyments, and particularly in his falling; When thou tillest the ground, it shall not henceforth yield thee his strength. Note, Every creature is to us what God makes it; a comfort or a cross; a blessing or a curse. If the earth yield not her strength to us, we must therein acknowledge God's righteousness; for we have not yielded our strength to him. The ground was cursed before, of Adam, but it was now doubly sentenced to Cain. That part of it which fell to his share, and which he had the occupation of, was made unfruitful and uncomfortable to him by the blood of Abel. Note, The wickedness of the wicked brings a curse upon all they do, and all they have, Deut. 28. 15, 16, and that curse imbibers all they have, and disappoints them in all they do. (2.) Settlement on the earth, he laboured. A fugitive and a vagabond shalt thou be in the earth. By this he was condemned. [1] To perpetual disgrace and reproach among men. It should be ever looked upon as a scandalous thing to harbour him, converse with him, or show him any countenance. And justly was a man that had divested himself of all humanity, abolished and abandoned by all mankind, and made infamous. [2] To perpetual drought and horror in his own mind. His own guilty conscience should haunt him wherever he went, and make him Major-missabib, a terror round about. What rest can those find, what settlement, that carry their own disturbance with them in their bosoms wherever they go? they must needs be fugitives, that are thus tossed. There is not a more restless fugitive upon earth, than he that is continually pursued by his own guilt, nor a viler vagabond than he that is at the mercy of his own conscience. This was the sentence passed upon Cain; and even in this there was mercy mixed, insomuch, as he was not immediately cut off, but had space given him to repent; for God is long-suffering to us-ward, not willing that any should perish.

13. And Cain said unto the Lord, My punishment is greater than I can bear. 14. Behold, thou hast driven me out this day from the face of the earth; and from thy face shall I be hid; and I shall be a fugitive and a vagabond in the earth; and it shall come to pass, that every one that findeth me, shall slay me. 15. And the Lord said unto him, Therefore whosoever slayeth Cain, vengeance shall be taken upon him seven-fold. And the Lord set a mark upon Cain, lest any finding him should kill him.

We have here a further account of the proceedings against Cain.

I. Here is Cain's complaint of the sentence passed upon him, as hard and severe. Some make him to speak the language of despair; and read it, Mine iniquity is greater than that it may be forgiven; and so what he says, is a reproach and affront to the mercy of God, which these only shall have the benefit of, that hope in it. There is forgiveness with the God of pardons for the greatest sins and sinners; but they forfeit it, who despise of it. Just before, Cain made nothing of his sin; but now, he is in the other extreme; he covers it with various presumptions, to persuade us to despair. We cannot think too ill of sin, provided we do not think it unpardonable. But Cain seems rather to speak the language of indignation; My punishment is greater than I can bear; and so, what he says, is a reproach and affront to the justice of God, and a complaint, not of the greatness of his sin, but of the extremity of his punishment, as if that were disproportionable to his merits. Instead of justifying God, the text, he condemns him; not accepting the punishment of his iniquity, but quarrelling with it. Note, Impenitent unhumble hearts are therefore not reclaimed by God's rebukes, because they think themselves wronged by them; and it is an evidence of great hardness to be more concerned about our sufferings than about our sins. Note, First, This death only, not this sin, Exod. 10. 17; so was Cain's here. He is a living man, and yet complains of the punishment of his sin, Lam. 3. 39. He thinks himself rigorously dealt with, when really he is favourably treated; and he cries out of wrong, when he has more reason to wonder that he is out of hell. We unto him that thus strives with his Maker, and enters into judgment with his judge.

Now, to justify this complaint, observe his descents upon the sentence. 1. He sees himself excluded by it from the favour of God; and concludes that, being cursed, he was hid from God's face; which is indeed the true nature of God's curse; damned sinners find it so, to whom it is said, Depart from me, ye cursed. Those are cursed indeed, that are for ever shut out from God's love and care, and from all hopes of his grace. 2. He sees himself expelled from all the comforts of this life; and concludes that, being a fugitive, he was, in effect, driven out this day from the face of the earth. As good have no place on earth, as not have a settled place. Better rest in the grave, than not rest at all. 3. He sees himself excommunicated by it, and cut off from the church, and forbidden to attend on public ordinances. His hands being full of blood, he must bring more vain oblations, Isa. 1. 13, 15. Perhaps, if he beheld the blood of Abel, he began to see what was driven out from the face of the earth, for, being shut out of the church, which none had yet deserted, he was hid from God's face, being not admitted to come with the sons of God to present himself before the Lord. 4. He sees himself exposed by it to the hatred and ill-will of all mankind. It shall come to pass, that every one that finds me, shall slay me. Wherefore, for he wanders, he goes in peril of his life, at least he thinks so; every man in debt, thinks every one he meets, a bailiff. They were none alive but his near relations; yet even of them he is justly afraid, who had himself been so barbarous to his brother. Some read it, Whosoever finds me, shall slay me; not only, Whosoever among men, but Whosoever among all the creatures: seeing himself thrown out of God's protection. This judgment, it was well, he was cursed against him. Note, Unpardonned guilt fills men with continual terrors, Prov. 28. 1. Job 15. 20, 21. Ps. 53. 5. It is better to fear and not sin, than to sin and then fear. Dr. Lightfoot thinks this word of Cain should be read as a wish; Now, therefore, let it be that any that finds me, may kill me. Being bitter in his soul, he longs for death, but it comes not, Job 3. 20...22, as those under spiritual torments do, Rev. 9. 5, 6.

II. Here is God's confirmation of the sentence; for when he judges, he will overcome, v. 15. Observe, 1. How Cain is protected in wrath by this declaration, notified, we may suppose, to all that little world which was then in being, Whosoever slayeth Cain, vengeance shall be taken upon him seven-fold; because thereby the sentence he was under (that he should be a fugitive and a vagabond) would be defeated. Condemned prisoners are under the special protection of the law; they that are appointed sacrifices to public justice, must not be sacrificed to private revenge. God having said, in Cain's case, Vengeance is mine, I will repay, it had been a daring usurpation for any man to take the sword out of God's hand, a contempt put upon an express declaration of God's mind, and therefore, avenged on the man who should have protected, and procured the protecting and prolonging the lives even of very wicked men. God deals with some, according to that prayer, Ps. 59. 11, Slay them not, lest my people forget; scatter them by thy power. Had Cain been slain immediately, he had been forgotten, Ecc. 8. 10; but now he lives, a more fearful and lasting monument of God's justice, hanged in chains, as it were. 2. How he is marked in wrath; The Lord set a mark upon Cain, to distinguish him from the rest of mankind, and to notify that he was the man that murdered his brother, whom nobody must hurt, but every body must hoot at. God sighted him, (as some mofclators are burnt in the church,) and put upon him such a visible and indelible mark of infamy and disgrace, as would make all wise people shun him, so that he could not otherwise be a fugitive and vagabond, and the ossifring of all things.

16. And Cain went out from the presence of the Lord, and dwelt in the land of Nod, on the east of Eden. 17. And Cain knew his wife; and she conceived, and bare Enoch: and he built a city, and called the name of the city, after the name of his son, Enoch. 18. And unto Enoch was born Irad: and Irad begat Mehujael: and Mehujael begat Methusael: and Methusael begat Lamech.

We have here a further account of Cain, and what became of him after he was rejected of God.

1. He tamely submitted to that part of his sentence, by which he was hid from God's face. For, (v. 16.) he went out from the presence of the Lord, that is, he willingly renounced God and religion, and was content to retire to, and live in a world of which he might not be under its precepts. He forsook Adam's family and altar, and cast off all pretensions to the fear of God, and never came among good people, nor attended on God's ordinances, any more. Note, Hypocritical professors, that have disbelieved and trifled with God Almighty, are justly left to themselves, to do something that is grossly scandalous, and so throw off that form of godliness which they have been taught to, and are under obligation of which they have denied the power of it. Cain went out now from the presence of the Lord, and we never find that he came into it again, to his comfort. Hell is destruction from the presence of the Lord, 2 Thes. 1. 9. It is a perpetual banishment from the fountain of all good. This is the choice of sinners; and so shall their doom be, to their eternal confusion.

2. He endeavoured to confront that part of the sentence by which he was made a fugitive and a vagabond, for,

1. He chose his land. He went and dwelt on the east of Eden, somewhere distant from the place where Adam and his religious family resided, distinguishing himself and his accursed generation from the holy seed, his camp from the camp of the saints and the beloved city, Rev. 20. 9. On the east of Eden, the chasm there was, with the flaming sword; ch. 3. 24. there he chose his lot, as if to defy the terrors of the Lord. But his attempt to settle was in vain; for the land he dwelt in, was to him the land of Nod, that is, shaking, or trembling, because of the continual restlessness and uneasiness of his own spirit. Note, Those that depart from God, cannot find rest any where else. When Cain went out from the presence of the Lord, he never rested after. Those that shut themselves up, and abandon themselves to a perpetual trembling; "Return therefore to thy rest, O my soul, to thy rest in God; else thou art for ever restless.”

2. He built him a city for a habitation, v. 17. He was building a city, so some read it, ever building it, but, a curse being upon him and the work of his hands, he could not finish it. Or, as we read it, he built a city, in token of a fixed separation from the church of God, to which he had no thoughts of ever returning. This city was to be the head quarters of the apostacy. Observe here, (1.) Cain's defence of the divine sentence. God said he should be a fugitive and a vagabond; had he resisted and persisted, that curse might have been turned into a blessing, as that of the tribe of Levi was, that they should be divided in Jacob, and scattered in Israel; but his impenitent unhumbled heart walking contrary to God, and resolving to fix, in spite of heaven, that which might have been a blessing, turned into a curse. (2.) See what was Cain's choice, after he had forsaken God; he pitched upon a settlement in this world, as his rest for ever. They who looked for the heavenly city, on earth chose to dwell in tabernacles; but Cain, as one that minded not that city, built him one on earth. They that are cursed of God, are apt to seek their settlement and satisfaction here below, Ps. 17. 14. (3.) See what method Cain took to defend himself against the terrors with which he was perpetually haunted. He undertook this building, to divert his thoughts from the consideration of his own misery, and to drown the clamours of a guilty conscience with the noise of axes and hammers. Thus many puzzle their convictions, by thrusting themselves into a hurry of worldly business. (4.) See how wicked people often get the start of God's people, and out-go them in outward prosperity. Cain and his cursed race dwell in a city, while Adam and his blessed family dwell in tents; we cannot judge of love or hatred by all that is before us, Eccl. 9. 1, 2.

3. His family was also built up. Here is an account of his posterity, at least, the heirs of his family, for seven generations. His son was Enoch; of the same name, but not of the same character, with that holy man that walked with God, ch. 5. 22. Good men and bad may bear the same names; but God can distinguish between Judas Iscariot, and Judas not Iscariot, John 14. 22. The names of more of his posterity are mentioned, and but just mentioned; not as those of the holy seed, ch. 5, where we have the three verses containing the names of those here we have three or four in one verse. They are numbered in haste, as not valued or delighted in, in comparison with God's chosen.

19. And Lamech took unto him two wives: the name of the one was Adah, and the name of the other Zillah. 20. And Adah bare Jabal: he was the father of such as dwell in tents, and of such as have cattle. 21. And his brother's name was Jubal: he was the father of all such as handle the harp and organ. 22. And Zillah, she also bare Tubal-Cain, an instructor of every artificer in brass and iron: and the sister of Tubal-Cain was Naamah.

We have here some particulars concerning Lamech, the seventh from Adam in the line of Cain. Observe,

1. His marrying of two wives. It was one of the degenerate race of Cain, who first transgressed that original law of marriage, that two only should be one flesh. Hitherto, one man had but one wife at a time; but Lamech took two. From the beginning it was not so, Gen. 2. 24. 25. Mark the haste he made here,

1. That those who desert God's church and ordinances, by themselves open to all manner of temptation. 2. That when a bad custom is begun by bad men, sometimes men of better characters are, through unwariness, drawn in to follow them. Jacob, David, and many others, who were otherwise good and eminent men, were afterward insinured in this sin which Lamech had begun.

II. His happiness in his children, notwithstanding this. Though he sinned, in marrying two wives, yet he was blessed with children by both, and those, such as lived to be famous in their generation; not for their piety, no mention is made of that, (for aught that appears, they were the heathen of that age,) but for their ingenuity. They were not only themselves men of business, but men that were serviceable to the world, and eminent for the invention, or, at least, the improvement, of some useful art.

1. Jabal was a famous shepherd; he delighted himself much in keeping cattle, and was so happy in devising methods of doing it to the best advantage, and instructing others in them, that the shepherds of three times, nay, the shepherds of all times, called him father; or, perhaps, his children after him being brought up to the same employment, the family was a family of shepherds.

2. Jabal was a famous musician, and particularly an organist, and the first that gave rules for that noble art or science of music. When Jabal had set them in a way to be rich, Jabal put them in a way to be merry. Those who spend their days in wealth will not be without the timbrel and harp, Job 21, 12, 13. From his name, Jabal, probably, the jubilee-trumpet was so called; for the best music was that which proclaimed liberty and redemption. Jabal was their Pan, and Jabal their Apollo.

3. Tubal-Cain was a famous smith, who greatly improved the art of working in brass and iron, for the service both of war and husbandry. He was their Tufan. See here,

(1.) That worldly things are the only things that carnal wicked people set their hearts upon, and are most ingenious and industrious about. So it was with this impious race of cursed Cain. Here was a father of shepherds, and a father of musicians, but not a father of the faithful: here is one to teach in brass and iron, but none to teach the good knowledge and grace of God. They continued to be rich, and to be mighty, and how to be merry: but nothing of God, or of his fear and service among them. Present things fill the hearts of most people.

(2.) That even those who are destitute of the knowledge and grace of God, may be endowed with many excellent useful accomplishments, which may make them famous and serviceable in their generation. Common gifts are given to bad men, while God chooses to himself the foolish things of the world.

23. And Lamech said unto his wives, Adah and Zillah, Hear my voice; ye wives of Lamech, hearken unto my speech; for I have slain a man to my wounding, and a young man to my hurt:' 24. If Cain shall be avenged seven-fold, truly Lamech seventy and seven-fold.

By this speech of Lamech, which is here recorded, and, probably, was much talked of in those times, he further appears to have been a bad man, as Cain's accursed race generally were.

Observe,

1. How haughtily and imperiously he speaks to his wives, as one that expected a mighty regard and obedience. He speaks of Lamech, yet he speaks as Lamech. No marvel that he who had broken one law of marriage, by taking two wives, broke another, which obliged him to be kind and tender to those he had taken, and to give honour to the wife as to the weaker vessel. Those are not always the most careful to do their own duty, that are highest in their station, or the most connected with others, and most frequent in calling upon their relations to know their place, and do their duty.

II. How bloody and barbarous he was to all about him. I have slain, or, (as it is in the margin,) I would slay a man in my own wound, and a young man in my hurt. He owns himself a man of a fierce and cruel disposition, that would lay about him with utter cruelty, and kill all that stood in his way; such a man, or a young man, he himself were in danger to be wounded and hurt in the conflict. Some think, because (v. 24,) he compares himself with Cain, that he had murdered some of the holy seed, the true worshippers of God, and that he acknowledges this to be the wounding of his conscience, and the hurt of his soul; and yet that like Cain, he continued impatient, trembling and yet unhumbled. Or, his wives, knowing what manner of spirit he was of, how apt both to give and to resent provocation, were afraid lest somebody or other would be the death of him. "Never fear," says he, "I defy any man to set upon me; I will slay him, be he a man, or a young man." Note, It is a common thing for fierce and bloody men to glory in their shame, (Phil. 3. 19,) as if it were both their safety and their honour, that they should not see how many lives are sacrificed to their sordid resentments, nor how much they are hated, provided they may be feared. Oderint, dum meu- turant.—Let them hate, provided they fear.

III. How impudently he presumeth even upon God's protection in his wicked way, v. 24. He had heard that Cain should be avenged seven-fold, v. 13; that is, that if any man should dare to kill Cain, he should be severely reckoned with, and punished, for so doing, though Cain deserved to die a thousand deaths for the murder of his brother; and hence infers, that if any one should kill him for the murders he had committed, God would much more avenge his death. As if the special care God took to prolong and secure the life of Cain, for special reasons peculiar to his case, and indeed for his sorcer punishment, as the beings of the damned are intended—so if this care were not designed for a protection to all murderers. Thus Lamech, as we may conclude, boldly argues, "If God provided for the safety of Cain, much more for mine; who, though I have slain many, yet never slew my own brother, and upon no provocation, as he did." Note, The reprobate of some sinners, and the patience God exercised toward them, are often abused to the hardening of others in the like sinful ways, Eccl. 8. 11. But though justice strike others, and they therefore be sure but that they may be taken away with a swift destruction. Or, if God should hear long with those who thus presume upon his forbearance, they do but hereby treasure up unto themselves wrath against the day of wrath. Now this is all we have upon record in scripture concerning the family and posterity of cursed Cain, till we find them all cut off and perishing in the universal deluge.

25. And Adam knew his wife again; and she bare a son, and called his name Seth: For God, said she, hath appointed me another seed instead of Abel, whom Cain slew. 26. And to Seth, to him also there was born a son; and he called his name Enos; then began men to call upon the name of the Lord.

This is the first mention of Adam in the story of this chapter. No question, the murder of Abel, and the impenitence and apostasy of Cain, were a very great grief to him and Eve; and this more, because their own children did not correct them, and they were ever so near, and their kindred, did reprove them. Their folly had given sin and death entrance into the world; and now they smote it by, being, by means thereof, deprived of both their sons in one day, ch. 27. 45. When parents are grieved by their children's wickedness, they should take occasion thence to lament that corruption of nature which was derived from them, and which is the root of bitterness. But here we have that which was a relief to our first parents in their affliction.

I. God gave them to see the rebuilding of their family, which was sorely shaken and weakened by that sad event. For, 1. They saw their seed, another seed instead of Abel, v. 25. Observe God's kindness and tenderness toward his people, in his providential dealings with them; when he takes away one comfort from them, he gives them another instead of it, which may prove a greater blessing to them than that was, in which they thought their lives were bound up. This other seed was he in whom the church was to be built up and perpetuated; and he comes instead of Abel; for the succession of professors is the revival of the martyrs, and as it were the resurrection of God's slain witnesses. Thus we are baptized for the dead, 1 Cor. 15. 29; that is, we are, by baptism, admitted into the church, for or instead of those who, by death, especially by martyrdom, are removed out of it; and we fill up their room. They who slay God's servants, hope thus to wear out the saints of the Most High; but they will be deceived. Christ shall still see his seed; God can out of stones raise up children for him, and make the blood of the martyrs the seed of the church, whose lands, we are sure, shall never be lost for want of heirs. This see, by a prophetic spirit, they called Seth, that is, settled, or placed in his seat; and by a new, making up the time of the world, or bringing them to the end of time, and from him the Messiah should descend. While Cain, the head of the apostasy, is made a wanderer, Seth, from whom the true church was to come, is one fix'd. In Christ and his church is the only true settlement. 2. They saw their seed's seed, v. 26. To Seth was born a son called Enos, that general name for all men, which bespeaks the weakness, frailty, and misery, of human nature. The seed of Seth were more blessed of God than the seed of Cain, both in themselves and their children. We are never so settled, but we must remind ourselves that we are frail.

II. God gave them to see the reviving of religion in their family, v. 26. Then began men to call upon the name of the Lord. It is small comfort to a good man to see his children's children, if he do not, withal, see peace upon Israel, and those that come after them, which God will certainly give; and the name of God's name was called upon before, but now, 1. The worshippers of God began to stir up themselves to do more in religion than they had done; perhaps not more than had been done at first, but more than had been done of late, since the defection of Cain. Now, men began to worship God, not only in their closets and families, but in public and solemn assemblies. On this truth, Doubtless God's name was called upon before, but now, a new beginning of it. Then may refer, not to the birth of Enos, but to the whole foregoing story; then, when men saw in Cain and Lamech the sad effects of sin, by the workings of natural conscience; then, they were so much the more lively and resolute in religion. The worse others are, the better we should be, and the more zealous. 2. The worshippers of God began to distinguish themselves; the margin reads it, Then began men to be called by the name of the Lord, or, to call themselves by it.

Now, that Cain and those who had deserted religion, had built a city, and begun to declare for impiety and irreligion, and called themselves the Sons of men; these that adhered to God, began to declare for him and his worship, and called themselves the Sons of God. Now began the distinction between professors and profane, which has been kept up ever since, and will be while the world stands.

CHAP. V.

This chapter is the only authentic history extant of the first age of the world, from the creation to the flood, containing (according to the verity of the Hebrew text) 1666 years, as may easily be computed by the ages of the Patriarchs, before they begat that son, through whom the line went down to Noah. This is the root of that which the apostle calls endless genealogies, 1 Tim. 1. 4, for Christ who was the end of the Old Testament law, was also the end of the Old Testament genealogies; toward him they looked, and in him they centred. The genealogy here recorded, is inserted briefly in the pedi gree of our Saviour, Luke 3. 36, 38, and is of great use, to show that Christ was the Seed of the woman, that was promised. We have here an account. I. Concerning Adam, v. 1. 5. II. Seth, v. 6. 8. III. Enos, v. 9. 11. IV. Cainan, v. 12. 14. V. Mahalaleel, v. 15. 17. VI. Jared, v. 18. 20. VII. Enock, v. 21. 24. VIII. Methuselah, v. 25. 27. IX. Lamech and his son Noah, v. 28. 32. All perpetually bearing the name and signification of God, is profitable, though not all alike profitable.

THIS is the book of the generations of Adam. In the day that God created man, in the likeness of God made he him: 2. Male and female created he them; and blessed them, and called their name Adam, in the day when they were created: 3. And Adam lived an hundred and thirty years, and begat a son in his own likeness, after his image; and called his name Seth: 4. And the days of Adam after he had gotten Seth were eight hundred years: and he begat sons and daughters: 5. And all the days that Adam lived were nine hundred and thirty years: and he died.

The first words of the chapter are the title or argument of the whole chapter; it is the book of the generations of Adam, it is the list or catalogue of the posterity of Adam; not of all, but only of the holy seed which were the substance thereof, Isa. 6. 13, and of whom, as concerning the flesh, Christ came, Rom. 9. 5, the names, ages, and deaths, of these that were the successors of the first Adam in the custody of the promise, and the ancestors of the second Adam. The genealogy begins with Adam himself.

I. His creation, v. 1. 2. Where we have a brief rehearsal of what was before at large related concerning the creation of man. This is what we have need frequently to hear of, and carefully to acquaint ourselves with. Observe here, 1. That God created man. Man is not his own maker, therefore he must not be his own master; but the Author of his being must be the Director of his motions and the centre of them. 2. That there was a day in which God created man; he was not from eternity, but of yesterday; he was not the first-born, but the junior of the creation. 3. That God made him in his own likeness, righteous and holy, and therefore, undoubtedly, happy; man's nature resembled the divine nature more than that of any of the creatures of this lower world. 4. That God created them male and female, (v. 2.) for their mutual comfort as well as for the preservation and increase of their kind. Adam and Eve were both made immediately by the hand of God, both made in God's like ess; and therefore between the sexes there is not that great distance and inequality which some imagine. 5. That God blessed them. It is usual for parents to bless their children; so God, the common Father, blessed his; but earthly parents can only beg a blessing. It is God's prerogative to give it. And this refers chiefly to the blessing of increase, not excluding other blessings. 5. That he called their name Adam. Adam signifies earth, red earth. Now, (1.) God gave him this name. Adam had himself named the rest of the creatures, but he must not choose his own name, lest he should assume some glorious pious noun. But God gave him a name which would be a continual memorandum to him of the meaness of his own name, and bid him to look unto the rock whence he was hewn, and the hole of the pit whence he was digged, Isa. 51. 1. Those have little reason to be proud, who are so near akin to dust. (2.) He gave this name both to the man and to the woman. Being, at first, one by nature, and afterward, one by marriage, it was fit they should both have the same name, in token of their union. The woman is of the earth, earthly, as well as he. II. The birth of his son Seth, v. 3. He was born in the hundred and thirtieth year of Adam's life; and, probably, the murder of Abel was not long before. Many other sons and daughters were born to Adam, besides Cain and Abel, before this; but no notice is taken of them, because an honourable mention must be made of his name only, in whose loins Christ and the church were. But that which is most observable here concerning Seth, is, that Adam begat him in his own likeness, after his image. Adam was made in the image of God; but when he was fallen and corrupt, he begat a son in his own image, sinful and defiled, frail, mortal, and miserable, like himself; not only a man like himself, consisting of body and soul, but a sinner like himself, guilty and obnoxious, degenerate and corrupt. Even the man after God's own heart owns himself conceived and born in sin, Ps. 51. 5. This was Adam's own likeness, the reverse of that divine likeness in which Adam was made; but, having lost it himself, he could not convey it to his seed. Note, Grace does not run in the blood, but corruption does. A sinner begets a sinner, but a saint does not beget a saint.

III. His age and death. He lived, in all, nine hundred and thirty years; and then he died, according to the sentence passed upon him, To dust thou shalt return. Though he did not die in the day he ate forbidden fruit, yet in that very day he became mortal; then he began to die: his whole life after was but a reprieve, a forfeited, condemned, life; nay it was a wasting, dying, life: he was not only like a criminal sentenced, but as one already crucified, that dies slowly, and by degrees.

6. And Seth lived an hundred and five years, and begat Enos: 7. And Seth lived after he begat Enos eight hundred and seven years, and begat sons and daughters: 8. And all the days of Seth were nine hundred and twelve years: and he died. 9. And Enos lived ninety years, and begat Cainan: 10. And Enos lived after he begat Cainan eight hundred and fifteen years, and begat sons and daughters: 11. And all the days of Enos were nine hundred and five years: and he died. 12. And Cainan lived seventy years, and begat Mahalaleel:

Vol. I.—H

13. And Cainan lived after he begat Mahalaleel eight hundred and forty years, and begat sons and daughters: 14. And all the days of Cainan were nine hundred and ten years: and he died. 15. And Mahalaleel lived sixty and five years, and begat Jared: 16. And Mahalaleel lived after he begat Jared eight hundred and thirty years, and begat sons and daughters: 17. And all the days of Mahalaleel were eight hundred ninety and five years: and he died. 18. And Jared lived an hundred sixty and two years, and he begat Enoch: 19. And Jared lived after he begat Enoch eight hundred years, and begat sons and daughters: 20. And all the days of Jared were nine hundred sixty and two years: and he died.

We have here all that the Holy Ghost thought fit to leave upon record concerning five of the patriarchs before the flood, Seth, Enos, Cainan, Mahalaleel, and Jared. There is nothing observable concerning the remainder: particularly, there is no reason to think they were men of eminence, both for prudence and piety, in their day: but, in general,

I. Observe how largely and expressly their generations are recorded. This matter, one would think, might have been delivered in fewer words; but it is certain that there is not one idle word in God's books, whatever there is in men's. It is thus laid very open to us. 1. To show us the sum total, for the sake of those that have not even so much skill as that. 2. To show the pleasure God takes in the names of his people: we find Cain's generation numbered in haste, chap. 5. 4. 5. 6. But this account of the holy seed is enlarged upon, and given in words at length, and not in figures: we are told how long they lived, that lived in God's fear, and when they died, that died in his favour; but as for others, it is no matter. The memory of the just is blessed, but the name of the wicked shall rot.

II. Their life is reckoned by days, v. 8, all the days of Seth, and so of the rest; which intimates the shortness of the life of man, when it is at its longest, and the quick revolution of our times on earth. If they reckon by days, surely we must reckon by hours, or, rather make that our frequent prayer, (Ps. 90. 12.) Teach us to number our days.

III. Concerning each of them, except Enoch, it is said, and he died. It is implied in the numbering of the years of their life, that their life, when three years, or ten, or number, or number, came to an end; and yet it is still repeated, and he died: to show that death passed upon all men without exception, and that it is good for us particularly to observe and improve the deaths of others for our own edification. Such a one was a strong healthful man, but he died; such a one was a great and rich man, but he died: such was a wise and prudent man, but he died; such a one was a very good man, perhaps a very useful man, to go on.

IV. That which is especially observable, is, that they all lived very long; not one of them died till he had seen the revolutions of almost eight hundred years, and some of them lived much longer; a great while for an immortal soul to be imprisoned in a house of clay. The present life surely was not to them such a burthen as, commonly, it is now, else they would have been weary of it; nor was the future life so clearly revealed then as it is now under the gospel, else they would have been impatient to remove to it: long life to the pious patriarchs was a blessing, and made them blessings. 1. Some natural causes may be assigned for their long life in those first ages of the world. It is very probable that the earth was more fruitful, the productions of it more strengthening, the air more healthful, and the food much of the animal bodies more choice, before the flood than they were after. Though man was driven out of paradise, yet the earth itself was then paradisical; a garden, in comparison with its present wilderness state: and some think that their great knowledge of the creatures, and of their usefulness both for food and medicine, together with their sobriety and temperance, contributed much to it; yet we do not find that those who were intemperate, as many were, Luke 17. 27., were as short-lived as intemperate men generally are now. 2. It must chiefly be resolved into the power and providence of God; he prolonged their lives, both for the more speedy replenishing of the earth, and for the more effectual preservation of the knowledge of God and religion, then, when there was no written word, but tradition was the channel of its conveyance. All the patriarchs here, except Noah, were born before Adam died; so that from him they might receive a satisfactorily account of the creation, paradise, the fall, the promise, and those divine precepts which concerned religious worship and a religious life: and if any mistake arose, they might have recourse to him while he lived, as to an oracle, for the rectifying of it, and, after his death, to Methuselah, and others, that had conversed with him: so great was the care of Almighty God to preserve in his church the knowledge of his will, and the purity of his worship.

21. And Enoch lived sixty and five years, and begat Methuselah: 22. And Enoch walked with God after he begat Methuselah, three hundred years, and begat sons and daughters. 23. And all the days of Enoch were three hundred and sixty-five years: 24. And Enoch walked with God: and he was not: for God took him.

The accounts here run on for several generations without any thing remarkable, or any variation but if the names and numbers; but, at length, there comes in one that must not be passed over, of whom special notice must be taken, and that is Enoch, the seventh from Adam: the rest, we may suppose, did virtuously, but he excelled them all, and was the brightest star of the patriarchal age. It is but little that is recorded concerning him; but that little is enough to make his name great, greater than the name of the other Enoch, who had a city called by his name. Here are two things concerning him:

1. His gracious conversation in this world, which is twice spoken of, v. 22, Enoch walked with God after he begat Methuselah: and again v. 24, Enoch walked with God: the natural consequence of his piety. 1. The nature of his religion, and the scope and tenor of his conversation; he walked with God, which denotes, (1.) True religion; what is godliness, but walking with God? The ungodly and profane are without God in the world, they walk contrary to him; but the godly walk with God, which presupposes reconciliation to God, for two cannot walk together, except they be agreed, Amos 3., and includes all the parts and instances of a godly, righteous, and sober life: to walk with God, is to set God always before us, and to act as those that are always under his eye. It is to live a life of communion with God, both in ordinances and performances; it is to make God's word our rule, and his glory our end, in all our actions; it is to make it our constant care and endeavour in every thing to please God, and in nothing to offend him; it is to comply with his will, to concur with his designs, and to be workers together with him: it is to be followers of him as dear children. (2.) Eminent religion. He must be addicted to his world, and did not only walk after God, as all good men do, but he walked with God, as if he were in heaven already: he lived above the rate, not only of other men, but of other saints; not only good in bad times, but in good times. (3.) Activity in promoting religion among others: executing the priest's office is called walking before God, 1 Sam. 2. 30, 35, and see Zech. 3. 7. Enoch, it should seem, was a priest of the most high God, and, as Noah, who is likewise said to walk with God, he was a preacher of righteousness, and prophesied of Christ's second coming, Jude 14, Behold, the Lord cometh with his holy myriads. Now the Holy Spirit instead of saying, Enoch walked, says, Enoch walked with God; for it is the life of a good man to walk with God. This was, [1.] The business of Enoch's life, his constant care and work; while others lived to themselves and the world, he lived to God. [2.] It was the joy and support of his life; communion with God was to him better than life itself; To me to live is Christ, Phil. 1. 21.

2. The date of his religion. It is said, v. 21, he lived sixty-five years, and begat Methuselah; but, v. 22, he walked with God after he begat Methuselah; which intimates that he did not begin to be eminent for piety, till about that time; at first he walked but as other men. Great saints arrive at their eminence by degrees.

3. The continuance of his religion; he walked with God three hundred years, as long as he continued in this world: the hypocrite will not pray always; but the real saint that acts from a principle, and makes religion his choice, will persevere to the end, and walk with God while he lives, as one that hopes to live for ever with him, Ps. 104. 33.

4. His glorious removal to a better world: as he did not live like the rest, so he did not die like the rest. v. 21, he was not; this is not an instance of the immortality of the soul, as it is explained, Heb. 11. 3. He was translated that he should not see death, and was not found because God had translated him. Observe, 1. When he was thus translated. (1.) What time of his life it was; when he had lived but three hundred and sixty-five years, (a year of years,) which, as men's ages went then, was in the midst of their days; for there was none of the patriarchs, before the flood, that did not more than double that time; but why did God take him so soon? Surely, because the world, which was now grown corrupt, was not worthy of him; or, because he was so much above the world, and so weary of it, as to desire a speedy removal out of it; or, because his work was done, and done the sooner for his minding it so closely. Note, God often takes them soonest whom he loves best; and the time they lose encores is the time they gain in heaven, and have an advantage.

2. What time of the world; it was when all the patriarchs, mentioned in this chapter, were living, except Adam, who died 57 years before, and Noah, who was born 69 years after; they two had sensible confirmations to their faith other ways, but to all the rest, who were, or might have been witnesses of Enoch's translation, that was a sensible encouragement to their faith and hope concerning the next state.
for God took him. (1.) He was not any longer in this world; it was not the period of his being, but of his being here; he was not found, so the apostle explains it from the LXX, not found by his friends, who sought him, as the sons of the prophets sought Elijah, 2 Kings 2. 17; not found by his enemies, who, some think, were in quest of him, to put him to death in their rage against him for his eminent piety: it appears by his prophecy: "He was a type of the unspotted lamb, who spake hard speeches, and, probably did hard things too, against God's people, Jude 15, but God hid Enoch from them, not under heaven, but in heaven. (2.) God took him body and soul to himself in the heavenly paradise, by the ministry of angels, as, afterward, he took Elijah. He was changed, as these saints shall be, that will be found alive at Christ's second coming. Whenever a good man dies, God takes him, and carries him hence, and receives him to himself. The apostle adds concerning Enoch, that before his translation, he had this testimony that he pleased God, and this was the good report he obtained. Note, [1.] Walking with God, pleases God. [2.] We cannot walk with God, so as to please him, but by faith. [3.] God himself will put an honour upon those that by faith walk with him so as to please him, and will overtake them, and, when there is no other place for them before angels and men at the great day: they have not this testimony before the translation, yet shall have it after. [4.] Those whose conversation in the world is truly holy, shall find their removal out of it truly happy. Enoch's translation was not only an evidence to faith of the reality of a future state, and of the possibility of the body's existing in glory in that state; but it was an encouragement to those that walk with God, that they shall be for ever with his signal piety be crowned with signal honours.

25. And Methuselah lived an hundred eighty and seven years, and begat Lamech: 26. And Methuselah lived after he begat Lamech seven hundred eighty and two years, and begat sons and daughters: 27. And all the days of Methuselah were nine hundred sixty and nine years: and he died. Concerning Methuselah observe, 1. The signification of his name, which some think, was prophetic, his father Enoch being a prophet; Methuselah signifies, he dies, there is a dart, or, a sending forth, namely, of the deluge, which came the very year that Methuselah died. If indeed his name was so intended, and so explained, it was fair warning to a careless world, a long time before the judgment came. However, this is observable, that the longest liver that ever was, carried death in his name, and he might be reminded of its coming surely, though it came slowly. 2. His age: he lived nine hundred and sixty-nine years, the longest we read of, that ever any man lived to, on earth; and yet he died: the longest liver must die at last. Neither youth nor age will discharge from that war, for that is the end of all men: none can challenge life by long prescription, nor make that a plea against their being of death. It is commonly supposed that Methuselah died a little before the flood; the Jewish writers say, "seven days before," referring to ch. 7. 10, and that he was taken away from the evil to come; which goes upon this presumption which is generally received, that all these patriarchs in this chapter were holy men. I am loath to offer any reason to the contrary; and yet, I see not that this can be any more inferred from their enrolment here among the ancestors of Christ, than that all those kings of Judah were so, whose names are recorded in his genealogy, many of whom, we are sure, were much otherwise: and if this be questioned, it may be suggested as probable, that Methuselah was himself drowned with the rest of the world; for it is certain that he died that year.

28. And Lamech lived an hundred eighty and two years, and begat a son: 29. And he called his name Noah, saying, This same shall comfort us concerning our work and toil of our hands, because of the ground which the Lord hath cursed: 30. And Lamech lived after he begat Noah five hundred ninety and five years, and begat sons and daughters: 31. And all the days of Lamech were seven hundred seventy and seven years: and he died: 32. And Noah was five hundred years old: and Noah begat Shem, Ham, and Japheth.

Here we have the first mention of Noah, of whom we shall read much in the following chapters. Here is,

I. His name, with the reason of it: Noah signifies rest: his parents gave him that name, with the prospect of his being a more than ordinary blessing to his generation. This same shall comfort us concerning our work and toil of our hands, because of the ground which the Lord hath cursed. 1. His complaint of the calamitous state of human life; by the entrance of sin, and the entail of the curse for sin, it is become very miserable: our whole life is spent in labour, and our time filled up with continual toil. God having cursed the ground, it is as much as some can do, with the utmost care and pains, to fetch a hard livelihood out of it. He speaks as one fatigued with the business of this life, and grudging that it should take up so much of our thoughts; and precious minutes, which otherwise might have been much better employed, are unavoidably spent for the support of the body. 2. His comfortable hopes of some relief by the birth of this son: This same shall comfort us; which denotes not only the desire and expectation which parents generally have concerning their children, that when they grow up, they will be comforts to them, and helpers in their business, though they often prove otherwise; but it denotes also an apprehension and prospect of something more: very probably, there were some prophecies that went before him, as a person that should be wonderfully serviceable to his generation, which they so understood as to conclude that he was the promised Seed, the Messiah that should come: and then intimates that a covenant-interest in Christ as our's, and the believing expectation of his coming, furnish us with the best and surest comforts, both in reference to the wrath and curse of God which we have received, and to the toils and troubles of this present time which we are often complaining of. "Is Christ our's? Is heaven our's? This same shall comfort us." II. His children, Shem, Ham, and Japheth: These Noah begat, (the eldest of these,) when he was 350 years old: and he called the name of Japheth, because he upon him the covenant was entailed, as appears ch. 9. 26, where God is called the Lord God of Shem; to him, it is probable, the birth-right was given, and from him, it is certain, both Christ the Head, and the church the body, were to descend; therefore he is called Shem, which signifies a name, because in his posterity the name of God should always be remaining, till he should come out of his lineage whose name is above every name; so that in putting Shem first, Christ was in effect put first, who in all things must have the pre-eminence.
The most remarkable thing we have upon record concerning the old world, is, the destruction of it by the universal deluge, which this chapter begins with; wherein we have

The astounding iniquity of that wicked world, v. 1. & 2. II. The righteous God's just resentment of that astounding iniquity, and his holy resolution to punish it, v. 3. The special providence preserved the life and goods of Noah, and for the character given of him, v. 8. 10. 2. In the communication of God's purpose to him, v. 13. 17. 3. In the directions he gave him to make an ark for his own safety, v. 14. 15. 4. In the employing of him for the preservation of the rest of the creatures, v. 18. 21. Lastly, Noah's obedience to the instructions given him, v. 22. And this concerning the old world is written for our admonition, upon whom the ends of the new world are come.

1. AND it came to pass, when men began to multiply upon the face of the earth, and daughters were born unto them:
2. That the sons of God saw the daughters of men, that they were fair: and they took them wives of all which they chose.
3. And the Lord said, My Spirit shall not always strive with man, for that he also is flesh; yet his days shall be an hundred and twenty years.

This comes in here. 1. As a token of God's displeasure at those who married strange wives; he threatens to withdraw his Spirit from them, whom they had grieved by such marriages, contrary to their convictions. Fleshly lusts are often punished with spiritual judgments, the sorest of all judgments. Or, 2. As another occasion of the great wickedness of the old world; the Spirit of the Lord, being provoked by their resistance of his motions, ceased to strive with them, and then all religion was soon lost among them. This he warns them of before, that they might not further vex his holy Spirit, but by their prayers might stay him with them. Observe in this verse,

1. God's resolution not always to strive with man by his Spirit. The Spirit then strove by Noah's preaching, 1 Pet. 3. 19, 20, and by inward checks; but it was in vain with the most of men; therefore,

2. As he resolved, God's Spirit would yet strive with them, for the maintaining of the honour of God's government.

Now here we have an account of two things which occasioned the wickedness of the old world:

1. The increase of mankind. Men began to multiply upon the face of the earth. This was the effect of the blessing, ch. 1. 23, and yet man's corruption so abused and perverted this blessing, that it turned into a curse. Thus sin takes occasion by the means of the blessing. It is best to be thankful for this very misfortune.

Prov. 29. 16, When the wicked are multiplied, transgression increaseth. The more sinners, the more sin; and the multitude of offenders embolden men: infectious diseases are more destructive in populous cities; and sin is a spreading leprosy. Thus in the New Testament church, when the number of the disciples was multiplied, there arose a murmuring, Acts 6. 1, and we read of a nation that was in the interior of their joy, Isa. 9. 3. Numerous families need to be well governed, lest they should become wicked families.

2. Mixed marriages, v. 2. The sons of God, that is, the professors of religion, who were called by the name of the Lord, and called upon that name, married the daughters of men, that is, those that were profane, and strangers to God and godliness. The posterity of Seth did not keep by themselves, as they ought to have done, both for the preservation of their own purity, and in detestation of the apostasy; they intermingled themselves with the apostates; they intermingled themselves with the excommunicated race of Cain; they took them wives of all that they chose. But what was amiss in these marriages? (1.) They chose only by the eye; they saw that they were fair, which was all they looked at. (2.) They followed the choice which their own corruption had taken, that they chose without advice and consideration. But, (3.) That which proved of such bad consequence to them, was, that they married strange wives, were unequally yoked with unbelievers, 2 Cor. 6. 14. This was forbidden to Israel, Deut. 7. 3. 4. It was the unhappy occasion of Solomon's apostasy, 1 Kings 11. 1. 4. and was of bad consequence to the Jews after their return from Babylon, Ezra 9. 1. 2.

Note, Professors of religion, in marrying both with themselves and their children, should make conscience of keeping within the bounds of profession. The bad will sooner debauch the good than the good reform the bad. Those that profess themselves the children of God, must not marry without his consent, which they have not, if they join in affinity with his enemies.

3. And the Lord said, My Spirit shall not always strive with man, for that he also is flesh; yet his days shall be an hundred and twenty years.

We have here a further account of the corruption of the old world. When the sons of God had matched with the daughters of men, though it was very displeasing to God, yet he did not immediately
The imagination of the thoughts of the heart was so, that is, their designs and devices were wicked. They did not do evil only through carelessness, as those that walk at all adventures, not heeding what they do; but they did evil deliberately, and designedly, contriving how to do mischief. It was bad indeed; for it was only evil, continually evil, and by imagination was so. There was no good to be found among them, not at any time: the stream of sin was full, and strong, and constant; and God saw it; see Ps. 14. 1-5.

6. And it repented the Lord that he had made man on the earth, and it grieved him at his heart: And the Lord said, I will destroy man whom I have created from the face of the earth; both man, and beast, and the creeping thing, and the fowls of the air; for it repented me that I have made them.

Here is,

1. God's resentment of man's wickedness; he did not see it as an unconcerned spectator, but as one influenced and affronted by it; he saw it as a tender father sees the folly and stupidity of his darling child, not only angels him, but grieves him, and makes him wish he had been written childless. The expressions here used, are very strong. It repented the Lord that he had made man upon the earth, that he had made a creature of such noble powers and faculties, and had put him on this earth, which he built and furnished for a purpose to be a convenient, comfortable habitation for them; and it grieved him at his heart. These are expressions after the manner of men, and must be understood so as not to reflect upon the honour of God's immutability or felicity.

1. It does not bespeak any passion or uneasiness in God; (nothing can create disturbance to the eternal mind;) but it bespeaks his just and holy displeasure against sin and sinners; against sin as odious to his holiness, and against sin as obnoxious to his justice. He is pressed by the sins of his creatures, Amos 2. 13, wearied, Isa. 43. 54, broken, Ezek. 6. 9, grieved, Ps. 95. 10, and here, grieved to the heart, as men are when they are wronged and abused by those they have been very kind to, and therefore repent of their kindness, and wish they had never fostered that snake in their bosom, which now bites in their face, and stings them to the heart. Does God thus hate sin? And shall not we hate it? Has our sin grieved him to the heart? And shall not we be grieved and pricked to the heart for it? O that this consideration might humble us, and shame us, and that we may look on him whom we have thus grieved, and mourn! Zech. 12. 10.

2. It does not bespeak any change in God's mind; for he is in one mind, and who can turn him? With him there is no variableness. But it bespeaks a change of his way; when God has made man upright, he rested and was refreshed, Exod. 31. 17, and his way toward him was such as showed he was pleased with the work of his own hands; but now that man was apostatized, he could not do otherwise than show himself displeased: so that the change was in man, not in God. God repented that he had made man; but we never find him repenting the made man, though that was a work of much greater expense, because so much special and eternal grace is given to secure the great ends of redemption; so that those gifts and callings are without repentance, Rom. 11. 29.

II. God's resolution to destroy man for his wickedness, v. 7. Observe, 1. When God repented that he had made man, he resolved to destroy man.
Thus they that truly repent of sin, will resolve, in the strength of God's grace, to mortify sin, and to destroy it, and so to undo what they have done amiss; we do but mock God in saying that we are sorry for our sin, and that it grieves us to the heart, if we continue to indulge it. In vain do we pretend a change of our mind, if we do not evidence it by a change of our way. 2. He resolves to destroy man; but not by the sword; for he will wash off man from the earth, (so some,) as dirt or filth is wiped off from a place which should be clean, and is thrown to the dunghill, the proper place for it. See 2 Kings 21. 13. These that are the spots of the places they live in, are justly wiped away by the judgments of God. I will blot out man from the earth, (so others,) as those lines are blotted out of a book, which displease the author; or, as the name of a citizen is blotted out of the rolls of the freemen, when he is dead, or disfranchised. 3. He speaks of man as his own creature then, when he resolves upon his ruin, Man whom I have created; "Though I have created him, that shall not excuse him." Isa. 27. 11. He that made him, will not save him; he that is our Creator, if he shall not be our Ruler, will be our Destroyer. Or, "Because I have created him, and he has been so unprofitable and so ungrateful to his Creator, therefore I will destroy him," those forfeit their lives that do not answer the end of their living. 4. Even the brute creatures were to be involved in this destruction, Beasts and creeping things, and the fowl of the air. These were made for man, and therefore must be destroyed with man; for it follows, It repenteth me that I have made them; for the end of their creation also was frustrated; they were made, that man might live and have an honourable life with God; and therefore were destroyed, because he had served his lusts with them, and made them subject to vanity. 5. God took up this resolution concerning men, after his Spirit had been long striving with them in vain. None are ruined by the justice of God but those that hate to be reformed by the grace of God.

8. But Noah found grace in the eyes of the Lord. 9. These are the generations of Noah: Noah was a just man and perfect in his generations, and Noah walked with God. 10. And Noah begat three sons, Shem, Ham, and Japheth.

We have here Noah distinguished from the rest of the world, and a peculiar mark of honour put upon him.

9. When God was displeased with the rest of the world, he favoured Noah, v. 8. But Noah found grace in the eyes of the Lord. This vindicates God's justice in his displeasure against the world, and shows that he had strictly examined the character of every person in it, before he pronounced it universally corrupt; for, there being one good man, he found him out, and smiled upon him. It also magnifies his grace towards Noah, that he was made a vessel of God's mercy, when all mankind besides were become the execration and abuse of his wrath: distinguishing favours bring under peculiarly strong obligations. Probably, Noah did not find favour in the eyes of men; they hated and persecuted him, because both by his life and preaching he condemned the world; but he found grace in the eyes of the Lord, and that was honour and comfort enough. God made more account of Noah than of all the world besides; and the more manifestly so, because he were truly honoured above all the giants that were in these days, who became mighty men, and men of renown. Let this be the top of your ambition, to find grace in the eyes of the Lord; herein let us labour, that, present or absent, we may be accepted of him, 2 Cor. 5. 9. These are highly favoured, when God favours.

2. When the rest of the world was corrupt and wicked, Noah kept his integrity, v. 9. These are the generations of Noah: this is the account we have to give of him; Noah was a just man. This character of Noah comes in here either, (1.) As the reason of God's favour to him: his singular piety was a proof of his sincerity, and consequently the fruit of his loving kindness. Those that would find grace in the eyes of the Lord, must be as Noah was, and do as Noah did: God loves those that love him; or (2.) As the effect of God's favour to him: it was God's good-will to him that produced this good work in him; he was a very good man, but he was no better than the grace of God made him, 1 Cor. 15. 10. Now observe his character; 1. He was a just man, that is, justified before God by faith in the promised Seed; for he was an heir of the righteousness which is by faith, Heb. 11. 7. He was sanctified, and had right principles and dispositions implanted in him; and he was righteous in his conversation, one that made conscience of rendering to all their due, to God his due, and to men their's. Note, None but a downright honest man, can find favour with God; that conversation which will be pleasing to God, and therefore be good-willed by sinfully and gaudily sincerity, not by fleshly wisdom, 2 Cor. 1. 12. God has sometimes chosen the foolish things of the world, but he never chose the knowish things of it. [2. He was perfect, not with a sinless perfection, but a perfection of sincerity; and it is well for us, that by virtue of the covenant of grace, upon the score of Christ's righteousness, sincerity is accepted as our gospel perfection. [3.] He walked with God, as Noah had done before him; he was not only honest, but devout: he walked, that is, he acted: with God, as one always under his eye; he lived a life of communion with God; it was his constant care to conform himself to the will of God, to please him, and to approve himself to him. Note, God looks down upon those with an eye of favour, who sincerely look up to him with an eye of faith. But, [4.] That which crowns his character, is, that thus he was, and thus he died, in his generation, in that corrupt degenerate age in which his lot was cast, which is, as his treatment was religious, when religion is in fashion; but it is an evidence of strong faith and resolution, to swim against a stream to heaven, and to appear for God, when no one else appears for him; so Noah did, and it is upon record, to his immortal honour.

11. The earth also was corrupt before God, and the earth was filled with violence. 12. And God looked upon the earth, and, behold, it was corrupt; for all flesh had corrupted his way upon the earth.

The wickedness of that generation is here again spoken of. 1. As a foil to Noah's piety; he was just and perfect, when all the earth was corrupt, v. 2. As a further justification of God's resolution to destroy the world, which he was now about to communicate to his servant Noah.

1. All kind of sin was found among them, v. 11, it is said that the earth was (1.) Corrupt before God, that is, in the matters of God's worship: either they had other gods before him, or, they worshipped him by images, or, they were corrupt and wicked in despite and contempt of God, daring him and defying him to his face. (2.) The earth was also filled with violence, and iniquity; and (3.) There was no order or regular government; no man was safe in the possession of that which he had the most clear and incontestable right to, no to the most innocent life, nothing but murders, rapes, and rapine. Note, Wickedness, as it is the shame of the human nature so is it the ruin of human society; it takes away conscience and the fear of God, and men become beasts and devils to one another, like the fishes of the sea, where the greater devour the lesser. Sin fills the earth with violence, and so turns the world into a wilderness, into a cock-pit.

2. The proof and evidence of it were undeniable; for God looked upon the earth, and was himself eye-witness of the corruption that was in it, of which before, v. 5. The righteous judge in all his judgments proceeds upon the infallible certainty of his own omniscience, Ps. 33. 13.

3. That which most aggravated the matter, was the universal spreading of the contagion. All flesh had corrupted his way. It was not some particular nation or cities that were thus wicked, but the whole world of mankind were so: there was none that did good, no, not one, beside Noah. Note, When wickedness is become general and universal, ruin is not far off; while there is a remnant of praying people in a nation to empty the measure as it fills, judgments may be kept off a great while; but when all hands are at work to pull down the fences by sin, and none stand in the gap to make up the breach, what can be expected but an inundation of wrath?

13 And God said unto Noah, The end of all flesh is come before me; for the earth is filled with violence through them; and, behold, I will destroy them with the earth. 14. Make thee an ark of gopher-wood; rooms shalt thou make in the ark, and shall pitch it within and without with pitch. 15. And this is the fashion which thou shalt make it of: The length of the ark shall be three hundred cubits, the breadth of it fifty cubits, and the height of it thirty cubits. 16. A window shalt thou make to the ark, and in a cubit shalt thou finish it above; and the door of the ark shalt thou set in the side thereof; with lower, second, and third, stories shalt thou make it. 17. And, behold, I, even I, do bring a flood of waters upon the earth, to destroy all flesh, wherein is the breath of life from under heaven; and every thing that is in the earth, shall die. 18. But with thee will I establish my covenant; and thou shalt come into the ark, thou, and thy sons, and thy wife, and thy sons’ wives with thee. 19. And of every living thing of all flesh, two of every sort shalt thou bring into the ark, to keep them alive with thee; they shall be male and female. 20. Of fowls after their kind, and of cattle after their kind, of every creeping thing of the earth after his kind, two of every sort shall come unto thee, to keep them alive. 21. And take thou unto thee of all food that is eaten, and thou shalt gather it to thee; and it shall be for food for thee and for them.

Here it appears indeed, that Noah found grace in the eyes of the Lord; God’s favour to him was plainly intimated in what he said to him, v. 8. 16, where his name is mentioned five times in five lines, when once might have served to make the sense clear, as if the Holy Ghost took a pleasure in perpetuating his memory; but it appears much more in what he says to him in these verses—the informations and instructions here given him.

1. God here makes Noah the man of his counsel; communicating to him his purpose to destroy this wicked world by water, as, afterward, he told Abra- ham his resolution concerning Sodom, ch. 18. 17, Shall I hide from Abraham? So here, Shall I hide from Noah, the thing that I do, seeing that he shall be the keeper of the covenant? Who then is it with that fear him, Ps. 25. 14; it was with his servants the prophets, Amos 3. 7, by a spirit of revelation, informing them particularly of his purposes; it is with all believers, by a spirit of wisdom and faith, enabling to understand and apply the general declarations of the written word, and the warnings therein given.

Now, God told Noah, in general, that he would destroy the world, v. 13. The end of all flesh is come before me; I will destroy them, that is, The ruin of this wicked world is decreed and determined; it is come; that is, it will come surely, and come quickly. Noah, it is likely, in preaching to his neighbours, had warned them, in general, of the wrath of God that they would bring upon themselves by their wickedness, and now God seconds it by a particular denunciation of wrath, that Noah might try the faith and resolution of them, both to work upon their hearts.

(1.) That God confirmeth the words of his messengers, Isa. 44. 26. (2.) That to him that has, and uses what he has for the good of others, more shall be given, more full instructions. 2. He told him particularly, that he would destroy the world by a flood of waters, v. 17, And behold, I, even I, do bring a flood of waters upon the earth. God could have destroyed all mankind by the sword of an angel, a flaming sword turning every way, as he destroyed all the first-born of the Egyptians, and the camp of the Assyrians; and then there needed no more than to set a mark upon Noah and his family for their preservation; but God chose to do it by a flood of waters, which should drown the world. The reasons, we may be sure, were wise and just, though to us unknown. God has many arrows in his quiver, and he may use which he pleases: as he chooses the sword with which he will correct his children, so he chooses the sword with which he will cut off his enemies.

Observe the manner of expression, I, even I, do bring a flood; I that am infinite in power, and therefore can do it, infinite in justice, and therefore will do it. (1.) It bespeaks the certainty of the judgment; I, even I, will do it; that cannot but be done effectually, which God himself undertakes the doing of, see Job 11. 10. (2.) It bespeaks the tendency of it to God’s glory, and the honour of his justice; thus he will be magnified and exalted in the earth, and all the world shall be made to know that he is the God to whom vengeance belongs: methinks the expression here is somewhat like that, Isa. 1. 24, Ah, I will case me of mine adversaries.

II. God here makes Noah the man of his covenant, another Hebrew periphrasis of a friend, v. 18, But with thee will I establish my covenant. 1. The covenant of forsoverience; that the course of nature shall be continued to the end of time, notwithstanding the wickedness of man, the flood was, as he destroyed all the first-born of the Egyptians, immediate, God and his sons, ch. 9. 8, &c. They were as trustees for all this part of the creation, and a great honour was thereby put upon him and his. 2. The covenant of grace; that God would be to him a God, and that out of his seed God would take to himself a people. Note, (1.) When God makes a covenant, he establishes it, he makes it sure, he makes it good; his are everlasting covenants. (2.) The covenant of grace has in it the recompense of singular services, and the fountain and foundation of all distinguishing favours; we need desire no more, either to make up our losses for God, or to make up a happiness for us in God, than to have the world sufficed with us.

III. 2. God here makes Noah a monument of sparing mercy, by putting him in a way to secure himself in the approaching deluge, that he might not perish with the rest of the world. I will destroy them, says God, with the earth, v. 13. 'But make thee an ark; I will take care to preserve thee alive.

Note, Singular piety shall be recompensed with distinguishing salvations, which are in a sense peculiarly our application. This will add much to the honour and happiness of glorified saints, that they shall be saved, when the greatest part of the world is left to perish.

Now, 1. God directs Noah to make an ark, v. 14. 16. This ark was like the hull of a ship, fitted not to sail upon the waters, (there was no occasion for that, when there should be no shore to sail to,) but to float upon the waters, waiting for their fall. God could have secured Noah by the ministration of angels, without putting him to any care or pains or trouble, himself; but he chose to employ him in making that which was to be the means of his preservation, both for the trial of his faith and obedience, and to teach us that none shall be saved by Christ, but those only that work out their salvation; we cannot do it without God, and he will not without us: both the providence of God, and the grace of God, are in this a crown to the endures of the obedient and diligent.

God gave him very particular instructions concerning this building, which could not but be admirably well-fitted for the purpose, when Infinite Wisdom itself was the Architect. (1.) It must be made of gopher wood: Noah, doubtless knew what sort of wood that was, though now we do not, whether poplar, or cypress, or what else: it must make it three stories high within. (2.) He must divide it into cabins, with partitions, places fitted for the several sorts of creatures, so as to lose no room. (4.) Exact dimensions are given him, that he might make it proportionable, and might have room enough in it to answer the intention, and no more. Note, [1.] Those that work for God, must take their measures from him, and carefully observe them. (2.) It is not enough if he who builds our habitations should fix the bounds and limits of it. (5.) He must pitch it within and without, to shed off the rain, and to prevent the water from soaking in; within, to take away the ill smell of the beasts, when kept close. Observe, God does not bid him paint it, but pitch it. If God give us habitations that are safe, and warm, and wholesome, we are bound to be thankful, though they are not magnificent or nice. (6.) He must have a little window towards the top, to let in light, and (some think) that through that window he might behold the desolations to be made in the earth. (7.) He must make a door in the side of it, by which to go in and out.

2. God promises Noah, that he and his should be preserved alive in the ark, v. 18. Thou shalt come into the ark. Note, What we do in obedience to God, we ourselves are likely to receive the benefit of; If thou be wise, thou shalt be wise for thyself. Nor was he himself only saved in the ark, but his wife, and his sons, and his sons' wives. Observe, (1.) The care of good parents; they are solicitous not only for their own salvation, but for the salvation of their families, and especially their children. (2) The happiness of those children that have godly parents; their parents' piety often continues, even where they have not the benefit of it, and it furthers them in the way to eternal salvation, if they improve the benefit of it.

IV. God here makes Noah a great blessing to the world, and herein makes him an eminent type of the Messiah, though not the Messiah himself, as his parents expected, ch. 5. 29.

1. God made him a preacher to the men of that generation. As a watchman, he received the word from God's mouth, that he might give them warning, Ezek. 3. 17. Thus while the long-suffering of God waited, by his spirit in Noah, he preached to the old world, who, when St. Peter wrote, were spirited in prison, 1 Pet. 3. 18., 20. and herein he was the type of Christ, who, as the Lord our righteous one, wherein all flesh had corrupted their way, went about preaching repentance, and warning men of a deluge of wrath coming.

2. God made him a saviour to the inferior creatures, to keep the several kinds of them from perishing and being lost in the deluge, v. 19., 21. This was a great honour put upon him, that not only in him the race of mankind should be kept up, and that from him should proceed a new world, the church, the soul of that world, and Messiah, the Head of that church; but that he should be instrumental to preserve the inferior creatures, and so mankind should in him acquire a new title to them and their service. (1.) He was to provide shelter for them, that they might not be drowned. Two of every sort, male and female, he must take with him into the ark; and lest he should make any difficulty of gathering them together, and getting them in, God promises, v. 19., that the Lord of his own accord come to him. He that makes the ox to know his owner and his crib, then made him know his preserver and his ark. (2.) He was to provide sustenance for them, that they might not be starved, v. 21. He must victual his ship according to the number of his crew, that great family which he had now the charge of, and according to the time appointed for the deluge. (3.) We are, by the appointment of Christ, to whom it is owing that the world stands, by whom all things consist, and who preserves mankind from being totally cut off and ruined by sin; in him the holy seed is saved alive, and the creation rescued from the vanity under which it groans. Noah saved these whom he was to rule; so does Christ, Heb. 5. 9.

22. Thus did Noah, according to all that God commanded him, so did he.

Noah's care and diligence in building the ark may be considered. 1. As an effect of his faith in the word of God, God had told him he would shortly drown the world; he believed it, feared the threatened deluge, and, in that fear, prepared the ark. Note, We ought to mix faith with the revelation God has made of his wrath against all ungodliness and unrighteousness of men; the threatenings of the word are not false alarms. Much might have been objected against the credibility of this warning given to Noah. "Who could believe that the wise God, who made the world, should so soon make it again; who had drawn the waters off the dry land, ch. 1. 9., 10., should cause them to cover it again? How would this be reconciled with the mercy of God, which is over all his works; especially that the innocents creatures should die for man's sin? What would water be had sufficient to deluge the world? And, if it must be so, why should notice be given of it to Noah only?" But Noah's faith triumphed over all these corrupt reasonings.

2. As an act of obedience to the command of God; had he consulted with flesh and blood, many objections would have been raised against building, such a one as he never saw, so large, and of such exact dimensions, would put him upon a great deal of care, and labour, and expense; it would be a work of time, the vision was for a great while to come; his neighbours would ridicule him for his credulity, and he would be the song of the drunkards; his building would be called Noah's folly; if the worst came to the worst, as we say, each would fare as well as his neighbours. But these, and a thousand such objections, Noah by faith got over; his obedience was ready and resolute. Thus did Noah willingly and cheerfully, without murmuring and disputing. God says, Do this, and he does it: it was also punctual and persevering; he did all exactly according to the instructions given him, and having begun to build, did not give off till he had finished it: so did he, and so must we do.

2. An instance of wisdom for himself, thus to provide for his own safety; he feared the deluge, and therefore prepared the ark. Note, When God gives warning of approaching judgments, it is our wisdom and duty to provide accordingly. See Exod. 9. 20, 21. Ezek. 3. 18. We must prepare to meet the Lord in his judgments on earth, flee to his name as a strong tower. Prov. 18. 10; enter into our chambers, Isa. 26. 20, 21, especially prepare to meet him in the judgment of the great day, build upon Christ the Rock, Mark. 7. 24, go into Christ the Ark.

4. As intended for warning to a careless world: and it was fair warning of the deluge coming; every blow of his axes and hammers was a call to repentance, a call to them to prepare arks too. But since by it he could not convince the world, by it he condemned the world, Heb. 11. 7.

CHAP. VII.

In this chapter, we have the performance of what was foretold in the foregoing chapter, both concerning the destruction of the old world, and the salvation of Noah; for we may be sure that no word of God shall fail to the ground. There we left Noah busy about his ark, and full of care to get it finished in time, while the rest of his neighbours were laughing at him for his pains. Now here we see what was the end thereof; the end of his care, and of their carelessness. And this famous period of the old world gives us some idea of the state of things, when the world that now is, shall be destroyed by fire, as that was by water. See 2 Pet. 3. 6, 7. We have, in this chapter, I. God's gracious call to Noah to come into the ark, v. 1, and to bring the creatures that were to be preserved with him, v. 2. II. Noah's obedience to that call, v. 4. II. Noah's obedience to his heavenly vision, v. 5. When he was six hundred years old, he came with his family into the ark, v. 6, 7, and brought the things appointed for him, v. 8, 9, an account of which is repeated, v. 13, 16. III. The Lord's tender care to shut him in. III. The coming of the threatened deluge, v. 10, the causes of it, v. 11, 12, the prevalency of it, v. 17, 18. IV. The dreadful desolations that were made by it in the death of every living creature upon earth, except those that were in the ark, v. 21, 23. V. The continuance of it in full sea, before it began to ebb, one hundred and fifty days, v. 24.

1. AND the Lord said unto Noah, Come thou, and all thy house, into the ark; for thou have I seen righteous before me in this generation. 2. Of every clean beast thou shalt take to thee by sevens, the male and his female: and of beasts that are not clean by two, the male and his female. 3. Of fowls also of the air by sevens, the male and the female: to keep seed alive upon the face of all the earth. 4. For yet seven days, and I will cause it to rain upon the earth forty days and forty nights; and every living substance that I have made will I destroy from off the face of the earth.

Here is, I. A gracious invitation of Noah and his family Vol. I. --I into a place of safety, now that the flood of waters was coming on, v. 1.

1. The call itself is very kind, like that of a tender father to his children, to come in doors, when he sees night or a storm coming; Come thou, and all thy house, that small family that thou hast, into the ark. Observe, (1.) Noah did not go into the ark till God bade him; though he knew it was designed for his place of refuge, yet he waited for a renewed command, and had it. It is very comfortable to allow the calls of Providence, and to see God going before us in the way we take. (2.) God does not bid him go into the ark, but come into it, implying that God would go with him, would lead him into it, accompany him in it, and in due time bring him safe out of it. Note, Wherever we are, it is very desirable to have the presence of God with us, for that is all in all, to the comfort of every condition. This was it that made Noah's ark, which was a prison, to be to him not only a refuge, but a palace. (3.) Noah had taken a great deal of pains to build the ark, and now he was himself preserved alive in it. Note, What we do in obedience to the command of God, and in faith, we ourselves shall certainly have the comfort of, first or last. (4.) Not he only, but his house also, his wife and children, are called with him into the ark. Note, It is good to belong to the family of a godly man; it is the pleasantest and comfortablest to dwell under such a shadow. One of Noah's sons was Ham, who proved afterward a bad man, yet he was saved in the ark; which intimates, [1.] That wicked children often fare the better for the sake of their godly parents. [2.] That there is a mixture of bad with good in the best societies on earth, and we are not to think it strange; in Noah's family there was a Ham, and in Christ's family there was a Judas; there is no perfect purity on this side but he who is of Christ. That call to Noah was a type of the call which the gospel gives to poor sinners. Christ is an ark already prepared, in whom alone we can be safe, when death and judgment come; now the burden of the song is, "Come, come," the word says, "Come;" ministers say, "Come;" the Spirit says, "Come, come into the ark.

2. The reason for this invitation is a very honourable testimony to Noah's integrity, For thee have I seen righteous before me in this generation. Observe, (1.) Those are righteous indeed, that are righteous in the sight of God. God takes not only the form of godliness by which they appear right, but the substance of it, and looks to those men, who may easily be imposed upon, but the power of it, by which they approve themselves to God, who searches the heart, and cannot be deceived in men's character. (2.) God takes notice of, and is pleased with, those that are righteous before him; They have I seen righteous before him; They have I seen. In a world of wicked people, God could see one righteous Noah; that singular grace of God, that just comfort and cure in so great a heap of chaff. The Lord knows them that are his. (3.) God that is a Witness to, will shortly be a witness for, his people's integrity; he that sees it, will proclaim it before angels and men, to their immortal honour. They that obtain mercy to be righteous shall obtain witness that they are righteous. (4.) God is, in a special manner, pleased with those that are preserved in bad times and places. Noah was therefore illustriously righteous because he was so in that wicked and adulterous generation. (5.) Those that keep themselves pure in times of common iniquity, God will keep safe in times of common calamity; those that partake not with others in their sins, shall not partake with them in their plagues; these that are better than others, are, even in this life, safer than others, and it is better with them.
II. Here are necessary orders given concerning the brute creatures that were to be preserved alive with Noah in the ark, v. 2, 3. They were not capable of receiving the warning and directions themselves, as man was, who hereinafter is taught more than the beasts of the earth, and made wise therewith the foresight of all their future conduct. God is not of small effect; therefore man is charged with the care of them: being under his dominion, they must be under his protection; and though he could not secure every individual, yet he must carefully preserve every species, that no tribe, no not the least considerable, might entirely perish out of the creation. Observe in this, 1. God's care for man, and for his comfort and benefit; we do not find that Noah was solicited of himself about this matter, but God suits our happiness more than we do ourselves. Though God saw that the old world was very provoking, and foresaw that the new one would be little better; yet he would preserve the brute-creatures for man's use: Doth God take care for oxen? 1 Cor. 9. 9. Or was it not rather for man's sake that this care was taken? 2. Even the unclean beasts (which were least valuable and profitable) were not forgotten: the ark was to contain all the sacrifices, and the Lord appeared in the power of the Lord in the Ark. 3. Yes, more of the clean were preserved than of the unclean, (1.) Because the clean were most for the service of man; and therefore, in favour to him, more of them were preserved, and are still perpetuated. Thanks be to God, that there are not herds of lions as there are of oxen, nor flocks of tigers as here are of sheep. (2.) Because the clean were for sacrifice to God; and therefore in honour to him, more of them were preserved, three couple for breed, and the odd seventh for sacrifice, ch. 8. 20. God gives us six for one earthly things, as in the distribution of the days of the week, that in spiritual things we should be all for him. What is devoted to God's honour, and used in his service, is particularly blessed and increased. III. Here is notice given of the new imminent approach of the flood, v. 4. Yet seven days, and I will cause it to rain. 1. "It shall be seven days yet, before I do it." After the 120 years were expired, God grants them a reprieve of seven days longer; both to show how slow he is to anger, and that punishing work is his strange work, and also to give them some further space for repentance; but all in vain; these seven days were only to give them time to call the rest they continued, awaken them to discern the things that belonged to their peace, which otherwise would soon be hidden from their eyes. But it is common for those who have been careless of their souls during the years of their health, when they have looked upon death at a distance, to be as careless during the days, the seven days, of their sickness, when they see it approaching, their hearts being hardened by the deceitfulness of sin. 5. And Noah did according unto all that the Lord commanded him. 6. And Noah was six hundred years old when the flood of waters was upon the earth. 7. And Noah went in, and his sons, and his wife, and his sons' wives with him, into the ark, because of the waters of the flood. 8. Of clean beasts, and of beasts that are not clean, and of fowls, and of every thing that creepeth upon the earth. 9. There went in and two unto Noah into the ark, the male and the female, as God had commanded Noah. 10. And it came to pass after seven days, that the waters of the flood were upon the earth. Here is Noah's ready obedience to the commands that God gave him. 1. He went into the ark, upon notice that the flood would come after seven days, though, probably, as yet there appeared no visible sign of its approach, no cloud arising that threatened it, nothing done toward it, but all continued serene and clear; for as he prepared the ark by faith in the warning given, that the world would perish by the flood, he by faith in this warning, that it would come quickly, though he did not see that the second causes had yet begun to work. In every step he took, he walked by faith, and not by sense. During these seven days, it is likely, he was settling himself and his family in the ark, and distributing the creatures into their several apartments, which was the conclusion of the first seven days, in which he had long been preaching to his careless neighbours, to think, if they would, one would think, might have awakened them; but, not obtaining that desired end, it left their blood upon their own heads. 2. He took all his family along with him; his wife, to be his companion and comfort; (though it should seem that, after this, he had no children by her; his sons, and his sons' wives, that by them not only his family, but the world of mankind, might be built up. Observe, Though men were to be reduced to so small a number, and it would be very desirable to have the world speedily repopulated, yet Noah's sons were to have each of them but one wife, which strengthens the arguments against having many wives; for from the beginning of this new world it was not so: at first, God made, so now he kept alive, but one woman for one man; see Math. 19. 4, 8. 3. The brute-creatures readily went in with him: the same hand that at first brought them to Adam to be named, now brought them to Noah to be preserved; the ox now knew his owner, and the ass his protector's crib, nay, even the wildest creatures flocked to it; but man was become more brutish than the brutes themselves, and did not consider, Isa. 1. 3. 11. In the six hundredth year of Noah's life, in the second month, the seventeenth day of the month, the same day were all the fountains of the great deep broken up, and the windows of heaven were opened. 12. And the rain was upon the earth forty days and forty nights. 1. The date of this great event; this is carefully recorded, for the great certainty of the story. 1. It was in the 600th year of Noah's life, which, by computation, appears to be 1656 years from the creation. The fountains of the old world are reckoned, not by the reigns of the giants, but by the lives of the patriarchs; saints are of more account with God than princes: The righteous shall be had in everlasting remembrance. Noah was now a very old man, even as men's years went then. Note, (1.) The longer we live in this world, the more we see of the miseries and calamities of it; it is therefore spoken of as the privilege of those that die young, that their eyes shall not see the evil which is coming.
When find noes, der geer; was loosed, cloud in patience. Now heaven, sealed.

The second causes that concurred in this deluge; in the self-same day that Noah was fixed in the ark, the inundation began. Note, 1. Desolating judgments put out upon God's people, for the security of his own people; see ch. 19. 22, I call nothing till thou be come thither: and we find, Rev. 7. 3, the winds are held till the servants of God are sealed. 2. When good men are removed, judgments are not far off; for they are taken away from the evil to come, Isa. 57. 1. When they are called into the chambers, hidden in the grave, hidden in heaven, then God is coming out of his place to HUD.

Now see what was done on that day, that fatal day to the world of the ungodly. 1. The fountains of the great deep were broken up. Perhaps there needed no new creation of waters; what were already made to be, in the common course of providence, blessings to the earth, were now by an extraordinary act of divine power, made the ruin of it. God has laid up the deep in storehouses, (Ps. 33. 7.) and now he breaks them forth; and he tells us in themselves those humors, which, when God pleases, become the seeds and springs of mortal diseases; so the earth had in its bowels those waters, which, at God's command, sprang up, and flooded it. God had, in the creation, set bars and doors to the waters of the sea, that they might not return to cover the earth, (Ps. 104. 9. Job 38. 9. 11.) and now he only remover, and the least barrier is taken away; and the waters of the sea returned to cover the earth, as they had done at first, ch. 1. 9.

Note, All the creatures are ready to fight against sinful man, and any of them is able to be the instrument of his ruin, if God do but take off the restraints by which they are held in, during the day of God's patience. 2. The windows of heaven were opened, and the waters which were above the firmament went down upon the earth, and the waters of the great deep were broken up, which God has reserved against the day of trouble, the day of battle and war, Job 38. 22, 23. The rain, which ordinarily descends in drops, then came down in streams, or spouts, as they call them in the Indies, where clouds have been often known to burst, as they express it there, when the rain descends in a much more violent torrent than we have ever seen in the greatest shower. We read, Job 26. 8, that God gives rain to the earth, and waters the land, and the cloud is not rent under them; but now the bond was loosed, the cloud was rent, and such rains descended as were never known before or since, in such abundance, and of such continuance: the thick cloud was not, as ordinarily it is, weared with waterings, (Job 37. 11.) that is, soon spent and exhausted; but still the clouds returned after the rain, and the divine power brought in fresh recruits. It rained, without intermission, for weeks and months, and the cloud is not rent under them; but now the bond was loosed, the cloud was rent, and such rains descended as were never known before or since, in such abundance, and of such continuance: the thick cloud was not, as ordinarily it is, weared with waterings.

God made the world in six days, but he was forty days in destroying it; for he is slow to anger; but though the destruction came slowly and gradually, yet it came effectually.

Now learn from this, (1.) That all the creatures are at God's disposal, and that he makes what use he pleases of them, whether for correction, or for his land, or for mercy, as Elisha speaks of the rain, Job 37. 12, 13. (2.) That God often makes that which should be for our welfare, to become a trap, Ps. 69. 22. That which usually is a comfort and benefit to us, becomes, when God pleases, a scourge and a plague to us. Nothing is more needful or useful than waters, but the springs of the earth, and the showers of heaven; and yet, in a case like this, nothing is more hurtful, nothing more destructive: every creature is to be what God makes it. (3.) That it is impossible to escape the righteous judgments of God, when they come against sinners with commission; for God can arm both heaven and earth against them; see Job 20. 27. God can surround men with the messengers of his wrath, so that if they look upward, it is with horror and amazement; if they look to the earth, behold, trouble and darkness, Isa. 8. 21, 22. Who then is able to stand before God, when he is angry? (Lastly,) In this destruction of the old world by water, God gave a specimen of the final destruction of the world that now is, by fire; we find the apostles setting the one of these over against the other, 2 Pet. 3. 6, 7. As there are waters under the earth, so are winds, Vesuvius, and other volcanoes, proof of the world that there are subterraneous fires too; and fire often falls from heaven, many desolations are made by lightning; so that when the time predetermined comes, between these two fires the earth and all the works therein shall be burnt up; as the flood was brought upon the old world out of the fountains of the great deep, and through the windows of heaven.

13. In the self-same day entered Noah, and Shem, and Ham, and Japheth, the sons of Noah, and Noah's wife, and the three wives of his sons with them, into the ark; 14. They and every beast after his kind, and all the cattle after their kind, and every creeping thing that creepeth upon the earth after his kind, and every fowl of every sort. 15. And they went in unto Noah into the ark, two and two of all flesh, wherein is the breath of life. 16. And they that went in, went in male and female of all flesh, as God had commanded him: and the Lord shut him in.

Here is repeated what was before of Noah's entrance into the ark, with his family and the creatures that were marked for preservation.

1. It is thus repeated, for the honour of Noah, whose faith and obedience herein shines so bright, by which he obtained a good report, and who herein appeared so great a favourite of Heaven, and so great a blessing to this earth.

2. Notice is here taken of the beasts going in each after his kind, according to the phrase used in the history of the creation, ch. 1. 24, 25, to intimate that just as many kinds as were created at first, were saved now, and no more; and that this preservation was as a new creation; a life remarkably protected, is, as it were, a new life.

3. Though all enmities and hostilities between the creatures ceased, for the present, and ravaging creatures were not only so mild and manageable, as that the wolf and the lamb lay down together, but so strangely altered, as that the lion did eat straw like an ox, Isa. 11. 6, 7, yet, when this present occasion was over, the restraint was taken off, and they were still of the same kind as ever; for the ark did not alter their constitution. Hypocrites in the church, that externally conform to the laws of ark, may yet be unchangeable; and then it will appear, one time or other, what kind they are after.

IV. It is added, (and the circumstance deserves our notice,) The Lord shut him in, v. 16. As Noah continued his obedience to God, so God continued his care of Noah; and here it appeared to be very dextrously distinguishing care; for the crying wall between him and all the world besides. God shut the door. 1. To secure him, and keep him safe in the ark. The door must be shut very close, lest the waters should break in, and sink the ark, and very fast, lest any without should break it down. Thus God made up Noah, as he makes up his jewels, Mal. 3. 17. 2. To exclude all others, and keep them for ever out. Bitherto, the door of the ark was opened, and it is related, that seven days, had repented and believed, for 'twas known, they might have been welcomed into the ark; but now, the door was shut, and they were cut off from all hopes of admittance: for God shutteth, and none can open.

V. There is much of our Gospel-duty and privileges to be seen in Noah's preservation in the ark. The apostle makes it a type of our baptism, that is, our circumcision: Efc. 2. 11. It was a great duty, in obedience to the gospel-call, by a lively faith in Christ, to come into that way of salvation which God has provided for poor sinners. When Noah came into the ark, he quitted his own house and lands; so must we quit our own righteousness and our worldly possessions, whenever they come into competition with Christ. Noah must, for a while, submit to the confinements and inconveniences of the ark, in order to his preservation for a new world; so those that come into Christ to be saved by him, must deny themselves, both in sufferings and services. 2. Those that come into the ark themselves, should bring as many as they can in with them, by good instructions, by persuasions, and by a good example: What knowest thou, O man, but thou mayest thus save thy wife, (1 Cor. 7. 16.) as Noah did his. There is room enough in Christ for all comers. 3. Those that by faith come into Christ, the Ark, shall by the power of God be shut in, and kept as in a strong hold by the power of God, 1 Pet. 1. 5. God put Adam into paradise, but he did not shut him in, and so he threw himself out; but when he put Noah into the ark, he shut him in, and so when he brings a soul to Christ, he insures the salvation: it is not in our own keeping, but in the Mediator's hand. 4. The door of mercy will shortly be shut against those, that now make light of it. Now, knock, and it shall be opened; but the time will come, when it shall not, Luke 13. 25.

17. And the flood was forty days upon the earth; and the waters increased, and bare up the ark, and it was lift up above the earth. 18. And the waters prevailed, and were increased greatly upon the earth; and the ark went upon the face of the waters. 19. And the waters prevailed exceedingly upon the earth; and all the high hills, that were under the whole heaven, were covered. 20. Fifteen cubits upward did the waters prevail; and the mountains were covered.

We are here told,

1. How long the flood was increasing; forty days, v. 17. The profane world which believed not that it would come, probably, when it came, fluttered themselves with hopes that it would soon abate, and never come to extremity; but still it increased, it prevailed. Note, (1.) When God judges, he will overcome. If he begin, he will make an end; his way is perfect both in judgment and mercy. (2.) The gradual approaches and advances of God's judgments, which are designed to bring sinners to repentance, are often abused to the hardening of them in their impenitency.

2. To what degree they increased; they rose so high, that not only the low flat countries were deluged, but, to make sure work, and that none might escape, the tops of the highest mountains were overflown, fifteen cubits, that is, seven yards and a half. So that in vain was salvation hoped for from hills or mountains, Jer. 3. 23. None of God's creatures are so high, but his power can overpower them; and he will make them know that wherein they deal proudly, he is above them. Perhaps the tops of the mountains were washed down by the strength of the waters, which helped much toward the prevailing of the waters above them; for it is said, Job 12. 5. He sends out the waters, and they not only overflow, but overturn, the earth. Thus the refuge of lies was swept away, and the waters overflowed the hiding-place of those sinners, (Isa. 28. 17.) and in vain they fly to them for safety, Rev. 6. 16. Now the mountains departed, and the hills were removed, and nothing stood a man in stead but the covenant of peace, Isa. 54. 10. There is no place on earth so high as to set men out of the reach of God's judgments, Jer. 49. 16. Obad. 3. 4. God's hand will find out all his enemies, Ps. 21. 8. Observe how exactly they are fathomed, (fifteen cubits,) not by Noah's plummet, but by his knowledge who weighed the waters by the measure. What became of Noah's ark, when the waters thus increased? it was lift up above the earth, (v. 17.) and went upon the face of the waters, v. 18. When all other buildings were demolished by the waters, and buried under them, the ark alone subsisted. Observe, (1.) The waters which brake down every thing else, bare up the ark. That which to unbelievers is a favour of death unto death, is to the faithful a favour of life unto life. (2.) The more the waters increased, the higher the ark was lifted up toward heaven. Thus sanctified afflictions are spiritual promotions; and as troubles abound, consolations much more abound.

21. And all flesh died that moved upon the earth, both of fowl, and of cattle, and of beast, and of every creeping thing that creepeth upon the earth, and every man: 22. All in whose nostrils was the breath of life, of all that was in the dry land, died. 23. And every living substance was destroyed, which was upon the face of the ground, both man, and cattle, and the creeping things, and the fowl of the heaven; and they were destroyed from the earth: and Noah only remained alive, and they that were with him in the ark. 24. And the waters prevailed upon the earth an hundred and fifty days.
dry land, v. 22. Every living substance, v. 23. And why so? Man only had done wickedly, and justly is God's hand against him; but these sheepe, what have they done? Answer, (1.) We are sure God did them no wrong; he is the sovereign Lord of all life, for he is the sole Fountain and Author of it. He that made them as he pleased, might unmake them as he pleased: and who shall say unto him, What doeth that? May he not do what he will with his own, which were created for his pleasure? (2.) God did admirably serve the purposes of his own glory by their destruction, as well as by their creation. Herein his holiness and justice were greatly magnified: by this appears that he hates sin, and is highly displeased with sinners, when he multiplies: and in the case, they are the servants of man, and part of his possession, and because they have been abused to be the servants of sin, are destroyed with him. This makes the judgment the more remarkable, the more dreadful, and consequently, the more expressive of God's wrath and vengeance. The destruction of the creatures was their deliverance from the bondage of corruption, which deliverance the whole creation groans after, Rom. 8. 21, 22. It is likewise an instance of God's wisdom. As the creatures were made for man when he was made, so they were multiplied: and therefore, now that mankind was reduced to so small a number, it was fit that the beasts should proportionably be reduced, otherwise they would have had the dominion, and would have replenished the earth, and the remnant of mankind it that left would have been overpowered by them. See how God considered this in another case, Exod. 23. 29. Let the beasts of the field multiply against thee. 2. All the men, women, and children, that were in the world, (except what were in the ark,) died. Every man, v. 21, and v. 23, and perhaps they were as many as are now upon the face of the earth, if not more. Now, (1.) We may easily imagine what terror and consternation seized on them when they saw themselves surrounded. Our Saviour tells us, that till the very day that the flood came, they were eating and drinking, Luke 17. 26, 27, they were drowned in security and sensuality, before they were drowned in those waters; crying, Peace, peace, to themselves; deaf and blind to all divine warnings. In this posture death surprised them, as 1 Sam. 50. 16, 17. But O what an amendment did they in this case? Now the first thing that they would not believe and fear, and are convinced of their folly when it is too late; now they find no place for repentance, though they seek it carefully with tears. (2.) We may suppose that they tried all ways and means possible for their preservation, but all in vain. Some clung to the tops of trees or mountains, and spin out their terrors there awhile. But the flood reaches them, at last, and they are turned into derision. Some, it is likely, clung to the ark, and now hope that that may be their safety, which they had so long made their sport. Perhaps some get to the top of the ark, and hope to shift for themselves there; but either they perish there for want of food, or, by a speedier despatch, a dash of rain washes them off that deck. Others, it may be, hoped to prevail with Noah for admittance into the ark; perhaps he pleased them. Have we not eaten and drunk in thy presence? Hast thou not taught in our streets? "Yes," might Noah say, "I have, many a time, to little purpose. I called, but ye refused; ye set at naught all my counsel, Prov. 1. 24, 25, and now it is not in my power to help you: God has shut the door, and I cannot open it." Thus it will be at the great day. Neither climbing high in an outward profession, nor claiming relation to good people, will bring men to heaven, Matt. 7. 22.—25, 8, 9. Those that are not found in Christ, the Ark, are certainly undone, for ever; salvation itself cannot save them. See Isa. 10. 32. 5. We may suppose that some of those who perished in the deluge, had themselves assisted Noah, or were employed by him, in the building of the ark, and yet were not so wise as by repentance to secure themselves a place in it. Thus wicked ministers, though they may have been instrumental to help others to heaven, will themselves be thrust down to hell. Let us now pause awhile, and consider this tremendous judgment! Let our hearts meditate terror, the terror of this destruction: let us see, and say, It is a fearful thing to fall into the hands of the living God; who can stand before him when he is angry? Let us see, and say, It is an evil thing, and a bitter, to depart from God. The sin of sinners will, without repentance, be their ruin, first or last; if God be true it will. Though hand join in hand, yet the wicked shall not go unpunished. The righteous God knows how to bring a flood upon the world of the ungodly, 2 Pet. 2. 5. Elijahias appeals to this story as a standing warning to a careless world, Job. 22, 15, 16, Hast thou marked the old way, which wicked men have trodden, which were cut down out of time, and sent into eternity, whose foundation was overflowed with the flood? 11. The special preservation of Noah and his family by the mark, Noah only 4, others that were with him in the ark. Observe, 1. Noah lives; when all about him were monuments of justice, thousands falling on his right hand, and ten thousands on his left, he was a monument of mercy; only with his eyes might he behold and see the reward of the wicked, Ps. 91. 7, 8. In the floods of great waters, they did not come nigh him, Ps. 32. 6. We have reason to think, that while the long-suffering and plenteous of God waited, Noah not only preached, but prayed for, that wicked world, and would have turned away the wrath; but his prayers return into his own bosom, and are answered only in his own escape; which is plainly referred to, Ezek. 14. 14, Noah, Daniel, and Job, shall but deliver their own souls. A mark of honour shall be set on intercessors. 2. He but lives. Noah remains alive, and that is all; he is, in effect, buried alive; cooped up in a small place, surrounded with the waters, and the increasing flood, and the shrieks and outrages of his perishing neighbours—his heart overwhelmed with melancholy thoughts of the desolations made: but he comforts himself with this, that he is in the way of duty, and in the way of deliverance. And we are taught, Jer. 44. 3, 5, that when desolating judgments are abroad, we must not seek great or pleasant things to ourselves, but reckon it an unspeakable favour, if we have our lives given us for a prey. CHAP. VIII. In the close of the foregoing chapter, we left the world in ruins, and the church in straits; but in this chapter, we have the repair of the one, and the enlargement of the other. Now the second part of the discourse is presented to us, and the brighter side of that cloud which there appeared so black and dark: for though God contend long, he will contend for ever, nor be always wrath. We have here, I. The earth made anew, by the recess of the waters, and the appearing of the dry land, now a second time, and both gradual. 1. The increase of the waters is stayed, v. 1, 2. 2. They begin sensibly to abate, v. 3. 3. After sixteen days' ebbing, andark rests, v. 4. 4. The waters, and the tops of the mountains appeared above water, v. 5. 5. After forty days' ebbing, and twenty days before the mountains appeared, Noah began to send out his spicew. a raven and a dove, to gain intelligence, v. 6. 12. 6. Two
A ND God remembered Noah, and every living thing, and all the cattles that were with him in the ark: and God made a wind to pass over the earth, and the waters assuaged. 2. The fountains also of the deep, and the windows of heaven were stopped, and the rain from heaven was restrained; 3. And the waters returned from off the earth continually: and after the end of the hundred and fifty days, the waters were abated.

Here is, 1. An act of God's grace. God remembered Noah and every living thing. This is an expression after the manner of men; for not any of his creatures, much less of his people, are forgotten of God, Isa. 49. 15. 16. But,

1. The whole race of mankind, except Noah and his family, was now extinguished, and gone into the land of forgetfulness, to be remembered no more; so that God's remembering Noah was the return of his mercy to mankind, of whom he would not make a full end. It is a strange expression, Ezek. 3. 13. When I have accomplished my fury in the desolate, then will I cause the exhalings of the earth to be assuaged, and the exhaled fumes of the earth to be dispersed. The demands of divine justice had been answered by the ruin of those sinners: he had eased him of his adversaries, Isa. 1. 24, and now his spirit was quieted, Zech. 6. 8, and he remembered Noah and every living thing. He remembered mercy in wrath, Hab. 3. 2, remembered the days of old, Isa. 63. 11, remembered the holy seed, and then remembered Noah.

2. Noah himself, though one that had found grace in the eyes of the Lord, yet seemed to be forgotten in the ark, and left to think himself so; for we do not find that God had told him how long he should be confined, and when he shall be released. Very good men have sometimes been ready to conclude themselves forgotten of God, especially when their afflictions have been unusually grievous and long. Perhaps Noah, though a great believer, yet when he found the flood continuing so long after it might reasonably be presumed to have done its work, was tempted to fear lest he that shut him in, would keep him in, and began to expostulate, How long wilt thou forget me? But at length, God returned in mercy to him, and that is expresse d by remembering him. Note, Those that remember God, shall certainly be remembered by him, how desolate and disconsolate soever, their condition may be. He will appoint them a set time, and remember them, Job 14. 13.

3. With Noah, God remembered every living thing; for though his delight is especially in the sons of men, yet he rejoices in all his works, and hates nothing that he has made. He takes special care not only of his people's persons, but of their possessions; of them and all that belongs to them. He considered the cattle of Nineveh, Jonah 4. 11.

II. An act of God's power over wind and water, neither of which is under man's control, but both at his beck. Observe, 1. He commanded the wind, and said to that, G2, and it went, in order to the carrying off of the flood. God made a wind to pass over the earth. See here, (1.) What was God's remembrance of Noah; it was his relieving of him. Note, Those whom God remembers, he remembers effectually, for good; he remembers us to save us, that we may remember him to serve him. (2.) What a sovereign dominion God has over the winds! He has them in his fist, Prov. 30. 19. God brings all things under his feet, Ps. 135. 7. He sends them when, and whither, and for what purposes, he pleases. Even stormy winds fulfil his word, Ps. 148. 8. It should seem, while the waters increased, there was no wind; for that would have added to the terrors of the ark; but now God sent a wind, when it would not be troublesome. Probably, it was a north wind, for that drives away rain. However, it was a drying wind, with a high and dry east wind, to divide the Red sea before Israel, Exod. 14. 21.

2. He remanded the waters, and said to them, Come, and they came. (1.) He took away the cause. He sealed up the springs of those waters, the fountains of the great deep, and the windows of heaven. Note, [1.] As God had a key to open, so he has a key to shut up again, and to stay the progress of judgments by stopping the causes of them: and the wind, which has, in the preceding verse, brought the deliv erance; to that hand therefore our eye must ever be. He that wounds is alone able to heal. See Job 12. 14. 15. [2.] When afflictions have done the work for which they are sent, whether killing work or curing work, they shall be removed. God's word shall not return void, Isa. 55. 11. 12. Then the effect ceased; not all at once, but by degrees. The waters assuaged, v. 1, returned from off the earth continually, v. 3. Heb. they were going and returning, which shows a gradual departure. The heat of the sun exhaled much, and perhaps the subterraneous caverns soaked in more. Note, As the earth was not drowned in a day, so it was not dried in a day. In the creation, it was but one day's work to clear the earth from the waters that covered it, and to make it dry land; nay, it was but half a day's work, ch. 1. 9, 10. But the work of creation being finished, this work of providence was effected by the concurring influence of second causes, yet thus enforced by the almighty power of God. God usually works deliverance for his people gradually, that the day of small things may not be despaired, nor the day of great things despised of, Zech. 4. 10. See Prov. 4. 18.

4. And the ark rested in the seventh month, on the seventeenth day of the month, upon the mountains of Ararat. 5. And the waters decreased continually until the tenth month: in the tenth month, on the first day of the month, were the tops of the mountains seen.

Here we have the effects and evidences of the ebbings of the waters. 1. The ark rested. This was some satisfaction to Noah, to feel the house he was in, upon firm ground, and no longer moveable. It rested upon a mountain, whither it was directed, not by Noah's prudence, (he did not steer it,) but by the wise and gracious providence of God, that it might rest the sooner. Note, God has times and places of rest for his people after their terrors; and many a time he provides for their seasonable and comfortable settlement without their own contrivance, and quite beyond their own foresight. The ark of the church, though sometimes tossed with tempests, and not comforted, Isa. 54. 11, yet has its rests, Acts 9. 31. 2. The tops of the mountains were seen, like little islands, appearing above the water. We must suppose that they were seen by...
Noah and his sons; for there were none besides to see them: it is probable that they had looked through the window of the ark every day, like the longing mariners, after a tedious voyage, to see if they could discover land, or as the prophet's servant, 1 Kings 18. 43, 44, and at length they spy ground, and enter the day of the discovery in their journal. They felt ground above forty days before they saw it, according to Dr. Lightfoot's computation, whence he infers that if the waters decreased proportionably, the ark drew eleven cubits in water.

6. And it came to pass at the end of forty days, that Noah opened the window of the ark which he had made: 7. And he sent forth a raven, which went forth to and fro, until the waters were dried up from off the earth. 8. Also he sent forth a dove from him, to see if the waters were abated from off the face of the ground; 9. But the dove found no rest for the sole of her foot, and she returned unto him into the ark, for the waters were on the face of the whole earth: then he put forth his hand, and took her, and pulled her in unto him into the ark. 10. And he stayed yet other seven days; and again he sent forth the dove out of the ark; 11. And the dove came in to him in the evening; and, lo, in her mouth was an olive-leaf plucked off: so Noah knew that the waters were abated from off the earth. 12. And he stayed yet other seven days; and sent forth the dove; which returned not again unto him any more.

We have here an account of the spies which Noah sent forth to bring him intelligence from abroad, a raven and a dove. Observe here,

1. That though God had told Noah particularly when the flood would come, even to a day, (ch. 7. 4.) yet he did not give him a particular account by revelation at what times, and by what steps it should go away. 1. Because the knowledge of the future was necessary to his preparing the ark, and setting of himself in it; but the knowledge of the latter would serve only to gratify his curiosity, and the concealing of it from him would be the needful exercise of his faith and patience. And, 2. He could not foresee the flood, but by revelation; but he might, by ordinary means, discover the decrease of it, and therefore God was pleased to leave him to the use of them.

2. That though Noah by faith expected his enlargement, and by patience waited for it, yet he was inquisitive concerning it, as one that thought it long to be thus confined. Note, Desires of release out of trouble, earnest expectations of it, and inquiries concerning its advances towards us, will very well consist with the sincerity of faith and patience. He that believes does not make haste to run before God, but waits not the haste to go forth to meet him, Isa. 28. 16. Particularly, 1. Noah sent forth a raven through the window of the ark, which went forth, as the Hebrew phrase is, going forth and returning, that is flying about, and feeding on the carcases that floated, but returning to the ark for rest; probably, not in it, but upon it. This gave Noah little satisfaction; therefore, 2. He sent forth a dove, which returned the first time with no good news, but, probably, wet and dirty; but, the second time, she brought an olive-leaf in her bill, which appeared to be first plucked off; a plain indication that now the trees, the fruit-trees, began to appear above water.

Note here, (1.) That Noah sent forth the dove the second time, seven days after the first time, and the third time was after seven days too; and, probably, the first sending of her out was seven days after the sending forth of the raven, which intimates that it was done on the sabbath-day, which, it should seem, Noah religiously observed in the ark. Having waited for the sabbath at the assembly of his little church, he then expected special blessings from heaven, and inquired concerning them. Having directed his prayer, he looked up, Ps. 5. 3. (2.) The dove is an emblem of a gracious soul, which finding no rest for its foot, no solid peace or satisfaction in this world, this deluged, defiling world, returns to Christ as to its Ark, as to its Noah. The carnal heart, like the raven, takes up with the world, and feeds on the carcases it finds there; but return thou to thy rest, O my soul, to thy Noah, so the word is, Ps. 116. 7. O that I had wings like a dove, to flee to him! Ps. 55. 6. And as Noah put forth his hand, and took the dove, and pulled her in to him, into the ark, so Christ will graciously preserve, and help, and welcome, those that fly to him for rest. (3.) The olive-branch, which was an emblem of peace, was brought not by the raven, a bird of prey, nor by a gay and proud peacock, but by a mild, patient, humble, dove. It is a dove-like disposition that brings into the soul earnestness of rest and joy. (4.) Some make these things an allegory. The law was first sent forth like the raven, but brought no tidings of the assuaging of the waters of God's wrath, with which the world of mankind was deluged; therefore, in the fulness of time, God sent forth his gospel, as the dove, in the likeness of which the Holy Ghost descended, and gives us with us an olive-branch, and brings in a better hope.

13. And it came to pass in the sixth hundredth and first year, in the first month, the first day of the month, the waters were dried up from off the earth: and Noah removed the covering of the ark, and looked and, behold, the face of the ground was dry. 14. And in the second month, on the seventh and twentieth day of the month, the earth was dried.

1. The ground dry; (v. 14.) that is, all the water carried off it, which, upon the first day of the first month, (a joyful new-year's day it was,) Noah was himself an eye-witness of. He removed the covering of the ark, not the whole covering, but so much as would suffice to give him a prospect of the earth about it; and a most comfortable prospect he had. For behold, behold and wonder, the face of the ground was dry. Note, (1.) It is a great mercy to see ground about us. Noah was more sensible of it than we are: for mercies restored are much more affecting than mercies continued. (2.) The divine power which now renewed the face of the earth, can renew the face of an afflicted troubled soul, and of a distressed persecuted church. He can make dry ground to appear there where it seemed to have been lost and forgotten, Ps. 18. 16.

2. The ground dried, (v. 14.) so as to be a fit habitation for Noah. Observe, Though Noah saw the ground dry the first day of the first month, yet God would not suffer him to go out of the ark till the twenty-seventh day of the same month. For Noah, being somewhat weary of his restraint, would have quitted the ark at first, but God, in kindness to him, ordered him to stay so much longer. Note, God consults our benefit, rather than our desires;
15. And God spake unto Noah, saying, 16. Go forth of the ark, thou, and thy wife, and thy sons, and thy sons' wives with thee. 17. Bring forth with thee every living thing that is with thee, of all flesh, both of fowl, and of cattle, and of every creeping thing that creepeth upon the earth; that they may breed abundantly in the earth, and be fruitful, and multiply upon the earth. 18. And Noah went forth, and his sons, and his wife, and his sons' wives with him: 19. Every beast, every creeping thing, and every fowl, and whatsoever creepeth upon the earth, after their kinds, went forth out of the ark.

Here is, 1. Noah's dismissal out of the ark, v. 15... 17. Observe, 1. Noah did not stir till God bid him. As he had a command to go into the ark, (ch. 7. 1.) so, how tedious soever his confinement there was, he would wait for a command to go out of it again. Note, We must in all our ways acknowledge God, and set him before us in all our removing. The Lord ordained and directed him, and he followed God's direction, and submit to his government. Those that steadfastly adhere to God's word as their rule, and are guided by his grace as their principle, and take hints from his providence to assist them in their application of general directions to particular cases, may in faith see him guiding their motions in their march through this wilderness. 2. Though God detained him long; yet at last he gave him his discharge; for the time is for an appointed time, and at the end it shall speak, it shall speak the truth, (Hab. 2. 3.) it shall not lie. 3. God had said, Come into the ark, which intimated that God went in with him; now he says, not, Come forth, but Go forth, which intimates that God, who went in with him, stood with him all the while, till he sent him out safe; for he has said, I will not leave thee. 4. Some observe, that when they were ordered into the ark, the men and the women were mentioned separately, ch. 6. 18. Thou and thy sons, and thy wife and thy sons' wives; whence they infer that, during the time of mourning, they were apart, and their wives apart, Zech. 12. 12. But now God did as it were new marry them, sending out Noah and his wife together, and his sons and their wives together, that they might be fruitful and multiply. 5. Noah is ordered to bring the creatures out with him; that having taken the care of feeding them so long, and been at so much pains about them, he might have the honour of leading them forth by their armies, and receiving their homage. 6. Noah's departure when he had his dismissal. As he would not go out without leave, so he would not, out of fear or honour, stay in when he had leave, but was in all points observant of the heavenly ordinance. Though he had been now a full year and ten days a prisoner in the ark, yet when he found himself preserved there, not only for a new life, but for a new world, he saw no reason to complain of his long confinement. Now observe, 1. Noah and his family came out alive, though one of them was a wicked Ham, whom, though he escaped the flood, God's justice could have taken away by some other stroke. But they are all alive. Note, When families have been long continued together, and no breaches made upon them, it must be looked upon as a distinguishing favour, and attributed to the Lord's mercies. 2. Noah brought out all the creatures that went in with him, except the raven and the dove, who, probably, were ready to meet them at their coming out. Noah was able to give a very good account of all; for of all that were given him he had lost none, but was faithful to him that appointed him, Jus hac vice—on this occasion, high steward of his household. 20. And Noah built an altar unto the Lord; and took of every clean beast, and of every clean fowl, and offered burnt-offerings on the altar. 21. And the Lord smelled a sweet savour; and the Lord said in his heart, I will not again curse the ground any more for man's sake; for the imagination of man's heart is evil from his youth; neither will I again smite any more every thing living, as I have done. 22. While the earth remaineth, seed-time and harvest, and cold and heat, and summer and winter, and day and night, shall not cease.
and the sacrifices of righteousness, by pious devotion, and a pious conversation.

II. God's gracious acceptance of Noah's thankfulness. It was a settled rule in the patriarchal age, If thou dost well, shalt thou not be accepted? Noah was so. For, because,

1. He was well pleased with the performance, v. 21. He smelled a sweet savour, or a savour of rest, from it; as it is in the Hebrew. As when he had made the world at first on the seventh day, he rested and was refreshed, so now that he had new-made it, in the sacrifice of the seventh he rested. He was pleased with Noah's pious zeal, and these hopeful beginnings of the new world, as men are with fragrant and agreeable smells: though his offering was small, it pleased God. The mind of God was pleased and accepted it. Having caused his anger to rest upon the world of sinners, he here caused his love to rest upon this little remnant of believers.

2. Hereupon he took up a resolution never to drown the world again. Herein he had an eye, not so much to Noah's sacrifice, as to Christ's sacrifice of himself, which was typified and represented by it, and which was indeed an offering of a sweet savour from him, 2 Ch. 31. 20.

(1) That this judgment should never be repeated. Noah might think, "To what purpose should the world be repaired, when, in all probability, for the wickedness of it, it will quickly be in like manner ruined again?" "No," says God, "it shall not.

It was said, ch. 6. 6. It repented the Lord that he had made men, and was sore displeased with them. But he now saw that he that destroyed them, that never destroyed man; neither means a change of his mind, but both a change of his way. It repented him concerning his servants, Deut. 32. 36. Two ways this resolve is expressed: [1.] I will not again curse the ground, Hebrew, I will not add to curse the ground any more. God had cursed the ground upon the first entrance of sin (ch. 5. 17.); when he had drowned it, he had added to that curse, but now he determines not to add to it any more.

[2.] Neither will I again smite any more every living thing, that is, it was determined that whatever ruin God might bring upon particular persons, or families, or countries, he would never again destroy the whole world, till the day shall come when time shall be no more. But the reason of this resolve is very surprising, for it seems the same in effect with the reason given for the destruction of the world. Deut. 2. 29.

The imputation of man's heart is evil from his youth. But there is this difference; there it is said, The imputation of man's heart is evil continually, that is, "H's actual transgressions continually cry against him;" here it is said, It is evil from his youth or childhood. It is bred in the bone, he brought it into the world with him, he was shapen and conceived in it. Now, one would think, it should follow, "Therefore that guilty race shall be wholly extinct, and I will make a full end." No: "Therefore I will no more take this severe method; for, first, He is rather to be pitied, for it is all the effect of sin dwelling in him; and it is but what might be expected from such a degenerate race; he is called a transgressor from the womb, and therefore it is not strange that he deals so very treacherously, v. 14. 2dly, remember that this is flesh, corrupt and sinful, Ps. 78. 39. Secondly, "He will be utterly ruined; for if he be dealt with according to his deserts, one flood must succeed another till all be destroyed." See here, 1. That outward judgments, though they may terrify and restrain men, yct cannot, of themselves, sanctify and renew them; the grace of God must work with those judgments. Man's nature was as sinful after the deluge as it had been before. That God's goodness takes occasion from man's badness to magnify itself the more; his reasons of mercy are all drawn from himself, not from any thing in us. (2.) That the course of nature should never be discontinued, v. 22, While the earth remaineth, and man upon it, there shall be summer and winter, not all winter as had been this last year; "day and night," not all night, as probably it was while the rain was descending. Here, [1.] It plainly intimated that this earth is not to remain always; it, and all the works in it, must shortly be burnt up; and we look for new heavens and a new earth, when all these things must be dissolved. But, [2.] As long as it does remain, God's providence will carefully preserve the regular succession of times and seasons, and marks their place. To this we owe it, that the world stands, and the wheel of nature keeps its track. See here how changeable the times are, and yet how unchangeable. First, The course of nature always changing. As it is with the times, so it is with the events of time, they are subject to vicissitudes, day and night, summer and winter, counterchanged. In heaven and hell it is not so, but on earth God's providence set the one over against the other. Secondly, Yet never changed; it is constant in this inconstancy; these seasons have never ceased, nor shall cease, while the sun continues such a steady measure of time, and the moon such a faithful witness in heaven. This is God's covenant of the day and of the night, the stability of which is mentioned for the confirming of our faith in the covenant of grace, which is no less inviolable, Jer. 31. 35. Thus God promises to the creatures made good, and thence may infer that his promises to all believers shall be so.

CHAP. IX.

Both the world and the church were now again reduced to a family, the family of Noah, of the affairs of which this chapter gives us an account, which we are the more concerned to take cognizance of, because from this family we are all descendants. Here is, I. The covenant of providence settled with Noah and his sons, v. 1-11. In this covenant, 1. God promises them to take care of their lives, so that (1.) They shall replenish the earth, v. 1, 7. (2.) They should be safe from the insults of the brute creatures, which should stand in awe of them, v. 2. (3.) They should be allowed to eat flesh for the support of their lives, v. 3; and they may eat all flesh, v. 3, 4. (4.) The world should never be drowned again, v. 21. 2. God requires of them to take care of one another's lives, and of their own, v. 5, 6. 11. The seal of that covenant, namely, the rainbow, v. 12-17. 3. A particular passage of a story concerning Noah and his sons, especially 4. The curse of Canaan, and the blessing of Shem and Japheth, v. 24-27. IV. The age and death of Noah, v. 28, 29.

1. And God blessed Noah and his sons, and said unto them, Be fruitful, and multiply, and replenish the earth. 2. And the fear of you and the dread of you shall be upon every beast of the earth, and upon every fowl of the air, upon all that moveth upon the earth, and upon all the fishes of the sea; into your hand are they delivered. 3. Every moving thing that liveth, shall be meat for you; even as the green herb have I given you all things: 4. But flesh with the life thereof, which is the blood thereof, shall ye not eat. 5. And surely your blood of your lives will I require; at the hand of every beast will I require it, and at the hand of man; at the hand of every man’s brother will I require the life of man: 6. Whoso sheddeth man’s blood, by man shall his blood be shed: for in the image of God made he man: 7. And you, be ye fruitful, and multiply; bring forth abundantly in the earth, and multiply therein.

We read, in the close of the foregoing chapter, the very kind things which the Lord said in his heart, concerning the remnant of mankind which was now left to be the seed of a new world. Now here we have those kind things spoken to mankind; in general, God blessed Noah and his sons, v. 1, that is, he assured them of his good will to them, and his gracious intentions concerning them. This follows from what he said in his heart. Note, All God’s promises of good flow from his purposes of love, and the counsels of his own will. See Eph. 1. 11—3. 11, and compare Jer. 29. 11, I know the thoughts that I think towards you. We read, ch. 8. 20, how Noah blessed God, by his altar and sacrifice. Now here we find God blessing Noah. Note, 1. God will bless (that is, speak well of) him. 2. Those that are truly thankful for the mercies they have received, take the readiest way to have them confirmed and continued to them.

Now here we have the Magna Charta—the Great Charter of this new kingdom of nature which was now to be erected, and incorporated, the former charter having been forfeited and seized.

1. The grants of this charter are kind and gracious to men. Here is,

1. A grant of lands of vast extent, and a promise of a great increase of men to occupy and enjoy them. The first blessing is here renewed, Be fruitful, and multiply, and replenish the earth, v. 1, and repeated, v. 7, for the race of mankind was, as it were, to begin again. Now, (1.) God sets the whole earth before them, tells them it is all their own, while it remains, to them and their heirs. Note, The earth God has given to the children of men, for a possession and habitation, Ps. 115. 16. Though it is not a paradise, but a wilderness rather, yet it is better than we deserve. Blessed be God, it is not hell. (2.) He gives them a blessing, by the force and virtue of which, mankind should be both multiplied and perpetuated upon earth; so that, in a little while, all the habitable parts of the earth should be more or less inhabited; and though one generation should pass away, yet another generation should come, while the world stands, so that the stream of the human race should be supplied with a constant succession, and run parallel with the current of time, till both be delivered up together into the ocean of eternity. Though death should still reign, and the powers of darkness foretell that the earth should never again be peopled as now it was, but still replenished, Acts 17. 24—26.

2. A grant of power over the inferior creatures, v. 2. He grants, (1.) A title to them. Into your hands they are delivered, for your use and benefit. (2.) A dominion over them, without which the title would avail little. The fear of you and the dread of you shall be upon every beast. This is the former grant, ch. 1. 28, only with this difference, that man in innocence ruled by love, fallen man rules by fear. Now this grant remains in force, and thus far we have still the benefit of it. [1.] That those creatures which are any way useful to us, are reclaimed, and we use them either for service, or food, or both, as they are capable. The noose and ox patiently submit to the bridle and yoke, and the sheep is dumb both before the shearer, and before the butcher; for the fear and dread of man are upon them. [2.] These creatures that are any way hurtful to us are restrained, so that though now and then man may be hurt by some of them, yet they do not combine together to rise up in rebellion against man, else God could by these destroy the world as effectually as he did by a deluge; it is one of God’s seven judgments, Exk. 14. 16. [3.] That it keeps the shepherds and rams, and lions out of our streets, and confines them to the wilderness, but this fear and dread? Nay, s’not have been tamed, James 3. 7.

3. A grant of maintenance and subsistence, v. 3. Every moving thing that liveth, shall be meat for you. Hitherto, most think, man had been confined to feed only upon the products of the earth, fruits, herbs, and roots, and all sorts of corn and milk; so was the first grant, ch. 1. 29. But the food having perhaps washed away much of the virtue of the earth, and so rendered its fruits less pleasing, and less nourishing; God now enlarged the grant, and allowed man to eat flesh, which perhaps man himself never thought of, till now that God directed him to it, nor had any more desire to, than a sheep has to suck blood like a wolf. But now man is allowed to feed upon the flesh of the brute from the earth, and upon the green herb. Now here see, (1.) That God is a good Master, and provides, not only that we may live, but that we may live comfortably, in his service; not for necessity only, but for delight. (2.) That every creature of God is good, and nothing to be refused, 1 Tim. 4. 4. Afterward, some meats that were proper enough for a few, were prohibited by the ceremonial law; but from the beginning, it seems, it was not so, and therefore it is not so under the gospel.

II. The precepts and provisions of this charter are no less kind and gracious, and instances of God’s good-will to man. The Jewish doctors speak so often of the seven precepts of Noah, or of the sons of Noah, which, they say, were to be observed by all nations, that it may not be anis to set them down. The first against the worship of idols. The second against blasphemy, and requiring to bless the name of God. The third against murder. The fourth against incest and all uncleanness. The fifth against theft and rapine. The sixth requiring the administration of justice. The seventh against eating of flesh with the life. These the Jews required the observation of from the promises of the ages. But the precepts here given, all concern the life of man:

1. Man must not prejudice his own life by eating that food which is unwholesome and prejudicial to his health, v. 4. Flesh with the life thereof, which is the blood thereof; that is, raw flesh, shall ye not eat, as the beasts of prey do. It was necessary to add this limitation to the grant of liberty to eat flesh, lest, instead of nourishing their bodies by it, they should nourish their passions. God gave the following reasons: (1.) That though they were lords of the creatures, yet they were subjects to the Creator, and under the restraint of his law. (2.) That they must not be greedy and hasty in taking their food, but stay the preparing of it; not like Saul’s soldiers, 1 Sam. 14. 32, nor ravenous eaters of flesh, Prov. 25. 26. (3.) That they must not be barbarous and cruel toward the inferior creatures; they must be Lords, but not Tyants; they might kill them for their profit, but not torment them for their pleasure; nor tear away the member of a creature while it was yet alive, and eat that. (4.) That during the continuance of the law of sacrifices, in which the blood made atonement for the soul, Lev. 17. 11, (signifying that the life of the sacrifice was accepted for the life of the sinner,) blood must not be looked upon as a common thing, but must be found out before the Lord, 2 Sam. 23. 16, either upon his altar, or upon his earth. But now that the great and true sacrifice is offered, the obligation of the law ceases with the reason of it.

2. Man must not take away his own life, v. 5, Your blood of your lives will I require. Our lives are not our own, yet neither must we return them to ourselves, for the life of every creature is in God's hand, and is not our own pleasure, but they are God's, and we must resign them to his pleasure; if we any way hasten our own deaths, we are accountable to God for it.

3. The beasts must not be suffered to hurt the life of man; at the hand of every beast will I require it. To show how tender God was of the life of man, though he had lately made such destruction of our lives, he made himself a protection to the beasts of the field. This was confirmed by the law of Moses, Exod. 21. 28, and I think it would not be unsafe to observe it still. Thus God showed his hatred of the sin of murder, that men might hate it more, and not only punish, but prevent it. And see Job 5. 23.

4. Wilful murderers must be put to death. This is the sin which is here designed to be restrained by the terror of punishment. (1.) God will punish man far to the height of all the plagues he shall bring upon him, v. 24. He is not bound to a moderate degree of punishment of the innocent for the innocent, but shall make his hand heavy against the murderer, as well as against the man.

This was confirmed by the law of Moses, Exod. 21. 28, and I think it would not be unsafe to observe it still. Thus God showed his hatred of the sin of murder, that men might hate it more, and not only punish, but prevent it. And see Job 5. 23.

5. The magistrate must punish murderers, v. 6, Whoso sheddeth man's blood, whether upon a sudden provocation, or having premeditated it, (for rash anger is heart-murder as well as malice,) or premeditated it, Let him be as his own blood be shed, as he who shed it. (Compare Matt. 10. 21, 22.) by man shall his blood be shed, that is, by the magistrate, or whoever is appointed or allowed to be the avenger of blood. There are those who are ministers of God for this purpose, to be a protection to the innocent, by being a terror to the malicous and evil-doers, and they must not hear the sword in vain, Rom. 13. 14. Before the flood, as it should seem by the story of Cain, God took the man, and slew him. The blood of the just calleth for blood; but Cain, who committed this judgment to men, to masters of families at first, and afterwards, to the heads of countries, who ought to be faithful to the trust reposed in them. Note, Wilful murder ought always to be punished with death. It is a sin which the Lord would not pardon in a Prince, 2 Kings. 24. 3, 4, and which therefore a Prince should not pardon in a Subject. To this law there is a reason annexed, That the presence of God made him hate at first: man is a creature dear to his Creator, and therefore ought to be so to us; God put honour upon him, let us not then put contempt upon him. Such remains of God's image are still even upon fallen man, as that he who unjustly kills a man, defaces the image of God, and dishonour to him. When God allowed men to kill their beasts, yet he laid upon them this condition for these are of a much more noble and excellent nature, not only God's creatures, but his image, Jam. 3. 9. All men have something of the image of God upon them; but magistrates have, besides, the image of his power, and the saints the image of his holiness, and therefore those who shed the blood of princes or saints, incur a double guilt. 8. And God spake unto Noah, and to his sons with him, saying, 9. And I, behold, I establish my covenant with you, and with your seed after you: 10. And with every living creature that is with you, of the fowl of the air, of the cattle, and of every beast of the earth with you; from all that go out of the ark, to every beast of the earth: 11. And I will establish my covenant with you; neither shall all flesh be cut off any more by the waters of a flood; neither shall there any more be a flood to destroy the earth.

Here is, The general establishment of God's covenant with this new world, and the extent of that covenant, v. 9, 10. Where observe, 1. That God is graciously pleased to deal with man in the way of a covenant; wherein God greatly magnifies his condescending favour, and greatly encourages man's duty and obedience, as a reasonable and gainful service. 2. That all God's covenants with man are of his own making, I, behold, I. It is thus expressed, both to raise our admiration, ("Behold, and wonder, that though God be high, yet he deals this respect to man," ) and to confirm our assurances of the validity of the covenant. "Behold, and see, I make it; I that am faithful, and able to make it good." 3. That God's covenants are established firmer than the pillars of heaven, or the foundations of the earth, and cannot be disannulled. 4. That God's covenants are made with the covenanters and with their seed; the promise is to them and their children. 5. That those may be taken into covenant with God, and receive the benefits of it, who yet are not capable of restituting, or giving their own consent. For this covenant is made with every living creature, every beast of the earth.

II. The particular intention of this covenant; it was designed to secure the world from another deluge, v. 11, There shall not any more be a flood. God had drowned the world once, and, still it is as filthy and provoking as ever, and God farsaw the wickedness of it, and yet promised he would never drown it any more; for he deals not with us according to our sins. It is owing to God's goodness and faithfulness, not to any reformation of the world, that it has not often been deluged, and that it is not deluged now. As the old world was ruined, to be a monument of justice, so this world remains to this day a monument of mercy, wherein God shows forth the riches of his grace, so that the words of God, that the waters of Noah should no more return to cover the earth, Isa. 54. 9. This promise of God keeps the sea and clouds in their decreed place, and sets them gates and bars; hitherto they shall come, Job 38. 10, 11. If the sea should flow but for a few days, as it does twice every day for a few hours, what desolation would it make! And how destructive would the clouds be, if such showers as we have in some parts of it were to continue long! But God, by flowing seas, and sweeping rains, shows what he could do in wrath; and yet, by preserving the earth from being deluged between both, shows what he can do in mercy, and will do in truth. Let us give him the glory of his mercy in promising, and truth in performing. This promise does not hinder, 1. But that God may bring other wasters home upon mankind; for though he has here bound himself not to use this arrow any more, yet he has other arrows in his quiver. 2. Not but that he may destroy particular places and countries by the inundations of the sea or rivers. 3. Nor will the destruction of the world at the last day by fire, be any breach of his promise. Sin that drowned the old world, will burn this.

12. And God said, This is the token of the covenant which I make between me and you and every living creature that is with you, for perpetual generations: 13. I do set my bow in the cloud, and it shall be for a token of a covenant between me and the earth. 14. And it shall come to pass, when I bring a cloud over the earth, that the bow shall be seen in the cloud: 15. And I will remember my covenant, which I have established between me and all flesh that is upon the earth.

Articles of agreement among men are sealed, that the covenants may be the more solemn, and the performances make the seal, and the seal of the covenant, till now that it was made so by a divine institution. Now concerning this seal of the covenant, Observe, 1. This seal is affixed with repeated assurances of the truth of that promise which it was designed to be the ratification of. I set my bow in the cloud, (v. 13.) it shall be seen in the cloud, (v. 14.) that the eye may affect the heart, and confirm the faith; and it shall be the token of the covenant (v. 12, 13.); and I will remember my covenant, that the waters shall no more become a flood, v. 15. Nay, as if the Eternal Mind needed a memorandum, I will upon it, that I may remember the everlasting covenant, v. 16. Thus here is line upon line, that we might have a sure and strong consolation, who have laid hold on this hope. 2. The rainbow appears then when the clouds are most disposed to wet, and returns after the rain; then when we have most reason to fear the rain prevailing, God shows this seal of the promise that it shall not prevail. Thus God obviates our fears with such encouragements as are both suitable and seasonable. 3. The thicker the cloud, the brighter the bow in the cloud. Thus as threatening afflictions abound, encouraging consolations much more abound, 2 Cor. 1. 5. 4. The rainbow appears when one part of the sky is clear, which intimates mercy remembered in the midst of wrath; and the clouds are hemmed as it were with the rainbow, that it may not overflow the waters; for the bow is coloured rain, or the edges of a cloud gilded. 5. The rainbow is the reflection of the beams of the sun, which intimates that all the glory and significance of the seals of the covenant are derived from Christ the Sun of righteousness, who is also described with a rainbow about his throne (Rev. 4. 3.) and a rainbow upon his head (Rev. 10. 1.), which beareth not only his majesty, but his mediatorship. 6. The rainbow has fiery colours in it, to signify, that though God will not again drown the world, yet when the mystery of God shall be finished, the world shall be consumed by fire. 7.

A bow bespeaks terror, but it has neither string nor arrow, as the bow ordained against the persecutors has; (Ps. 7. 13, 14.) and a bow alone will do little execution; it is a bow, but it is directed upward, not toward the earth; for the seals of the covenant were intended for comfort, not to terrify. Lastly, As God looks upon the bow, that he may remember the covenant, so should we, that we also may be ever mindful of the covenant, with faith and thankfulness.

18. And the sons of Noah, that went forth of the ark, were Shem, and Ham, and Japheth: and Ham is the father of Canaan. 19. These are the three sons of Noah: and of them was the whole earth overspread. 20. And Noah began to be an husbandman, and he planted a vineyard: 21. And he drank of the wine, and was drunken; and he was uncovered within his tent. 22. And Ham, the father of Canaan, saw the nakedness of his father, and told his two brethren without. 23. And Shem and Japheth took a garment, and laid it upon both their shoulders, and went backward, and covered the nakedness of their father; and their faces were backward, and they saw not their father's nakedness.

Here is, 1. Noah's family and employment. The names of his sons are again mentioned, (v. 18, 19.) as those from whom the whole earth was overspread. By which it appears that Noah, after the flood, had no more children: all the world came from these three. Ncte, God, when he pleases, can make a little one to become a thousand, and greatly increase the latter end of those whose beginning was small. Such are the power and efficacy of a divine blessing. The business Noah applied himself to, was of a husbandman, Hebr. a man of the earth, that is, a man dealing in the earth, that kept ground in his hands, and occupied it: he are all naturally men of the earth, made of it, living on it, and hastening to it: many are sinfully so, addicted to earthly things. Noah was led by his calling to trade in the fruits of the earth. He began to be a husbandman; that is, some time after his departure out of the ark, he returned to his old employment, from which he had been diverted by the building of the ark first, and, probably, afterward, by the building of a house on dry-ground for himself and family. For this good while he had been a carpenter, but now he began again to be a husbandman. Observe, Though Noah was a great man, and a good man, an old man, and a rich man, a man greatly favoured by Heaven, and honoured on earth, yet he would not live an idle life, nor think the husbandman's calling below him. Note, Though God by his providence may take us off from our callings for a time, yet when the occasion is over, we ought with humility and industry to apply ourselves to them again; and in the calling wherein we are called, therein faithfully to obide with God, 1 Cor. 7. 24.

II. Noah's sin and shame. He planted a vineyard; and when he had gathered his vintage probably, he appointed a day of mirth and feasting in his family, and had his sons and their children with him, to rejoice with him in the increase of his house, as well as in the increase of his vineyard; and we may suppose he prefaced his feast with a sacrifice to the honour of God. If that was omitted, at was just with God to leave him to himself, that he who did not begin with God, might end with the beasts;
but we charitably hope the case was different. And perhaps he appointed this feast, with a design, at the close of it, to bless his sons, as Isaac, ch. 27. 3, 4. That I may eat, and that my soul may bless thee.

At this feast, he drank of the wine; for who planteth a vineyard, and eateth not of the fruit of it? But he drank too liberally, more than his head at this age would bear; for he was drunken. We have reason to think that there was a proverb before; observe how he came now to be overtaken in this fault.

It was his sin, and a great sin, so much the worse for its being so soon after a great deliverance; but God left him to himself, as he did Hezekiah, (2 Chron. 32. 31.) and has left this miscarriage of his upon record, to teach us, 1. That the fairest copy that ever men wrote since the fall, had its blots and false strokes. II. that Noah, that he might be perfected in generations, (ch. 6. 9;) but this shows that it is meant of sincerity, not a sinless perfection. 2. That sometimes those who, with watchfulness and resolution, have by the grace of God, kept their integrity in the midst of temptation, have, through security, and carelessness, and neglect of the grace of God, been surprised into sin, when the hour of temptation has been over. Noah, who had kept sober in drunkardship, is now drunken, in the presence of God.

Let him that thinks he stands take heed. 3. That we have need to be very careful when we use God's good creatures plentifully, lest we use them to excess. Christ's disciples must take heed, lest at any time their hearts be overcharged, Luke 21. 34.

Now the consequence of Noah's sin was shame. He was uncovered within his tent, made naked to his shame, as Adam when he had eaten forbidden fruit. Yet Adam sought concealment; Noah is so destitute of thought and reason, that his own covering.

This was a fruit of the vine, that Noah did not think of. Observe here the great evil of the sin of drunkenness. (1.) It discovers men; what infirmities they have, they betray when they are drunken, and what secrets they are intrusted with, are then easily got out of them. Drunken porters keep open gates. (2.) It disgraces men, and exposes them to contempt. As it shows them, so it shames them. Men say and do that when drunken, which, when they are sober, they would blush at the thoughts of, Hab. 2. 15, 16.

III. Ham's impudence and impiety: (v. 22.) He saw the nakedness of his father, and told his two brethren. To see it accidentally and involuntarily, would not have been a crime; but, 1. He pleased himself with the sight, as the Edomites looked upon the day of their brother, (Obad. 12.) pleased and insulting. Perhaps Ham had sometimes been himself drunken, and reproved for it by his good father, whom he was therefore pleased to see thus overcome. Note, It is common for those who walk in false ways themselves, to rejoice at the false steps which they sometimes see others make. But charity rejoices not in iniquity, nor can true penitents, that are sorry for their own sins, rejoice in the sins of others. 2. He told his two brethren. (v. 23.) of the street, as the word is, in a scornful deriding manner, that his father might seem vile unto them. It is very wrong, (1.) To make a jest of sin, (Prov. 14. 9.) and to be puffed up with that for which we should rather mourn, (1 Cor. 5. 2.) and (2.) To publish the faults of any, especially of parents, whom it is our duty to honour. Noah was not only a good man; but he had been a good father to him; and this was a most unbecoming injury to him for his tenderness. Ham is here called the father of Canaan, which intimates that he who was himself a father, should have been more respectful to him that was his father.

IV. The pious care of Shem and Japheth to cover their poor father's shame, v. 23. They not only would not see it themselves, but provided that no one else might see it; herein setting us an example of charity with reference to other men's sin and shame; we must not only not say, A confederacy, with these that proclaim it, but we must be careful to conceal it, or however to make the best of it, so doing as we would be done by. 1. There is a mantle of love to be thrown over the faults of all. 1 Pet. 4. 8. Beside that, there is a robe of reverence to be thrown over the faults of parents and other superiors.

24. And Noah awoke from his wine, and knew what his younger son had done unto him. 25. And he said, Cursed be Canaan; a servant of servants shall he be unto his brethren. 26. And he said, Blessed be the Lord God of Shem; and Canaan shall be his servant. 27. God shall enlarge Japheth, and he shall dwell in the tents of Shem; and Canaan shall be his servant.

Here,

I. Noah comes to himself, He awoke from his wine: sleep cured him, and, we may suppose, so cured him, that he never relapsed into that sin afterward. Those that sleep as Noah did, should awake as he did, and not as that drunkard, Prov. 23. 35. who says when he awakes, I will seek it yet again.

II. The spirit of prophecy comes upon him, and, like dying Jacob, he tells his sons what should befall them, ch. 49. 1. v. 25.

1. He pronounces a curse on Canaan the son of Ham, in whom Ham is himself cursed; either, because this son of his was now more guilty than the rest, or, because the posterity of this son was afterward to be rooted out of their land, to make room for Israel. And Moses here records it for the animating of Israel in the wars of Canaan; though the Canaanites were a formidable people, yet they were of old an accursed people, and doomed to ruining. The particular curse is, a servant of servants, that is, the meanest and most desplicable servant, shall he be, even to his brethren. Those who by birth were his equals, shall by conquest be his lords. This certainly points at the victories obtained by Israel over the Canaanites, by which they were all either put to the sword, or put under tribute, (Josh. 9. 23. Judg. 1. 28, 30, 33, 35.) which happened not till about 800 years after this. Note, (1.) God often visits the iniquity of the fathers upon the children, especially when the children inherit their fathers' wicked dispositions, and imitate the father's wicked practices, and do nothing to cut off the entail of a curse. (2.) Disgrace is justly put upon those that put disgrace upon others, especially that dishonour and grieve their own parents. An undutiful child thatmocks at his parents, is no more worthy to be a servant, but, being seduced to be a hired servant, may be a servant of servants, among his brethren. (3.) Though divine curses operate slowly, yet, first or last, they will take effect. The Canaanites were under a curse of slavery, and yet, for a great while, had the dominion; for a family, a people, a person, may lie under the curse of God, and yet may long prosper in the world, till the measure of their iniquity, like that of the Canaanites, be filled. Many are marked for ruin, that are not yet ripe for ruin. Therefore, Let not thine heart envy sinners.

2. He entails a blessing upon Shem and Japheth. (1.) He blesses Shem, or, rather blesses God for him, yet so that it entitles him to the greatest honour and happiness imaginable, v. 26. Observe,
1. He calls the Lord, the God of Shem; and happy, this happy is that people whose God is the Lord, Ps. 144. 15. All blessings are included in this. This was the blessing conferred on Abraham and his seed; the God of Heaven was not ashamed to be called their God, Heb. 11. 16. Shem is sufficiently recompensed for his respect to his father by this, that the Lord himself puts his honour upon him, to be his God, which is a sufficient recompense for all our services and all our prayers for his name.

2. He gives to God the glory of that good work which Shem had done, and, instead of blessing and praising him that was the instrument, he blesses and praises God that was the Author. Note, The glory of all that is at any time well done by ourselves or others, must be humbly and thankfully transmitted to God, who works all our good works in us and for us. When we see men's good works, we should glory, not them, but our Father, Matt. 5. 16. Thus David, in effect, blessed Abigail, when he blessed God that sent her, 1 Sam. 25. 32, 33, for it is an honour and favour to be employed for God, and used by him in doing good. [3.] He foresees and foretells, that God's gracious dealings with Shem and his family, would be such as would evidence to all the world that he was the God of Shem, on which behalf thankfulness and praise to God, whose name is blessed be the Lord God of Shem. [4.] It is intimated that the church should be built up and continued in the posterity of Shem; for of him came the Jews, who were, for a great while, the only professing people God had in the world. [5.] Some think reference is here had to Christ, who was the Lord God that in his human nature, should descend from the loins of Shem, or, as concerning the flesh, Christ came. [6.] Canaan is pertinently named, to ensnare to him; He shall be his servant. Note, Those that have the Lord for their God, shall have as much of the honour and power of this world as he sees good for them.

2. He blesses Japheth, and, in him, the isles of the Gentiles, which were peopled by his seed, v. 27, God shall enlarge Japheth, and he will dwell in the tents of Shem. Now,

[1.] Some make this to belong wholly to Japheth, and his seed, first, His outward prosperity, that his seed should be so numerous, and so victorious, that they should be masters of the tents of Shem; which was fulfilled, when the people of the Jews, the most eminent of Shem's race, were tributaries to the Grecians first, and afterward to the Romans, both of Japheth's seed. Note, Outward prosperity is no infallible mark of the true church; the tents of Shem do not always the tents of the conqueror. Or, Secondly, It beseeks the conversion of the Gentiles, and the bringing of them into the church; and then we would read it, God shall persuade Japheth, (for so the word signifies,) and then, being so persuaded, he shall dwell in the tents of Shem, that is, Jews and Gentiles shall be united together in the gospel-fold; after many of the Gentiles shall have been peopled by the Jewish religion, both shall be one in Christ, Eph. 2. 11, 12. And the Christian church, mostly made up of the Gentiles, shall succeed the Jews in the privileges of church-membership; the latter having first cast themselves out by their unbelief, the Gentiles shall dwell in their tents, Rom. 11. 11, 16. Note, It is God only that can bring those again into the church, who have separated themselves from it. It is the power of God that makes the gospel of Christ effectual to salvation, 1 Cor. 15. 18. And again, Souls are brought into the church, not by force, but by persuasion, Ps. 110. 3. They are drawn by the cords of a man, and persuaded by reason to be religious.

[2.] Others divide this between Japheth and Shem, Shem having not been directly blessed, v. 26. First, Japheth has the blessing of earth beneath; God shall enlarge Japheth, enlarge his seed, enlarge his border; Japheth's posterity peopled all Europe, a great part of Asia, and perhaps America. Note, God is to be acknowledged in all our enlargements; it is he that enlarges the coast, and enlarges the heart. And again, Many dwell in large tents, that do not dwell in God's tents, as Japheth did. Secondly, Shem has the blessing of Heaven above; He shall, that is, God shall, dwell in the tents of Shem, that is, From his loins Christ shall come, and in his seed the church shall be continued. The birth-right was now to be divided between Shem and Japheth, Ham being utterly discarded; in the principality they equally share, Canaan shall be servant to both; the double portion is given to Japheth, whom God shall enlarge; but the priesthood was given to Shem, for God shall dwell in the tents of Shem; and certainly we are more happy, if we have God dwelling in our tents, than if we had there all the silver and gold in the world. It is better to dwell in tents with God than in palaces without him; in Salem, where is God's tabernacle, there is more satisfaction than in all the isles of the Gentiles. Thirdly, They both have dominion over Canaan; Canaan shall be servant to them; so some read it. When Japheth joins hands with Shem, Canaan falls between them both. When strangers become friends, enemies become servants.

28. And Noah lived after the flood three hundred and fifty years. 29. And all the days of Noah were nine hundred and fifty years; and he died.

Here see, 1. How God prolonged the life of Noah; he lived 930 years; 20 more than Adam, and but 19 less than Methuselah; this long life was a further reward of his signal piety, and a great blessing to the world, to which, no doubt, he continued a preserver of righteousness, with this advantage, that now all he preached to, were his own children. 2. How God put a period to his life at last; though he lived long, yet he died, having, probably, first seen many that descended from him, dead before him. Noah lived to see two worlds, but being an heir of the righteousness which is by faith, when he died, he went to see a better than either.

CHAP. X.

This chapter shows more particularly what was said in general, ch. 9. 19, concerning the three sons of Noah, that of them was the whole earth overspread; and the fruit of that blessing, ch. 9. 1, 7. replenish the earth. It is only certain account extant of the original of nations; and yet perhaps there is no nation but that of the Jews, that can be confident from which of these seven fountains (for so many there are here) it derives its streams. Through the want of early records, the mixtures of people, the revolutions of nations, and distance of time— the knowledge of the lineal descent of the present inhabitants of the earth, how soever they may be subdivided into many, but those of the Jews, for the sake of the Messiah; only in this chapter, we have a brief account, 1. Of the posterity of Japheth, v. 2...5. 2. The posterity of Ham, v. 6...20. and in what part of the earth they dwelt, v. 8. 9. III. The posterity of Shem, v. 21...31.

1. These are the genealogies of the sons of Noah; Shem, Ham, and Japheth; and unto them were sons born after the flood. 2. The sons of Japheth; Gomer, and Magog, and Madai, and Javan, and Tubal, and Meshech, and Tiras. 3. And the sons of Gomer; Ashkenaz, and Riphath, and Togarmah. 4. And the sons of Javan; Elishah, and Tarshish, Kittim.
and Do-lah-im. 5. By these were the isles of the Gentiles divided in their lands; every one after his tongue, after their families, in their nations.

Moses begins with Japheth's family; either because he was the eldest, or, because his family lay remotest from Israel, and had least concern with them, at the time when Moses wrote; and therefore he mentions that race very briefly; hastening to give account of the posterity of Ham, who were Israel's enemies, and of Shem, who were Israel's ancestors: for it is the church that the scripture is designed to be the history of, and of the nations of the world, only as they were some way or other related to Israel, and interested in the affairs of Israel. Observe, 1. Notice is here taken that the sons of Noah had sons to them after the flood, to repair and rebuild the world of mankind which the flood had ruined. He that had killed, now makes alive. 2. The prosperity of Japheth were allotted to the isles of the Gentiles, (v. 5.) which were, solemnly, by lot, after a survey, divided among them, and probably, this island of our's among the rest; all places beyond the sea from Jutia, are called isles, Jer. 25. 22. And this is, perhaps, that promise, Isa. 44. 2, the isles shall wait for his law, of the conversion of the Gentiles to the faith of Christ.

6. And the sons of Ham; Cush, and Mizraim, and Phut, and Canaan. 7. And the sons of Cush; Seba, and Havilah, and Sabtah, and Raamah, and Sabteca: and the sons of Raamah; Sheelah, and Dedan.

8. And Cush begat Nimrod: he began to be a mighty one in the earth. 9. He was a mighty hunter before the Lord: wherefore it is said, Even as Nimrod the mighty hunter before the Lord. 10. And the beginning of his kingdom was Babel, and Erech, and Accad, and Calneh, in the land of Shinar. 11. Out of that land went forth Asshur, and builded Nineveh, and the city Rehoboth, and Calah, 12. And Resen between Nineveh and Calah: the same is a great city. 13. And Mizraim begat Ludim, and Anamim, and Lehabim, and Naphtuhim, 14. And Pathrusim, and Casluhim, (out of whom came Philistim,) and Caphtorim.

That which is observable and improbable in these verses, is, the account here given of Nimrod, v. 8, 11. He is here represented as a great man in his day. He began to be a mighty one in the earth, that he might do as he pleased with them: he was content to stand upon the same level with his meanest neighbours, and though every man bare rule in his own house, yet no man pretended any further; Nimrod's aspiring mind could not rest here; he was resolved to tower above his neighbours, and not only so, but to lord it over them. The same spirit that actuated the giants before the flood, (who became mighty men, and men of renown, ch. 6. 4.) now revived in him; so soon was that tremendous judgment which the pride and tyranny of those mighty men brought upon the world, forgotten. Note, There are some, in whom ambition and affectation of dominion seem to be bred in the bone; such there have been, and we will, notwithstanding the wrath of God often revealed from heaven against them. Nothing on this side hell will humble and break the proud spirits of some men, in this, like Lucifer, Isa. 14. 14, 15. Now, 1. Nimrod was a great hunter; this he began with, and for this, became famous to a proverb. Every great hunter is, in remembrance of him, called a Nimrod. 2. Some think he did good with his hunting, served his country by ridding it of the wild beasts which infested it, and so insinuated himself into the affections of his neighbours, and got to be their prince; these things, if true, are, or at least, would be called, benefactors, Luke 22. 25. 2. Others think that under pretence of hunting, he gathered men under his command, in pursuit of another game he had to play, which was to make himself master of the country, and to bring them into subjection. He was a mighty hunter, that is, He was a violent invader of his neighbour's rights and properties, and a persecutor of innocent men, carrying all before him, and endeavouring to make all his own by force and violence. He thought himself a mighty prince, but before the Lord, that is in God's account, he was but a mighty hunter. Note, Great conquerors are but great hunters. Alexander and Cesar would not make such a figure in scripture history as they do in common history; the former is represented in prophecy but as a hero, 1 Sam. 15. 33. 3. Nimrod was a mighty hunter against the Lord, so the LXX; that is, he set up idoltry, as Jeroboam did, for the confirming of his usurped dominion: that he might set up a new government, he set up a new religion upon the ruin of the primitive constitution of both: Babel was the mother of harlots. Or, (2.) He carried on his oppression and violence, in defiance of God himself; during Heaven with his impetness, as if he and his housethe had been the Almighty, and were a match for the Lord of Hosts and all his armies. As if it were a small thing to weary men, he thinks to weary my God also, Isa. 7. 13.

II. Nimrod was a great ruler, v. 10. The beginning of his kingdom was Babel. Some write, or, by arts or arms, he got into power, either chosen to it, or forcing his way to it; and so laid the foundations of a monarchy, which was afterward a head of gold, and the terror of the mighty, and bid fair to be universal. It does not appear that he had any right to rule by birth; but either his fitness for government recommended him, as some think, to an election; or, by power and policy, he advanced himself to it, and enforced it by force. See the antiquity of civil government, and particularly that form of it, which lodges the sovereignty in a single person. If Nimrod and his neighbours began, other nations soon learned, to incorporate under one head for their common safety and welfare, which, however it began, proved so great a blessing to the world, that things were reckoned to go ill indeed when there was no king in Israel.

III. Nimrod was a great builder; probably he was architect in the building of Babel, and there he began his kingdom; but when his project to rule all the sons of Noah was stopped by the confusion of tongues, out of that land he went forth into Assyria (so the margin reads it, v. 11.) and built Nineveh, &c. that having built these cities, he might command them, and rule over them. Observe in Nimrod the nature of ambition: 1. It is boundless; much would have more, and still cries, Give, give. 2. It is restless; Nimrod, when he had four cities under his command, could not be content till he had five; and he would have had more; Nimrod will rather be at the charge of raising another, to the honour of ruling them. The spirit of building is the common effect of a spirit of pride. 4. It is daring, and will stick at nothing; Nimrod's name signifies rebellion, which (if indeed he did abuse his power to the oppression of his neighbours) teaches us.
that tyrants to men are rebels to God, and their rebellion is as the sin of witchcraft.

15. And Canaan begat Sidon his first-born, and Heth. 16. And the Jebusite, and the Amorite, and the Girgashite. 17. And the Hivite, and the Arkite, and the Sinite, 18. And the Arvadite, and the Zemarite, and the Hamathite: and afterward were the families of the Canaanites spread abroad. 19. And the border of the Canaanites was from Sidon, as thou comest to Gerar, unto Gaza; as thou goest unto Sodom and Gomorrah, and Admah, and Zeboim, and even unto Lasha. 20. These are the sons of Ham, after their families, after their tongues, in their countries, and in their nations.

Observe here, 1. That the account of the posterity of Canaan, of the families and nations that descended from him, and of the land they possessed, is more particular than of any other in this chapter; because these were the nations that were to be subdued before Israel, and their land was, in process of time, to become the holy land, Immanuel's land; and this God had an eye to, when, in the mean time, he cast the lot of that accursed devoted race in that spot of ground which he had spied out for his own people; this Moses takes notice of. Dent. 32. 8. When the most high divided to the nations their inheritance, he set the bounds of the people according to the number of the children of Israel. 2. That by this account it appears that the posterity of Canaan were both numerous and rich, and very pleasantly seated; and yet Canaan was under a curse, a divinatory curse, and not a curse causeless. Note, Those that are under the curse of God, may yet perhaps thrive and prosper greatly in this world; for we cannot know love, or hatred, or the blessing, or the curse, by what is before us, but by what is within us, Eccl. 9. 1. The curse of God always works really, and always terribly; but perhaps it is a secret curse, a curse to the soul, and does not work visibly; or a secret curse, and does not work immediately; but others are by it reserved for, and bound over to, a day of wrath. Canaan here has a better land than either Shem or Japheth, and yet they have a better lot, for they inherit the blessing.

21. Unto Shem also, the father of all the children of Eber, the brother of Japheth the elder, even to him were children born. 22. The children of Shem; Elam and Assur, and Arphaxad, and Lud, and Aram. 23. And the children of Aram; Uz, and Hul, and Gether, and Mash. 24. And Arphaxad begat Salah; and Salah begat Eber. 25. And unto Eber were born two sons: the name of one was Peleg; for in his days was the earth divided; and his brother's name was Joktan. 26. And Joktan begat Almodad, and Sheleph, and Hazarmaveth, and Jerah. 27. And Hadoram, and Uzal, and Diklah, 28. And Obal, and Abimael, and Sheba, 29. And Ophir, and Havilah, and Jobab; all these were the sons of Joktan. 30. And their dwelling was from Mesha, as thou goest unto Sepher a mount of the east. 31. These are the sons of Shem, after their families, after their tongues, in their lands, after their nations. 32. These are the families of the sons of Noah, after their generations, in their nations: and these were the nations divided in the earth after the flood.

Two things especially are observable in this account of the posterity of Shem.

I. The description of Shem, v. 21. We have not only his name, Shem, which signifies a name, but two titles to distinguish him by.

1. He was the father of all the children of Eber: Eber was his great-grandson; but why should he be called the father of all his children, rather than all Arphaxad's, or Salah's, &c.? Probably, because Abraham and his seed, God's covenant-people, not only descended from Heber, but from him were called Hebrews, ch. 14. 13, Abram the Hebrew. St. Paul looked upon it as his privilege, that he was a Hebrew of the Hebrews, Phil. 3. 5. Eber himself, we may suppose, was a man eminent for religion in a time of general apostasy, and a great example of piety to his family; and the holy tongue being commonly called from him the Hebrew, it is probable that he retained it in his family, in the confusion of Babel, as a special token of God's favour to him; and from him the professors of religion were called the children of Eber; now, when the inspired penman would give them an honourable title, he calls him the father of the Hebrews; though, when Moses wrote this, they were a poor despised people, bond-slaves in Egypt, yet, being God's people, it was an honour to a man to be akin to them. As Ham, though he had many sons, is disowned by being called the father of Canaan, on whose seed the curse was entailed, ch. 9. 22, so Shem, though he had many sons, is dignified with the title of the father of Eber, and not of Japheth; for the blessing was entailed. Note, A family of saints is more truly honourable than a family of nobles; Shem's holy seed than Ham's royal seed, Jacob's twelve patriarchs than Ishmael's twelve princes, ch. 17. 20. Goodness is true greatness.

2. He was the brother of Japheth the elder, by which it appears that though Shem is commonly put first, yet he was not Noah's first-born, but Japheth was. But why should this also be put as part of Shem's title and description, that he was the brother of Japheth, since that had been, in effect, said often before? And was he not as much brother to Ham? Probably, this was intended to signify the union of the Gentiles with the Jews in the church. He had mentioned it as Shem's honour, that he was the father of the Hebrews; but lest Japheth's seed should therefore be looked upon as the elder and fatter, he sets forth from the title of the church that the church was the church of Japheth, not in birth only, but in blessing, for Japheth was to dwell in the tents of Shem. Note, (1.) These are brethren in the best manner, that are so by grace, and that meet in the covenant of God, and in the communion of saints. (2.) God, in dispensing his grace, does not go by seniority, but the younger sometimes gets the start of the elder in coming into the church; so that Shem was first, but, and Japheth last.

II. The reason of the name of Peleg, v. 25, because in his days, (that is about the time of his birth, when his name was given him,) was the earth divided among the children of men that were to inhabit it; either, when Noah divided it by an orderly distribution of it, as Joshua divided the land of Canaan by lot, or when, upon their refusal to comply with that division, God, in justice, divided them by the confusion of tongues; whichever of these was the occasion, pious Heber saw cause to perpetuate
The remembrance of it in the name of his son; and justly may our sons be called by the same name, for in our days, in another sense, is the earth, the church, most wretchedly divided.

II. The method they took to bind themselves to one another, and to settle together in one body. Instead of coveting to enlarge their borders by a peaceable underdine under the divine protection, they contrived to fortify them, and as those that were resolved to wage war with heaven, they put themselves into one compact. Their unanimous resolution is, let us build us a city and a tower. It is observable, that the first builders of cities, both in the old world, ch. 4. 17, and in the new world here, were not men of the best character and reputation; tents served God's subjects to dwell in, cities were the work of those that were rebels against him, and revolters from him. Observe here, II. The free and open method which was used to set about their work. They intended to make brick, v. 3, and again v. 4, Go, let us build us a city; by mutual expectations they made one another more daring and resolute. Note, Great things may be brought to pass, when the undertakers are numerous and unanimous, and stir up one another to it. Let us learn to provoke one another to love and to good works, as sinners stir up and encourage one another to wicked works. See Ps. 122. 1. Isa. 2. 3. 5. Jer. 31. 5.

1. What materials they used in their building. The country being plain, yielded neither stone nor mortar, yet that did not discourage them from their undertaking, but they made brick to serve instead of stone, and slime or pitch instead of mortar. See here, (1.) What shift these will make, that are resolute in their purposes: were we but thus zealous! as we are, in a good thing, we should not stop our work so often as we do, under pretence that we want conveniences for carrying it on. (2.) What a difference there is between men's building and God's; when men build their Babel, brick and slime are their best materials; but when God builds his Jerusalem, he lays even the foundations of it with sapphires, and all its borders with pleasant stones, Isa. 54. 11. 12. Rev. 21. 19.

2. For what ends they built. Some think they intended hereby to secure themselves against the waters of another flood. God had told them indeed he would not again drown the world; but they would trust to a tower of their own making, rather than to a promise of God's making, or an ark of his appointing; if, however, they had had this in their eye, they would have chosen to build their tower upon a mountain, rather than upon a plain; but three things, it seems, they aimed at in building this tower.

(1.) It seems designed for an affront to God himself; for they would build a tower, whose top might reach to heaven, which bespeaks a defiance of God, or at least a rivalry with him; they will be like the Most High, or come as near him as they can, not in holiness, but in height. They forget their place, and, scorning to creep on the earth, resolve to climb to heaven, not by the door, or ladder, but some other way.

(2.) They hoped hereby to make them a name; they would do something to be talked of now, and to give posterity to knew that there had been such men as they in the world; rather than die and leave no memorandum behind them, they would leave this monument of their pride, and ambition, and folly. Note, [1.] Affectation of honour, and a name among men, inspires with a strange ardor for enterprises of difficult undertakings, and often bestrides to that which is of the Lord, and not in his ways. [2.] It is just with God to bury those names in the dust, which are raised by sin. These Babel-builders put themselves to a great deal of foolish expense, to make them a name; but they could not gain even this point, for we do not find in any history the name of so much as one of these Babel-builders; Philo Ju
Jesus says, They engraved every one his name upon a brick, in perpetuum rei memoriam—as a perpetuum memorial; yet neither did that serve their purpose. (3.) They did it to prevent their dispersion; lest we be scattered abroad upon the face of the earth. "It was done," (says Josephus,) "in disobedience to that command, ch. 9. 1, Replenish the earth." God orders them to scatter; "No," say they, "we will not, we will live and die together." In order hereunto, they engage themselves, and one another, in this vast undertaking. That they might unite in one glory it as clearly and happily, as they resolved to build this city and tower, to be the metropolis of their kingdom, and the centre of their unity. It is probable that the hand of ambitious Nimrod was in all this: he could not content himself with the command of a particular colony, but aimed at universal monarchy; in order to which, under pretence of uniting for their common safety, he contrives to keep them in one body, that, having them all under his eye, he might not fail to have them under his power. See the daring presumption of these sinners: here is, [1.] A bold opposition to God; "You shall be scattered," says God; "But we will not," say they; Woe unto him that thus strives with his maker. [2.] A bold competition with God. It is God's prerogative to be universal Monarch, Lord of all, and King of kings; the man that aims at it, offers to step into the throne of God, who will not give his glory to another.

5. And the Lord came down to see the city and the tower which the children of men built. 6. And the Lord said, Behold, the people is one, and they have all one language; and this they begin to do: and now nothing will be restrained from them, which they have imagined to do. 7. Go to, let us go down, and there confound their language, that they may not understand one another's speech. 8. So the Lord scattered them abroad from thence upon the face of all the earth: and they left off to build the city. 9. Therefore is the name of it called Babel; because the Lord did there confound the language of all the earth: and from thence did the Lord scatter them abroad upon the face of all the earth.

We have here the quashing of the project of the Babel-builders, and the turning of the counsel of these froward men-headlong, that God's counsel might stand, in spite of them. Here is, 1. The cognizance that God took of the design that was on foot, v. 5. The Lord came down to see the city: it is an expression after the manner of men; he knew it as clearly and fully as men know that which they come to the place to view. Observe, 1. Before he gave judgment upon their cause, he inquired into it; for God is incontestably just and fair in all his proceedings against sin and sinners, and condemns none unheard. 2. It is spoken of as an act of condescension in God, to take notice even of this building, which the undertakers were so proud of, for he humbles himself to behold their transactions, even the most considerable ones, of this lower world, Ps. 113. 6. 3. It is said to be the tower which the children of men built; which intimates, (1.) Their weakness and frailty as men: it was a very foolish thing for the children of men, worms of the earth, to defy Heaven, and to provoke the Lord to jealousy: Are they stronger than he? (2.) Their sinfulness and obsequiousness: they were the sons of Adam, so it is in the Hebrew; nay, of Adam, that sinful disobedient Adam, whose children are by nature children of disobedience, children that are corrupters. (3.) Their distinction from the children of God, the professors of religion, from whom these daring builders had separated themselves, and built this tower to support and perpetuate the separation. Pious Eber is not found among this ungodly crew; for he and his are called children of God, because their souls come not into the secret, nor unite themselves to the assembly, of these children of men. II. The counsels and resolves of the Eternal God concerning this matter; he did not come down merely as a spectator, but as a Judge, as a Prince, to look upon these proud men, and abase them, Job 40. 11. 14.

Observe, 1. He suffered them to proceed a good way in their enterprise, before he put a stop to it; that they might have space to repent, and, if they had so much consideration left, might be ashamed of it, and weary of it, themselves; and if not, that their disappointment might be the more shameful, and every one that passed by, might laugh at them, saying, These men began to build, and were not able to finish; that so the works of their hands, from which they promised themselves immortal honour, and put their trust in their power and wisdom, the Lord has wise and holy ends in permitting the enemies of his glory to carry on their impious projects a great way, and to prosper long in their enterprises. 2. When they had, with much care and toil, made some considerable progress in their building, then God determined to break their measures, and disperse them. Observe, (1.) The righteousness of God, which appears in the considerations upon which he proceeded in this resolution, v. 6. Two things he considered, [1.] Their oneness, as a reason why they must be scattered: "Behold, the people is one, and they have all one language; if they continue one, much of the earth will be uninhabited; the power of their prince will soon be exorbitant; wickedness and pride and presumption will be insufferably rampant, for they will strengthen one another's hand and heart, and, which is worst of all, they will be an overbalance to the church, and these children of men, if thus incorporated, will swallow up the little remnant of God's children." Therefore it is decreed that they must not be one. Note, Unity is policy, but it is not the infallible mark of a true church; yet, while the builders of Babel, though of different families, dispositions, and interests, were thus unanimous in opposing God, what a pity it is, and what a shame, that the builders of Zion, though united in one common Head and Spirit, should be divided, as they are, in serving God! But marvel not at the matter; Christ came not to send peace. [2.] Their obstinacy; now nothing will be restrained from them; and this is a reason why they must be crossed and thwarted in their design: God had tried, by his commands and admonitions, to bring them off from this project, but in vain; therefore he must take another course with them. See here, First, The sinfulness of sin, and the wilfulness of sinners; ever since Adam would not be restrained from the forbidden tree, his unsanctified seed have been impatient of restraint, and ready to rebel against it. Secondly, See the necessity of God's judgments upon men, to keep the world in some order, and to tie the hands of those that will not be checked by law.

(2.) The wisdom and mercy of God in the methods that were taken for the defeating of this enterprise; (v. 7.) Go to, let us go down, and there
confound their language: this was not spoken to the angels, as if God needed either their advice, or their assistance, but God speaks it to himself, or the Father to the Son and Holy Ghost; they said, Go, let us make brick; and Go to, let us build us a tower; and mating one another to the attempt; and now God says, Go to, let us confound their languages; for if men stir up themselves to sin, God will stir up himself to take vengeance, Isa. 59, 17, 18. Now observe here, [1.] The mercy of God, in moderating the penalty, and not making that proportionable to the offence; for he deals not with us according to our sins, nor according to our transgressions; Ps. 103, 10. Let the earth open, and swallow them and their building, and let them go down quick into hell, who are climbing to heaven the wrong way; no, only, Let us go down, and scatter them; they deserved death, but are only banished or transported; for the patience of God is very great towards a provoking world. Punishments are chiefly reserved for the future state; God’s judgments on sinners in this life, compared with these, are little more than restraints. [2.] The wisdom of God, in pitching upon an effectual expedient to stay proceedings, which was the confounding of their language, that they might not understand one another’s speech, nor could they well join hands when their tongues were divided; so that this would be a signal mercy on them, and deliver them off from their building, (for if they could not understand one another, they could not help one another,) as also for disposing them to scatter; for when they could not understand one another, they could not employ one another. Note, God has various means, and effectual ones, to baffle and defeat the projects of proud men that set themselves against him, and particularly to divide them among themselves, either by dividing their speech, (Judges 9, 23,) or by dividing their tongues, as David prays, Ps. 55, 9.

III. The execution of these counsels of God, to the blasting and defeating of the counsels of men, v. 8, 9. God made them know whose word should stand, his or their’s, as the expression is, Jer. 44, 28. Notwithstanding their oneness and obstinacy, God had hid them, and everywhere they dealt proudly, he was above them, for who ever hardened his heart against him and prospered? Three things were done:

1. Their language was confounded. God, who, when he made man, taught him to speak, and put words into his mouth fit to express the conceptions of his mind by, now made those builders to forget their former language, and to speak and understand a new one, which yet was the same to those of the same tribe or family, but not to others; those of one colony could converse together, but not with those of another. Now, (1.) This was a great miracle, and a proof of the power which God has upon the minds and tongues of men, which turns as the rivers of water. (2.) This was a great judgment upon those builders; for being thus deprived of the knowledge of the ancient and holy tongue, they were become incapable of communicating with the true church, in which it was retained; and, probably, it contributed much to their loss of the knowledge of the true God. (3.) We all suffer by it, to this day: in all the inconveniences we sustain by the diversity of languages, and all the pains and trouble we are at to learn the languages we have occasion for, we smart for the rebellion of our ancestors at Babel. No, they did not so, says the unhappy controversy, which are strains of words, and arise from our misunderstanding of one another’s language, for aught I know, are owing to this confusion of tongues. (4.) The project of some to frame an universal character, in order to a universal language, how desirable soever it may seem, is yet, I think, but a vain attempt; for it is to strive against a divine sentence, by which the languages of the nations will be divided while the world stands. (5.) We may here lament the loss of the universal use of the Hebrew tongue, which, from this time, was the vulgar language of the Hebrews only, and continued so till the captivity in Babylon, where, even among them, it was exchanged for the Syriac. (6.) As the confounding of tongues divided the children of men, and scattered them abroad, so the gift of tongues, bestowed upon the apostles, Acts 2, 1-13, was greatly to the gathering together of the children of God, which were scattered abroad, and the uniting of them in Christ, that with one mind and mouth they might glorify God, Rem. 15, 6.

2. Their building was stopped; they left off to build the city. This was the effect of the confusion of their tongues; for it not only incapacitated them for helping one another, but, probably, struck such a damp upon their spirits, that they could not proceed, since they saw, in this, the hand of the Lord gone out against them. Note, (1.) It is wisdom to leave off that which we see God fights against. (2.) God is able to blast and bring to naught all the devices and designs of Babel-builders. He sits in heaven, and laughs at the counsels of the kings of the earth against Him and His Anointed; and foretold them to confess that there is no wisdom nor counsel against the Lord, Prov. 21, 30. Isa. 8, 9, 10.

3. The builders were scattered abroad from thence upon the face of the whole earth, v. 8, 9. They departed in companies, after their families, and after their tongues, (ch. 10, 5, 20, 31,) to the several countries and places allotted to them in the division that had been made, which they knew before, but would not go to take the possession of till now that they were forced to it. Observe here, [1.] That the very thing which they feared, came upon them; they feared dispersion, they sought to evade it by an act of rebellion, and by that act they brought upon themselves the evil with all its horrors; for we are most likely to fall into that trouble which we seek to evade by indirect and sinful methods. (2.) That it was God’s work: The Lord dispersed them abroad. God was the creator of men in all scattering providences; if the family be scattered, relations scattered, churches scattered, it is the Lord’s doing. (3.) That though they were as firmly in league with one another as could be, yet the Lord scattered them; for no man can keep together what God will put asunder. (4.) That thus God justly took vengeance on them for their one ness in that presumptuous attempt to build their sinful dispensation; the just punishment of sinful unions; Simeon and Levi, who had been brethren in iniquity, were divided in Jacob, ch. 49, 5, 7, Ps. 83, 3, 13. (5.) That they left behind them a perpetual memorandum of their reapprach in the name given to the place; it was called Babel, confusion. They that aim at a great name, commonly come off with a bad name. (6.) The children of men were now scattered, never did, nor ever will, come all together again, till the great day, when the Son of man shall sit upon the throne of his glory, and all nations shall be gathered before him, Matt. 25, 31, 32.

10. These are the generations of Shem: Shem was an hundred years old, and begat Arphaxad, two years after the flood: 11. And Shem lived after he begat Arphaxad, five hundred years, and begat sons and daughters. 12. And Arphaxad lived five thiers, ch. 47. 9. 3. That Eber, from whom the Hebrews were denominated, was the longest lived of any that were born after the flood; which perhaps was the reward of his singular piety, and strict adherence to the ways of God.

27. Now these are the generations of Terah: Terah begat Abram, Nahor, and Haran; and Haran begat Lot. 28. And Haran died before his father Terah, in the land of his nativity, in Ur of the Chaldees. 29. And Abram and Nahor took them wives: the name of Abram's wife was Sara; and the name of Nahor's wife, Milcah, the daughter of Haran, the father of Milcah, and the father of Iscah. 30. But Sarai was barren; she had no child. 31. And Terah took Abram his son, and Lot, the son of Haran, his son's son, and Sarai his daughter-in-law, his son Abram's wife; and they went forth with them from Ur of the Chaldees, to go into the land of Canaan, and they came unto Haran, and dwelt there. 32. And the days of Terah were two hundred and five years: and Terah died in Haran.

Here begins the story of Abram, whose name is famous, henceforward, in both Testaments; we have here

I. His country: Ur of the Chaldees, that was the land of his nativity, an idolatrous country, where even the children of Eber themselves were degenerated. Note, Those who are, through grace, heirs of the land of promise, ought to remember what was the land of their nativity; what was their corrupt and sinful state by nature; the rock out of which they were hewn.

II. His relations; mentioned for his sake, and because of their interest in the following story. 1. His father was Terah, of whom it is said, Josh. 24. 2, that he served other gods, on the other side of the flood; so early did idolatry gain footing in the world, and so hard is it even for those that have some good principles, to swim against the stream. Though it is said, v. 26, that when Terah was seventy years old, he begat Abram, Nahor, and Haran, (which seems to tell us that Abram was the eldest son of Terah, and born in his 70th year,) yet, by comparing v. 32, which makes Terah to die in his 205th year, with Acts 7. 4, (where it is said that Abram removed from Haran, when his father was dead,) and with ch. 12. 4, (where it is said that he was but 73 years old when he removed from Haran,) it appears that he was born in the 130th year of Terah, and, probably, was his youngest son; for, in God's choices, the last are often first, and the first last. We have, 2. Some account of his brethren. (1.) Nahor, out of whose family both Isaac and Jacob had their wives. (2.) Haran, the father of Lot, of whom it is here said, v. 28, that he died before his father Terah. Note, Children cannot be sure that they shall survive their parents: For death does not go by seniority, taking the eldest first: the shadow of death is without any order, Job 10. 22. It is likewise said that he died in Ur of the Chaldees, before the happy removal of the family out of that idolatrous country. Note, It concerns us to hasten out of our natural state, lest death surprise us in it. 3. His wife was Sara, who, some think, was the same with Iscah, the daughter of Haran. Abram himself says of her, that she was the daughtter of his father, but not the daughter of his mother, ch. 20. 14. She was ten years younger than Abram. III. His departure out of Ur of the Chaldees, with his father Terah, his nephew Lot, and the rest of his family, in obedience to the call of God, of which we shall read more, ch. 12, 1, &c. This chapter leaves them in Haran, or Charran, a place about the midway between Ur and Canaan, where they dwelt till Terah’s head was laid, probably because the old man was unable, through the infirmities of age, to proceed in his journey. Many reach to Charran, and yet fall short of Canaan; they are not far from the kingdom of God, and yet never come thither.

CHAP. XII.

The pedigree and family of Abram we had an account of in the foregoing chapter; here, the Holy Ghost enters upon his story; henceforward, Abram and his seed are almost the only subject of the sacred history. In this chapter we have, I. God’s call of Abram to the land of Canaan, v. 1–3. II. Abram’s obedience to this call, v. 4, 5. III. His welcome to the land of Canaan, v. 6, 7. IV. His journey to Egypt, with an account of what happened to him, and of Abram’s flight out of Egypt, v. 10–13. Sarai’s danger, and deliverance, v. 14–20.

1. NOW the Lord had said unto Abram, Get thee out of thy country, and from thy kindred, and from thy father’s house, unto a land that I will show thee. 2. And I will make of thee a great nation, and I will bless thee, and make thy name great; and thou shalt be a blessing: 3. And I will bless them that bless thee, and curse him that curseth thee: and in thee shall all families of the earth be blessed.

We have here the call by which Abram was removed out of the land of his nativity into the land of promise; which was designed both to try his faith and obedience, and also to separate him, and set him apart, for God and for special services and favours which were further designed. The circumstances of this call we may be somewhat helped to the knowledge of, from Stephen’s speech, Acts 7, 2, where we are told, 1. That the God of glory appeared to him, to give him this call; appeared in such displays of his glory, as left Abram no room to doubt the divine authority of this call. God spake to him afterward in divers manners; but this first time, when the correspondence was to be settled, he appeared to him as the God of glory, and spake to him. 2. That this call was given him in Mesopotamia, before he dwelt in Charran; therefore we rightly read it, The Lord had said unto Abram, namely, in Ur of the Chaldees; and, in obedience to this call, as Stephen farther relates the story, v. 4, he came out of the land of the Chaldeans, and dwelt in Charran, or Haran, about five years, and from thence, when his father was dead, by a fresh command, pursuant to the former, God called him into the land of Canaan. Some think that Haran was in Chaldea, and so was still a part of Abram’s country; or that he, having staid there five years, began to call it his country, and to take root there, till God let him know that this was not the place he was intended for. Note, If God loves us, and has mercy in store for us, he will not suffer us to take up our rest anywhere where short of Canaan, but will graciously repeat his calls, till the good work begun, be performed, and our souls repose in God only.

In the call itself, we have a precept and a promise. 1. A trying precept, v. 1. Get thee out of thy country. Now, 1. By this precept he was tried whether he loved God better than he loved his native soil and dear friends, and whether he could willingly leave all, to go along with God. 2. It was not but what Abram was become idolatrous, his kindred and his father’s house were a constant temptation to him, and he could not continue with them without danger of being infected by them; therefore, Get thee out, v. 8—9. Fade thee!—Get thee gone, with all speed, escape for thy life, look not behind thee, ch. 19. 7. Note, Those that are in a sinful state are concerned to make all haste out of it. Get thee out for thyself; (so some read it,) that is, for thine own good; that is, those who love their sins and turn to God, will themselves be unspeakable gainers by the change, Prov. 9. 12. This command which God gave to Abram, is much the same with the gospel-call by which all the spiritual seed of faithful Abram are brought into covenant with God. For, (1.) Natural affection must give way to divine grace: our country is dear to us, our kindred dearer, and our father’s house dearest of all; and yet they must all be hated, Luke 14. 26, that is, we must love them less than Christ, hate them in comparison with him, and, whenever any of these come in competition with him, they must be postponed, and the preference given to the will and honour of the Lord Jesus. (2.) Sin and all the occasions of it, must be forsaken, and, particularly, bad company; we must abandon all the idols of the heart, which have kept us up in our hearts, and get out of the way of temptation, place us in a world or sight, even a right eye that leads us to sin, Matt. 5. 29, willingly parting with that which is dearest to us, when we cannot keep it without hazard of our integrity. Those that resolve to keep the commandments of God, must quit the society of evil doers, Ps. 119. 115. Acts 2. 40. (3.) The world, and all our enjoyments in it, must be looked upon with a good eye, and contempt; we must no longer look upon it as our country, or home, but as our ruin, and must, accordingly, sit loose to it, and live above it, get out of it in affection.

2. By this precept he was tried, whether he could trust God further than he saw him; for he must leave his own country, to go to a land that God would show him; he does not say, “It is a land I will give thee,” but merely, “a land that I will show thee.” Nor does he tell him what land it was, or what kind of land; but he must trust God with an implicit faith, and take God’s word for it, though he had no particular securities given him, that he should be no loser by leaving his country, to follow God. Note, Those that will deal with God, must deal upon trust; we must quit the things that are seen, for things that are not seen, and submit to the sufferings of this present time, in hope of glory that is yet to be revealed, Rom. 8. 18, for it doth not yet appear, what we shall be. 1 John, 2. 2, any more than it did to Abram, when God called him to a land he would show him, so teaching him to live in a continual dependence upon his direction, and with his eye ever toward him.

II. Here is an encouraging promise, nay, it is a complication of promises, many, and exceeding great and precious. Note, All God’s precepts are intended to precursour these promises: and God does not make himself known to us as a Commandment, he makes himself known also as a Rewarder; if we obey the command, God will not fail to perform the promise. Here are six promises.

1. I will make of thee a great nation; when God took him from his own people, he promised to make him the head of another; he cut him off from being the branch of a wild olive, to make him the root of a good olive. This promise was, (1.) A great relief to Abram’s burden; for he had now no child. Note, God knows how to suit his favours to the wants and necessities of his children. He that has a plaster for every sore, will provide one for that first that he paints. [2.] A great trial to Abram's faith; for his wife was long barren, so that if he believe, it must be by hope, and his faith must build purely upon that power which can out of stones raise up children unto Abraham, and make them a great nation. Note.
[1.] God makes nations; by him they are born at once, Isa. 66. 8, and he speaks to build and plant them, Jer. 18. 9. And [2.] If a nation be made great in wealth and power, it may be by that power that God can raise great nations out of dry ground, and can make a little one to be a thousand.

2. I will bless thee; either particularly, with the blessing of fruitfulness and increase, as he had blessed Adam and Noah; or in general, "I will bless thee with all manner of blessings, both of the upper and the nether springs: leave thy father's house, and I will give thee a father's blessing, better than that of thy progenitors." Note, Obedient believers shall be sure to inherit the blessing:

3. I will make thy name great; by moving among his country, he lost his name there: "Care not for that," says God, "but trust me, and I will make thee a greater name than ever thou couldst have had there." Having no child, he feared he should have no name; but God will make him a great nation, and so make him a great name. Note, (1.)
God is the fountain of honour, and from him promesses all the blessings of life and grace, (2.)
The name of obedient believers shall certainly be made great, and be made great: the best report is that which the elders obtained by faith, Heb. 11. 2.

4. Thou shalt be a blessing: that is, (1.) "Thy happiness shall be a sample of happiness, so that those who would bless their friends, shall only pray that God would make them like Abram;" as Ruth 4. 11. Note, God's dealings with obedient believers, are so kind and gracious, that we need not deserve for ourselves or our friends to be any better dealt with; that is blessedness enough. (2.) "Thy life shall be a blessing to the places where thou shalt sojourn." Note, Good men are the blessings of their country, and it is their unspeakable honour and happiness to be made so.

5. I will bless them that bless thee, and curse him that curseth thee: this made it a kind of a league offensive and defensive between God and Abram.
Abram heartily espoused God's cause, and here God promises to interest himself in his: (1.) He promises to be a Friend to his friends, to take kindnesses shown to him as done to himself, and to recompense them accordingly. God will take care that none be losers, in the long run, by any service done for his people; even a cup of cold water shall be rewarded. (2.) He promises to appear against his enemies; that he would not only God's friends but his cause: even Abram himself; but while their causeless curses could not hurt Abram, God's righteous curse would certainly overtake and min them, Num. 24.
9. This is a good reason why we should bless them that curse us, because it is enough that God will curse them, Ps. 38. 13. 15.

6. In thee shall all families of the earth be blessed;
this was the promise made to the rest; for it points at the Messiah, in whom all the promises are yes and amen. Note, (1.) Jesus Christ is the great Blessing of the world, the greatest that e er the world was blessed with; he is a family-blessing, by himself salvation is brought to the house, Luke 19.
9. When we reck on our family blessings, let us put Christ in the infirmities—the first place, as the Blessing of blessings. But how are all the families of the earth blessed in Christ, when so many are strangers to him? Answer, [1.] All that are blessed, are blessed in him, Acts 4. 12. [2.] All that believe, of what family soever they are, shall be blessed in him. [3.] Some of all the families of the earth are blessed in him. [4.] There are some blessings which all the families of the earth are blessed with in Christ; for the gospel-salvation is a common salvation, Jude 3. (2.) It is a great honour to be related to Christ; this made Abram's name great, that the Messiah was to descend from his loins, much more than that he should be the father of many nations. It was Abram's honour to be his father by nature; it will be our's to be his brethren by grace, Matt. 12. 50.

4. So Abram departed, as the Lord had spoken unto him; and Lot went with him: and Abram was seventy and five years old when he departed out of Haran. 5.
And Abram took Sarai his wife, and Lot his brother's son, and all their substance that they had gathered, and the souls that they had gotten in Haran; and they went forth to go into the land of Canaan; and into the land of Canaan they came.

Here is,
I. Abram's removal out of his country; out of Ur first, and afterward out of Haran, in compliance with the call of God; so Abram departed; he was not disobedient to the heavenly vision, but did as he was bid. Gen. 15. 1. Ib. [3.] Thy foot; Gen. 15.
11. There was no physical journey. In 16. 1-4 he went out, not knowing whither he went, Heb. 11 8, but knowing whom he followed, and under whose direction he went. Thus God called him to his foot, Isa. 41. 2.

II. His age when he removed; he was seventy and five years old, an age when he should rather have rested himself; but God would have him to begin the world again; now in his old age, he will submit. Here is an instance of an old convert. The company and cargo that he took with him.
1. He took his wife, and his nephew Lot, with him; not by force and against their wills, but by persuasion. Sarai, his wife, would be sure to go with him; God had joined them together, and nothing should put them asunder. If Abram leave all to follow God, Sarai will leave all to follow Abram; though neither of them knew whither.
And it was a mercy to Abram to have such a companion in his travels, a help meet for him. Note,
It is very comfortable when husband and wife agree to go together in the way to heaven. Lot also, his kinsman, was influenced by Abram's good example, who was perhaps his guardian after the death of his father, and who was willing to go along with him too. Note, Those that go to Canaan, need not go alone; for though few find the strait gate, blessed be God, some do; and it is our wisdom to go with those with whom God is, Zech. 8. 23, wherever they go.

2. They took all their effs with them; all their substance and mov(e)able goods, that they had gathered. For, [1.] With themselves they would give up their all, to be at God's disposal, would keep back no part of the price, but venture all in one bottom, knowing it was a good bottom. (2.) They would furnish themselves with that which was requisite, both for the service of God, and the supply of their family, in the country whither they were going. To have thrown away his substance, be cause God had promised to bless him, had been to tempt God, not to trust him. (3.) They would not be under any temptation to return, therefore they leave not a hoof behind, lest that should make them mindful of the country from which they came out. 3. They took with them the souls that they had gotten, that is, (1.) The servants they had bought, which were part of their substance, but are called souls, to remind masters that their poor servants have souls, precious souls, which they ought to take care of, and provide food convenient for. (2.) The proselytes they had made, and persuaded to attend the worship of the true God, and to go with them to Canaan: the souls which (as one of the Rabbins expresses it) they had gathered under the wings of the Divine Majesty. Note, Those who serve and follow God themselves, should do all they can to bring others to serve and follow him too. Those souls they are said to have gathred; we must reckon ourselves true gainers, if we can but win souls to Christ. 4. Here is their happy arrival at their journey's end. They went forth to go into the land of Canaan, so they did before, (ch. 11. 31.) and then took up short; but now they held on their way, and, by the good hand of their God upon them, to the land of Canaan they came; where, by a fresh revelation, they were told that this was the land God promised to show them. They were not discouraged by the difficulties they met with, nor dismayed by the delights they met with; but pressed forward. Note, 1. Those that set out for heaven, must persevere to the end, still reaching forth to those things that are before. 2. That which we undertake, in obedience to God's command, and a humble attendance upon his providence, will certainly succeed, and end with comfort at last.

6 And Abram passed through the land unto the place of Shechem, unto the plain of Moreh. And the Canaanite was then in the land. 7. And the Lord appeared unto Abram, and said, Unto thy seed will I give this land: and there builded he an altar unto the Lord, who appeared unto him. 8. And he removed from thence unto a mountain on the east of Beth-el, and pitched his tent, having Beth-el on the west, and Hai on the east: and there he builded an altar unto the Lord, and called upon the name of the Lord. 9. And Abram journeyed, going on still toward the south.

One would have expected that Abram having had such an extraordinary call to Canaan, some great event should have followed upon his arri at all there; that he should have been introduced with all possible marks of honour and respect, and that the kings of Canaan should immediately have surrendered the country to him, and done him homage: but, lo! he comes not with observation, little notice is taken of him: for still God will have him to lie by faith, and to look upon Canaan, even when he was in it, as a land of promise: therefore observe here, 1. How little comfort he had in the land he came to; for, 1. He had it not to himself; the Canaanite was then in the land. He found the country people and possessed by Cananites, who were likely to be but bad neighbours, and worse landlards; and, for aught that appears, he could not have ground to pitch his tent on, but by their permission: thus the accursed Canaanites seemed to be in better circumstances than blessed Abram. Note, The children of this world have commonly more of it than God's children. 2. He had not a settlement in it. He passed through the land, v. 6. He removed to a mountain, v. 8. He journeyed, going on still, v. 9. Observe here, (1.) That sometimes it is the lot of good men to be unsettled, and obliged often to remove their habitation. Holy David had his wanderings, his fittings, Ps. 56. 8. (2.) Our removes in this world are often into various conditions. Abram sojourned, first, in a plain, v. 6, then, in a mountain, v. 8. God had set the one over against the other. (3.) All good people must look upon themselves as strangers and sojourners in this world, and by faith sit loose to it as a strange country. So Abram did, Heb. 11. 8. 14. (4.) While we are here in this present state, we must be journeying, and going on still from strength to strength, as having not yet attained.

II. How much comfort he had in the God he followed. He might have a great deal of satisfaction in converse with the Canaanites, whom he found there, he had abundance of pleasure in communion with that God who brought him thither, and did not leave him. Communion with God is kept up by the word and by prayer, and by these according to the methods of that dispensation, Abram's communion with God was kept up in the land of his pilgrimage. 1. God appeared to Abram; probably, in a vision, and told him, that there should be a plenty of good things, unto thy seed will I give this land. Note, (1.) No place or condition of life can shut us out from the comfort of God's gracious visitations. Abram is a sojourner, unsettled, among the Canaanites; and yet here also he meets with him that lives and sees him. Enemies may part us and our tents, and our altars, but not us and our God. Nav. (2.) With them he was conscious of no other comfort, than that their way was a good way of duty, though he lead them from their friends, he will himself make up that less by his gracious appearances to them. (3.) God's promises are sure and satisfying to all those who conscientiously observe and obey his precepts: and those who, in compliance with God's call, leave or lose any thing that is dear to them, shall be sure of something else abundantly better in lieu of it. Abram had left the land of his nativity, "Well," says God, "I will give thee this land," Matth. 19. 29. (4.) God reveals himself and his favours to his people by degrees; before he had promised to show him this land, now, to give it him: as grace is growing, so is comfort. (5.) It is comfort able to have land of God's giving, not by providence only, but by promise. (6.) Mercies to the children are mercies to the parents. "I will give it, not to thee, but to thy seed," It is a grant in return. It was his seed, which, yet, it should be, Abram understood also as a grant to himself of a better land in reversion, of which this was a type; for he looked for a heavenly country, Heb. 11. 16.

2. Abram attended on God in his instituted ordinances. He built an altar unto the Lord, who appeared to him, and called on the name of the Lord, v. 7, 8. Now consider this, (1.) As done upon a special occasion; when God appeared to him, then and there he made an altar to him, and called upon him. Note, He appeared to him, who appeared to him. Thus he returned God's visit, and kept up his correspondence with Heaven, as one that resolved it should not fail on his side; thus he acknowledged with thankfulness, God's kindness to him in making him that gracious visit and promise; and thus he testified his confidence in, and dependence upon, the word which God had spoken, Note. An altar belongeth to the worship of God, for a promise which he does not yet see in the performance of, and build an altar to the honour of God who appears to him, though he does not yet appear for him. (2.) As his constant practice, without ceasing he removed. As soon as Abram was got to Canaan, though he was but a stranger and sojourner there, yet he set up, and kept up the worship of God in his family; and wherever he had a text, God had an altar, and that, an altar sanctified by prayer. For he not only minded the ceremonial part of religion, the offering of sacrifice; but he made conscience of the natural duty of seeking to his God, and calling on his name, that spiritual sacrifice with which God is well-pleased; he preached concerning the name of the Lord, that is, he instructed his family and neighbours in the knowledge of the true God, and his holy religion. The souls he had gotten n Haran, being disciplined, must be further taught. Note, Those that would approve themselves to the children of Abraham, and would inherit the blessing of Abraham, must make conscience of keeping up the solemn worship of God, particularly in their families, according to the example of Abraham: the way of family worship is a good old way, is no novel invention, but the ancient usage of all the saints. Abram was very rich, and had a numerous family, was now unsettled, and in the midst of enemies; and yet, wherever he pitched his tent, he built an altar: wherever we go, let us not fail to take our religion along with us.

10. And there was a famine in the land: and Abram went down into Egypt, to sojourn there; for the famine was grievous in the land. 11. And it came to pass, when he was come near to enter into Egypt, that he said unto Sarai his wife, Behold now, I know that thou art a fair woman to look upon: 12. Therefore it shall come to pass, when the Egyptians shall see thee, that they shall say, This is his wife: and they will kill me, but they will save thee alive. 13. Say, I pray thee, thou art my sister; that it may be well with me for thy sake: and my soul shall live because of thee.

I. A famine in the land of Canaan, a grievous famine; that fruitful land was turned into barrenness, and waste for the purity of the Canaanites, who dwelt therein, but to exercise the faith of Abram who sojourned therein; and a very sore trial was: it tried what he would think. 1. Of God that brought him hither: whether he would not be ready to say, with his murmuring seed, that he was brought forth to be killed with hunger; Exod. 16. 2. Nothing short of a strong faith could keep up good thoughts of God under such a providence. 2. Of the land of promise; whether he would think the grant of it worth the accepting, and a valuable consideration for the relinquishing of his own country, when, for aught that then appeared, it was a land that ate up the inhabitants: now he was tried, whether he could preserve an unshaken confidence that the God that brought him to Canaan, would maintain him there, and whether he could rejoice in him as the God of his salvation, when the fig-tree did not blossom, Habb. 3. 17, 18. Note, (1.) Strong faith is commonly exercised with divers temptations, that it may be found to praise, and honour, and glory, 1 Pet. 1. 6, 7. (2.) It pleases God sometimes to try those with great afflictions, who are but young beginners in religion. (3.) It is possible for a man to be in the way of duty, and in the way to happiness, and yet meet with great troubles and disappointments. 2. Abram's remove into Egypt, upon occasion of this famine. See how wisely God provides that there should be plenty in one place when there was scarcity in another, that as member of the great body, we may not say to one another. Have no need of you. God's providence took care there should be a supply in Egypt, and Abram's prudence made use of the opportunity; for we 'empt God, and do not trust him, if, in the time of distress, we are not willing to accept of the means he has graciously provided for our preservation; we must not expect needless miracles. But that which is especially observable here, to the praise of Abram, is, that he did not offer to return, upon this occasion, to the country from which he came out, nor so much as towards it. The land of his nativity lay north-east from Canaan; and therefore, when he must, for a time, quit Canaan, he resolves to go to Egypt which lay south-west, the contrary way, that he might not so much as seem to look back; see Heb. 11. 15, 16. Further observe, when he went down into Egypt, it was to sojourn there, not to dwell there. Note, 1. Though Providence, for a time, may cast us into bad places, yet we ought to tarry there no longer than needs must; we may sojourn there, where we may not settle. 2. A good man, while he is on this side heaven, wherever he is, is but a sojourner.

III. A great fault which Abram was guilty of, in denying his wife, and pretending that she was his sister. The scripture is impartial in relating the misdeeds of the most celebrated saints, which are recorded, not for our imitation, but for our admonition; that who he thinks he stands, may take heed lest he fall. 1. His fault was, dissembling his relation to Sarah, equivocating concerning it, and teaching his wife, and, probably, all his attendants, to do so too. What he said was, he was her sister, (ch 20. 12.) but with a purpose to deceive; he so concealed a further truth, as, in effect, to deny it, and to expose thereby both his wife and the Egyptians to sin. 2. That which was at the bottom of it, was a jealous timorous fancy he had, that some of the Egyptians would be so charmed with the beauty of Sarah, (Egypt producing few such beauties,) that if they should be suffer'd to make advances, he would find some way or other to take him off, that they might marry her. He presumes they would rather be guilty of murder than adultery; such a heinous crime was it then accounted, and such a sacred regard was paid to the marriage-bond: hence he inferred, without any good reason, They will kill me. Note, The fear of man brings a snare, and man are driven to sin by the dread of death, Luke 12. 4, 5. 3. Of the grace and providence of God, was faithfulness, and yet he thus fell, through unbelief and distrust of the Divine Providence, even after God had appeared to him twice. Alas, what will become of the willows, when the cedars are thus shaken?

14. And it came to pass that when Abram was come into Egypt, the Egyptians beheld the woman, that she was very fair. 15. The princes also of Pharaoh saw her, and commended her before Pharaoh: and the woman was taken into Pharaoh's house. 16. And he entreated Abram well for her sake: and he had sheep, and oxen, and he-asses, and men-servants, and maid-servants, and she-asses, and camels. 17. And the Lord plagued Pharaoh and his house with great plagues, because of Sarai Abram's wife. 18. And Pharaoh called Abram, and said, What is this that thou hast done unto me? Why didst thou not tell me that she was thy wife? 19. Why saidst thou, She is my sister? So I might have taken her to me to wife: now therefore be behold thy wife, take her, and go thy way. 20. And Pharaoh commanded his men concerning him: and they sent him away, and his wife, and all that he had.

Here is, 1. The dang: Sarai was in of having her chastity violated by the king of Egypt. And, without doubt, the peril of sin is the greatest peril we can be in. Pharaoh's princes (his pimps rather) saw her, and observing what a comely woman she was, they commanded her before Pharaoh; not for that which was really her praise—her virtue and modesty, her faith and piety, (those were no excellencies in their eyes,) but for her beauty, which they thought too good for the king to neglect. While Sarai was in this danger, Abram fared the better for her sake; Pharaoh gave him sheep, and oxen, &c. (v. 16.) to gain his consent with her whom they supposed his sister. We cannot think that Abram expected this when he came down into Egypt, much less that he had an eye to it when he denied his wife; but God brought good out of evil. And thus the wealth of the sinner proves, some way or other, laid up for the just.

II. The deliverance of Sarai from this danger. For if God did not deliver us, many a time, by preventing evil, or dispensing with the thing or person, he would have sent us, and we bring ourselves into by our own sin and folly, and which therefore we could not expect any deliverance from by promise, we should soon be ruined, nay, we had been ruined long before this. He deals not with us according to our deserts.

1. God chastised Pharaoh, and so prevented the progress of his sin. Note, Those are happy chastisements, that hinder us in a sinful way, and effectually bring us to our duty, and particularly to the duty of restoring that which we have wrongfully taken and detained. Observe, Not Pharaoh only, but his house, was plagued; probably, those princes especially that had commanded Sarai to Pharaoh. Note, Partners in sin are justly made partakers in the punishment. Those that serve others' lusts, must expect to share in their plagues. We are not told particularly what those plagues were; but, doubtless, there was something in the plagues themselves, or some explication added to them, sufficient to convince them that it was for Sarai's sake that they were thus plagued.

2. Pharaoh reproved Abram, and then dismissed him with respect.

(1.) The reproof was calm, but very just; What is this that thou hast done? What an improper thing! How unbecoming a wise and good man! Note, If these that profess religion, do that which is unfair and disingenuous, especially if they say that they prefer religion to all things, they must expect to hear of it, and have reason to thank those that will tell them of it. We find a prophet of the Lord justly reproved and upbraided by a heathen master, Jon. 1. 6. Pharaoh reasons with him, Why didst thou not tell me that she was thy wife? Intimating, that if he had known that, he would not have taken her into his house. Note, It is a fault too common among good people, to entertain suspicions of others beyond what there is cause for. We have often found more of virtue, honour, and conscience, in some people, than we thought they possessed; and it ought to be a pleasure to us to be thus disappointed, as Abram was here, who found Pharaoh to be a better man than he expected. Charity teaches us to hope the best.

(2.) The dismissal was kind, and very generous. He returned him his wife without offering any injury to her honour, v. 19, Behold thy wife, take her. Note, Those that would prevent sin, must remove the temptation, or get out of the way of it. He also sent him away in peace, and was so far from design to kill him, as he apprehended, that he took particular care of him. Note, We often perplex and insnare ourselves with fears which soon appear to have been altogether groundless. We often fear, where no fear is. We fear the fiery of the oppressor, as though he were ready to destroy, when really there is no danger, Isa. 51. 13. It had been more for Abram's credit and comfort, to have told the truth at first; for, after all, honesty is the best policy. Nay, it is said, v. 20, Pharaoh commanded his men concerning him; that is, [1.] He charged them not to injure him in any thing. Note, It is not enough for those in authority, that they do not hurt themselves, but they must restrain their servants, and those about them, from doing hurt. Or, [2.] He appointed them, when Abram was disposed to return home, after the famine, to conduct him he fare out of Egypt. Perhaps, among others, the Psalmist refers, Ps. 105. 13. 15. He reproved kings for their sakes, saying, Touch not mine anointed. Perhaps, if Pharaoh had not sent him away, he would have been tempted to stay in Egypt, and to forget the land of promise. Note, Sometimes God makes use of the enemies of 1 is people, to convince them, and remind them, that this world is not their rest, but that they must think of departing thither. Lastly, Observe a resemblance between this deliverance of Abram out of Egypt, and the deliverance of his seed thence: 430 years after Abram went into Egypt on occasion of a famine, they went thither, on occasion of a famine also; he was fetched out with great plagues on Pharaoh, so were they; as Abram was dismissed by Pharaoh, and enriched with the spoil of the Egyptians, so were they. For God's care of his people is the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever.

CHAP. XIII.

In this chapter, we have a further account concerning Abram. In general, of his condition and behaviour in the land of promise, which was now the land of his pilgrimage. 1. His removes, v. 1, 3, 4, 18. 2. His riches, v. 2, 3. His devotion, v. 4, 18. 2. A particular account of a quarrel that happened between him and Lot. 1. The unhappy occasion of their strife, v. 5, 6. 2. The parties concerned in the strife, with the aggravation of it, v. 7. 3. The making up of the quarrel, by the prudence of Abram, v. 8, 9. IV. Lot's departure from Abram in the plain of Mamre, and his lands and appearance to Abram, to confirm the promise of the land of Canaan to him, v. 14. 17.

1. AND Abram went up out of Egypt, he, and his wife, and all that he had, and Lot with him, into the south. 2. And Abram was very rich in cattle, in silver, and in gold. 3. And he went on his journeys from the south even to Beth-el, unto the place where his tent had been at the be-giving, between Bethel and Hai; 4. Unto the place of the altar which he had made there at the first: and there Abram called on the name of the Lord.

Here is,

I. Abram's return out of Egypt, v. 1. He came himself, and brought all his with him, back again to Canaan. Note, Though there may be occasions when we go sometimes into places of temptation, yet we must hasten out of them as soon as possible. See Ruth 1. 6.

II. His wealth, v. 2. He was very rich. He was very heavy, so the Hebrew word signifies. For riches are a burthen, and they that will be rich, do but load themselves with thick clay. Hab. 2. 6. There is a burthen of care in getting them, guilt in abusing them, sorrow in losing them, and a burthen of account, at last, to be given up concerning them. Great possessions do make men heavy and unwieldy. Abram was not only rich in faith and good works, and in the promises, but he was rich in cattle, and in silver and gold. Note, 1. God is his providence, sometimes makes good men rich men, and teaches them how to use their riches. 2. The riches of good men are the fruits of God's blessing. God had said to Abram, I will bless thee; and that blessing made him rich without sorrow. Prov. 10. 22. 3. True piety will very well consist with great prosperity. Though it is hard for a rich man to get to heaven, yet it is not impossible, Mark 10. 25. 24. Abram was very rich, and yet very religious. Nay, as piety is a friend to outward prosperity, 1. Sam. 8, so outward prosperity, if well managed, is an ornament to piety, and an opportunity of doing so much the more good.

III. His removal to Bethel, v. 3, 4. Thither he went, not only because there he had formerly his tent, and he was willing to go among his old acquaintance; but because there he had, formerly, had his altar; and, though the altar was gone, (probably, he himself having taken it down, when he left the city, lest it should be polluted by the idolatrous Canaanites,) yet he came to the place of the altar, either to revive the remembrance of the sweet communion he had had with God in that place, or, perhaps, to pay the vows he had there made to God when he undertook his journey into Egypt. Long afterward, God sent Jacob to this same place, on that errand. Gen. 35. 1. Go, to Bethel, where thou wast not. We have need to be reminded, and should take all occasions to remind ourselves, of our solemn vows; and perhaps the place where they were made, may help to bring them fresh to mind, and it may therefore do us good.

IV. His devotion there. His altar was gone, so that he could not offer sacrifice; but he called on the name of the Lord, as he had done, ch. 12. 3. Note, 1. All God's people are praying people. You may as soon find a living man without breath, as a living christian without prayer. 2. Those that would approve themselves upright with their God, must be constant and persevering in the services of religion. Abram did not leave his religion behind him in Egypt, as many do in their travels. 3. When we cannot do what we would, we must make conscience of doing what we can, in the acts of devotion. When we want an altar, let us not be wanting in prayer, but, wherever we are, call on the name of the Lord.

5. And Lot also, which went with Abram, had flocks, and herds, and tents. 6. And he was not able to bear them, that they might dwell together: for their substance was great, so that they could not dwell together. 7. And there was a strife between the herdmen of Abram's cattle and the herdmen of Lot's cattle: and the Canaanite and the Perizzite dwelt then in the land. 8. And Abram said unto Lot, Let there be no strife between me and thee, and between my herdmen and thy herdmen: for we be brethren. 9. Is not the whole land before thee? Separate thyself, I pray thee, from me: if thou wilt take the left-hand, then I will go to the right; or if thou depart to the right-hand, then I will go to the left.

We have here an unhappy falling-out between Abram and Lot, who had hitherto been inseparable companions; (see v. 1, and ch. 12. 4,) but now parted.

I. The occasion of their quarrel was their riches. We read, v. 2, how rich Abram was; now here we are told, v. 5, that Lot which went with Abram, was rich too; God blessed him with riches, because he went with Abram. Note, 1. It is good being in good company, and going with those with whom God is, Zech. 8. 23. 2. Those that are partners with God's people in their obedience and sufferings, will be better able to bear the temptation of riches, than they themselves can, in their joys and their pursuits, Isa. 66. 10. Now, they both being very rich, the land was not able to bear them that they might dwell comfortably and peaceably together. So that their riches may be considered, (1.) As setting them at a distance one from another; because the place was too strait for them, and they had not room for their stock, it was necessary they should live separ- ately. Note, Every comfort in this world has its cross attending it. Business is a comfort but it has this inconvenience in it, that it allows us not the society of those we love, so often, nor so long, as we could wish. (2.) As setting them at variance one with another. Note, Riches are often an occasion of strife and contention among relations and neighbours. This is one of these foolish and hurtful lusts, which they that will be rich, fall into, 1 Tim. 6. 9. Riches will not only afford matter of contention, but are the things most commonly striven about; but they also stir up a spirit of contention, by making people proud and covetous. Money and tumult—Mine and Thine, are the great make-bates of the world. Poverty and want, wants and wanderings, could not separate between Abram and Lot; but riches did it. Friends are soon lost; but God is a Friend from whose love neither the height of prosperity, nor the depth of adversity, shall separate us.

II. The immediate instruments of the quarrel were their servants. The strife began between the herdmen of Abram's cattle, and the herdmen of Lot's cattle, v. 7. They strove, it is probable, which should have the better pasture, or the better water; and both interested their masters in the quarrel. Note, 1. Good servants, though not always of meanest birth in families, by their pride and passion, their lying, slandering, and tale-bearing, it is a very wicked thing for servants to do; ill offices between relations and neighbours, and to sow discord; those that do so, are the Devil's agents, and their masters' worst enemies.

III. The aggravation of the quarrel was, that the Canaanite and the Perizzite dwelt then in the land, this made the quarrel. 1. Very dangerous; if Abram and Lot cannot agree to feed their flocks together, it is well if the common enemy do not come upon them, and plunder them both. Note, The division of families and churches often proves the ruin of them. 2. Very scandalous. No doubt, the eyes of all the neighbours were upon them, especially because of the singularity of their religion, and the extraordinary sanctity they professed; and notice would soon be taken of this quarrel, and improvement made of it, to their reproach, by the Canaanites and Perizzites. Note, The quarrels of professors and families are often the means of increasing, and giving occasion as much as anything, to the encircling of the Lord to blaspheme.

IV. The making up of this quarrel was very happy. It is best to preserve the peace, that it be not broken; but the next best is, if differences do happen, with all speed to accommodate them, and quench the fire that is broken out. The motion for staying this strife was made of Abram, though he was the senior and superior relation.

1. His petition for peace was very affectionate. Let there be no strife, I pray thee. Abram here shows himself to be a man, (1.) Of a cool spirit, that had the command of his passion, and knew how to turn away wrath with a soft answer. Those that would keep the peace, must never render railing for railing. (2.) Of a condescending spirit; he was willing to yield a place, when his interest would have been to yield peace, and made the first overture of reconciliation. Conquerors reckon it their glory to give peace by power; and it is no less so to give peace by the meekness of wisdom. Note, The people of God should always approve themselves a peaceable people; whatever others are for, they must be for peace.

2. His plea for peace was very cogent. (1.) Let there be no strife between me and thee. Let the Canaanites and Perizzites contend about trifles; but let not me and thee fall out, who know better things, and look for a better country. Note, Professors of religion should, of all others, be careful to avoid contention. Ye shall not be so, Luke 22. 26. We have no such custom, 1 Cor. 11. 16. Let there be no strife between me and thee, who have lived together and loved one another, and all. Note, The remembrance of old friendships should quickly put an end to new quarrels which at any time happen. (2.) Let it be remembered that we are brethren, Heb. We are men brethren; a double argument. [1.] We are men; and, as men, we are mortal creatures, we may die to-morrow, and are concerned to be found in peace; we are rational creatures, and should be ruled by reason. We are men, and not brutes, men, and not children; we are sociable creatures, let us be so to the utmost. [2.] We are brethren. Men of the same nature, of the same kindred and family, of the same religion; companions in obedience, companions in patience; note, The consideration of our relation to each other, as brethren, should always prevail to moderate our passions, and either to prevent, or put an end to, our contentions. Brethren should love as such.

3. His proposal for peace was very fair. Many profess to be for peace, yet will do nothing towards it; but Abram hereby approved himself a real friend to peace, that he proposed an unexceptionable expedient for the preserving of it, v. 9. Is not the whole land before thee? As if he said, Why should we quarrel so? or, while there is room enough for us both? (3.) He concludes that they must part, and is very desirous that they should do so part friends. Separate thyself, I pray thee, from me. What could be expressed more affectionately? He does not expel him, and force him away, but advises that he should separate himself. Nor does he charge him to depart, but humbly desires him to withdraw. Note, Those that have power to command, yet, sometimes, for love's sake, and peace's sake, should rather beseech, as Paul Philemon, v. 8, 9. When the great God condescends to beseech us, we may well afford to beseech one another, to be reconciled, 2 Cor. 5. 20. (3.) He offers him a sufficient share of the land they were in. Though God had promised Abram to give this land to his seed, ca. 12. 7, and it does not appear that ever any such promise was made to Lot, which Abram might have insisted on, to the total exclusion of Lot; yet he allows him to come in compound peace; and in his heart he offers an equal to that one that had not on his right, and will not make God's promise to patronise his quarrel, nor under the protection of that, put any hardship upon his kinsman. (3.) He gives him his choice, and offers to take up with his levings; If thou wilt take the left hand, I will go to the right. There was all the reason in the world, that he should make his choice of the right part, which he recedes from his right. Note, It is a noble conquest, to be willing to yield for peace sake, it is the conquest of ourselves, and our own pride and passion, Matth. 5. 39, 40. It is not only the punctilious of honour, but even interest itself, that, in many cases, must be sacrificed to peace.

10. And Lot lifted up his eyes, and beheld all the plain of Jordan, that it was well-watered every where, before the Lord destroyed Sodom and Gomorrah, even as the garden of the Lord, like the land of Egypt, as thou comest unto Zoor. 11. Then Lot chose him all the plain of Jordan; and Lot journeyed east: and they separated themselves the one from the other. Abram dwelled in the land of Canaan, and Lot dwelled in the cities of the plain, and pitched his tent toward Sodom. 13. But the men of Sodom were wicked, and sinners before the Lord exceedingly.

We have here the choice that Lot made when he parted from Abram; upon this occasion, one would have expected, 1. That he should have expressed an unwillingness to part from Abram, and that, at least, he should have done it with reluctancy. 2. That he should have been so civil as to have remitted the choice back again to Abram. But we find not any instance of deference or respect to his uncle, in the whole management. Abram having offered him the choice, without compliment he accepted it, and made his election. Passion and selfishness make men rude. Now, in the choice which Lot made, we may observe,

I. How much he had an eye to the goodness of the land. He beheld all the plain of Jordan, the flat country in which Sodom stood, that it was admirably well watered every where, and perhaps the strife had been about water, which made him particularly fond of the conveniences. Lot chose him all the plain, v. 10, 11. That valley which was like the garden of Eden itself, now yielded him a most pleasant prospect; it was, in his eye, beautiful for situation, the joy of the whole earth; and therefore he doubted not that it would yield him a comfortable settlement, and that in such a fruitful soil he should certainly thrive, and grow very rich; and this was all he looked at. But what came of it? Why, the next news we hear of him, is, that he is in the briars among them, and his carriage captive; while he lived among them, he vexed his righteous soul with their conversation, and never had a good day with them, till, at last, God fired the town over his head, and forced him to the mountain for safety, who chose the plain for wealth and pleasure. Note, Some choices are seldom on the best. Those who in choosing relations, callings, dwellings, or settlements, are guided and governed by the lusts of the flesh, the lusts of the eye, or the pride of life, and consult not the interests of their souls and their religion, cannot expect God's presence with them, nor his blessing upon them; but are commonly disappointed even in that which they principally aimed at, and miss of the good in which they promised themselves so much. In all our choices, this principle should over-rule us, That this is the best for us, which is best for our souls.

II. How little he considered the badness of the inhabitants. But the men of Sodom were wicked, v. 13. Note, 1. Though all are sinners, yet some are greater sinners than others; the men of Sodom were sinners of the first magnitude, sinners before the Lord, that is, impudently daring sinners; they were so, to a proverb; hence we read of those that declare their sin as Sodom, they hide it not, Isa. 3. 9. 2. That some sinners are the worse for living in a good land. So the Sodomites were; for this was the iniquity of Sodom, pride, fullness of bread, and abundance of idleness; and all these were supported by the great plenty their country afforded, Ezek. 16. 49. Thus the prosperity of fools destroys them. 3. There was room for pious actions and sinners. Fifty Sodomites dwell in a city, a fruitful plain, while faithful Abram and his pious family dwell in tents upon the barren mountains. 4. When wickedness is come to the height, ruin is not far off. Abounding sins are sure presages of approaching judgments. Now Lot's coming to dwell among the Sodomites may be considered, (1.) As a great mercy to them, and a likely means of bringing them to repentance; for now they had a prophet among them, and a preacher of righteousness; if they had hearkened to him, they might have been reformed, and the ruin prevented. Note, God sends preachers, before he sends destroyers; for he is not willing that any should perish. (2.) As a great affliction to Lot, who was not only grieved to see their wickedness, (2 Pet. 2. 7, 8.) but was molested and persecuted by them because he chose to act the contrary way. Note, It has often been the vexation of good men, to live among wicked neighbours, to sojourn in Meshech, (Ps. 120. 5.) and it cannot but be the more grievous, if, as Lot here, they have brought it upon themselves by an unadvised choice.

14. And the Lord said unto Abram, after that Lot was separated from him, Lift up now thine eyes, and look from the place where thou art, northward, and southward, and eastward, and westward. For all the land which thou seest, to thee will I give it, and to thy seed for ever. 16. And I will make thy seed as the dust of the earth: so that if a man can number the dust of the earth, then shall thy seed also be numbered. 17. Arise, walk through the land in the length of it, and in the breadth of it; for I will give it unto thee. 18. Then Abram removed his tent, and came and dwelt in the plain of Mamre, which is in Hebron, and built there an altar unto the Lord.

We have here an account of a gracious visit which God made to Abram, to confirm the promise v. 13. Observe,

1. When it was that God renewed and ratified the promise; after that Lot was separated from him, v. 13. After the grace that was for ever; for these are best prepared for by the visits of divine grace, whose spirits are calm and sedate, and not ruffled with any passion. 2. After Abram's humble self-denying confessions to Lot for the preserving of peace; was then that God came to him with this token of his favour. Note, God will abundantly make up its spiritual peace, what we lose for the preserving of neighbourly peace. When Abram had willingly offered Lot one half of his right, God came, and confirmed the whole to him. 3. After he had lost the comfortable society of his kinsman, by whose departure his hands were weakened, and his heart saddened; then God came to him with these good words, and comfortable words. Note, Commissary with God may, at any time, serve to make up the want of conversation with our friends; when our relations are separated from us, yet God is not. 4. After Lot had chosen that pleasant, fruitful vale, and was gone to take possession of it; lest Abram should be tempted to envy him, and to repent that he had given him the choice, God comes to him, and assures him that what he had, should remain to him and his heirs for ever; so that though Lot perhaps had the better land, yet Abram had the better title; Lot had the paradise, such as it was, but Abram had the promise; and the event soon made it certain that theirs should not be the better point, but really the better part. See Job 22. 20. God owned Abram after his strife with Lot, as the churches did Paul after his strife with Barnabas, Acts 15. 39, 40. II. The promises themselves which God now comforted and enriched Abram with. Two things he assures him of; a good land, and a numerous issue to enslave the heathen.

1. Here is the grant of a good land, a land famous above all lands, for it was to be the holy land, and Inmanuel's land; this is the land here spoken of. (1.) God here shows Abram the land, as he had promised, (ch. 12. 1.) and afterward he showed it to Moses from the top of Pisgah. Lot had lifted up his eyes, and beheld the plain of Jordan, (v. 10.) and he was gone to enjoy what he saw; Come, says God to Abram, now lift up thine eyes, and see, and look, and see thy own. Note, That which God has to show us, is infinitely better and more desirable than any thing that the world has to offer to our view. The prospects of an eye of faith are much more rich and beautiful than those of an eye of sense. These for whom the heavenly Canaan is designed in the other world, have sometimes, by faith, a comfortable prospect of it in their present state; for we look at the things that are not seen, as real, though distant. (2.) He secures this land to him and his seed for ever; (v. 15.) To thee will I give it; and again (v. 17.) I will give it unto thee; every repetition of the promise is a ratification of it. To thee and thy seed, not to Lot and his seed; they were not to have their inheritance in this land, and therefore Providence so ordered it, that he should be separated from Abram first, and then the grant should be confirmed to him and his seed; thus God often brings good out of evil, and makes men's sins and follies subservient to his own wise and holy counsels. To thee and thy seed; to thee, to sojourn as a stranger; to thy seed, to dwell and rule in as proprietors. To thee, that is, to thy seed. The granting it to him and his for ever, intimates that it was typical of the heavenly Canaan, which is given to the spiritual Israel, Acts 7. 5. Note, (3.) He gives him livery and seisin of it, though it was a revision, v. 17, "Arise, walk through the land. Enter and take possession, survey the parcels, and it will appear better than upon a distant prospect." Note, God is willing more abundantly to show to the heirs of promise the immutability of his covenant, and the inestimable worth of covenant-blessings. Go, walk about Zion, Ps. 48. 12.

2. Here is the promise of a numerous issue to replenish this good land, so that it should never be lost for want of seed. Gen. 15. 16. And Abram took Ishmael his son, and all that were the seed of the earth, that is, "They shall increase incredibly, and, take them altogether, they shall be such a great multitude as no man can number."
The were so in Sodom's time, 1 Kings 4. 20. Judah and Israel were many as the sand which is by the sea in multitude. This God here gives him the promise of. Note, The same God that provides the inheritance, provides the heirs. He that has prepared the eternal inheritance, he that gives glory, gives grace to make meet for glory.

Lastly, We are told what Abram did, when God had thus confirmed the promise to him, v. 12. 1. He removed his tent. God bid him walk through the land, that is, "Do not think of fixing in it, but expect to be always unsettled, and walking through it to a better Canaan": in compliance with God's will, herein, he removed his tent, conforming himself to the condition of a pilgrim. 2. He builded there an altar, in token of his thankfulness to God for the kind visit he had made him. Note, When God meets us with gracious promises, he expects that we should attend with our humble praises.

CHAP. XIV.

We have four things in the story of this chapter. I. A war with the king of Sodom and his allies, v. 1. 11. II. The captivity of Lot in that war, v. 12. III. Abram's rescue of Lot from that captivity, with the victory he obtained over the conquerors, v. 13. 16. IV. Abram's return from that expedition, v. 17. with an account of what passed, 1. Between him and the king of Salem, v. 18. 20. 2. Between him and the King of Sodom, v. 21. 24. So that here we have that promise to Abram, in part, fulfilled, that God would make his name great.

I. And it came to pass in the days of Amraphel king of Shinar, Arioch king of Ellasar, Chedorlaomer king of Elam, and Tidal king of nations; 2. That these made war with Bera king of Sodom, and with Birsha king of Go monster, Shinab king of Admah, and Shemeber king of Zeboiim, and the king of Bela, which is Zoar. 3. All these were joined together in the vale of Siddim, which is the salt-sea. 4. Twelve years they served Chedorlaomer, and in the thirteenth year they rebelled. 5. And in the fourteenth year came Chedorlaomer, and the kings that were with him, and smote the Rephaims in Ashteroth-Karnaim, and the Zuzims in Ham, and the Emims in Shaveh-Kiriathaim, 6. And the Horites in their mount Seir, unto El-paran, which is by the wilderness. 7. And they returned, and came to En-mishpat, which is Kadesh, and smote all the country of the Amalekites, and also the Amorites, that dwelt in Hazezon-tamar. 8. And there went out the king of Sodom, and the king of Go monster, and the king of Admah, and the king of Zeboiim, and the king of Bela; (the same is Zoar;) and they joined battle with them in the vale of Siddim; 9. With Chedorlaomer the king of Elam, and with Tidal king of nations, and Amraphel king of Shinar, and Arioch king of Ellasar; four kings with five. 10. And the vale of Siddim was full of slime-pits; and the kings of Sodom and Go monster fled, and fell there; and they that remained fled to the mountain. 11. And they took all the goods of Sodom and Go monster, and all their victuals, and went their way. 12. And they took Lot, Abram's brother's son, who dwelt in Sodom, and his goods, and departed.

We have here an account of the first war that ever we read of in scripture, which (though the wars of the nations make the greatest figure in history, we had not the record of, if Abram and Lot had not been concerned in it. Now concerning this war, we may observe,

I. The parties engaged in it. The invaders were four kings; two of them no less than kings of Shinar and Elam, that is, Chaldea and Persia; yet, probably not the sovereign princes of those great kingdoms in their own persons, but either officers under them, or rather the heads and leaders of some colonies which God had appointed to be governors over the holy land, preserves the holy seed; and settled themselves near Sodom, but retained the names of the countries from which they had their original. The invaded were the kings of five cities that lay near together in the plain of Jordan; Sodom; Go monster; Admah, Zeboiim, and Zoar. Four of them are named, but not the fifth, the king of Bela; either because he was much more mean and inconsiderable; or because he was much more wicked and inglorious, than the rest.

II. The occasion of this war was, the revolt of the five kings from under the government of Chedorlaomer. Twelve years they served him. Small joy had they of their fruitful land, while thus they were tributaries to a foreign power, and could not call what they had their own. Rich countries are a desirable prey, and idle luxurious countries are easy prey, to growing greatness. The Sodomites were the posterity of Canaan whom Noah had pronounced a servant to Shem, from whom Elam descended; thus soon did that prophecy begin to be fulfilled. In the 13th year, beginning to be weary of their subjection, they rebelled, denied their tribute, and attempted to shake off the yoke, and retrieve their ancient liberties. In the 14th year, after some pause and preparation, Chedorlaomer, in conjunction with his allies, set himself to chastise the rebels, to reduce the revolters; and, since he could not have it otherwise, to fetch his tribute from them upon the point of his sword. Note, Pride, covetousness, and ambition, are the lusts from which wars and fighting come. To those insatiable idols the blood of thousands has been sacrificed.

III. The progress and success of the war. The four kings laid the neighbouring country waste, and enriched themselves with the spoil of them, v. 5. 7, upon the alarm of which, it had been the wisdom of the king of Sodom to submit, and desire conditions of peace; for how could he grapple with an enemy thus flushed with victory? But he would rather venture the utmost extremity than yield, and it sped accordingly; Quos Deus destruct, eos damna—Those whom God means to destroy, he delivers up to infatuation.—1. The fortunes of the king of Sodom and his allies were routed; and, it should seem, many of them perished in the slime-pits, who had escaped the sword, v. 10. In all places, we are surrounded with deaths of various kinds, especially in the field of battle.

The cities were plundered, vi. 11. All the goods of Sodom, and particularly their stores and provisions of victuals, were carried off by the conquerors. Note, When men abuse the gifts of a bountiful providence to gluton and excess, it is just with God, and his usual way, by some judgment or other, to strip them of that which they have so abused, Hos. 2. 6, 9.

Let wars carry captive, vi. 12. They took Lot among the rest, and his goods. Now Lot may here be considered, (1.) As sharing with his neighbours in this common calamity. Though he was himself a righteous man, and (which here is expressly not said) Abram's brother's son, yet he was involved with the rest in this trouble. Note, [1.] All things come alike to all, Eccl. 9. 2. The best of men cannot promise themselves to be exempted from the greatest troubles in this life; neither our own pieties, nor our relation to those who are the favourites of heaven, will be our security, when God's judgments are abroad. [2.] Many an honest man fares the worse for his wicked neighbours; it is therefore our wisdom to separate ourselves, or, at least, to distinguish ourselves from them, 2 Cor. 6. 17, and so deliver ourselves, Rev. 18. 4. (2.) As smarting for the foolish choice he made of a settlement here: this is plainly intimated here, when it is said, This brother's son, who dwelt in Sodom. So near a relation of Abram should have been a companion and disciple of Abram, and should have abode by his tents; but if he choose to dwell in Sodom, he must thank himself, if he share in Sodom's calamities. Note, When we go out of the way of our duty, we put ourselves from under God's protection, and cannot expect that the choices which are made by our lusts, should issue in our comfort. Particular mention is made of their taking Lot's goods, those goods which had occasioned his contest with Abram, and his separation from him. Note, It is just with God to deprive us of those enjoyments by which we have suffered ourselves to be deprived of our enjoyment of him.

13. And there came one that had escaped, and told Abram the Hebrew; for he dwelt in the plain of Mambre the Amorite, brother of Eshcol, and brother of Aner: and these were confederate with Abram. 14. And when Abram heard that his brother was taken captive, he armed his trained servants, born in his own house, three hundred and eighteen, and pursued them unto Dan. 15. And he divided himself against them, he and his servants, by night, and smote them, and pursued them unto Hobah, which is on the left hand of Damascus. 16. And he brought back all the goods, and also brought again his brother Lot, and his goods, and the women also, and the people.

We have here an account of the only military action we ever find Abram engaged in; and this he was prompted to not by his avarice or ambition, but purely by a principle of charity; it was not to enrich himself, but to help his friend. Never was any military expedition undertaken with so little pain and hazard, and finished, more honourably than this of Abram's.

I. The tidings brought him of his kinsman's distress. Providence so ordered it, that he now so-journed not far off, that he might be a very present help. 1. He is here called Abram the Hebrew, that is, Abram the Friend of God. Thus the name of the Hebrews, familiarly the profession of the true religion was kept up in that degenerate age. Abram herein acted like a Hebrew—in a manner not unworthy the name and character of a religious professor. 2. The tidings were brought by one that had escaped with his life for a prey. Probably, he was a Sodomite, and as bad as the worst of them; yet, knowing Abram's relation to Lot, and concern for him, he implores his help, and hopes to speed for Lot's sake. Note, The worst of men, in the day of their trouble, will be glad to claim acquaintance with those that are wise and good, and so get an interest in them. The rich man in hell, called Abram Father; and the foolish virgins make court to the wise for a share of their oil.

II. The preparations he made for this expedition. The cause was plainly good, his call to engage in it was clear; and therefore, with all speed, he armed his trained servants, born in his house, to the number of three hundred and eighteen. A great family, but a small army, about as many as Gideon's that routed the Midianites, Judg. 7. 7. He drew out his trained servants, or his catechised servants, not only instructed in the art of war, which was then far short of the perfection which later and worse ages have improved it to, but instructed in the principles of religion; this the best way for us to keep the way of the Lord. This shows that Abram was, 1. A great man, who had so many servants depending upon him, and employed by him; which was not only his strength and honour, but gave him a great opportunity of doing good, which is all that is truly valuable and desirable in great places and great estates. 2. A good man, who not only served God himself, but instructed all about him in the service of God. Note, Those that have great families, have not only many bodies, but many souls beside their own, to take care of and provide for. Those that would be found the followers of Abram, must see that their servants be catechised servants. 3. A wise man; for though he was a man of peace, yet he disciplined his servants for war, not knowing what occasion he might have, some time or other, so to employ them. Note, Though our duty requires us to make provision for peace, yet it does not forbid us to provide for war.

III. His allies and confederates in this expedition. He prevailed with his neighbours, Aner, Eshcol, and Mamre, (with whom he kept up a fair correspondence,) to go along with him. It was his prudence thus to strengthen his own troops with their auxiliary forces; and, probably, they saw themselves concerned, in interest, to act, as they could, against this formidable power. Let their own turn be next. Note, 1. It is our wisdom and duty to behave ourselves so respectfully and obligingly towards all men, as that, whenever there is occasion, they may be willing and ready to do us a kindness. 2. Those who depend on God's help, yet, in times of distress, ought to make use of men's help, as Providence offers it; else they tempt God. Note, 3. His courage and disposition were admirable. 1. There was a great deal of bravery in the enterprise itself, considering the disadvantages he lay under. What could one family of husbandmen and shepherds do against the armies of four princes, who now came fresh from blood and victory? It was not a vanquished, but a victorious army, that he was to pursue; nor was he constrained by necessity to this daring attempt, but moved to it by generosity; so that, all things considered, it was, for aught I know, as great an instance of true courage as ever Alexander or Caesar was celebrated for. Note, Religion tends to make men, not coward.
but truly valiant. The righteous is bold as a lion. The true Christian is the true hero. There was a great deal of policy in the management of it. Abram was no stranger to the stratagems of war; he divided himself, as Gideon did his little army, Judg. 7. 16, that he might come upon the enemy from two sides, and so much as he feared seem a great many; he made his attack by night, that he might surprise them. Note, Honest policy is a good friend both to our safety, and to our usefulness. The serpent's head (provided it be nothing akin to the old serpent) may well become a good Christian's body, especially if it have a dove's eye in it, Matt. 10. 16.

Note, The sax was very considerable, v. 15, 16. He defeated his enemies, and rescued his friends; and we do not find that he sustained any less. Note, Those that venture in a good cause, with a good heart, are under the special protection of a good God, and have reason to hope for a good issue. Again, It is all one with the Lord to save many or by few, 1 Sam. 14. 6. Observe,

1. He rescued his kinsman; twice here he is called his brother Lot; the remembrance of the relation that was between them, both by nature and grace, made him forget the little quarrell that had been between them, in which Lot had by no means acted well towards Abram. Justly might Abram have upbraided Lot with his folly in quarrelling with him and removing from him, and have told him that he was well enough served, he might have known when he was well off: but, in the charitable breast of pious Abram, it is all forgiven and forgotten; and he takes this opportunity to give a real proof of the sincerity of his reconciliation. Note, (1.) We ought to be ready, whenever it is in the power of our hands, to succour and relieve those that are in distress, especially our relations and friends. A brother is born for adversity, Prov. 17. 17. A friend in need is a friend indeed. (2.) Though others have been wanting in their duty to us, yet we must not therefore deny our duty to them. Some have said that they can more easily forgive their enemies than the friends: but we shall see ourselves obliged to forgive both, if we consider, not only that our God, when we were enemies, reconciled us, but also that he passeth by the transgression of the remnant of his heritage, Mic. 7. 18.

2. He rescued the rest of the captives, for Lot's sake; though they were strangers to him, and such as he was under no obligation to at all; yet, though they were, so much as praetors before the Lord exceedingly, and though, probably, he might have recovered Lot alone by ransom; yet he brought back all the women and the people, and their goods, v. 16. Note, As we have opportunity, we must do good to all men. Our charity must be extensive, as opportunity offers itself. Wherever God gives life, we must not grudge the help we can give to support it. God does good to the just and unjust, and so must we, v. 15, 16. The victory which Abram obtained over the kings, the prophet seems to refer to, Isa. 41. 2. Who raised up the righteous man from the east, and made him rule over kings? And some suggest that as before, he had a title to this land by grant, so now, by conquest.

17. And the king of Sodom went out to meet him, after his return from the slaughter of Chedorlaomer and of the kings that were with him, at the valley of Shaveh, which is the king's dale. 18. And Melchizedek, king of Salem, brought forth bread and wine: and he was the priest of the most high God. 19. And he blessed him, and said, Blessed be Abram of the most high God, Possessor of heaven and earth: 20. And blessed be the most high God, which hath delivered thine enemies into thy hand. And he gave him tithes of all.

This par. begins with the mention of the respect which the king of Sodom paid to Abram, at his return from the slaughter of the kings; but before a particular account is given of that, the story of Melchizedek is briefly related. Concerning whom, observe,

Who he was, He was king of Salem and priest of the most high God; and other gracious things are said of him, Heb. 7. 1, &c.

The relations most of our rabbinical writers, conclude that Melchizedek was Sem, the son of Noah, who was king and priest to those that descended from him, according to the patriarchal model. But this is not at all probable; for why should his name be changed? And how came he to settle in Canaan? 2. Many Christian writers have thought that this was an appearance of the Son of God himself, our Lord Jesus, known to Abram, as this time, by his own name, as, afterward, Hagar called him by another name, ch. 16. 13. He appeared to him as a righteous king, owning a righteous cause, and giving peace. It is hard to think that any mere man should be said to be without father, without mother, and without descent, having neither beginning of days, nor end of life, Heb. 7. 3. It is witnessed of Melchizedek, that he liveth, and that he abideth a priest continually, v. 5, 8; and, v. 13, 14, the apostle makes him of whom these things are spoken, to be our Lord who sprang out of Judah. It is likewise hard to think that any mere man should, at this time, be greater than Abram in the things of God, and that Christ should be a priest after the order of any man, and that any human priesthood should so far excel that of Aaron as it is certain that Melchizedek's did. 3. The most received opinion is, that Melchizedek was a Canaanite prince, that reigned in Salem, and kept up the true religion there; but if so, why he should occur here only in all the story of Abram, why Abram should have altars of his own, and not attend the altars of his neighbour Melchizedek who was greater than he, seems unaccountable. Mr. Gregory of Oxford tells us, that the Arabic Catena, which he builds much upon the authority of, gives this account of Melchizedek: That he was the son of Heraclim, the son of Peleg, the son of Eber, and that his mother's name was Salathiel, the daughter of Gomer, the son of Japheth, the son of Noah.

II. What he did. 1. He brought forth bread and wine, for the refreshment of Abram and his soldiers, and in congratulation of their victory. This he did as a king, teaching us to do good and to communicate, and to be given to hospitality, according to our ability; and representing the spiritual provision of strength and comfort which Christ has laid up for us in the sure mercies of our refreshment, when we are wearied with our spiritual conflicts. 2. As priest of the most high God, he blessed Abram, which we may suppose a greater refreshment to Abram than his bread and wine were. Thus God, having raised up his son Jesus, has sent him to bless us, as one having authority; and those whom he blesses, are blessed indeed. Christ went to the bride, whom he was about to bless, and being his disciples, Luke 24. 51, for that it is which he doth give to.
speaks his absolute perfections in himself, and his sovereign dominion over all the creatures; he is King of kings. Note, It will greatly help both our faith and prayers, to eye God as the most high God, and to call him so. (2.) Possessor of heaven and earth, that is, rightful Owner, and sovereign Lord, of all the creatures; because he made them. This bespeaks him a great God, and greatly to be praised, Ps. 24. 1, and them a happy people who have an interest in his favour and love. 2. He blessed God for Abram, v. 20, and blessed be the most high God. Note, (1.) In all our prayers, we must praise God, and join Hallelujahs with all our Hosannas. These are the spiritual sacrifices we must offer up daily, and upon particular occasions. (2.) God, as the most high God, must have the glory of all our victories, Exod. 17. 15. 1 Sam. 7. 10, 12. Judg. 5. 1, 2. 2 Chron. 20. 21. In them he shows himself higher than our enemies, Exod. 18. 11, and higher than we; for without him we could do nothing. (3.) We ought to give thanks for others' mercies as for our own; triumphing with them that triumph. (4.) Jesus Christ, our great High-Priest, is the Mediator both of our prayers and praises, and not only offers up our's, but his own for us. See Luke 10. 21.

IV. What was done to him. Abram gave him tithes of all, that is, of the spoils, Heb. 7. 4. This may be looked upon, 1. As a gratuity presented to Melchizedek, by way of return for his aid and respect. Note. They that receive kindness, should show kindness. Gratitude is one of nature's laws. 2. As an offering vowed and dedicated to the most high God, and therefore put into the hands of Melchizedek his priest. Note, (1.) When we have received some signal mercy from God, it is very fit that we should express our thankfulness by some special act of pious charity. God must always have his dues out of our substance; especially when, by any particular providence, he has either preserved or increased it to us. (2.) That the tenth of our increase is a very fit proportion to be set apart for the honour of God, and the service of his sanctuary. (3.) That Jesus Christ, our great Melchizedek, is to have homage done him, and to be humbly acknowledged by every one of us as our King and Priest; and not only the tithe of all, but all we have, must be surrendered and given up to him.

21. And the king of Sodom said unto Abram, Give me the persons, and take the goods to thyself. 22. And Abram said to the king of Sodom, I have lift up mine hand unto the Lord, the most high God, the possessor of heaven and earth, 23. That I will not take from a thread even to a shoe-latchet, and that I will not take any thing that is thine, lest thou shouldest say, I have made Abram rich: 24. Save only that which the young men have eaten, and the portion of the men which went with me, Aner, Eshcol, and Mamre; let them take their portion.

We have here an account of what passed between Abram and the king of Sodom, who succeeded him that fell in the battle, v. 10, and thought himself obliged to do this honour to Abram, in return for the good services he had done him.

Here is, 1. The king of Sodom's grateful offer to Abram, v. 21. Give me the soul, and take thou the substance; so the Hebrew reads it. Here he fairly begs the persons, but as freely bestows the goods on Abram. Note, (1.) Where a right is dubious and divided, it is wisdom to compound the matter by mutual concessions rather than to contend. The king of Sodom had an original right both to the persons and to the goods, and it would bear a debate whether Abram's acquired right by rescue would supersede his title, and extinguish it; but, to prevent all quarrels, the king of Sodom makes this fair proposal. 2. Gratitude teaches us to recompense to the utmost of our power those that have undergone fatigue, run hazards, and been at expense, for our service and benefit. Who goes a warfare at his own charge, Prov. 1 Cor. 9. 7. Soldiers purchase their pay dearer than any labourers, and are well worthy of it, because they expose their lives.

II. Abram's generous refusal of this offer. He not only resigned the persons to him, who, being delivered out of the hand of their enemies, ought to have served Abram, but he restored all the goods too. He would not take from a thread even to a shoe-latchet, nor the least thing that had ever belonged to the king of Sodom or any of his. Note, A lively faith enables a man to look upon the wealth of this world with a holy contempt, 1 John 5. 4. What are all the ornaments and delights of sense to one that has God and heaven ever in his eye? He resolves even to a thread and a shoe-latchet; for a tender conscience fears offending in a small matter.

Now, 1. Abram ratifies this resolution with a solemn oath. I have lift up my hand unto the Lord, that I will not take any thing, v. 22. Here observe, (1.) The titles he gives to God, The most high God, the possessor of heaven and earth, the same that Melchizedek had just now used, v. 19. Note, It is good to learn of others how to order our speech concerning God, and to imitate those who speak well in divine things. This improvement we are made to of the conversation of devout good men, we must learn of them. (2.) The oath after which, v. 22. Note, (p.) This oath is a symbol used in this oath, I have lift up my hand. In religious swearing we appeal to God's knowledge of our truth and sincerity, and imprecate his wrath if we swear falsely; the lifting up of the hand is very significant and expressive of both. (3.) The matter of the oath, namely, that he would not take any reward from the king of Sodom, was lawful, but what he was not antecedently obliged to. [1.] Probably, Abram would not have refused, had not the king of Sodom given him something more than he expected, so far as he had a mind to take all he could have at the king's hand. But it is not a case where God would give him success, he would, for the glory of God, and the credit of his profession, so far deny himself and his own right, as to take nothing of the spoils to himself. Note, The vows we have made when we are in pursuit of a mercy, must be carefully and conscientiously kept when we have obtained the mercy, though they were made against our interest. A citizen of Zion, if he has sworn, whether he be to God or man, though it prove to his own hurt, yet he changeth not, Ps. 15. 4. Or, [2.] Perhaps Abram, now when he saw cause to refuse the offer made him, at the same time confirmed his refusal with this oath, to prevent further importunity. Note, First, There may be good reason sometimes why we should debar ourselves of that which is our undoubted right, as St. Paul, 2 Cor. 8. 13.—9. 12. Secondly, That strong resolutions are of good use to put by the force of temptations.

2. He backs his refusal with a good reason, lest thou shouldest say, I have made Abram rich; which would reflect reproach, (1.) Upon the premise and covenant of God, as if they would not have enriched Abram without the spoils of Sodom. And, (2.) Upon the piety and charity of Abram, as if all he had in his eye, when he undertook that hazardous expedition, was to enrich himself. Note, [1.] We must be very careful that we give not occasion to others to say things which they ought not. [2.] The people of God must, for their credit's sake, take Heed of doing anything that looks mean or mercenary, or that savours of covetousness and self-seeking. Probably, Abram knew the king of Sodom to be a proud and scornful man, and one that would, though most unreasonably, be apt to turn such a thing as this to his reproach afterward: when we have to do with such men, we have need to act with particular caution.

3. He limits his refusal with a double proviso, v. 24. In making vows, we ought carefully to insert the necessary exceptions, that we may not afterward say before the angel, It was an error, Eccl. 5. 6. Abram here excepts, (1.) The food of his soldiers; they were worthy of their meat while they trod out the corn. This would give no colour to the king of Sodom to say that he had enriched Abram. (2.) The shares of his allies and confederates. Let them take their portion. Note, Those who are strict in restraining their own liberty, yet ought not to impose those restraints upon the liberties of others, nor to judge of them accordingly; we must not make ourselves the standard to measure others by. A good man will deny himself that liberty which he will not deny another, contrary to the practice of the Pharisees, Matt. 23. 4. There was not the same reason why Aner, Eschol, and Mamre, should quit their liberty, and yield to Abram, what they did not make the profession that he made, nor were they, as he was, under the obligation of a vow; they had not the hopes that Abram had of a portion in the other world, and therefore, by all means, let them take their portion of this.

CHAP. XV.

In this chapter, we have a solemn treaty between God and Abram, concerning a covenant that was to be established between them. In the former chapter, we had Abram in the field with kings, here in the mount with God; and though there he looked great, yet, methinks, here he looks much greater; that honour have the great men of the world, but this honour have all the saints. The covenant to be settled between God and Abram, was a covenant of promises; accordingly, here is, 1. A general assurance of God’s kindess and good-will to Abram, v. 1. 2. A particular declaration of the purposes of his love concerning him, in two things: 1. That he would give him a numerous issue, v. 2. 6. 2. That he would give him Canaan for an inheritance, v. 7. 21. Either an estate without an heir, or an heir without an estate, would have been a half comfort to Abram. But God encouraged him both to him; and that which made these two, the promised seed, and the promised land, comforts indeed to this great believer, was, that they were both typical of those who are his acceptances, Chooses and seed; and so, we have reason to think, Abram eyed them.

1. AFTER these things, the word of the Lord came unto Abram, in a vision, saying, Fear not, Abram: I am thy shield and thy exceeding great reward.

Observe here, 1. The time when God had this treaty with Abram: after these things. 1. After that famous act of generous charity which Abram had done, in rescuing his friends and neighbours out of distress, and that, not for price nor reward; after that, God made him this gracious visit. Note, Those that show favour to men, shall find favour with God. 2. After that victory which he had obtained over four kings: lest Abram should be too much elevated and puffed up with his success, to tell him he had better things in store for him. Note, A believing converses with spiritual blessings is an excellent means to keep us from being too much taken up with temporal enjoyments. The gifts of common providence are not comparable to those of covenant-love. 2. The manner in which God conversed with Abram; The word of the Lord came unto Abram, that is, God manifested himself and his will to Abram in a vision; which supposes Abram awake, and some visible appearance of the Shechinah, or some sensible token of the presence of the divine glory. Note, The methods of divine revelation are adapted to our state in a world of sense.

3. The gracious assurance God gave him of his favour, v. 1. He called him by name, Abram, which was a great honour to him; and said, I will enrich him, that is, I will make him great, and was also a great encouragement and assistance to his faith. Note, God’s good word then does us good, when it is spoken by his Spirit to us in particular, and brought to our hearts. The word says, Ho, every one, Isa. 53. 1; the Spirit says, Ho, such a one. 2. He cautioned him against being disquieted and confounded; Fear not, Abram. Abram might fear lest the four kings he had helped, should rally again, and fall upon him to his ruin; “No,” says God, “Fear not. Fear not their revenges, nor thy neighbours’ envy; I will take care of thee.” Note, (1.) Where there is great faith, yet there may be many fears, 2 Cor. 7. 5. (2.) God takes cognizance of his people’s fears though ever so secret, and knows their souls, Ps. 31. 7. (3.) It will be to thy will that God that his people should not give way to prevailing fears, whatsoever they are. (4.) God will be merciful to the sinners in Zion be afraid, but fear not, Abram. 3. He assured him of safety and happiness; that he should for ever be, (1.) As safe as God himself could keep him; I am thy Shield, or, somewhat more emphatically, I am a Shield to thee, present with thee, actually caring for thee. See 1 Chron. 17. 24. Not only the God of Israel, but a God to Israel. Note, God’s consideration of this, that God himself is, and will be, a Shield to his people to secure them from all destructive evils, and a Shield ready to them, and a Shield round about them, should be sufficient to silence all their perplexing tormenting fears. (2.) As happy as God himself could make him; I will be thy exceeding great Reward; not only thy Rewarder, but thy Reward. Abram had generously refused the rewards which the king of Sodom offered him, and here God comes, and tells him he shall be no loser by it. Note, [1.] The rewards of believing obedience and self-denial, are exceeding great, I Cor. 2. 9. [2.] God himself is the chosen and promised felicity of holy souls; chosen in this world, promised in a better. He is the portion of their inheritance, and their cup.

2. And Abram said, Lord God, what wilt thou give me, seeing I go childless, and the steward of my house is this Eliezer of Damascus? 3. And Abram said, Behold, to me thou hast given no seed: and, lo, one born in my house is mine heir. 4. And, behold, the word of the Lord came unto him, saying, This shall not be thine heir: but he that shall come forth out of thine own bowels, shall be thine heir. 5. And he brought him forth abroad, and said, Look now toward heaven, and tell the stars, if thou be able to number them. And he said unto him, So shall thy seed be. 6. And he believed in the Lord; and he counted it to him for righteousness.

We have here the assurance given to Abram of a numerous offspring which should descend from him. In which, observe, 1. Abram’s repeated complaint, v. 2. 3. This was that which gave occasion to this promise. The great affliction that sat heavy upon Abram, was the want of a child; and the complaint of this he here hours out before the Lord, and shows before him his trouble, Ps. 142. 2. Note, Though we must never complaint of God, yet we have leave to complain to him, and to be large and particular in the statement of our complaints; and it is some case to a bared of God's spirit, to open its case to a faithful and compassionate friend; such a friend God is, whose ear is always open. Now his complaint is four-fold.

1. That he had no child, v. 3. Behold, to me thou hast given no seed; not only no son, but no seed; if he had had a daughter, from her the promised Messiah might have come, who was to be the seed of the woman; but he had neither son nor daughter. He seems to lay an emphasis on that, to me. His neighbours were full of children, his servants had children born in his house; "But to me," he complains, "thou hast given me none;" and yet God had told him he should be a favourite above all. Note, (1.) Those that are written childless, must see God writing them so. (2.) God often withholds those temporal comforts from his own children, which he gives plentifully to others that are strangers to him.

2. That he was never likely to have any; intimated in that, I go, or "I am going, childless, going into years, going down the hill apace; nay, I am going out of the world, going the way of all the earth. I die childless." So the LXX. "I leave the world, and leave no child behind me."

3. That his servants were, for the present, and were likely to be to him, instead of sons. While he lived, the steward of his house was Eliezer of Damascus; to him he committed the care of his family and estate, who might be faithful, but only as a servant, not as a son. When he died, one born in his house would be his heir, and would bear rule over all that for which he had laboured, Eccl. 2. 18, 19, 21. God had already told him that he would make of one of his servents his seed, Gen. 15. 1. Note, While promised mercies are delayed, our unbelief and impatience are apt to conclude them denied.

4. That the want of a son was so great a trouble to him, that it took away the comfort of all his enjoyments. "Lord what wilt thou give me? All is nothing to me, if I have not a son." Now (1.) If we suppose that Abram looked no further than a temporal comfort, this complaint was culpable. God had, by his providence, given him some good things and more by his promise; but he had neither son nor daughter. It did very ill become the father of the faithful to say, What wilt thou give me, seeing I go childless? immediately after God had said, I am thy shield, and thy exceeding great reward. Note, Those do not rightly value the advantages of their covenant-relations to God and interest in him, who do not think it sufficient to balance; and yet of any considerable value. But, (2.) If we suppose that Abram, herein, had an eye to the Promised Seed, the importance of his desire was very commendable; all was nothing to him if he had not the earnest of that great blessing, and an assurance of his relation to the Messiah, which God had already encouraged him to maintain in the expectation. He has wealth, and victory, and honour; but, while he is kept in the dark about the main matter, it is all nothing to him. Note, Till we have some comfortable evidence of our interest in Christ and the new covenant, we should not rest satisfied with any thing else. "This, and the other, I have; but what will this avail me, if I go Christless? Yet thus far the complaint was culpable, that there was an error of difference of the promise at the moment of it, and a want of waiting God's time. Note, True believers sometimes find it hard to reconcile God's promises and his providences, when they seem to disagree.

II. God's gracious answer to this complaint. To the first part of the complaint, (v. 2.) God gave no immediate answer, because there was something of futilities in it; but when he had in his address something which was certain, (v. 3.) God comforted him graciously. Note, If we continue instant in prayer, and yet pray with a humble submission to the divine will, we shall not seek in vain. 1. God gave him an express promise of a son, v. 4. This that is born in thy house, shall not be thine heir, as thou fearest, but one that shall come forth out of thine own bowels shall be thine heir. Note, (1.) God makes heirs; he says, "This shall not be this shall," whatever men devise and design, in settling their estates, God's counsel shall stand. (2.) God is often better to us than our own fears, and gives the mercy we had long despaired of. 2. To affect him the more with surprise, he took him out, and showed him the stars, (this vision being early in the morning before day,) and then tells him, So shall thy seed be, v. 5. (1.) So numerous, the stars, his seed, are. Though he was somewhat surprised by his son, yet he should have no child at all, but God tells him that the descendants from his loins should be so many as not to be numbered. (2.) So illustrious, resembling the stars in splendour: for to them pertained the glory, Rom. 9. 4. Abram's seed, according to his flesh, were like the dust of the earth, (ch. 13. 16.) but his spiritual seed are like the stars of heaven, not only numerous, but glorious, and cry, Alleluia.

III. Abram's firm belief of the promise God now made him, and God's favourable acceptance of his faith, v. 6. 1. He believed in the Lord, that is, he believed the truth of that promise which God had now made him, resting upon the irresistible power, and the inviolable faithfulness, of him that made it; Hath he spoken, and shall he not make it good? Note, Those who would have the promises, must have faith, or mix faith with the promises. See how the apostle magnifies this faith of Abram, and makes it a standing example, Rom. 4. 19, 21. He was not weak in faith; he staggered not at the promise; he was strong in faith; he was fully persuaded. The Lord work such a faith in every one of us! Some think that his believing in the Lord, respected, not only the Lord promising, but the Lord promised, the Lord Jesus, the Mediator of the New Testament. Note, Abram's faith was not in God's new covenant, He believed in him, that is, received and embraced the divine revelation concerning him, and rejoiced to see his day, though at so great a distance, John 8. 56. 2. God counted it to him for righteousness; that is, upon the score of this, he was accepted of God, and, as the rest of the patriarchs, by faith he obtained the witness that he was righteous, Heb. 11. 4. This is urged in the New Testament, to prove that we are justified by faith without the works of the law; (Rom. 4. 3. Gal. 3. 6.) for Abram was so justified, while he was yet uncircumcised. If Abram that was so rich in good works, was not justified by them, but by his faith, much less can we, that are so poor in them. This faith, which was imputed to Abram for righteousness, had lately struggled with unbelief, (v. 2.) and, coming off a conqueror, it was thus crowned, thus honoured. Note, A fiducial, practical, acceptance of, and dependence upon, God's promise of grace and glory, in and through Christ, is that, which according to the tenor of the new covenant, gives us a right to all the blessings contained in that promise. What God's believers are justified as Abram was, and it was his faith that was counted to him for righteousness.

7. And he said unto him, I am the Lord that brought thee out of Ur of the Chaldees, to give thee this land to inherit it. 8. And he said, Lord God, whereby shall I know that I shall inherit it? 9. And he said unto him, Take me an heifer of three years old, and a she goat of three years old, and a ram of three years old, and a turtle dove, and a young pigeon. 10. And he took unto him all these, and divided them in the midst, and laid each piece one against another: but the birds divided he not. 11. And when the fowls came down upon the carcasses, Abram drove them away.

We have here the assurance given to Abram, of the land of Canaan for an inheritance.

I. God declares his purpose concerning it, v. 7. Observe here, Abram made no complaint in this matter, as he had done for the want of a child. Note, Those that are sure of an interest in the Promised Seed, will see no reason to doubt of a title to the promised land. If Christ is our's, heaven is our's. Observe, again, when he believed the former promise, (v. 6.) then God explained and ratified this to him. Note, To him that has (improves what he has) more shall be given. Three things God here reminds Abram of for his encouragement concerning the promise of this good land.

1. To himself: I am the Lord Jehovah; and therefore, (1.) "I may give it thee, for I am sovereign Lord of all, and have a right to dispose of the whole earth." (2.) "I can give it thee, without opposition may be made, though by the sons of Anak." God never promises more than he is able to perform, as men often do. (3.) "I will make good my promise to thee; Jehovah is not a man that he should lie." 2. What he had done for Abram: he had brought him out of Ur of the Chaldees, out of the fire of the Chaldees, so some, that is, (1.) From their idolatries: for the Chaldeans worshipped the fire: or, (2.) From their persecutions. The Jewish writers have a tradition that Abram was cast into the fiery furnace for refusing to worship idols, and was miraculously delivered. It is rather a place of that name. Thence God brought him by an effectual call; brought him with a gracious visit; snatch ed him as a brand out of the burning. This was,

[1.] A special mercy; "I brought thee, and left others, thousands, to perish there," God called him alone, Isa. 51. 2. [2.] A spiritual mercy; a mercy to his soul, a deliverance from sin, and its fatal consequences. If God save our souls, we shall want nothing that is good for us. [3.] A fresh mercy; lately bestowed, and therefore it is the mercy he affected when he made the promise to the commandments, I am the Lord that brought thee out of Egypt lately. [4.] A foundation mercy; the beginning of mercy, peculiar mercy to Abram, and therefore a pledge of further mercy, Isa. 66. 9. Observe how God speaks of it as that which he gloried in, I am the Lord that brought thee out. He glories in it as an act both of power and grace; compare Isa. 29. 22, where he glories in it, long afterward. Thus saith the Lord who redeemed Abram, redeemed him from sin.

3. What he intended to do yet further for him;

"I brought thee hither, on purpose to give thee this land to inherit it, not only to possess it, but to possess it as an inheritor, which is the sweetest and surest title." Note, (1.) The providence of God has secret but gracious designs in all its various dispensations toward good people; we cannot conceive the projects of providence, till the event shows them in all their mercy and glory. (2.) The great thing God designs in all his dealings with his people, is, to bring them safe to heaven. They are brought in by the kingdom, (1 Thess. 2. 13.) called to the kingdom, (1 Thess. 2. 13.) begotten to the inheritance, (1 Pet. 1. 3, 4.) and by all made meet for it, Col. 1. 12, 13. 2 Cor. 4. 17.

II. Abram desires a sign, v. 8. Whereby shall I know that I shall inherit it? This did not proceed from distrust of God's power, or promise, as that of Zecharias; but he desired this, 1. For the strengthening and confirming of his own faith; he believed, (v. 6.) but here he prays, Lord, help me against my unbelief. Now he believed, but he desired a sign to be bestowed upon him, as a pledge, that what he expected may really be, and that not in a few years, but at once. 2. To be assured of the truth of the promise. Those that are satisfied in themselves, should desire that others also might be satisfied with the truth of God's promises. John sent his disciples to Christ, not so much for his own satisfaction as for their's, Matt. 11. 2. Canaan was a type of heaven. Note, It is a very desirable thing to know that we shall inherit the heavenly Canaan, that is, to be confirmed in our belief of the truth of that happiness, and to have the evidences of our title to it more and more clearly shown to us.

III. God directs Abram to make preparations for a sacrifice, intending by that to give him a sign, and Abram makes preparation accordingly, v. 9. 11, Take me an heifer, &c. Perhaps Abram expected some extraordinary sign from heaven; but God gives him a sign upon a sacrifice. Note, Those that would receive the assurances of God's favour, who would have their faith confirmed, must attend instituted ordinances, and expect to meet with God in them. Observe, 1. God appointed that he should offer two beasts used for this service should be three years old, because then they were at their full growth and strength. God must be served with the best we have, for he is the best. 2. We do not read that God gave Abram particular directions how to manage these beasts and fowls, knowing that he was so well used in the law and custom of sacrifices, that he need not any particular directions; or, perhaps, instructions were given him, which were not so carefully observed, though they are not recorded: at least, it was intimated to him, that they must be prepared for the solemnity of ratifying a covenant; and he well knew the manner of preparing them. 3. Abram took as God appointed him, though as yet he knew not how these things should become a basis of his title to the land, till the first instance of Abram's implicit obedience. 4. God divided the beasts in the midst, according to the ceremony confirming covenants, (Jer. 34. 18, 19.) where it is said, They cut the calf in twain and passed between the parts. 4. Abram having prepared according to God's appointment, now set himself to wait for the sign God might give him by these, like the prophet upon his watch-tower, Hab. 2. 1. While God's appearing to own his sacrifice, was deferred, Abram continued waiting, and his expectations were raised by those delays; when the fowls came down upon the carcasses to prey upon them, as common and neglected things, Abraham drove them away, (v. 11.) believing that the vision would, at the end, speak, and not lie. Note, A very watchful eye must be kept upon our spiritual sacrifices, that nothing be suffered to prey upon them, and render them unfit for God's acceptance. When vain thoughts, like these fowls, come down upon our sacrifices, we must drive them away, and not suffer them to lodge within us, but attend on God without distraction.

12. And when the sun was going down, a deep sleep fell upon Abram; and, lo, an horror of great darkness fell upon him. 13. And he said unto Abram, Know of a surety that thy seed shall be a stranger in a land that is not their's, and shall serve them; and they shall afflict them four hundred years; 14. And also that nation whom they shall serve, will I judge: and afterward shall they come out with great substance.

And thou shalt go to thy fathers in peace; thou shalt be buried in a good old age. 15. But in the fourth generation they shall come hither again: for the iniquity of the Amorites is not yet full.

We have here a full and particular discovery made to Abram of God's purposes concerning his seed. Observe,

I. The time when God came to him with this discovery: when the sun was going down, or declining, about the time of the evening oblation, 1 Kings 18. 36. Dan. 9. 21. Early in the morning, before day, while the stars were yet to be seen, God had given him orders concerning the sacrifices, (v. 5.) and we may suppose it was, at least his morning's work to prepare them and set them in order; when he had done this, he abode by them, praying and waiting till towards evening. Note, God often keeps his people long in expectation of the comforts he designs them, for the confirmation of their faith: but though the answers of prayer, and the performance of promises, come slowly, yet they come surely; at evening time it shall be light.

II. The preparatives for this discovery: 1. A deep sleep fell upon Abram, not a common sleep through weariness or cleanliness, but a divine ecstasy, like that which the Lord God caused to fall upon Adam, (ch. 2. 21.) that being hereby wholly taken off from the view of things sensible, he might be wholly taken up with the contemplation of things spiritual. The doors of the body were locked up, that the soul might be private and retired, and might act the more freely, and like itself. 2. With this sleep, a horror of great darkness fell upon him, a sudden change, as we are told, which we had solacing himself in the comforts of God's covenant, and in communion with him: and here a horror of great darkness falls upon him. Note, The children of light do not always walk in the light, but sometimes clouds and darkness are round about them. This great darkness, which brought horror with it, was designed, (1.) To strike an awe upon the spirit of Abram, and to possess him, a while, with fear and horror: but God was pleased to admit him to, might not break content. Note, Holy fear prepares the soul for holy joy; the spirit of bondage makes way for the spirit of adoption. God wound first, and then heals; humbles first, and then lifts up, Isa. 6. 5, 6. (2.) To be a specimen of the methods of God's dealings with his seed; they must first be in the horror and darkness of Egyptian slavery, and then enter with joy into the good land; and therefore he must have the foretaste of their sufferings, before he had the foresight of their happiness. (3.) To be an indication of the nature of that covenant of peculiarity which God was now about to make with Abram. This discovery and dispensation, which was founded on that covenant, was a dispensation, [1.] Of darkness and obscurity, 2 Cor. 3. 13. [2.] Of dread and horror, Heb. 12. 18, &c.

III. The prediction itself; several things are here foretold.

1. The suffering state of Abram's seed for a long time, v. 13. Let not Abram flatter himself with the hopes of nothing but honour and prosperity in his family: no, he must know of a surety, that which he was loath to believe, that the promised seed should be a persecuted seed. Note, (1.) God tendeth the worst first; we must first suffer, and then reign. (2.) He lets us know the worst before it comes, that when it comes, it may not be a surprise to us, John 16. 4. Now we have here, [1.] The particulars of their sufferings. First, They shall be strangers; so they were, first in Canaan, Ps. 105. 12, and afterward in Egypt: before they were lords of their own land, they were strangers in a strange land. The inconveniences of an unsettled state, make a happy settlement the more welcome. Thus the heirs of heaven are, first, strangers on earth, a land that is not their's. secondly, They shall be servants; so they were to the Egyptians, Exod. 1. 13. See how that which was the doom of the Canaanites, ch. 9. 25, proves the distress of Abram's seed; they are made to serve, but with this difference, the Canaanites serve under a curse, the Hebrews under a blessing, and the upright shall have dominion in the morning, Ps. 49. 14. Thrifty, They shall be sufferers. Those whom they serve, shall afflict them; see Exod. I. 11. Note, Those that are blessed and beloved of God, are often sorely afflicted by wicked men; and God foresees it, and takes cognizance of it. [2.] The continuance of their sufferings; four hundred years. This persecution began with mocking, when Ishmael, the son of an Egyptian, persecuted Isaac, who was born after the spirit, ch. 21. 9. Gal. 4. 29. It continued in loathing; for it was an abomination to the Egyptians to eat bread with the Hebrews, ch. 43. 32, and it came, at last, to murder, the basest of murders, that of their new-born children; so that more or less, it continued 400 years, though in cares, and no cares, not so many. This was a long time, but a limited time.

2. The judgment of the enemies of Abram's seed, v. 14. That nation whom they shall serve, even the Egyptians, will I judge. Th's points at the plagues of Egypt, by which God not only constrained the Egyptians to release Israel, but punished them for all the hardships they had put upon them. Note, (1.) Though God may suffer persecutors and opposers to baulk and frustrate his people, yet he will certainly reckon with them at last; for his day is coming, Ps. 37. 12, 13. (2.) The punishment of persecutors is the judgment of them; it is a righteous thing with God, and a particular act of justice, to recompense tribulations to those that trouble his people. The judging of the church's enemies, is God's work. I will judge: God can do it, for he is the Lord; he will do it, for he is his people's God, and he will judge in righteousness; I will judge, will I judge. To him therefore we must leave it, to be done in his way and time.

3. The deliverance of Abram's seed out of Egypt; that great event is here foretold. Afterward, shall they come out with great substance. It is here promised, (1.) That they shall be enlarged; afterward, they shall come out, that is, either, after they have been afflicted 400 years, when the days of their servitude are fulfilled, then they may expect deliverance; or, after the Egyptians are judged and plagued. Note, The destruction of oppressors is the redemption of the oppressed; they will not let God’s people go, till they are forced to it. (2.) That they should be enriched; they shall come out with great substance this was fulfilled, Exod. 12. 33, 36. God took care they should have, not only a good land to go to, but a good stock to bring with them. 4. They shall be fruitful in the land of Egypt, Exod. 1. 16. They shall not only come out of Egypt, but they shall come hither again, hither to the land of Ca-naan, wherein thou now art. The discontinuance of their possession shall be no defacement of their right; we must not reckon those comforts lost for ever, that are intermitted for a time. The reason why they must not have the land of promise in possession till they are cleansed from the uncleanness of the Amonytes must not yet fall. Israel cannot be possessed of Canaan, till the Amorites be dispossessed; and they are not yet ripe for ruin. The righteous God has determined that they shall not be cut off, till they have persisted in sin so long, and arrived at such a pitch of wickedness, that there may appear some equitable proportion between their sin and their ruin; and therefore till it come to that certainty it (Abram) must be kept out of possession. Note. (1.) The measure of sin falls gradually: those that continue impenitent in wicked ways, are treasuring up unto themselves wrath. (2.) Some people’s measure of sin falls slowly. The So-domites, who were sinners before the Lord exceedingly, soon filled their measure; so did the Jews, who were in profession near to God; but the iniquity of the Amorites was long in the filling up. (3.) That this is the reason of the prosperity of wicked people; the measure of their sins is not yet full. The wicked live, become old, and are mighty in power, while God is laying up their iniquity for their children, Job 21. 7, 19. See Matt. 23. 32. Deut. 32. 34.

5. Abram’s peaceful quiet death and burial, before these things should come to pass, v. 15. As he should not live to see that good land in the possession of his family, but must die as he lived, a stranger in it; so, to balance that, he should not live to see the troubles that should come upon his seed, much less to share in them. This is promised to Josiah, 2 Kings 22. 23. Note, Good men are sometimes greatly favoured by being taken away from the evil to come, Isa. 57. 1. Let this satisfy Abram, that, for his part, (1.) He shall go to his fathers in peace. Note. [1.] Even the friends and favourites of Heaven are not exempt from the stroke of death; Are we greater than our father Abram which is dead? John 8. 53. [2.] Good men die willingly; they are not fetched, they are not forced, but they go; their soul is not required, as his, Luke 12. 20, but cheerfully resigned: they would not live always. [3.] At death we go to our fathers, to all our fathers that are gone before us to the state of the dead, Job 1. 22. 30. to our godly fathers that are gone hence to the state of the blessed, Heb. 12. 23. The former thought helps to take off the terror of death, the latter puts comfort into it. [4.] Whenever a godly man dies, he dies in peace. If the way be piety, the end is peace, Ps. 57. 37. Outward peace, to the last, is promised to Abram; peace and truth in his days, whatever should come after, 2 Kings 20. 19. Peace with God, and everlasting peace we may be assured he shall have in heaven, be buried in a good old age. Perhaps mention is made of his burial here, where the land of Canaan is promised him, because a burying place was the first possession he had in it. He shall not only die in peace, but die in honour, die, and be buried decently; not only die in peace, but die in season, Job 5. 25, 26. Note, [1.] Old age is a blessing; it is promised in the fifth commandment; it is pleasing to nature; and a great opportunity of usefulness; [2.] Especially if it be a good old age; their’s may be called a good old age, First, That are old and healthful, not loaded with such distempers as make them weary of life; Secondly, That are old and holy, old disciples, Acts 21. 16, whose hourly head is found in the end of righteousness, Prov. 16. 31. old and useful, old and exemplary for godliness; their’s is indeed a good old age.

17. And it came to pass that when the sun went down, and it was dark, behold, a smoking furnace, and a burning lamp that passed between those pieces. 18. In the same day, the Lord made a covenant with Abram, saying, Unto thy seed have I given this land, from the river of Egypt unto the great river, the river Euphrates: 19. The Kenites, and the Kinnizzites, and the Kadmonites, 20. And the Hittites, and the Perizzites, and the Rephaims, 21. And the Amorites, and the Canaanites, and the Girgashites, and the Jebusites.

Here is, I. The covenant ratified, v. 17; the sign which Abram desired, was given at length, when the sun was gone down, so that it was dark; for that was a dark dispensation.

1. The smoking furnace signified the affliction of his seed in Egypt; they were there in the iron fur-nace, Deut. 4. 20, the furnace of affliction, Isa. 48. 10. (1.) Labouring in the very fire. They were there in the smoke, their eyes darkened, that they could not see to the end of their troubles, and they at a loss to conceive what God would do with them; clouds and darkness were round about them.

2. The burning lamp denotes comfort in this affliction: and this God showed Abram, at the same time that he showed him the smoking furnace. (1.) Light denotes deliverance out of the furnace; their salvation was in the lamp that burned, Isa. 42. 2. When God came down to deliver them, he appeared in a bush that burned, and was not consumed, Exod. 3. 2. The lamp denotes direction in the smoke; God’s word was their lamp; this word to Abram was so, it was a light shining in a dark place; perhaps this burning lamp prefigured the pillar of cloud and fire, which led them out of Egypt, in which God was.

3. The passing of these between the fitches, was the confirming of the covenant God now made with him, that he might have strong consolation, being fully persuaded that what God promised, he would certainly perform. It is probable that this furnace and lamp, which passed between the pieces, burned, and consumed them, and so completed the sacrifice, and testified God’s acceptance of it, as of Gideon’s, Judg. 6. 21. Manoah’s, Judg. 13. 19, 20. and Solomon’s, 2 Chron. 7. 1, seintimates, (1.) That God’s covenants with men are made by sacrifice, Ps. 50. 5; by Christ, the great Sacrifice: no agreement without atonement. (2.) God’s acceptance of our spiritual sacrifices, is a token for good, and an earnest of further favours; see Judg. 13. 23. And by this we may know that he accepts our sacrifices, if he kindle in our souls a holy fire of pious and devout affections in them.

II. The covenant repeated and explained, v. 18, In that same day, that day never to be forgotten, the Lord made a covenant with Abram, that is, gave a promise to Abram, saying, Unto thy seed will I give this land. Here is, 1. A rehearsal of the grant: he had said before, To thy seed will I give this land, ch. 12, 7.—13. 15. But here he says, I have given it; that is, (1.) I have given the promise of it, the charter is sealed and delivered, and cannot be disannulled. Note, God's promises are God's gifts, and are so to be accounted of. (2.) The possession is as sure, in due time, as if it were now actual. Every possession of this kind is to be regarded as a quit claim to them: what God has promised, is as sure as if it were already done; hence it is said, He that believes hath everlasting life, John 3. 36, for he shall as surely go to heaven as if he were there already. 2. A recital of the particulars granted, such as is usual in the grants of land. He specifies the boundaries of the land intended hereby to be granted, v. 18. And then, for the greater certainty, as is usual in such cases, he mentions in whose tenure and occupation these lands now were. Then several nations or tribes, are here spoken of, v. 19. 21. that must be cast out, to make room for the seed of Abram. They were not possessed of all these countries, when God brought them into Canaan. The bounds are fixed much narrower, Num. 34. 2, 3, &c. But, (1.) In David's time and Solomon's, their jurisdiction extended to two or three of these limits, 2 Chron. 9. 26. (2.) It was their own fault that they were not sooner and longer in possession of all these territories. They forfeited their right by their sins, and by their own sloth and cowardice kept themselves out of possession. 3. The land granted, is here described in its utmost extent, because it was to be a type of the heavenly inheritance, where there is room enough: in our Father's house are many mansions. The present occupants are named, because their numbers, strength, and long preservation, should be no hindrance to the accomplishment of this promise in its season, and to magnify God's love to Abram and his seed, in giving to that one nation the possession of many nations: so precious were they in his sight, and so honoured, Isa. 43. 4.

CHAP. XVI.

Hagar is the person mostly concerned in the story of this chapter, an obscure Egyptian woman, whose name and story we had never heard of, if Providence had not brought her into the family of Abram. Probably, she was one of those maid-servants, which the king of Egypt, among other gifts, bestowed upon Abram, ch. 12, 16. Concerning her, we have few things in this chapter: 1. Her marriage to Abram, her master, v. 1. 3. II. Her misbehaviour toward Sarai, her mistress, v. 4. 6. III. Her discourse with an angel that met her in her flight, v. 7. 14. IV. Her deliverance of a son, v. 13. 16.

1. NOW Sarai, Abram's wife, bare him no children: and she had an handmaid, an Egyptian, whose name was Hagar.

2. And Sarai said unto Abram, Behold now, the Lord hath restrained me from bearing: I pray thee, go in unto my maid; it may be that I may obtain children by her. And Abram hearkened to the voice of Sarai.

3. And Sarai Abram's wife took Hagar her maid the Egyptian, after Abram had dwelt ten years in the land of Canaan, and gave her to her husband Abram to be his wife.

We have here the marriage of Abram to Hagar, who was his secondary wife; herein, though some excuse may be made for him, he cannot be justified; for from the beginning it was not so; and when it was so, it seems to have proceeded from an irregular desire to build up their families for the speedier peopling of the world and the church: it must not be so now. Christ has reduced this matter to this institution, and makes the marriage union to be between one man and one woman only.

Now, I. The maker of this match (would one think it?) was Sarai herself: she said to Abram, I pray thee go in unto my maid, v. 2. Note, 1. It is the policy of Satan to tempt us by our nearest and dearest relations, or those friends that we have an opinion of and an affection for. This is most dangerous; when it is sent by a hand that is least expected: it is our wisdom therefore to consider, not so much who speaks, as what is spoken. 2. God's commands consult our comfort and honour, much better than our own contrivances do. It had been much more for Sarai's interest, that Abram should have kept to the rule of God's law, than that he should have been guided by her foolish projects; but we often do ill for ourselves.

II. The indigence to which Sarai's barrenness brought Abram. 1. Sarai bare Abram no children; she was very fair, ch. 12, 14; she was an agreeable dutiful wife, and a sharer with him in his large possessions; and yet written childless. Note, (1.) God dispenses his gifts variously, loading us with benefits, but not overloading us: some cress or other is appointed to be an allay to great enjoyments. (2.) The mercy of children is often given to the poor, and denied to the rich; given to the wicked, and denied to good people. The poor man's hope is a good hope; the rich man's hope is a bad hope; the good people would take most care of their education: God does herein as it has pleased him.

2. She owned God's providence in this affliction; the Lord hath restrained me from bearing. Note, (1.) As where children are, it is that God gives them, ch. 33, 5, so where they are wanted, it is he that withholds them, ch. 30. 2. This evil is of the Lord. (2.) It becomes us to acknowledge this, that we may bear it, and improve it, as an affliction of his ordering for wise and holy ends.

3. She used this as an argument with Abram to marry her maid; and he was prevailed with by this argument to do it. Note, (1.) When our hearts are too much set upon any creature-comfort, we are easily put upon the use of indirect methods for the obtaining of it: inordinate desires commonly produce irregular endeavours: if our wishes be not kept in a suitable regulation by God's providence, our pursuits will scarce be kept under the restraints of his precepts. (2.) It is for want of a firm dependence upon God's promise, and a patient waiting for God's time, that we go out of the way of our duty to catch at expected mercy; He that believes, does not make haste.

4. Abram's compliance with Sarai's proposal, we have reason to think, was from an earnest desire of the Promise's Seed, on whom the covenant should be entailed. God had told him that his heir should be a son of his body, but had not yet told him that it should be a son by Sarai; therefore he thought, "Why not by Hagar: since Sarai herself proposed it?" Note, (1.) Foul temptations may have very fair pretences, and be coloured with that which is very plausible. (2.) Fleshly wisdom, as it anticipates God's time of mercy, so it puts us out of God's grace. (3.) This would be happily prevented, if we would ask counsel of God by the word and by prayer, before we attempt that which is important and suspicious: herein Abram was wanting; he married without God's consent. This persuasion came not of him that called him.

4. And he went in unto Hagar, and she conceived; and when she saw that she had conceived, her mistress was despised in her eyes. 5. And Sarai said unto Abram, My wrong be upon thee: I have given my maid into thy bosom; and when she saw that she had conceived, I was despised in her eyes: the Lord judge between me and thee. 6. But Abram said unto Sarai, Behold, thy maid is in thy hand; do to her as it pleaseth thee. And when Sarai dealt hardly with her, she fled from her face.

We have here the immediate bad consequences of Abram’s unhappy marriage to Hagar; a deal of mischief it made quickly: when we do not seek both the Lord and his grace, and take not care to keep ourselves from laying it up to ourselves, we may find many misfortunes and troubles from it. And now, though he had driven her from him, yet he sent her to his master’s servant, to take care of her; and though he might have thought it some slight service, he sent her with a present. And we may thank ourselves for the guilt and grief that follow us, when we go out of the way of our duty. See it in this story.

I. Sarai is despised, and thereby provoked and put into a passion, v. 4. Hagar no sooner perceives herself with child by her master, than she looks scornfully upon her mistress, upbraids her with her barrenness, insults over her, to make her to fret, as 1 Sam. 1. 6, and boasts of the prospect she had of bringing an heir to Abram, to that good land and to the promise; now she thinks herself a better woman than Sarai, more favoured by Heaven, and likely to be better beloved by Abram; and therefore she will not take it as she has done. Note, 1. Mean and servile spirits, when favoured and advanced either by God or man, are apt to grow haughty and insolent, and to forget their place and original. See Prov. 29. 21.—30. 21, 23. It is a hard thing to bear honour a while. 2. We justly suffer by those whom we have sinned indulged, and it is a righteous thing with God, to make those instruments of our trouble, whom we have made instruments of our sin, and to insnare us in our own evil counsels; this stone will return upon him that relishes it.

II. Abram is clamoured upon, and cannot bear it, while Sarai is out of humour; she accosts him violently, and very unjustly charges him with the injury, (v. 5.) My wrong be upon thee; with a most unreasonable jealousy, suspecting that he countenanced Hagar’s insolence; and, as one not willing to hear what Abram had to say for the rectifying of the mistake, and the clearing of himself, she rashly appeals to God in the case, The Lord judge between me and thee; as if Abram had refused to right her. Thus does Sarai, in her passion, speak as if she had the spirit of a fooleish woman sprayed. Note, 1. It is an absurdity which passionate people are often guilty of, to quarrel with others for that in which they themselves must bear the blame of: Sarai could not but own that she had given her maid to Abram, and yet she cries out, My wrong be upon thee, when she should have said, What a fool was I to do so! That is never said wisely, which pride and anger have the import of; when passion is upon the throne, reason is out of doors, and is not heard nor spoken. 2. Those are not always in the right, who are most loud and forward in appealing to God; rash and bold imprecations are commonly evidences of guilt and a bad cause.

III. Hagar is afflicted and driven from the house, v. 6. Observe, 1. Abram’s meekness resigns the matter of the maid’s servant to Sarai, with no whisper of the family: Thy maid is in thy hand: though she was his wife, he would not countenance or protect her in any thing that was disrespectful to Sarai, for whom he still retained the same affection that ever he had. Note, Those who would keep up peace and love, must return soft answers to hard accusations; husbands and wives particularly should agree, and endeavour not to be both angry together: yielding pacifies great offences; see Prov. 15. 1.

2. Sarai’s passion will be revenged upon Hagar; she dealt hardly with her, not only confining her to her usual place and work, as a servant, but probably making her to serve with rigour. Note, God takes notice of, and is displeased with the hardships which harsh masters unreasonably put upon their servants: they ought to forbear threatening, with Job’s thought, Did not he that made me, make him? Job 31. 13.

3. Hagar’s pride cannot bear it, her high spirit is become impatient of rebuke; she fled from her face; she saw that she could no longer live with her, and resolved to go, and seek for a friendly reception among strangers. Note, Those that are proud must expect to be taunted with their pride; and the more they are reviled with, the more they must be despised.

4. Hagar’s flight is taken by her own desire; she would have been the more easy to be revenged upon, if she had been the more easy to be taken. Note, The more easy we are to be revenged upon, the more right we do wrong; and the more easy we are to be taken, the more quick we are to be lost.

5. Hagar’s flight was providently of use to God; he had designs upon her. Note, God would have designs upon his people, whether they will have them or no; and if we will not have them, he will have them against us.

6. Hagar’s flight was of use to Sarai; she would make Hagar her help and helper. Note, Women should be considered as the means of many a good purpose and service, when women are not used.

7. The angel of the Lord found her by a fountain of water in the wilderness, by the fountain in the way to Shur. 8. And he said, Hagar, Sarai’s maid, whence camest thou? And whither wilt thou go? And she said, I flee from the face of my mistress Sarai. 9. And the angel of the Lord said unto her, Return to thy mistress, and submit thyself under her hands. Here is the first mention we have in scripture of an angel’s appearance. Hagar was a type of the angel, which was given by the disposition of angels; but the world to come is not put in subjection to them, Heb. 2. 5. Observe, 1. How the angel arrested her in her flight. v. 7. It should seem, she was making toward her own country; for she was in the way to Shur, which lay toward Egypt. It were well if our afflictions would make us think of our home, the better country. But Hagar was now out of her place, and out of the way of her duty, and going further astray, when the angel found her. Note, 1. It is a great mercy to be stopped in a sinful way, either by conscience or by providence. 2. God suffers those that are out of the way to wander a while, that when they are in their folly, and what a loss they have brought themselves to, they may be the better disposed to return. Hagar was not stopped till she was in the wilderness, and had sat down weary enough, and glad of clear water to refresh herself with: God brings us into a wilderness, and there meets us, Hos. 2. 14.

II. How he examined her, v. 8. He called her Hagar, Sarai’s maid, 1. As a check to her pride: though she was Abram’s wife, and, as such, was obliged to return, yet he calls her Sarai’s maid, to humble her. Note, Though civility teaches us to call others by their highest titles, yet humility and wisdom teach us to call ourselves by the lowest. 2. As a rebuke to her flight: Sarai’s maid ought to be in Sarai’s tent, and not wandering in the wilderness, and souterning by a fountain of water. Note, It is good for us to ask ourselves what our place and relation are. See Ex. 10. 4.

Now, (1.) The questions the angel put to her, were proper and very pertinent. [1.] Whence camest thou? Consider that thou art running away, both from the duty thou wast bound to, and the privileges thou wast blessed with, in Abram’s tent. Note, It is a great advantage to live in a religious family, those ought to consider, who have that advantage, yet upon every slight induction, are forward to quit it. [2.] Whither wilt thou go? Thou art running thyself into sin, in Egypt. (f she return to that people, she will return to their gods,) “and into danger, in the wilderness” through which she must travel, Deut. 8. 15. Note, Those who are forsaking God and their duty, would do well to remember not only when they are fallen, but whither they are falling. See Jex 2. 18. What hast thou to do (with Hagar) in the way of Egypt? John 6. 68.

(2.) Her answer was honest, and a fair confession; I flee from the face of my mistress. In which [1.] She acknowledges her fault in fleeing from her mistress, and yet, [2.] Excuses it, that it was from the face, or displeasure of her mistress. Note, Children and servants must be treated with mildness and gentleness, lest we provoke them to take any irregular courses, and so become accessary to their sin, which will condemn us, though it will not justify them.

(3.) How she sent her back, with suitable and compassionate notes, v. 9. “Return to thy mistress, and submit thyself under her hand. Go home, and humble thyself for what thou hast done amiss, and beg pardon, and resolve for the future, to behave thyself better.” He makes no question but she would be welcome, though it does not appear that Abram sent after her. Note, Those, that are gone away from their place and duty, when they are convinced of their error, must hasten their return and reformation, how mortifying soever it may be.

10. And the angel of the Lord said unto her, I will multiply thy seed exceedingly, that it shall not be numbered for multitude. 11. And the angel of the Lord said unto her, Behold, thou art with child, and shalt bear a son, and shalt call his name Ishmael; because the Lord hath heard thy affliction. 12. And he will be a wild man; his hand shall be against every man, and every man's hand against him; and he shall dwell in the presence of all his brethren. 13. And she called the name of the Lord that spake unto her, Thou God seest me: for she said, Have I also here looked after him that seeth me? 14. Wherefore the well was called Beer-lahai-roi; behold, it is between Kadesh and Bered.

We may suppose that the angel having given Hagar that good counsel, (v. 9.) to return to her mistress, she immediately turned to do so, and set her face homeward; and then the angel went on to encourage her with an assurance of the mercy God had in store for her and her seed: for God will meet those with mercy, that are returning to their duty: I said, I will confess, and thou forgavest, Ps. 32. 5.

Here is a prediction concerning her posterity, given her for her comfort in her present distress. Notice is taken of her condition; Behold, thou art with child; and therefore this is not a fit place for thee to be in. Note, It's a great comfort to women with child to think that they are under the particular cognizance and care of the Divine Providence. God graciously considers that case, and suits supports to it.

Now, 1. The angel assures her of a safe delivery, and that of a son, which Abram desired. This fright and rumble of her's might have destroyed her hope of an offspring; but God dealt not with her according to her folly; Thou shalt bear a son; she was saved in child-bearing, not only by providence, but by promise.

2. He names her child, which was an honour both to her and to him, for he called him Ishmael, God will hear; and the reason is, because the Lord has heard; he has, and therefore he will. Note, The experience we have had of God's seasonable kindness to us in distress, should encourage us to hope for the like help in the like exigencies, Ps. 10. 17. He has heard thy affliction. Note, (1.) Even where there is little cry of devotion, the God of pity sometime graciously hears the cry of affliction; tears speak as well as prayers. (2.) This speaks comfort to the afflicted, that God not only sees what their afflictions are, but hears what they say. (2.) That seasonable succours, in the day of affliction, ought always to be remembered with thankfulness to God. Such a time, in such a strait, the Lord heard the voice of my affliction, and helped me. See Deut. 26. 7. Ps. 32. 9.

3. He promises her a numerous offspring, v. 10, I will multiply thy seed exceedingly, Hebr. Multiplying, I will multiply it, that is, multiply it in every age, so as to perpetuate it. It is supposed that the Turks at this day descend from Ishmael; and they are a great people. This was in pursuance of the promise made to Abram, ch. 13. 16, I will make thy seed as the dust of the earth. Note, Many that are children of godly parents, have, for their sakes, a very large share of outward common blessings, though, like Ishmael, they are not taken into covenant: many are multiplied that are not sanctified.

4. He gives a character of the child she should bear, which, however it may seem to us, perhaps was not very disagreeable to her, v. 12. He will be a wild man; a wild ass of a man, so the word is; rude and bold, and fearing no man; untamed, untractable, living at large, and impatient of service and restraint. Note, The children of the bondwoman, who are out of covenant with God, are, as they were born, like the wild ass's colt; 't is grace that reigns men, civilizes them, and makes them wise, and good for something. It is foretold, (1.) That he should live in strife, and in a state of war; his hand against every man, that is his sin; and every man's hand against him, that is his punishment. Note, That this spirit of strife, which is in every soul, have commonly troublesome lives; they are provoking, vexatious, and injurious to others, must expect to be repaid in their own coin. He that has his hand and tongue against every man, shall have every man's tongue and hand against him; and he has no reason to complain of it. And yet, (2.) That he should live in safety, and hold his own against all the world; he shall dwell in the presence of all his brethren. Note, This phrase is not to be understood as if he's ne'ghbours, yet he shall keep his ground, and, for Abram's sake, more than his own, shall be able to make his part good with them: accordingly we read, ch. 25. 18, that he died, as he lived, in the presence of all his brethren. Note, Many that are much exposed by their own imprudence, yet are strangely preserved by the Divine Providence; so much better is God's dealing with them than he deserved, are not only forfeited their lives by sin, but hazard them.

II. Hagar's pious reflection upon this gracious appearance of God to her, v. 13. 14. Observe in what she said,

1. Her awful adoration of God's omniscience and providence, with application of it to herself; she *called the name of the Lord that spake unto her that is, thus she made confession of his name, thus she said to his praise, "Thou God seest me; this should be with her, his name for ever, and this his memorial, by which she will know him and remember him while she lives, Thou God seest me. Note, (1.) The God with whom we have to do, is a seeing God, an all-seeing God. God is, (as the ancients expressed it) all eye. (2.) We ought to acknowledge the preeminence of our God. He sees all, sees me, as David, Ps. 139. 1. O God, thou hast searched me and known me. (3.) A believing regard to God, as a God that sees us, will be of great use to us in our returns to him. It is a proper word for a pittance: [1.] Thus seest my sin and folly; I have sinned before thee, says the prodigal; in thy sight, says David. [2.] Thou seest my sorrow and affliction; that Hagar expressly referred to, when she had brought herself into distress by our own folly, yet God has not forsaken us. [3.] Thou seest the sincerity and seriousness of my return and repentance. Thou seest my secret mournings for sin, and secret motions toward thee." [4.] "Thou seest me, if in any instance I depart from thee," Ps. 44. 20, 21. This thought should always restrain us from sin, and excite us to duty; when we have brought ourselves into distress by our own folly, yet God has not forsaken us. [5.] Thus we express our admiration of God's favour to her: Have I here also looked after him that seeth me? Have I here seen the back parts of him that seeth me? So it might be read, for the word is much the same with that, Exod. 33. 23. She saw not face to face, but as through a glass darkly, 1 Cor. 13. 12. Probably, she knew not who it was that talked with her, till he was departing, as Judges 6. 24, 22, 13, 11; and then she looked after him, with a reflection like that of the two disciples, Luke 24. 31, 32. Or, Have I seen him that seeth me? Note, (1.) The communion which holy souls have with God, consists in their having an eye of faith toward him, as a God that has an eye of favour toward them. The intercourse is kept up by the eye. (2.) The privilege of our communion with God is, to be looked upon with wonder and admiration, considering what we are, who are admitted to this favour. Have I? That is so mean, that I am so vile?" 2 Sam. 7. 18. This privilege is thus to be looked upon, considering the place where we are thus favoured; [here also! Not only in Abram's tent, and at his altar, but here also, in this wilderness! Here, where I never expected it, where I was out of the way of my duty; Lord, how is it?" John 14. 22. Some make the answer to this question an eminence, and to acknowledge it as a privilege of our own selves, as a reflection: Have I here also, in my distress and affliction, looked after God? No, I was as careless and unmindful of him as ever I used to be; and yet he has thus visited and regarded me;" for God often prevents us with his favours, and is found of those that seek him not, Isa. 65. 1. III. The name which this event gave to the place, v. 14, Beer-lahai-roi. The name of him that lives and sees. It is probable that Hagar put this name upon it; and it was retained long after, in perpetuum rei memoriam— a lasting memorial of this event. This was the place, where the God of glory manifested the special cognizance and care he took of a poor woman in distress. Note. 1. He that is all-seeing, is ever-living; he lives and sees us. 2. Those that are graciously admitted into communion with God, are a peculiar and special comfort from him, should tell others what he has done for their souls, that they also may be encouraged to seek him, and trust in him. 3. God's gracious manifestations of himself to us are to be had in ever-lasting remembrance by us, and should never be forgotten.

15. And Hagar bare Abram a son: and Abram called his son's name, which Hagar bare, Ishmael. 16. And Abram was fourscore and six years old, when Hagar bare Ishmael to Abram.

It is here taken for granted, though not expressly recorded, that Hagar did as the angel commanded her, returned to her mistress, and submitted herself; and then, in the fulness of time, she brought forth her son. Note, Those who obey divine precepts, shall have the comfort of divine promises. This was the son of the bond-woman that was born after the flesh, Gal. 4. 35, representing the unbeliefing Jews, v. 25. Note, We may well call Abraham father, yet are born after the flesh, Matt. 3. 9. 2. The carnal seed in the church are sooner brought forth than the spiritual. It is an easier thing to persuade men to assume the form of godliness, than to submit to the power of godliness.

CHAP. XVII.

This chapter contains articles of agreement covenanted and concluded upon between the great Jehovah, the Father of mercies, on the one part, and pious Abram, the Father of the faithful, on the other part. Abram is therefore called the servant of God, not only because he was the man of his counsel, but because he was the man of his covenant; both these secrets were with him: mention was made of this covenant, ch. 15. 18, but here it is particular; there is mention of the God and people; here it is, that Abram might have strong consolation. Here is, 1. The circumstances of the making of this covenant, the time and manner, v. 1, and the posture Abram was in, v. 2. II. The covenant itself. In the general scope of it, v. 1. And afterward, in the particular instances. 1. That he should be the father of many nations, v. 4, 6. and, in token of that, his name was changed, v. 5. 2. That God would be a God to him and his seed, and would give them the land of Canaan, v. 7, 8. And the seal of this part of the covenant was circumcision, v. 9... 3. That he should have a son by Sarai, and in token of that, her name was changed, v. 16, 15. This promise Abram received, v. 17. And his request for Ishmael (v. 18.) was answered, abundantly to his satisfaction, v. 19. 22. III. The circumcision of Abram and his family, according to God's appointment, v. 22, 27.

1. AND when Abram was ninety years old and nine, the Lord appeared to Abram, and said unto him, I am the Almighty God; walk before me, and be thou perfect. And I will make my covenant between me and thee, and will multiply thee exceedingly. 3. And Abram fell on his face: and God talked with him, saying, Here is, 1. The time when God made Abram this gracious visit; when he was 99 years old, full 13 years after the birth of Ishmael. 1. So long, it should seem, God made Abram's covenant with Abraham was interrupted; and all the communion he had with God, was only in the usual way of ordinances and providences. Note, There are some special comforts which are not the daily bread, no not of the best saints, but they are favoured with them now and then. On this side heaven, they have convenient food, but not a continual feast. 2. So long the promise of Isaac was deferred. (1.) Perhaps it was good for the Lord to adopt this other branch of his family first, and to call it rather by a temporary name, Sarai, than by the name of a son, who was yet to be born. Note, The comforts we sinfully anticipate, are justly delayed. (2.) That Abram and Sarai being so far stricken in age, God's power, in this matter, might be the more magnified, and their faith the more tried. Sec Deut. 32. 36. John 11. 6, 15. (3.) That a child so long waited for, might be an Isaac, a son indeed, Isa. 54. 1. II. The way in which God made this covenant with him; The Lord appeared to Abram, in the Shechinah, some visible display of God's immediate glorious presence with him. Note, God first makes himself known to us, and gives us a sight of him by faith, and then takes us into his covenant.

III. The posture Abram put himself into upon this occasion. He fell on his face while God talked with him, v. 2. Either, 1. As one overcome by the brightness of the divine glory, and unable to bear the sight of it, though he had seen it several times before: Daniel and John did likewise, though they were also acquainted with the visions of the Almighty, Dan. 8. 17.—10. 9, 15. Rev. 1. 17. Or, 2. As one ashamed of himself, and blushing to think of the honours done to one so unworthy: he looks upon himself with humility, and upon God with reverence, and, in token of both, falls on his face, putting himself into a posture of adoration. Note, (1.) God graciously condescends to receive and conversate with those whom he takes into his covenant and communion with himself. He talks with them by his word, Prov. 6. 22. He talks with them by his Spirit, John 14. 26. This honour have all his saints. (2.) Those that are admitted into fellowship with God, are, and must be, very humble and very reverent in their approaches to him. If we say we have fellowship with him, and the familiarity breeds contempt, not of the lineages that would receive comfort from God, must set themselves to give glory to God, and to worship at his footstool.

IV. The general scope and summary of the covenant, laid down as the foundation on which all the rest was built; it is no other than the covenant of grace, still in use with all believers in Jesus Christ, v. 1. Observe here, 1. What we may expect to find God to us; I am the Almighty God; by this name he chose to make himself known to Abram rather than by his name Jehovah, Exod. 6. 3. He used it to Jacob, ch. 35. 11. They called him by this name, ch. 28. 3. 43. 14. 48. 3; It is the name of God that is mostly used throughout the book of Job, at least thirty times in the discourses of that book. After Moses, Jehovah is more frequently used, and this very rare sight, Exod. 22. 17; It bespeaks the almighty power of God, either, (1.) As an avenger, from 772 he laid waste, so some; and they think God took this title from the destruction of the old world. This is countenanced by Isa. 13. 6, and Joel 1. 15. Or, (2.) As a benefactor, w. ywh. 42 who, and t'sufficient. He is a God, that is enough; or, as our old English translation reads it here very significantly, I am God all-sufficient. Note, The God with whom we have to do, is a God that is evermore,
1. He is enough in himself; he is self-sufficient; he has every thing, and he needs not any thing.
2. He is enough to us, if we be in covenant with him: we have all in him, and we have enough in him; enough to satisfy our most enlarged desires, enough to supply the defect of every thing else, and to secure to us a happiness for our immortal souls: see Ps. 16. 5, 6.—73. 25.

When God first tells us that we be to him; the covenant is mutual, Walk before me, and be thou perfect, that is, upright and sincere; for herein the covenant of grace is well-ordered, that sincerity is our gospel perfection. Observe, (1.) That to be religious, is to walk before God in our integrity; it is to set God always before us, and to think, and speak, and act, in every thing, as those that are always before him: it is, therefore, his right, to regard to his word as our rule, and to his glory as our end, in all our actions, and to be continually in his fear. It is to be inward with him, in all the duties of religious worship, for in them particularly we walk before God, 1 Sam. 2. 30, and to be entire for him, in all holy conversation. I know no religion but sincerity. (2.) That upright walking with God, is the condition of our interest in his all-sufficient grace. If we neglect him, or dissemble with him, we forfeit the benefit and comfort of our relation to him. (3.) A continual regard to God's all-sufficient grace, will have a great influence upon our upright walking with him.

4. As for me, behold, my covenant is with thee, and thou shalt be a father of many nations. 3. Neither shall thy name any more be called Abram; but thy name shall be Abraham; for a father of many nations have I made thee. 6. And I will make thee exceeding fruitful, and I will make nations of thee, and kings shall come out of thee.

The promise here is introduced with solemnity: "As for me," says the great God, "behold, behold and admire it, behold and be assured of it, my covenant is with thee;" as before, v. 2, I will make my Covenant with thee, ch. 15. 17. That grace is a covenant of God's own making; this he declares in, (as for me,) and so may we. Now here, 1. It is promised to Abram, that he should be a father of many nations: that is, 1. That his seed after the flesh, should be very numerous, both in Isaac and Ishmael, and in the sons of Keturah; something extraordinary is doubtless included in this promise, and we may suppose that the event answered to it, and that there have been, and are, more of the children of men descended from Abraham, than from any one man at an equal distance with him from Noah, the common root. 2. That all believers, in every age, should be looked upon as his spiritual seed, and that he should be called, not only the friend of God, but the father of the faithful.

In this sense, the Apostle directs us to understand this promise, Rom. 4. 16, 17. He is the father of those in every nation, that by faith enter into covenant with God, and (as the Jewish writers express it) are gathered under the wings of the divine Majesty.

II. In token of this, his name was changed from Abram, a high father, to Abraham, the father of a multitude. This was, 1. To put an honour upon him: it is spoken of as the glory of the church, that she shall be called by a new name, which the mouth of the Lord shall name, Is. 62. 2. Princes dignified their favourites, by conferring new titles upon them; thus was Abraham dignified by him that is indeed the Fountain of honour: all believers have a new name, Rev. 2. 17. Some think it added to the honour of Abraham's new name, that a letter of the name Jehovah was inserted into it, as it was a disgrace to Jecohiah to have the first syllable of his name cut off, because it was the first syllable of that sacred name, Jer. 22. 29. Believers are named from Christ, Eph. 3. 15. 2. To encourage and confirm the faith of Abraham; while he was childless, perhaps even his own name was sometimes an occasion of grief to him: why should he be called a high father, who was not a father at all? But now that God had promised him a numerous issue, and had given him a name which signifies much, the name was his joy. Note, God calls things that are not, as though they were. It is the apostle's observation upon this very thing, Rom. 4. 17; he called Abraham the father of a multitude, because he should prove to be so in due time, though as yet he had but one child.

7. And I will establish my covenant between me and thee, and thy seed after thee, in their generations, for an everlasting covenant, to be a God unto thee, and to thy seed after thee. 8. And I will give unto thee, and to thy seed after thee, the land wherein thou art a stranger, all the land of Canaan, for an everlasting possession; and I will be their God. 9. And God said unto Abraham, Thou shalt keep my covenant therefore, thou, and thy seed after thee, in their generations. 10. This is my covenant, which ye shall keep, between me and you, and thy seed after thee; every man-child among you shall be circumcised. 11. And ye shall circumcise the flesh of your foreskin; and it shall be a token of the covenant betwixt me and you. 12. And he that is eight days old, shall be circumcised among you, every man-child in your generations, he that is born in the house, or bought with money of any stranger, which is not of thy seed. 13. He that is born in thy house, and he that is bought with thy money, must needs be circumcised: and my covenant shall be in your flesh for an everlasting covenant. 14. And the uncircumcised man-child, whose flesh of his foreskin is not circumcised, that soul shall be cut off from his people; he hath broken my covenant.

Here is,

1. The continuance of the covenant; intimated in three things. 1. It is established; not to be altered or revoked: it is fixed, it is ratified, it is made as firm as the divine power and truth can make it. 2. It is entitled: it is a covenant, not with Abraham only, (then it would die with him,) but with his seed after him, not only his seed after the flesh, but his spiritual seed. 3. It is everlasting: in the evangelical sense and meaning of it. The covenant of grace is everlasting; it is from everlasting in the counsels of it, and to everlasting in the consequences of it; and the external administration of it is transmitted with the seal of it to the seed of believers, and the internal administration of it by the Spirit, to Christ's seed in every age.

II. The contents of the covenant; it is a covenant of promises, exceeding great and precious promises. Here are two, which, indeed, are all sufficient.

1. That God would be their God, v. 7, 8. All the privileges of the covenant, all its joys, and all its hopes, are summed up in this: a man needs no more than this, to make him happy. What God is himself, that he will be to his people; his wisdom their's, to guide and counsel them; his power their's, to protect and support them; his goodness their's, to supply and comfort them. What faithful worshippers can expect from the God they serve, believers shall find in God as their's. This is enough, yet not all. 2. That Canaan should be their everlasting possession, v. 8. God had before promised this land to Abraham, and his seed, ch. 15. 18. But here, where it is promised for an everlasting possession, surely it must be looked upon as a type of heaven's happiness, that everlasting rest which remains for the people of God, Heb. 4. 9. This is that better country to which Abraham had an eye, and the grant of which was that which answered to the vast extent and compass of that promise, that God would be to them a God; so that if God had not prepared and designed this, he would have been ashamed to be called their God, Heb. 11. 16. As the land of Canaan was secured to the seed of Abraham, according to the flesh, so heaven is secured to all his spiritual seed, by a covenant, and for a possession, truly everlasting. The offer of this eternal life is made in the word, and confirmed by the sacraments, to all that are under the external administration of the covenant; but the offer of eternal life is given to all but none. 14. Canaan is here said to be the land wherein Abraham was a stranger; and heaven is a land to which we are strangers, for it does not yet appear what we shall be.

III. The token of the covenant, and that is circumcision, for the sake of which the covenant is itself called the covenant of circumcision, Acts 7. 9.

It is here said to be the covenant which Abraham and his seed must keep, as a copy of the former; part, v. 9, 10. It is called a sign and seal, Rom. 4. 11, for it was, 1. A confirmation to Abraham and his seed, of those promises which were God's part of the covenant, assuring them that they should be fulfilled; that in due time Canaan should be their's: and the continuance of this ordinance, after Canaan was their's, intimates that that promise looked further, to another Canaan, with which they should be associated in a new respect of: see Heb. 4. 8. 2. An obligation upon Abraham and his seed, to that duty which was their part of the covenant; not only to the duty of accepting the covenant and consenting to it, and the putting away of the corruption of the flesh, (which were more immediately and primarily signified by circumcision,) but, in general, to the observance of all God's commands, as they should at any time hereafter be intimate and made known to them; for circumcision made men debtors to do the whole law, Gal. 5. 3. They who will have God to be to them a God, must consent and resolve to be to him a people.

Now, (1.) Circumcision was a bloody ordinance; for all things by the law were purged with blood, Heb. 9. 22. See Exod. 24. 8. But the blood of Christ being shed, all bloody ordinances are now abolished; circumcision therefore gives way to baptism. (2.) It was peculiar to the males; though the women also were included in the covenant, for the man is the head of the woman. In our kingdom, the oath of allegiance is required only from men: some think that the blood of the males only was shed in circumcision, because respect was had in it to Jesus Christ, and his blood. (3.) It was the flesh that was laid aside, because by it is his ordinary generation that sin is propagated, and with an eye to the Promised Seed, who was to come from the loins of Abraham. Christ having not yet offered himself for us, God would have man to enter into covenant by the offering of some part of his own body, and no part could be better spared. It is a secret part of the body: for the true circumcision is that of the heart, this honour God will administer upon an uncomely part, Jer. 12. 23, 24. (4.) The ordinance was to be administered to children when they were eight days old, and not sooner: that they might gather some strength to be able to undergo the pain of it, and that at least one sabbath might pass over them. (5.) The children of the stranger, of whom the master of the family was the true domestic owner, were to be circumcised, v. 12, 13. Which looked favourably upon the godly stranger, in due time, being brought into the family of Abraham by faith; see Gal. 3. 14. (6.) The religious observance of this institution was required, under a very severe penalty, v. 14. The contempt of circumcision was a contempt of the covenant; if the parents did not circumcise their children, it was at their peril, as in the case of Moses, Exod. 4. 24, 25. With respect to those that were not circumcised in their infancy, if, when they grew up, they did not themselves come under this ordinance. He God would surely reckon with them. If they cut off not the flesh of their fore-skin, God would cut them off from their people. It is a dangerous thing to make 1 ght of divine institutions, and to live in the neglect of them.

15. And God said unto Abraham, As for Sara thy wife, thou shalt not call her name Sarai, but Sarah shall her name be. 16. And I will bless her, and give thee a son also of her: yea, I will bless her, and she shall be a mother of nations: kings of people shall be of her. 17. Then Abraham fell upon his face, and laughed, and said in his heart, Shall a child be born unto him that is an hundred years old? And shall Sarah, that is ninety years old, bear? 18. And Abraham said unto God, O that Ishmael might live before thee! This he speaks, not as desiring that Ishmael might be preferred before the son he should have by Sarah; but, desiring lest he should be abandoned and forsaken of God, he puts up this petition on his behalf. Now that God is talking with him, he thinks he has a very fair opportunity to speak a good word for Ishmael, and he will not let it slip. Note, 1. Though we ought not to prescribe to God, yet he gives us leave, in prayer, to be humbly free with him, and particular in making known our requests, Phil. 4. 6. Whatever is the matter of our care and fear, should be spread before God in prayer. 2. It is the duty of parents, and indeed of all believers, to intercede for their children, as Job, who offered burnt-offerings, according to the number of them all, Job 1. 5. Abraham would not have it thought, when God promised him a son by Sarah, which he so much desired, that then his son by Hagar was forgotten; no, still he bears him upon his heart, and shows a concern for him. The prospect of further favours must not make us unmindful of former favours. 3. The great child we are to have is Christ. Thus God shows us that they may live before him, that is, that they may be kept in covenant with him, and may have grace to walk before him in their uprightness; spiritual blessings are the best blessings, and which we should be most earnest with God for, both for ourselves, and others. These live well, that live before God.

17. God's answer to his prayer; and it is an answer of Abraham could not say that he sought God's face in vain. 1. Common blessings are secured to Ishmael. v. 20. As for Ishmael, whom thou art in so much care about, I have heard thee; he shall find favour for thy sake; I have blessed him, that is, I have many blessings in store for him. (1.) His posterity shall be numerous; 2. He shall multiply him exceedingly, more than his neighbours: this is the fruit of the blessing, as that, ch. 1. 28. (2.) They shall be considerable; twelve princes shall he beget: we may charitably hope that spiritual blessings also were bestowed upon him, though the visible church was not brought out of his loins, and the covenant was not lodged in his family. Note, Great plenty of outward good things is often given to those children of godly parents, who are born after the flesh, for their parents.

2. Covenant-blessings are reserved for Isaac, and appropriated to him, v. 19, 21. If Abraham, in his prayer for Ishmael, meant that he would have the covenant made with him, and the Promised Seed to come from him; then, God did not answer him in the letter, but in that sense which was equivalent, nay, which was every way better. (1.) God repeats to him the promise of a son by Sarah; she shall bear thee a son indeed. Note, [1.] Even those believers need to have God's promises doubled and repeated to them, that they may have strong consolation, Heb. 6. 18. [2.] Children of the promise are children indeed. [3.] He names that child, calls him Isaac, Laughter; because Abraham rejoiced in spirit, when this son was promised him. Note, If God’s promises be our joy, his mercies promised shall in due time be our exceeding joy. Christ was the Laughter to them that look for him; they that now rejoice in hope, shall shortly rejoice in having that which they hope for: this is laughter that is not mad. (3.) He entails the covenant upon that child; I will establish my covenant with him. Note, God takes whom he pleases into covenant with himself, according to the good pleasure of his will: see Rom. 9. 16, 18. Thus was the covenant established between God and Abraham, with its several limitations and remainders, and then the covenant ended; God left off talking with him, and the vision disappeared, God went up from Abraham. Note, Our communion with God here is broken and interrupted; in heaven it will be a continual and everlasting feast.

23. And Abraham took Ishmael his son, and all that were born in his house, and all that were bought with his money, every male among the men of Abraham’s house; and circumcised the flesh of their fore-skin in the selfsame day, as God had said unto him. 24. And Abraham was ninety years old and nine, when he was circumcised in the flesh of his fore-skin. 25. And Ishmael his son was thirteen years old when he was circumcised in the flesh of his fore-skin. 26. In the selfsame day was Abraham circumcised, and Ishmael his son. 27. And all the men of his house, born in the house, and bought with money of the stranger, were circumcised with him.

We have here Abraham’s obedience to the law of circumcision; he himself, and all his family, were circumcised; so receiving the token of the covenant, and distinguishing themselves from other families that had no part nor lot in the matter. 1. It was an implicit obedience; he did as God said unto him, and did not ask why or wherefore. God’s will was not so known to him, as to reason about it; that would have been insisting, and not to have done so was to lose the privilege which God bid him. 2. It was a speedy obedience; in the selfsame day, v. 23, 26. Sincere obedience is not dilatory, Ps. 119. 60. While the command is yet sounding in our ears, and the sense of duty is fresh, it is good to apply ourselves to it immediately, lest we deceive ourselves by putting it off to a more convenient season. 3. It was an universal obedience; he did not circumcise his family, and excuse himself, but set them an example; nor did he take the comfort of the seal of the covenant to himself only, but desired that all might share with him in it: this is a good example to masters of families; they and their houses must serve the Lord. Though God’s covenant was not established with Ishmael, yet he was circumcised; for children of believing parents, as such, have a right to the privileges of the visible church, and the seals of the covenant, whatever they may prove afterward; Ishmael is blessed, and therefore circumcised. 4. Abraham did this, though much might be objected against it; though circumcision was painful, though to grown men it was shamefull; though, while they were sure and unfit for action, their enemies might take advantage against them, as Simeon and Levi did against the Shechemites; though Abraham was 99 years old, and had been justified and accepted of God long since; though so strange a thing done religiously, might be turned to his reproach by the Canaanite and the Perizite that dwelt then in the land; yet God’s command was sufficient to answer these, and a thousand such objections; what God requires, we must do, not conferring with flesh and blood.

CHAP. XVIII.

We have an account in this chapter of another interview between God and Abraham, probably, within a few days after the former, as a reward of his cheerful obedience to the last. The subject here is, 1. The kind visit, which God made him, and the kind entertainment which he gave to that visit, v. 1-8. II. The matters discoursed of between them. 1. The purposes of God’s love concerning Sarah, v. 9-15. 2. The purposes of God’s wrath concerning Sodom, v. 17-20. 3. The discovery God made to Abraham of his design to destroy Sodom, v. 21-22. (3.) The intercession Abraham made for Sodom, v. 23-33.

1. And the Lord appeared unto him in the plains of Mamre: and he sat in the tent-door in the heat of the day; 2. And he lifted up his eyes, and looked, and, lo, three men stood by him: and when he saw them, he ran to meet them from the tent-door, and bowed himself toward the ground. 3. And said, My Lord, if now I have found favour in thy sight, pass not away, I pray thee, from thy servant: 4. Let a little water, I pray you, be fetched, and wash your feet, and rest yourselves under the tree; 5. And I will fetch a morsel of bread, and comfort ye your hearts; after that, ye shall pass on: for therefore are ye come to your servant. And they said, So do, as thou hast said. 6. And Abraham hastened into the tent unto Sarah, and said, Make ready quickly three measures of fine meal, knead it, and make cakes upon the hearth. 7. And Abraham ran unto the herd, and fetched a calf tender and good, and gave it unto a young man; and he hasted to dress it. 8. And he took butter, and milk, and the calf which he had dressed, and set it before them; and he stood by them under the tree, and they did eat.

This appearance of God to Abraham seems to have had in it more of freedom and familiarity, and less of grandeur and majesty, than those we have hitherto read of; and therefore more resembles that great visit, which, in the fulness of time, the Son of God was to make to the world; when the Word would be made flesh, and appear as one of us. Observe here,

1. How Abraham expected strangers, and how richly his expectations were answered, v. 1. He sat in the tent-door, in the heat of the day; not so much to repose or divert himself, as to seek an opportunity of doing good, by giving entertainment to strangers and travellers, there being perhaps no inn to accommodate them. Note, 1. We are likely to have the most comfort of those good works that we are most free and forward to. 2. God graciously visits those in whom he has first raised the expectation of him, and manifests himself to these that wait for him. When Abraham was thus sitting, he saw three men coming toward him. These three men were three spiritual heavenly beings, now assuming human bodies, that they might be visible to Abraham, and conversable with him. Some think that they were all created angels, others, that one of them was the Son of God, the Angel of the covenant, whom Abraham distinguished from the rest, y. 3, and who is called Jehovah, v. 13. The apostle improves this, for the encouragement of hospitality, Heb. 13. 2. Those who have entertained strangers, have entertained angels, to their unspeakable honour and satisfaction. Where, upon a prudent and impartial judgment, we see no cause to suspect ill, charity teaches us to hope well, and to show kindness accordingly; it is better to feed five drones, or wasps, than to starve one bee.

II. How Abraham entertained those strangers, and how kindly his entertainment was accepted. The Holy Ghost takes particular notice of the very free and affectionate welcome which Abraham gave to the strangers. 1. He was complaisant and respectful to them, forgetting his age, he ran to meet them in the most obliging manner, and bound himself toward the ground, though as yet he knew nothing of them, but that they appeared graceful respectable men. Note, Religion does not destroy, but improves good manners, and teaches us to honour all men. Decent civility is a great ornament to pieties. 2. He was very earnest and importunate for their stay, and took it as a great favour, v. 3, 4. Note, (1.) It becomes us, when we welcome strangers, to be liberal and open hearted in their entertainments, according to their ability, and (not to compliment, but cordially) to bid their friends welcome: we should take a pleasure in showing kindness to any; for both God and man love a cheerful giver. Who would eat the bread of him that has an evil eye? Prov. 23. 6, 7. (2.) Those that would have communion with God, must earnestly desire it, and pray for it. God is a Guest worth entertaining. 3. His entertainment was such, as was plain and homely, and there was nothing in it of the gaiety and niceness of these times. His dining room was an harbour under a tree; no rich table-linen, no side-board set with plate; his feast was a joint or two of veal, and some cakes baked on the hearth, and both hastily dressed up; here were no dainties, no varieties, no forced-meats, no sweetmeats, but good plain wholesome food, though Abraham was anxious to satisfy their wants. But we must not be curious in our diet; let us be thankful for food convenient, though it be homely and common; and not desirous of dainties, for they are deceitful meat to those that love them and set their hearts upon them. 4. He and his wife were both of them very attentive, and busy, in accommodating their guests; with the best they had, Sarah herself is cook and baker; Abraham runs to fetch the calf, brings out the milk and butter, and thinks it not below him to wait at table, that he might show how heartily welcome his guests were. Note, (1.) Those that have real merit, need not take state upon them. (2.) Heartly friendship will stoop to any thing but sin, Christ himself has taught us to wash one another's feet, in humble love. They that thus abuse themselves, shall be exalted. Here Abraham's faith showed itself in good works; and so must ours, else it is dead. Jam. 2. 24, 25. The fathers of the faithful was famous for charity, and genevisity, and good house-keeping; and we must learn of him to do good, and communicate. Job did it a tenth's morsel time, Job 31. 17.

9. And they said unto him, Where is Sarah thy wife? And he said, Behold, in the tent. 10. And he said, I will certainly return unto thee according to the time of life; and, lo, Sarah thy wife shall have a son. And Sarah heard it in the tent-door, which was behind him. 11. Now Abraham and Sarah were old and well-stricken in age; and it ceased to be with Sarah after the manner of women. 12. Therefore Sarah laughed within herself, saying, after I am waxed old shall I have pleasure, my lord being old also? 13. And the Lord said unto Abraham, Wherefore did Sarah laugh, saying, Shall I of a surety bear a child, which am old? 14. Is any thing too hard for the Lord? At the time appointed, I will return unto thee, according to the time of life, and Sarah shall have a son. 15. Then Sarah denied, saying, I laughed not; for she was afraid. And he said, Nay; but thou didst laugh.

These heavenly guests, (being sent to confirm the promise lately made to Abraham, that he should have a son by Sarah,) while they are receiving Abraham's kind entertainment, thus return his kindness: he receives angel's, and his angels' reward; a gracious message from Heaven, Matt. 10. 41. 42. Care is taken that Sarah should be with hearing. She must conceive by faith, and therefore the promise must be made to her, Heb. 11. 11. It was the modest usuage of that time, that the women did not sit at meat with men, at least, not with strangers, but confined themselves to their own apartments; therefore Sarah is here out of sight; but she must not be out of hearing. The angel's inquirers, v. 9. Where is Sarah thy wife? By naming her, they gave intimation enough to Abraham that though they seemed strangers, yet they very we knew him and his family; by inquiring after her, they showed a friendly kind concern for the family and relations of one whom they found respectful to them. It is a piece of common civility, which ought to proceed from a principle of christian love, and then it is sanctified. And by speaking of her, (she over-hearing it,) they drew her to listen to what was further to be said. Where is Sarah thy wife? Say the angels; Behold, in the tent, said Abraham. Where should she be else? There she is in her place, as she used to be, and is now within call. Note, 1. The daughters of Sarah must learn of her, to be chaste keepers at home. 2. There is nothing got by gadfling. Those are more likely to receive comfort from God and his promises, that are in their place, and in the way of their duty, Luke 2. 8.

II. The promise is then renewed and ratified, that she should have a son, v. 10, "I will certainly return unto thee, and visit thee next time, with the performance, as now I do, with the promise." God will return to those that bid him welcome, that entertain his visits: "I will return thy kindness, Sarah thy wife shall have a son;" it is repeated again, v. 14. Thus the promises of the Messiah were often repeated in the Old Testament, for the strengthening of the faith of God's people. We are slow of heart to believe, and therefore have need of line upon line to the same purport. This is that word of promise which the apostle quotes, Rom. 9. 9, that, by the virtue of which Isaac was born. Note, 1. The same blessings which others have from common providence, believers have from the promise, which makes them very sweet, and very sure. 2. The spiritual seed of Abraham are their life, and joy, and hope, and all, to the promise. They are born by the word of God, 1 Pet. 1. 23.

III. Sarah thinks this too good news to be true, and therefore cannot take as yet find in her heart to believe it, v. 12, Sarah laughed within herself. It was not a pleasing laughter of faith, like Abraham's, ch. 17. 17, but it was a laughing of doubting and mistrust. Note. The same thing may be done from very different principles, which God only can judge of, who knows the heart. The great objection which Sarah could not get over, was her age. "I am waxed old, and past child-bearing in the course of nature; especially having been hitherto barren; and (which magnifies the difficulty) My lord is old also." Observe here, 1. Sarah calls Abraham her lord; it was the only good word in this saying, and the Holy Ghost takes notice of it to her thereby, and repudiates the idea, and they all christian wives, I Pet. 3. 6, Sarah obeyed Abraham, calling him lord, in token of respect and submission. Thus must the wife reverence her husband, Eph. 5. 33. And thus must we be apt to take notice of what is spoken decently and well, to the honour of them that speak it, though it may be mixed with that which is amiss, over which we should cast a mantle of love. 2. Human improbability often sets up in contradiction to the divine promise. The objections of sense are very apt to stumble and puzzle the weak faith even of true believers. It is hard to cleave to the First Cause, when second causes frown. 3. Even where there is true faith, yet there are often sore conflicts with unbelief; Sarah could say, Lord, I believe, (Heb. 11. 11.) and yet must say, Lord, help my unbelief.

IV. The angel reproves the inelegant expressions of Sarah. Observe, 1. Though Sarah was most kindly and generously entertaining these angels, yet, when she did amiss, they reproved her for it, as Christ reproved Martha in her own house, Luke 10. 40, 41. If our friends be kind to us, we must not therefore be so unkind to them as to suffer sin upon them. 2. God gave this reproof to Sarah by Abraham her husband; and to him he said, Why did Sarah laugh? Perhaps, he had not told her of the promise that had been given him on that occasion before to this purport; if he had communicated it to her with its ramifications, she would hardly have been so surprised at it now. Or, Abraham was told of it, that he might tell her of it; mutual reproof, when there is occasion for it, is one of the duties of that relation. 3. The reproof itself is plain, and backed with a good reason. Wherefore did Sarah laugh? Note. (1.) It is good to inquire into the reason, and do penance for that which we have done amiss; of a fool, Eccl. 7. 6. "Wherefore did I laugh?" (2.) Our unbelief and distrust is a great offence to the God of heaven. He justly takes it ill, to have the objections of sense set up in contradiction to his promise, as Luke 1. 18. Here is a question asked, which is enough to answer all the cavils of flesh and blood; Is any thing too hard for the Lord? Heb. too wonderful, that is, [1.] Is any thing so secret as to escape his cognizance? No, not Sarah's laughing, though it was only within herself. Or, [2.] Is anything so difficult as to exceed his power? No, not the giving of a child to Sarah in her old age. V. Sarah foolishly endeavours to conceal her fault, v. 15. She denied, saying, I did not laugh; thinking nobody could disprove her: she told this lie, because she was afraid; but it was in vain to attempt concealing it from an all-seeing eye she was told to, her shame, Thou didst laugh. Now, 1. There seems to be in Sarah a retraction of her distrust. Now that she perceived, by laying circumstances together, that it was a divine promise which had been made concerning her, she renounces all doubting distrustful thoughts about it. But, 2. There was withal a sinful attempt to cover a sin with a lie. It is a shame to do amiss, but a greater shame to deny it; the natural way of an old confessor is to be open in the first quarter of a rebuke often brings us into this snare. See Isa. 57. 11. Whom hast thou feared, that thou hast lied? But we deceive ourselves, if we think to impose up on God; he can and will, bring truth to light, to our shame. He that covers his sin, cannot prosper; for the day is coming, which will discover it.

16. And the men rose up from thence, and looked toward Sodom: and Abraham went with them to bring them on the way. 17. And the Lord said, Shall I hide from Abraham that thing which I do? 18. Seeing that Abraham shall surely become a great and mighty nation, and all the nations of the earth shall be blessed in him? 19. For I know him, that he will command his children and his household after him, and they shall keep the way of the Lord, to do justice and judgment; that the Lord may bring upon Abraham that which he hath spoken of him. 20. And the Lord said, Because the cry of Sodom and Gomorrah is great, and because their sin is very grievous; 21. I will go down now, and see whether they have done altogether according to the cry of it, which is come unto me; and if not, I will know. 22. And the men turned their faces from thence, and went toward Sodom: but Abraham stood yet before the Lord.

The messengers from heaven had now despatched one part of their business, which was an errand of grace to Abraham and Sarah, and which they declared they were sent for; only, they have before them work of another nature: Sodom to be destroyed, and they must do it, ch. 19. 13. Note, As with the Lord there is mercy, so he is the God to whom vengeance belongs. Pursuant to their commission, we here find, 1. That they looked toward Sodom, v. 16, they set their faces against it in wrath; as God is said to look unto the host of the Egyptians, Exod. 14. 24. Note, Though God has long seemed to connive at sinners, from whom they have inferred that the Lord does not see, does not regard; yet, when the day of his wrath comes, he will look towards them. 2. That they went toward Sodom, v. 22, and accordingly, we find two of them at Sodom, ch. 19. 1. Whether the third was the Lord, before whom Abraham yet stood, and to whom he drew near, v. 23, as most think, or whether the third left them before they came to Sodom, and the Lord before whom Abraham stood, was the Shekinah, or that appearance of the Divine Glory which Abraham had formerly seen and conversed with, is uncertain. However, we have here, (1.) The honour Abraham did to his guests; he went with them to bring them on the way, as one that was leath to part with such good company, and was desirous to pay his utmost respects to them. This is a piece of civility, proper to be showed to our friends; but it must be done as the apostle directs, (2 Tim. 4. 6.) after a good sort. (2.) The honour they did to him; for these that honour God, he will honour; God communicated to Abraham his purpose to destroy Sodom, and not only so, but entered into a free conference with him about it. Having taken him, more closely than before, into covenant with himself, ch. 17, he here admits him into more intimate communion with himself than ever, as the man of his counsel. Observe how.

I. God's friendly thoughts concerning Abraham, (v. 17—19.) where we have his resolution to make known to Abraham his purpose concerning Sodom, with the reasons of it. If Abraham had not brought them on their way, perhaps he had not been thus favoured; but he that loves to walk with wise men, shall be wise, Prov. 13. 20. See how God is pleased to argue with himself; Shall I hide from Abraham (or, as some read it, Am I concealing from Abraham) that thing which I do? "Can I go about such a thing, and not tell Abraham?" Thus does God, in his counsels, express himself, after the manner of men, with deliberation. But why must Abraham be of the cabinet council? The Jews suggest that because God had granted the land of Canaan to Abraham and his seed, therefore he would not destroy those cities which were a part of that land, without his knowledge and consent. But God here gives two other reasons: (1.) He owns, for he is a friend and a favourite, and one that God has a particular kindness for, and great things in store for. He is to become a great nation; and not only so, but in the Messiah which is to come from his loins, All nations of the earth shall be blessed. Note, The secret of the Lord is with them that fear him, Ps. 25. 14. Prov. 3. 32. Those that by faith live a life of communion with God, cannot be left without the light of his secret counsels, even in other things, though not with a prophetic, yet with a prudential, practical, knowledge. They have a better insight than others into what is present, (Hos. 14. 9. Ps. 107. 43.) and a better foresight of what is to come, at least, so much as suffices for their conduct and for their comfort.

2. Abraham must know, for he will teach his household, v. 19. I know Abraham very well, that he will command his children and his household after him. Consider this, (1.) As a very bright part of Abraham's character and example. He not only prayed with his family, but he taught them as a man of knowledge, nay, he commanded them as a man in authority, and was prophet and king, as well as priest, in his own house. Observe, [1.] God having made the covenant with him and his seed, and his household being circumcised, pursuant to that, he was very careful to teach and rule them well. Those that expect family-blessings, must make conscience of family-duty. If our children be the Lord's, they must be nursed for him; if they wear his livery, they must be trained up in his work. [2.] Abraham not only took care of his children, but of his household; his servants were catechised servants. Masters of families should instruct, and instruct all under their roof. The poorest servants have precious souls that must be looked after. [3.] Abraham made it his care and business to promote practical religion in his family. He did not fill their heads with matters of nice speculation, or doubtful dispute; but he taught them to keep the way of the Lord, and to do judgment and justice, that is, to be serious and devout in the discharge of their several callings, and to bear just dealings with all men. [4.] Abraham, herein, had an eye to posterity, and was in care not only that his household with him, but that his household after him, should keep the way of the Lord; that religion might flourish in his family, when he was in his grave. [5.] His doing this, was the fulfilling of the conditions of the promises which God had made him. Those only can expect the benefit of the promises, that make conscience of their duty. (2.) We may consider this as the reason why God would make known to him his purpose concerning Sodom, because he was communicative of his knowledge, and improved it for the benefit of those that were under his charge. Note, To him that hath, shall be given, Matth. 13. 12.—25. 29. Those that make a good use of their knowledge, shall know more.

II. God's friendly talk with Abraham; in which he makes known to him his purpose concerning Sodom, and allows him a liberty of application to him about that matter. 1. He tells him of the evidence there was against Sodom, v. 20. The cry of Sodom is great. Note, Some sins, and the sins of some sinners, cry aloud to Heaven for vengeance. The iniquity of Sodom was crying with loudness, that is, it was so very provoking, that it even urged God to punish. 2. The inquiry he would make upon this evidence, v. 21, I will go down now and see. Not if there were any thing concerning which God is in doubt, or in the dark; but he is pleased thus to express himself after the manner of men, (1.) To show the incontestable equity of all his judicial proceedings. Men are apt to suggest that his way is not equal; but let them know that his judgments are the result of an eternal council, and are never rash or sudden resolves. He never punishes upon report, or common fame, or the information of others, but upon his own certain and infallible knowledge. (2.) To give example to magistrates, and those in authority, with the utmost care and diligence to inquire into the merits of a cause, before they give judgment upon it. 3. Perhaps the decree here spoken of as not yet peremptory, that room and encouragement might be given to Abraham to make intercession for them. Thus God looked if there were any to intercede, Isa. 59. 16.

23. And Abraham drew near, and said, Will thou also destroy the righteous with the wicked? 24. Peradventure there be fifty righteous within the city: wilt thou also destroy and not spare the place for the fifty righteous that are therein? 25. That be far from thee to do after this manner, to slay the righteous with the wicked: and that the righteous should be as the wicked, that be far from thee: Shall not the Judge of all the earth do right? 26. And the Lord said, If I find in Sodom fifty righteous within the city, then I will spare all the place for their sakes. 27. And Abraham answered and said, Behold now, I have taken upon me to speak unto the Lord, which am but dust and ashes: 28. Peradventure there shall lack five of the righteous: wilt thou destroy all the city for lack of five? And he said, If I find there forty and five, I will not destroy it. 29. And he spake unto him yet again, and said, Peradventure there shall be forty saved there. And he said, I will not destroy it for forty's sake, 30. And he said unto him, Oh let not the Lord be angry, and I will speak: Peradventure there shall be thirty found there. And he said, I will not do it, if I find thirty there. 31. And he said, Behold now, I have taken upon me to speak unto the Lord: Peradventure there shall be found twenty there. And he said, I will not destroy it for ten's sake. 32. And he said, Oh let not the Lord be angry, and I will speak yet but this once: Peradventure ten shall be found there. And he said, I will not destroy it for ten's sake. 33. And the Lord went his way, as soon as he had left communicating with Abraham: and Abraham returned unto his place.

Communion with God is kept up by the word and by prayer. In the word, God speaks to us; in prayer, we speak to him. God had spoken to Abraham his purposes concerning Sodom; now from thence Abraham takes occasion to speak to God on Sodom's behalf. Note, God's word does not do good, when it furnishes us with matter for prayer, and excites us to it. When God has spoken to us, we must consider what we have to say to him upon it.

Observe,

I. The solemnity of Abraham's address to God on this occasion, v. 23, Abraham drew near. The expression intimates, 1. A holy concern; he engaged his heart to approach to God, Jer. 30. 2. That he would not have Sodom destroyed, and I not speak one good word for it? 2. A holy confidence; he drew near with an assurance of faith, drew near as a prince, Job 31. 37. Note, When we address ourselves to the duty of prayer, we ought to remember that we are drawing near to God, that we may be filled with a reverence of him, Lev. 10. 3.

II. The general scope of this prayer. It is the first solemn prayer we have upon record in the Bible: and it is a prayer for the sparing of Sodom. Abraham, no doubt, greatly abhorred the wickedness of Sodom, he would not have lived among them, as Lot did, if they would have given him the best estate in their country; and yet he prayed earnestly for them. Note, Though sin is to be hated, sinners are to be pitied and prayed for. God delights not in the death, nor should we desire, but deeply tospare their precious, thankful, and formidable prayer. That the righteous among them might be spared, and not involved in the common calamity; having an eye particularly to just Lot, whose disingenious carriage toward him he had long since forgiven and forgotten; witness his friendly zeal to rescue him before by his sword, and now by his prayers.

2. He improves this into a petition, that all might be spared for the sake of the righteous that were among them, God himself countenancing this request, and in effect putting him upon it by his answer to his first address, v. 26. Note, We must pray not only for ourselves, but for others also; for we are members of the same body, at least, of the same body of mankind. All we are brethren.

III. The particular graces eminent in this prayer.

1. Here is great faith; and it is the prayer of faith. Abraham may be approaching prayer, Jer. 30. 10. He prays with God, orders the cause, and fills his mouth with arguments. He acts faith especially upon the righteousness of God, and is very confident, (1.) That God will not destroy the righteous with the wicked, v. 23. No, that be far from thee, v. 25. We must never entertain any thought that derogates from the honour of God's righteousness. See Rom. 3. 5, 6. Note, [1.] The righteous are mingled with the wicked in this world. Among the best there are, commonly, some bad, and among the worst some good. Even in Sodom, one Lot. [2.] Though the righteous be among the wicked, yet the righteous God will not, certainly he will not destroy the righteous with the wicked. Though in this world they may be involved in the same common calamities, yet in the great day, a distinction will be made. (2.) That the righteous shall not be as the wicked are the righteous, and have no share with them, yet they do not suffer like them. Common calamities are quite another thing to the righteous, than what they are to the wicked, Isa. 26. 7. (3.) That the Judge of all the earth doth right; undoubtedly he will, because he is the Judge of all the earth; it is the apostle's argument, Rom. 3. 5, 6. Note, [1.] God is the Judge of all the earth; he gives charge to all, takes cognizance of all, and will pass sentence upon all. [2.] That God Almighty never did, nor ever will do, any wrong to any of the creatures, either by withholding that which is right, or by exacting more than is right, Job 34. 10, 11.

2. Here is great humility, (1.) A deep sense of his own unworthiness, v. 27. Beloved note, I have taken upon me to speak unto the Lord, who am but dust and ashes; and again, v. 31, hereby to show our amazed at his own boldness, and the liberty God graciously allowed him, considering God's greatness,—he is the Lord; and his own meanness,—but dust and ashes. Note, [1.] The greatest of men, the most considerable and deserving, are but dust and ashes, mean and vile, before God; despicable, frail and dying. [2.] Whenever we draw near to God, it behoves us to remember the vast distance that there is between us and God. He is the Lord of glory, we are worms of the earth.

3. The access we have to the throne of grace, and the freedom of speech allowed us, are just matter of humble wonder, 2 Sam. 7. 18. (2.) An awful dread of God's displeasure. O let not the Lord be angry, v. 30, and again, v. 32. Note, [1.] The inordinate liberty and easy use in their addresses to God, is such, that if they were dealing with a man like themselves, they could not but fear that he would be angry with them. But he with whom we have to do, is God and not man; and, however he may seem, is not really, angry with the prayers of the upright, (Ps. 80. 4,) for they are his delight, (Prov. 13. 8,) and he is pleased when he is wrestled with. [2.] That even when we receive special assurances of God's mercy, we ought to be jealous over ourselves, lest we make ourselves the occasion of the divine displeasure; and therefore we must bring the Mediator with us in the arms of our faith, to atone for the iniquity of our holy things.

3. Here is great charity. (1.) A charitable opinion of Sodom's character: as bad as it was, he thought there were several good people in it. It becomes us to hope the best of the worst places. Of the two, it is better to have that extreme. (2.) A charitable desire of Sodom's being brought to an interest at the throne of grace for mercy for them. We never find him thus earnest in pleading with God for himself and his family, as here for Sodom.

4. Here are great boldness, and believing confidence. (1.) He took the liberty to pitch upon a certain number of righteous ones which he supposed might be in Sodom: to wit, there are fifty, v. 24. (2.) He drew upon God's concessions, again and again. As God granted much, he still bade more, with the hope of gaining his point. (3.) He brought the terms as low as he could for shame, (having prevailed for mercy if there were but ten righteous ones in five cities,) and perhaps so low, that he concluded they would have been spared.

IV. The success of the prayer. He that thus wrestled, prevailed wonderfully, as a prince he had power with God: it was but to ask and have. 1. God's general good-will appears in this, that he consented to spare the wicked for the sake of the righteous. See how swift God is to show mercy; he even seeks a reason for it. See what great blessings good people are to any place, and how little those befriended themselves, that hate and persecute them. 2. His particular favour to Abraham appeared in this: that he knew the abominations, till Abraham left off asking. Such is the use of prayer. Why then did Abraham leave off asking, when he had prevailed so far as to get the place spared, if there were but ten righteous in it? Either, (1.) Because he owned that they deserved to perish, if there were not so many; as the dresser of the vineyard, who consented that the barren tree should be cut down, if one year’s trial more did not make it fruitful, Luke 13. 9. Or, (2.) Because God restrained his spirit from asking any further. When God has determined the ruin of a place, he forbids it to be queried for, Jer. 7. 16.—11. 14.—14. 33.

Lastly, Here is the breaking up of the conference, v. 33. 1. The Lord went his way. The visions of God must not be constant in this world, where it is by faith only that we are to set God before us. God did not go away, till Abraham had said all he had to say; for he is never weary of hearing prayer, Isa. 59. 1. 2. Abraham returned unto his place, not puffed up with the honour done him, nor by the extraordinary interviews taken off from the ordinary course of duty; he returned to his place, to observe what the event would be; and it proved that his prayer was heard, and yet Sodom was not spared, because there were not ten righteous in it. We cannot expect too little from man, nor too much from God.

CHAP. XIX.

The contents of this chapter we have, 2 Pet. 2. 6. 8, where we find that God, turning the cities of Sodom and Gomorrha into ashes, condemned them with an overthrow, and delivered just Lot. It is the history of Sodom’s ruin, and Lot’s deliverance from that ruin. The 1st and 2d verses, etc., ch. 11 of God’s coming to take a view of the present state of Sodom; what its wickedness was, and what righteous persons there were in it: now here we have the result of that inquiry. 1. It was found, upon trial, that Lot was very good, v. 1. 3, and it did not appear that there was one more of the same character. II. It was found that the Sodomites were very wicked, and vile, v. 4. 11. III. Special care was therefore taken for the securing his safety, and Lot and his family, in a place of safety, v. 12. 13. IV. Mercy having rejoiced therein, justice shows itself in the ruin of Sodom, and the death of Lot’s wife, v. 24. 26. with a general repetition of the story, v. 27. 29. V. A foul sin that Lot was guilty of, in committing incest with his two daughters, v. 30. 38.

And there came two angels to Sodom at even; and Lot sat in the gate of Sodom: and Lot seeing them rose up to meet them; and he bowed himself with his face toward the ground; 2. And he said, Behold now, my lords, turn in, I pray you, into your servant’s house, and tarry all night, and wash your feet; and ye shall rise up early, and go on your ways. And they said, Nay; but we will abide in the street all night. 3. And he pressed upon them greatly; and they turned in unto him, and entered into his house; and he made them a feast, and did bake unleavened bread, and they did eat.

These angels, it is likely, were two of the three that had just before been with Abraham; the two created angels that were sent to execute God’s purpose concerning Sodom. Observe here,

I. There was but one good man in Sodom, and these heavenly messengers soon found him out. Wherever we are, we should inquire into those of the place that live in the fear of God, and should choose to associate ourselves with them; Matth. 10. 11. "Whosoever is not with me is against me, and there abide." They were of the same country, when they were in a foreign country, love to be together.

II. Lot sufficiently distinguished himself from the rest of his neighbours, at this time, which plainly set a mark upon him. He that did not act like the rest, must not fear like the rest. 1. Lot sat in the gate of Sodom at even; when the rest, it is likely, were tipp ling and drinking, he sat alone, waiting for an opportunity to do good. 2. He was extremely respectful to men whose men and aspect were sober and serious, though they did not come in state. He bowed himself to the ground, when he met them, as if, upon the first view, he discerned something divine in them. 3. He was hospitable, and very free and generous in his invitations and entertainments. He courted these strangers to his house, and to the best accommodations he had, and gave them all the evidences that he could of his sincerity: for, (1.) When the angels, to try whether he were hearty in the invitation, declined the acceptance of it, at first, (which is the common usage in hospitality,) in order to their not being in all to truth and honesty,) their refusal did but make him more importunate; for he pressed upon them greatly, v. 3. Partly, because he would by no means have them to expose themselves to the inconveniences and perils of lodging in the street of Sodom; and partly, because he was desirous of their company and converse. He had not seen two such honest faces in Sodom this great while. Note, Those that live in bad places, should know how to value the society of those that are wise and good, and earnestly desire it. (2.) When the angels accepted his invitation, he treated them nobly; he made a feast for them, and thought it well-bestowed on such guests. Note, Good people should be (with prudence) generous people.

4. But before they lay down, the men of the city, even the men of Sodom, compassed the house round, both old and young, all the people from every quarter: 5. And they called unto Lot, and said, Where are the men which came in to thee this night? Bring them out unto us, that we may know them. 6. And Lot went out at the door unto them, and shut the door after him. 7. And said, I pray you, brethren, do not so wickedly. 8. Behold now, I have two daughters which have not known man; let me, I pray you, bring them out unto you, and do ye to them as is good in your eyes; only unto these men do nothing; for therefore came they under the shadow of my roof. 9. And they said, Stand back. And they said again, This one fellow came in to sojourn, and he will needs be a judge: now will we deal worse with thee than with them. And they pressed sore upon the man, even Lot, and came near to break the door. 10. But the men put forth their hand, and pulled Lot into the house to them, and shut to the door. 11. And they smote the men that were at the door of the house with blindness, both small and great: so that they weared themselves to find the door.

Now it appeared, beyond contradiction, that the cry of Sodom was no louder than there was cause for. This night’s work was enough to fill the measure. For we find here,

1. That they were all wicked, v. 4. Wickedness was grown universal, and they were unanimous in any vile design. Here were old and young, and all from every quarter, engaged in this riot; the old were not past it, and the young were soon come up to it; either they had no magistrates to keep the peace, and protect the peaceable; or their magis-trated were themselves aiding and abetting. Note, When the disease of sin is become epidemic, it is fatal to any place, Isa. 1. 5. 7.

II. That they were arrived at the highest pitch of wickedness; they were sinners before the Lord exceedingly, ch. 13. 13, for,

1. It was the most unnatural and abominable wickedness that they were now set upon, a sin that still bears their name, and is called Sodomy. They were carried headlong by those vile affections, (Rm. 1. 26, 27.) which are worse than brutish, and the eternal reproach of the human nature, and which cannot be thought of without horror; by those that have the least spark of virtue, and any remains of natural light and conscience. Note, Those that allow themselves in unnatural uncleanness, are marked for the vengeance of eternal fire. See Jude 7.

2. They were not ashamed to own it, and to prosecute their design by force and arms. The practice had been bad enough, if it had been carried on by intrigue and wheedling; but they proclaim war with virtue, and bid open defiance to it. Hence during sinners are said to declare their sin as Sodom, Isa. 5. 9. Note, Those that are become impudent in sin, generally prove impertinent in sin; and it will be found, that they that have hard hearts indeed, that sin with a high hand, Jer. 6. 15.

3. When Lot interposed, with all the mildness imaginable, to check the rage and fury of their lust, they were most insolently rude and abusive to him. He ventured himself among them, v. 6. He spoke civilly to them, called them brethren, v. 7, and begged of them not to do so wickedly; and, being greatly disturbed at their vile attempt, unadvisedly and unjustly offered to prostitute his two daughters to them, v. 8. It is true, of two evils we must choose the less; but of two sins we must choose neither, nor ever do evil, that good may come of it. He reasoned with them, pleaded the laws of hospitality, and the protection of his house which his guests were entitled to; but you had as good offer reason to a roaring lion and a raging bear, as to these headstrong sinners, who were governed only by lust. Lot's engaging with them, does but exasperate them; and, to complete their wickedness, and fill up the measure of it, they fall foul upon him. (1.) They ridicule him, charge him with the absurdity of pretending to be a magistrate, when he was not so much as a free-man of their city, v. 9. Note, It is common for repevers to be unjustly upbraided as usurpers; and while offering the kindness of a friend, to be charged with assuming the authority of a judge: as if a man might speak reason, without taking too much upon him. (2.) They threaten him, and lay violent hands upon him; and the good man is in danger of being pulled in pieces by this outrageous rabble. Note, [1.] Those that hate to be reformed, hate those that repro-}
It was no time to trifle, when the destruction was just at the door. They had not forty days to turn them in, as the Ninevites had. Now or never, they must make their escape. At midnight this cry was made. Such as this, is our call to the unconverted, to turn and live. 2. The slight they put upon this warning, He seemed to them as one that mocked. They thought, perhaps, that the assault which the Sodomites had just now made upon his house, had disturbed his head, and put him into such a fright, that he knew not what he said; or they thought that he was not in earnest with them. They who lived a merry life, and made a jest of every thing, made a jest of that, and so they perished in the overthrow. Thus many who are warned of the misery and danger they are in by sin, make a light matter of it, and think their ministers do but jest with them; such will perish with their blood upon their own heads.

15. And when the morning arose, then the angels hasted Lot, saying, Arise, take thy wife, and thy two daughters, which are here; lest thou be consumed in the iniquity of the city. 16. And while he lingered, the men laid hold upon his hand, and upon the hand of his wife, and upon the hand of his two daughters; the Lord being merciful unto him: and they brought him forth, and set him without the city. 17. And it came to pass, when they had brought them forth abroad, that he said, Escape for thy life; look not behind thee, neither stay thou in all the plain; escape to the mountain, lest thou be consumed. 18. And Lot said unto them, Oh, not so, my Lord. 19. Behold now, thy servant hath found grace in thy sight, and thou hast magnified thy mercy, which thou hast showed unto me in saving my life; and I cannot escape to the mountain, lest some evil take me, and I die. 20. Behold now, this city is near to flee unto, and it is a little one: oh, let me escape thither, (is it not a little one?) and my soul shall live. 21. And he said unto him, See, I have accepted thee, concerning this thing also, that I will not overthrow this city, for the which thou hast spoken. 22. Hasten thee, escape thither; for I cannot do any thing till thou be come thither. Therefore the name of the city was called Zoar. 23. The sun was risen upon the earth when Lot entered into Zoar.

1. The rescue of Lot out of Sodom. Though there were not ten righteous men in Sodom, for whose sakes it might be spared, yet that one righteous man that was among them, delivered his own soul, Ezek. 14. 14. Early in the morning, his own guests, in kindness to him, turned him out of doors, and his family with him, v. 15. His daughters that were married, perished with their unbelieving husbands; but those that continued with him, were preserved with him. Observe, 1. With what a gracious violence Lot was brought out of Sodom, v. 16. It seems, though he did not make a jest of the warning given, as his sons-in-law did, yet he lingered, he tripped, he did not make so much haste as the case required. Thus many that are under some convictions about the misery of their spiritual state, and the necessity of a change, yet defer that needful work, and holiness linger. Lot did so, and it might have been fatal to him, if the angels had not laid hold on his hand and brought him forth, and saved him with fear, Jude 23. Here it is said, The Lord was merciful to him; other wise he might have justly left him to perish, since he was so loth to depart. Note, (1.) The salvation of the most righteous men must be attributed to God's mercy, not to their own merit. We are saved by grace. (2.) God's power also must be acknowledged in the bringing of souls out of a sinful state. If God had not brought us forth, we had never come forth. (3.) If God had not been merciful to us, our lingering had been our ruin.

2. With what a gracious vehemence he was urged to make the best of his way, when he was brought forth, v. 17. (1.) He must still apprehend himself in danger of being consumed, and be quickened by the law of self-preservation to flee for his life. Note, A holy fear and trembling are found necessary to the working out of our salvation. (2.) He must therefore mind his business with the utmost care and diligence. He must not hanker after Sodom, Look not behind thee; he must not loiter by the way, Stay not in all the plain, for it would all be made one dead sea; he must not take up short of the place of refuge appointed him, Escape to the mountain. Such as these, are the commands given to those who through grace are delivered out of a sinful state and condition. [1.] Return not to sin and Satan, for that is looking back to Sodom. [2.] Rest not in self and the world, for that is staying in the plain. And, [3.] Reach toward Christ and Heaven, for that is escaping to the mountain, short of which we must not take up.

II. The fixing of a place of refuge for him. The mountain was first appointed for him to flee to, but

1. He begged for a city of refuge, one of the five that lay together, called Bethel, ch. 14. 2, 18, 20. It was Lot's weakness to think a city of his own choosing safer than the mountain of God's appointing. And he argued against himself, when he pleaded, Thou hast magnified thy mercy in saving my life, and I cannot escape to the mountain; for could not he that had plucked him out of Sodom, when he lingered, carry him safe to the mountain, though he began to tire? Could not He that had saved him from greater evils, save him from the lesser? He insists much in his petition upon the smallness of the place. It is a little one, is it not? Therefore, it was to be hoped, not so bad as the rest. This gave a new name to the place; it was called Zoar, a little one. Intercessions for little ones are worthy to be remembered.

2. God granted him his request, though there was much infirmity in it, v. 21, 22. See what favour God showed a true saint, though weak. (1.) Zoar was spared, to gratify him. Though his intercession for it was not, as Abraham's for Sodom, from a principle of generous charity, but merely from self interest, yet God granted him his request, to show how much the fervent prayer of a righteous man availes. (2.) Sodom's ruin was suspended, till he was safe. I cannot do any thing till thou be come thither. Note, The very presence of good men in a place helps to keep off judgments. See what care God takes for the preservation of his people. The good works are such, that God's servants are sealed, Rev. 7. 3. Ezek. 9. 4.

Lastly, It is taken notice of, that the sun was risen when Lot entered into Zoar. For when a good man comes into a place, he brings light along with him, or should do.
24. Then the Lord rained upon Sodom and upon Gomorrah brimstone and fire from the Lord out of heaven; 25. And he overthrew those cities, and all the plain, and all the inhabitants of the cities, and that which grew upon the ground.

Then, when Lot was got safe into Zoar, then this ruin came; for good men are taken away from the evil to come. The sun was bright and clear, promising a fair day, then this storm arose, to show that it was not from natural causes. Concerning this destruction, observe,

1. That God was the immediate Author of it. It was destruction from the Almighty, The Lord rained,—from the Lord, v. 24, that is, God from himself, by his own immediate power, and not in the common course of nature. Or, God the Son from God the Father; for the Father has committed all judgment to the Son. Note, He that is the Saviour, will be the Destroyer of those that reject the salvation.

2. That it was a strange punishment, Job 31. 3. Never was the like before or since. Hell was rained from Heaven upon them. Fire and brimstone, and a terrible tempest, this was the portion of their evil, Ps. 11. 6; not a flash of lightning, which is destructive enough, when God gives it commission, but a shower of lightning. Brimstone was scattered upon their habitation, Job. 18. 15, and then the fire seen fastened upon them. God could have drowned them, as he did the old world; but he would show that he has many arrows in his quiver, fire as well as water.

3. That it was a judgment that laid all waste; it overthrew the cities, and destroyed all the inhabitants of them, the plain, and all that grew upon the ground, v. 25. It was an utter ruin, and irreparable; that fruitful valley remains to this day a great lake, or dead sea; it is called the Salt Sea, Numb. 34. 12. Travellers say that it is about thirty miles long, and ten miles broad; it has no living creature in it; it is not moved by the wind; the smell of it is offensive; things do not easily sink in it. The fire of God, as well as the flood of water, forsook none of those things which it cast upon. Jordan falls into it, and is lost there.

4. That it was a punishment that answered to their sin. Burning lusts against nature were justly punished with this preternatural burning. They that went after strange flesh, were destroyed by strange fire, Jude 7. They persecuted the angels with their rabbles, and made Lot afraid; and now God persecuted them with his tempest, and made them afraid with his storm, Ps. 83. 15.

5. That it was designed for a standing revelation of the wrath of God against sin and sinners in all ages: it is, accordingly, often referred to in the scripture, and made a pattern of the ruin of Israel, Deut. 29. 23. of Babylon, Isa. 13. 19. of Edom, Jer. 49. 18. of Moab and Ammon, Zeph. 2. 9. Nay, it was typical of the vengeance of eternal fire, Jude 7, and the ruin of all such as live ungodly. 2 Pet. 2. 5. especially, that desolate the gospel, Matt. 10. 15. It is in allusion to this destruction, that the place of the damned is often represented by a lake that burns, as Sodom did, with fire and brimstone. Let us learn from it, (1.) The evil of sin, and the hurtful nature of it. Iniquity tends to ruin. (2.) The terror of the Lord. See what a fearful thing it is to fall into the hands of the living God!

26. But his wife looked back from behind him, and she became a pillar of salt.

This also is written for our admonition; our Saviour refers to it, Luke 17. 32. Remember Lot's wife. As by the example of Sodom, the wicked are warned to turn from their wickedness; so by the example of Lot's wife, the righteous are warned not to follow her example of impiety and unrighteousness. See Ezek. 3. 18, 20. We have here,

1. The sin of Lot's wife: she looked back from behind him. This seemed a small thing, but we are sure, by the punishment of it, that it was a great sin, and exceeding sinful. (1.) She disobeyed an express command, and so sinned after the similitude of Adam's transgression which ruined us all. (2.) She rebelled at the bottom of it; she questioned whether Sodom would be destroyed, and thought she still might have been safe in it. (3.) She looked back upon her neighbours whom she had left behind, with more concern than was fit, now that their day of grace was over, and Divine Justice was glorifying itself in their ruin. See Isa. 65. 24. (4.) Probably, she hankered after her house and goods in Sodom, and was loath to leave them. Christ intimates this to be her sin, Luke 17. 31, 32. She too much regarded her stuff. (5.) Her looking back bespoke an inclination to go back; and therefore our Saviour uses it as a warning against apostasy from our Christian profession. We have all renounced the world and the flesh, and have set our faces heavenward; we are in the plain, upon our probation; and it is at our peril, if we return into the interests we profess to have abandoned. Drawing back is to repentance, and looking back is towards it. Let us therefore fear, Heb. 4. 1.

2. The punishment of Lot's wife for this sin. She was struck dead in the place; yet her body did not fall down, but stood fixed and erect like a pillar or monument, not liable to waste or decay as human bodies exposed to the air are, but metamorphosed into a metallic substance which would last perpetually. Come, behold the goodness and severity of God: For if God spares not the natural man, (Rom. 1. 18.) how much less will he spare the sinner! Consider how the goodness of God is to be cherished, toward his wife that looked back, severity. Though she was nearly related to a righteous man, though better than her neighbours, and though a monument of distinguishing mercy in her deliverance out of Sodom, yet God did not connive at her disobedience; for great privileges will not secure us from the wrath of God, if we do not carefully and faithfully continue in them. The favor of God should season us. Since it is such a dangerous thing to look back, let us always press forward, Phil. 3. 13, 14.

27. And Abraham got up early in the morning to the place where he stood before the Lord: 28. And he looked toward Sodom and Gomorrah, and toward all the land of the plain, and beheld, and lo, the smoke of the country went up as the smoke of a furnace. 29. And it came to pass, when God destroyed the cities of the plain, that God remembered Abraham, and sent Lot out of the midst of the overthrow, when he overthrew the cities in which Lot dwelt.

Our communion with God consists in our gracious regard to him, and his gracious regard to us; we have here therefore the communion that was between God and Abraham, in the event concerning Sodom, as before, in the consultation concerning it; for communion with God is to be kept up in providences as well as in ordinances.

1. Here is Abraham's pious regard to God in this event, in two things; (1.) A careful expectation of the event, v. 27. He got up early to look toward Sodom; and, to intimate that his design herein was to see what became of his prayers, he went to the very place where he had stood before the Lord, and set himself there, as upon his watch-tower, Hab. 2.
1. Note, When we have prayed, we must look after our prayers, and observe the success of them; we must direct our prayer as a letter, and then look up for an answer; direct our prayer as an arrow, and then look up to see whether it reach the mark, Ps. 5. 3. Our inquiries after news must be in expectation of an answer to our prayers. (2.) An awful observation of it; he looked toward Sodom, (v. 28.) not as Lot’s wife did, tacitly reflecting upon the divine severity; but humbly adoring it, and acquiescing in it. Thus the saints, when they see the smoke of Babylon’s torment rising up for ever, (like Sodom’s here,) will say again and again, Alleluia, Rev. 19. 3. Those that have, in the day of grace, most earnestly interceded for sinners, will, in the day of judgment, be content to see them perish, and will glorify God in it.

2. Here is God’s favourable regard to Abraham, v. 29. As before, when Abraham prayed for Ishmael, God heard him for Isaac; so now, when he prayed for Sodom, he heard him for Lot. He remembered Abraham, and, for his sake, sent Lot out of the overthrow. Note, (1.) God will certainly give an answer of peace to the prayer of faith, in his own way and time; though, for a while, it seems to be forgotten, yet, sooner or later, it will appear to be remembered. (2.) The relations and friends of godly people fare the better for their interest in God, and intercessions with him; it was out of respect to Abraham that Lot was rescued: perhaps this word encouraged Moses long afterward to pray, Exod. 15. Lord, remember Abraham; and see Isa. 53. 11.

30. And Lot went up out of Zoar; and dwell in the mountain, and his two daughters with him; for he feared to dwell in Zoar: and he dwelt in a cave, he and his two daughters. 31. And the first-born said unto the younger, Our father is old, and there is not a man in the earth to come in unto us after the manner of all the earth. 32. Come, let us make our father drink wine, and we will lie with him, that we may preserve seed of our father. 33. And they made their father drink wine that night: and the first-born went in, and lay with her father; and he perceived not when she lay down, nor when she arose. 34. And it came to pass on the morrow, that the first-born said unto the younger, Behold, I lay yesternight with my father: let us make him drink wine this night also; and go thou in, and lie with him, that we may preserve seed of our father. 35. And they made their father drink wine that night also: and the younger arose, and lay with him; and he perceived not when she lay down, nor when she arose. 36. Thus were both the daughters of Lot with child by their father. 37. And the first-born bare a son, and called his name Moab: the same is the father of the Moabites unto this day. 38. And the younger, she also bare a son, and called his name Ben-ammi: the same is the father of the children of Ammon unto this day.

I. The great trouble and distress that Lot was brought into, after his deliverance, v. 30. 1. He was frightened out of Zoar, durst not dwell there; either, because he was conscious to himself that it was a refuge of his own choosing, and that therein he had foolishly prescribed to God, and therefore he could not but distrust his safety in it; or, because he found it as wicked as Sodom, and therefore concluded it could not long survive it; or, perhaps, he observed the rise and increase of those waters, which, after the conflagration, perhaps from Jordan, began to overflow the plain, and which, mixing with the ruins, by degrees made the Dead Sea; in those waters he concluded Zoar must needs perish (though it had escaped the fire,) because it stood upon the same flat. Note, Settlements and shelters of our own choosing, and in which we do not follow God, commonly prove uneasy to us. 2. He was forced to take himself to the mountain, and to take up with a cave for his habitation there. Methinks, it was strange that he did not return to Abraham, and put himself under his protection, to whom he had once and again owed his safety; but the truth is, there are some good men, that are not wise enough to know what is best for themselves. Observe, (1.) He was now glad to go to the mountain, the place which God had appointed for his shelter. Note, It is well, if disappointment in our way drive us at last to God’s way. (2.) He that, a while ago, could not find room enough for himself and his stock in the open land, he thinks now that he should justly be kept as far from him as he could, is now confined to a hole in a hill, where he has scarcely room to turn him, and there he is solitary and trembling. Note, It is just with God to reduce those to poverty and restraint, who have abused their liberty and plenty. See also in Lot what these bring themselves to, at last, that forsake the communion of saints for secular advantages; they will be beaten with their own rod.

II. The great sin that Lot and his daughters were guilty of, when they were in this desolate place. It is a sad story:

1. His daughters laid a very wicked plot to bring him to sin; and their’s was, doubtless the greater guilt. They contrived, under pretext of cheering up the spirits of their father in his present condition, to make him drunk, and then to lie with him, v. 30. 32. Some think that he was under a kind of a delusion, as far as he ought to have been; there was no natural inclination to it; and yet when he was con-need carefully to watch against the least evil thought of this kind, lest Satan get an advantage.

2. Lot himself, by his own folly and unwariness, was wretchedly overcome, and suffered himself so far to be imposed upon by his own children, as, two nights together, to be drunk, and to commit incest, v. 33, &c. Lord, what is man! What are the best of men, when God leaves them to themselves! See here, (1.) The peril of security; Lot, who, not only kept himself sober and chaste in Sodom, but was a constant mourner for the wickedness of the place, and a witness against it, is yet, in the mountain, where he was alone, and, as he thought, quite out of the way of temptation, thus shamefully overtake: let him therefore that thinks he stands, stands high, and stands firm, take heed lest he fall. No mountain, on this account, the hedge in the above, can set us out of the reach of Satan's fiery darts. (2.) The peril of drunkenness; it is not only a great sin itself, but it is the inlet of many sins; it may prove the inlet of the worst and most unnatural sins, which may be a perpetual wound and dishonour. Excellently does Mr. Herbert describe it,

"He that is drunken, may his Mother kill

A man may do that without reluctance, when he is drunken, which, when he is sober, he could not think of without horror. (3.) The peril of temptation from our dearest relations and friends, whom we love and esteem, and expect kindness from. Lot, whose temperance and chastity were impregnable against the batteries of foreign force, was surprised into sin and shame by the base treachery of his own daughters; we must dread a snare wherever we are, and be always upon our guard.

In the close, we have an account of the birth of the two sons, or grandsons, (call them which you will,) of Lot—Meab and Ammon, the fathers of two nations, neighbours to Israel, and which we often read of in the Old Testament; both together are called the children of Lot, Ps. 83. 8. Note, Though prosperous births may attend incestuous conceptions, yet they are so far from justifying them, that they rather perpetuate the reproach of them, and entail infamy upon posterity; yet the tribe of Judah, of which our Lord sprang, descended from such a birth, and Ruth, a Moabitess, has a name in his genealogy, Matt. 1. 3. 5.

Lastly, Observe that, after this, we never read any more of Lot, nor what became of him: no doubt he repented of his sin; and was pardoned; but from the story in which Abimelech restores Abraham his wife, forward, we may learn that drunkenness, as it makes men forgetful, so it makes them forgotten; and many a name, which otherwise might have been remembered with respect, is buried by it in contempt and oblivion.

CHAP. XX.

We are here returning to the story of Abraham; yet that part of it which is here recorded, is not to his honour. The fairest marbles have their flaws, and while there are spots in the sun, we must not expect anything spotless under it. The scripture, it should be remarked, is impartial in relating the blemishes even of its most celebrated characters. We have here, I. Abraham's sin in denying Abimelech's sin thereupon in taking her, v. 1, 2. II. God's discourse with Abimelech in a dream, upon this occasion, wherein he shows him his error, v. 3, accepts his plea, v. 4. 6., and directs him to return to the half-sister, v. 7. III. Abraham's discourse with Abimelech, wherein he chides him for the cheat he had put upon him, v. 8. 10, and Abraham excuses it as well as he can, v. 11. 13. IV. The good issue of the story in which Abimelech restores Abraham his wife, v. 14. 16, and Abraham, by prayer, prevails with God for the removal of the judgment Abimelech was under, v. 17. 18.

1. AND Abraham journeyed from thence toward the south country, and dwelt between Kadesh and Shur, and sojourned in Gerar. 2. And Abraham said of Sarah his wife, She is my sister: and Abimelech king of Gerar sent, and took Sarah.

Here is,

1. Abraham's remove from Mamre, where he had lived near twenty years, into the country of the Philistines, v. 1. He sojourned in Gerar. We are not told upon what occasion he removed, whether terrified by the destruction of Sodom; or, because the country round was, for the present, preferable to that; or, as some of the Jewish writers say, because he was grieved at Lot's incest with his daughters, and the reproach which the Canaanites cast upon him and his religion, for his kinman's sake: doubtless, there was some good cause for his removal. Note, (1.) In a world where we are strangers and pilgrims, we cannot expect to be always in the same place. (2.) Wherever we are, we must think upon ourselves but as sojourners.

2. His sin in denying his wife as before, v. 12, 13, which was not only in itself such an equivocation as bordered upon a lie, and which, if admitted as lawful, would be the ruin of human converse, and an inlet to all falsehood; but was also an exposing of the chastity and honour of his wife, which he ought to have been the protector of. But besides this, it had here a two-fold aggravation, (1.) That he had been guilty of the same sin before, and had been reproved for it, and convinced of the folly of the suggestion which induced him to it; yet he returns to it. Note, It is possible that a good man may not only fall into sin, but relapse into the same sin, through the surprise and strength of temptation, and the infirmity of the flesh. Let backsliders repent then, but not despair, Jer. 3. 22. (2.) That Sarah, as it should seem, was now the child of the promised seed, or, at least, in expectation of being so quickly, according to the word of God; he ought therefore to have taken particular care of her now, as Judg. 13. 4.

3. The peril that Sarah was brought into by this means; The king of Gerar sent, and took her to his house, in order to take her to his bed. Note, The sin of one often occasions the sin of others; he that breaks the hedge of God's commandments, opens a gap to his enemies; or as some of the writers say, as the beginning of sin is as the letting forth of water.

3. But God came to Abimelech in a dream by night, and said to him, Behold, thou art but a dead man, for the woman which thou hast taken; for she is a man's wife. 4. But Abimelech had not come near her; and he said, Lord, wilt thou slay also a righteous nation? 5. Said he not unto me, She is my sister? And she, even she herself, said, He is my brother: In the integrity of my heart, and innocency of my hands, have I done this. 6. And God said unto him in a dream, Yea, I know that thou didst this in the integrity of thy heart; for I also withheld thee from sinning against me: therefore suffered I thee not to touch her. 7. Now therefore restore the man his wife; for he is a prophet, and he shall pray for thee, and thou shalt live: and if thou re store her not, know thou that thou shalt surely die, thou, and all that are thine.

It appears by this, that God revealed himself by dreams, (which evidenced themselves to be divine and supernatural,) not only to his servants, the prophets, but even to those who were out of the pale of the church and covenant; but then, usually it was with some regard to God's own people, as in Pharaoh's dream, to Joseph, in Nebuchadnezzar's, to Daniel, and here in Abimelech's, to Abraham and Sarah, for he reproved this king for the r'sake, Ps. 105. 15.

I. God gives him notice of his danger, (v. 3.) his danger of sin; telling him that the woman was a man's wife, so that if he take her, he wrongs her husband; his danger of death for this sin, Thou art a dead man; and God's saying so of a man, makes him so. Note, Every wilful sinner ought to be told that he is a dead man. As the condemned malefactor, and the patient whose disease is mortal, are said to be so: If thou art a bad man, certainly thou art a dead man.

II. He pleads ignorance, (v. 4, 5.) that Abraham and Sarah had agreed to impose upon him, and not to let him know that they were any more than brother and sister. See what confidence a man may have toward God, when his heart condemns him not, 1 John 3. 21. If our consciences witness to our integrity, we may have been cheated into a snare, we have not, knowingly and willingly sinned against God, it will be our rejoicing in the day of evil. He pleads with God as Abraham had done, ch. 18. 25, Will thou slay a righteous nation? Not such a nation as Sodom, which was indeed justly destroyed, but a nation which, in this matter, was innocent.

III. God gives a very full answer to what he had said.

1. He allows his plea, and admits that what he did, he did in the integrity of his heart, v. 6. Yea, I know it. Note, It is matter of comfort to those that are honest, that God knows their honesty, and will acknowledge it, though perhaps men that are prejudiced against them, either cannot be convinced of it, or will not own that they are.

2. He lets him know that he was kept from proceeding in the sin, merely by the good hand of God upon him. I withheld thee from sinning against me. Abimelech was hereby kept from doing wrong, Abraham from suffering wrong, and Sarah from both. Note, (1.) There is a great deal of sin devised and designed, that is never executed. As bad as things are in the world, they are not so bad as the Devil and wicked men would have them. (2.) It is God that restrains men from doing the ill they would do; it is not from him that there is sin, but it is from him that there is not more sin, either by his influence upon men's minds, checking their inclination to sin, or by his providence, taking away the opportunity to sin. (3.) It is a great mercy to be hindered from committing sin; of this God must have the glory, whoever is the instrument, 1 Sam. 25. 32. 33.

3. He charges him to make restitution, v. 7. Now therefore, now that thou art better informed, restore the man his wife. Note, Ignorance will excuse no longer than it continues; if we ignorantly did wrong, that will not excuse us, if we knowingly persist in it, Lev. 5. 3. 5. The reasons why he must be just and Kind to Abraham, are, (1.) Because he is a prophet, near and dear to God, for whom God does in a particular manner concern himself. God highly resents the injuries done to his prophets, and takes them as done to himself. (2.) Being a prophet, he shall pray for thee; that is a prophet's reward, and a good reward it is. It is intimated that there was great efficacy in the prayers of a prophet, and that good men should be ready to help those with their prayers, that stand in need of them, and should make, at least, this return, for the kindnesses that are done them. Abraham was accessory to Abimelech's trouble, and therefore was obliged in justice to pray for him. (3.) It is at thy peril, if thou do not restore her; know thou that thou shalt surely die. Note, Sin that doth wrong, whoever he is, prince or peasant, shall certainly receive the wrong which he has done, unless he repent and make restitution, Col. 3. 25. No injustice can be made passable with God, no not by Casar's image stamped upon it.

8. Therefore Abimelech rose early in the morning, and called all his servants, and told all these things in their ears: and the men were sore afraid. 9. Then Abimelech called Abraham, and said unto him, What hast thou done unto us? And what have I offended thee, that thou hast brought upon me, and on my kingdom, a great sin? 'Thou hast done deeds unto me that ought not to be done. 10. And Abimelech said unto Abraham, What sawest thou, that thou hast done this thing? 11. And Abraham said, Because I thought, Surely the fear of God is not in this place; and they will slay me for my wife's sake. 12. And yet indeed she is my sister; she is the daughter of my father, but not the daughter of my mother; and she became my wife. 13. And it came to pass, when God caused me to wander from my father's house, that I said unto her. This is thy kindness which thou shalt show unto me: at every place whither we shall come, say of me, He is my brother. Abimelech, being thus warned of God in a dream, takes the warning, and, as one truly afraid of sin and its consequences, he rises early to pursue the directions given him.

I. He has a care for his servants; (v. 8.) Abraham himself could not be more careful than he was, to command his household in this matter. Note, Those whom God has convinced of sin and danger, ought to tell others what God has done for their souls, that they also may be awakened, and brought to a like holy fear.

II. He has a chiding for Abraham. Observe, 1. The serious reproof which Abimelech gave to Abraham, v. 9, 10. His reasoning with Abraham upon this occasion was strong, and yet very mild. Nothing could be said better; he does not reproach him, nor insult over him; does not say, "Is this your profession? I see, though you will not swear, you will lie. If these be prophets, I will beg to be freed from the sight of them;" but he fairly represents the injury Abraham had done him, and calmly signifies his punishment of it. (1.) He says that sin which he now found that he had been in danger of, a great sin. Note, Even the light of nature teaches men that the sin of adultery is a very great sin: be it observed, to the shame of many who call themselves Christians, and yet make a light matter of it. (2.) He looks upon it, that both himself and his kingdom would have been exposed to the wrath of God, if he had been guilty of that sin, though it greatly. Note, The sins of kings often prove the plagues of kingdoms; rulers should therefore, for their people's sake, dread sin. (3.) He charges Abraham with doing that which was not justifiable, in disowning his marriage; this he speaks of justly, and yet tenderly; he does not call him a liar and cheat; but tells him he had done deeds that ought not to be done. Note, Equivocation and dissimulation, however it may be palliated, are very bad things, and by no means to be admitted in any case.

(4.) He tells him it was a very great injury to himself and his family, that Abraham should take the liberty to say to them: "Have I offended thee? If I had been thy worst enemy, thou couldst not have done me a worse turn, nor taken a more effectual course to be avenged on me." Note, We ought to reckon that those do us the greatest unkindness in the world, that any ways tempt or expose us to sin, though they may pretend friendship, and offer that which is grateful enough to the corrupt nature.

(5.) He challenges him to assign a cause for his suspicion, as he calls it, of the fear of that thing, and then they will slay me." [1.] Little good is to be expected there, where no fear of God is: see Ps. 36. 1. [2.] There are many places and persons, that are because of the fear of that thing in them, that do not think they have: perhaps they are not called by our dividing name, they do not wear our judged, they do not tie themselves to that which we have an opinion of; and therefore we conclude they have not the fear of God in their hearts, which is very injurious both to Christ and Christians, and makes us obnoxious to God's judgment, Matt. 7. 1. [3.] Unhassitableness and censoriousness are sins that are because of the fear of other sins. When we have once persuaded ourselves concerning such and such, that they have not the fear of God, they think that will justify them in the most unjust and unchristian practices toward them. Men would not do ill, if they did not first think ill.

(2.) He excused it from the guilt of a downright sin, by making it out, that, in a sense, she was his sister; v. 12. Some think she was own sister to Lot, who was the son of his brother Lot, ch. 14. 16. Though it was his nephew, so Sarah is called his sister. But to whom he said, She is my sister, understood that she was so his sister, as not to be capable of being his wife; so that it was an equivocation, with an intent to deceive.

(3.) He clears himself from the imputation of an affront designed to Abimelech in it, by alleging that it had been his practice before, according to an agreement between him and his wife, when they first became sojourners, v. 15. "When God caused me to wander from my father's house, then we settled this matter." Note, [1.] God is to be acknowledged in all our wanderings. [2.] These that travel abroad, and converse much with strangers, as they have need of the wisdom of the serpent, so it is requisite that that wisdom be ever tempered with the innocence of the dove. It may, for such I know, be a comfort to God's people, and Sarah the blessing of children so long, to punish them for this sinful compact which they had made, to deny one another; if they will not own their marriage, why should God own it? But we may suppose that, after this reproof which Abimelech gave them, they agreed never to do so again, and then presently we read, ch. 21. 1, 2, that Sarah conceived.

14. And Abimelech took sheep, and oxen, and men servants, and women servants, and gave them unto Abraham, and restored him Sarah his wife. 15. And Abimelech said, Behold, my land is as before thee: dwell where it pleaseth thee. 16. And unto Sarah he said, Behold, I have given thy brother a thousand pieces of silver: behold, he is to thee a covering of the eyes, unto all that are with thee, and with all other: thus was she reproved. 17. So Abraham prayed unto God: and God healed Abimelech, and his wife, and his maid servants; and they bare children. 18. For the Lord had fast closed up all the wombs of the house of Abimelech, because of Sarah Abraham's wife.

1. The kindness of a prince, which Abimelech showed to Abraham. See how unjust Abraham's jealousies were; he fancied that if they knew that Sarah was his wife, they would kill him; but, instead of that, when they did know, they were kind to him, frightened at least to be so, by the divine reproofs they were under. [1.] He gives him his royal licence to dwell where he pleased in his country; curtailing his stay, because he saw that God was with him, v. 15. [2.] He gives him his royal gifts, v. 14, sheep and oxen, and v. 16, a thousand pieces of silver. This he gave when he restored Sarah, either, [1.] By way of satisfaction for the wrong he had offered to do, in taking her to his house; when the Philistines restored the Ark, being placated for detaining it, they sent a present with it. The law appointed, that when restitution was made, something should be added to it, Lev. 6. 5. Or, [2.] To engage Abraham's prayers for him; not as if prayers should be bought and sold; but these, whose spiritual things we reap of, we should endeavour to be kind to, 1 Cor. 9. 11. Note, It is our wisdom to get and keep an interest with these that have an interest in heaven; and to make these our friends, as they are the friends of God. [3.] He gives to Sarah good instruction, tells her that her husband (her brother, he calls him, to upbraid her with calling him so) must be to her for a covering of the eyes, that is, she must look at no other, nor desire to be looked at by any other. Note, Yekefeftows must be to each other for a covering of the eyes. The marriage-covenant is a covenant with the eyes, like Jeb's, ch. 51. 1.

2. The kindness of a prophet, which Abraham showed to Abimelech; he prayed for him, v. 17, 18. This honour God would put upon Abraham, that though Abimelech had restored Sarah, yet the judgment he was under should be removed upon the prayer of Abraham, and not before. Thus God healed Miriam, when Mesees, when she had most affronted, prayed for her, Num. 12. 13, and was reconciled to Job's friends, when Job, whom they had previously reproved for, (Job 44. 8. 10.) and so did, as it were, give it under his hand, that he was reconciled to them. Note, The prayers of good men may be a kindness to great men, and ought to be valued.

CHAP. XXI.

In this chapter, we have, I. Isaac, the child of promise, born into Abraham's family, v. 1. 8. II. Ishmael, the son of the bond-woman, cast out of it, v. 9. 21. 111. Abraham's league with his neighbour Abimelech, v. 22 ... 32. IV. His devotion to his God, v. 33, 34.

1. AND the Lord visited Sarah as he had said, and the Lord did unto Sarah as he had spoken. 2. For Sarah conceived, and bare Abraham a son in his old age, at the set time of which God had spoken to him. 3. And Abraham called the name of his son that was born unto him, whom Sarah bare to him, Isaac. 4. And Abraham circumcised his son Isaac being eight days old, as God had commanded him. 5. And Abraham was an hundred years old, when his son Isaac was born unto him. 6. And Sarah said, God hath made me to laugh, so that all that hear shall laugh with me. 7. And she said, Who would have said unto Abraham, that Sarah should have given children suck! for I have born him a son in his old age. 8. And the child grew, and was weaned: and Abraham made a great feast the same day that Isaac was weaned.

Long looked for comes at last. The vision concerning the promised seed is for an appointed time, and now at an end, it speaks, and does not lie; few under the Old Testament were brought into the world with such expectation as Isaac was; not for the sake of any great personal eminence at which he was to arrive, but because he was to be, in this very thing, a type of Christ, that Seed which the holy God so long promised, and holy men so long expected. In this account of the first days of Isaac, we may observe,

1. The fulfilling of God's promise in the conception and birth of Isaac. v. 1, 2. Note, God's providence took him, and brightened him, when they are compared with his word, and when we observe how God in them all, acts as he has said, as he has spoken. 1. Isaac was born according to the promise. The Lord visited Sarah in mercy, as he had said. Note, No word of God shall fall to the ground; for he is faithful that has promised, and God's faithfulness is the stay and support of his people's faith. He was born at the set time in which God had spoken to him; v. 2. Note, God is always punctual in time; though his promised mercies come not at the time we set, they will certainly come at the time that He sets, and that is the best time. 2. He was born by virtue of the promise; Sarah by faith received strength to conceive, Heb. 11. 11. God therefore, by promise, gave that strength. It was not by the power of common providence, but by the power of a special promise, that Isaac was born. for sentence of death, as it were, passed upon the second causes; Abraham was old, and Sarah old, and both as good as dead; and then the word of God took place. Note, True believers, by virtue of God's promises, are enabled to do that which is above the power of human nature, for by them they partake of a divine nature, 2 Pet. 1. 4.

II. Abraham's obedience to the precept concerning Isaac. 1. He named him, as God commanded him, v. 3. God directed him to name him for a memorial, Isaac, laughter; and Abraham, whose office it was, gave him that name, though he might have designed him some other name of a more pompos signification. Note, It is fit that the luxuriancy of human invention should always yield to the sovereignty and plainness of divine institution; yet there was good reason for the name. 1. When Abraham received the promise of him, he laughed for joy, ch. 17. 17. Note, When the sun of comfort is risen upon the soul, it is good to remember how welcome the dawning of the day was, and with what exultation we embraced the promise. (2.) When Sarah received the promise, she laughed with dishonour, and with a profane disdain. When God gives us the mercies he began to descend, we should remember with sorrow and shame our sinful distrusts of God's power and promise, when we were in pursuit of them. (3.) Isaac was himself, afterward, laughed at by Ishmael, v. 9, and perhaps his name bid him expect it. Note, God's favourites are of the world's laughing-stocks. (4.) The promise which he was, not only the son, but the heir, was to be the joy of all ages, and that which would fill their mouths with laughter. 2. He circumcised him, v. 4. The covenant being established with him, the seal of the covenant was administered to him: and though a bloody ordinance, and he a darling, yet it must not be omitted; nor, nor deferred beyond the eighth day. God had kept time in performing the promise, and therefore Abraham must keep time in obeying the precept.

III. The impressions which this mercy made upon Sarah, v. 1. It filled her with joy, v. 6. "God has made me to laugh; he has given me both cause to rejoice, and a heart to rejoice." Thus the mother of our Lord, Luke 1. 46, 47. Note, (1.) God bestows mercies upon his people to encourage their joy in his work and service: and whatever is the matter of our joy, God must be acknowledged as the Author of it; and God be praised for the laughter of the fool. (2.) When mercies have been long deferred, they are the more welcome when they come. (3.) It adds to the comforts of any mercy, to have our friends rejoice with us in it. See Luke 1. 58. They that hear us, will laugh with me: for laughing is catching. Others would rejoice in this instance of God's power and goodness, and be encouraged to trust in him. See Ps. 119. 74.

2. It filled her with wonder, v. 7. Observe here, (1.) What it was she thought so wonderful, that Sarah should give children suck, that she should not only bear a child, but be so strong and hearty at that age, as to give it suck. Note, Mothers, if they be able, ought to be nurses to their own children. Sarah was a person of quality; was aged; nursing might be prejudicial either to herself, or to the child, or to both; she had courage of jugulars, so doubtful, in her own family; and yet she would do her duty in this matter; and her daughters the good wives are, while they thus do well, 1 Pet. 3. 5. 6. See Lam. 4. 3. (2.) How she expressed her wonder, "Who would have said it!" The thing was so highly improbable, so near to impossible, that if any one but God had said it, we could not have believed it. Note, God's favours to his covenant people are such as cannot be known by other's thoughts and expectations; who could imagine that God should do so much for these that deserve so little, nay, for those that deserve so ill? See Eph. 3. 20. 2 Sam. 7. 18, 19. Who would have said that God should send his Son to die for us, his Spirit to sanctify us, his angels to attend us? Who would have said that such great sins should be pardoned, such mean services accepted, and such worthless persons taken into covenant and communion with the great and holy God?

IV. A short account of Isaac's infancy, v. 8. The child grew; special notice is taken of this, though a thing of course, to intimate that the children of the promise are growing children; See Luke 1. 80. 2. 40. They that are born of God, shall increase more and more with the increase of God, Col. 2. 10. Eve, also, so as not always to nurse milk, but was able to bear strong meat, and then was weaned: See Heb. 5. 13, 14. And then it was that Abraham made a great feast for his friends and neighbours, in thankfulness to God for his mercy to him. He made this feast, not on the day that Isaac was born, that would have been too great a disturbance to Sarah; nor on the day that he was circumcised, that would have been too great a diversion from the religious character of the feast. But it was on the day that he was weaned, because God's blessing upon the bringing up of children, and the preservation of them through the perils of the infant-age, are signal instances of the care and tenderness of the Divine Providence, which ought to be acknowledged, to its praise: see Ps. 22. 9, 10. Hos. 11. 1, 2.

9. And Sarah saw the son of Hagar the Egyptian, which she had born unto Abraham, mocking. 10. Wherefore she said unto Abraham, Cast out this bond-woman, and her son: for the son of this bond-woman shall not be heir with my son, even with Isaac. 11. And the thing was very grievous in Abraham's sight because of his son. 12. And God said unto Abraham, Let it not be grievous in thy sight because of the lad, and because of thy bond-woman; in all that Sarah hath said unto thee, hearken unto her voice; for in Isaac shall thy seed be called. 13. And also of the son of the bond-woman will I make a nation, because he is thy seed.

I. Ishmael himself gave the occasion, by some affronts he gave to Isaac his little brother; some think, on the day that Abraham made the feast, for joy that Isaac was safely weaned, which, the Jews say, was not till he was three years old; others say, five. Sarah herself was an eye-witness of the abuse; she saw the son of the Egyptian, mocking v. 9, mocking Isaac, no doubt, for it is said, with reference to this, Gal. 4. 29, that he that was born after the flesh, persecuted him that was born after the Spirit. Ishmael is here called the son of the Egyptian, because, as some think, the 400 years' affliction of the seed of Abraham by the Egyptians began now, and was to be dated from hence, ch. 15. 13. She saw him playing with Isaac, so the LXX. and, in play, mocking him. Ishmael was fourteen years older than Isaac; and when children are together, the elder should be careful and tender of the younger: but it argued a very base and sordid disposition in Ishmael, to be abusive to a child that was no way a match for him. Note. 1. God takes notice of what children say and do in their play: and will reckon with them, if they say or do amiss, though their parents do not. 2. Mocking is a great sin, and ignorance thereof, to the root thereof is rooted remaining enmity in the seed of the serpent against the Seed of the woman. The children of promise must expect to be mocked. This is persecution which they that live godly, must count upon. 4. None are rejected and cast out from God, but those who have first refused it; Ishmael is continued in Abraham's family, till he becomes a disturbance, grief, and scandal to it.

II. Sarah made the motion, v. 10. Cast out this bond-woman. This seems to be spoken in some heat, yet it is quoted, Gal. 4. 30, as if it had been spoken by a spirit of prophecy; and it is the sentence passed on all hypocrites and carnal people, though they have a place and name in the visible church; all that are cast out of the church and not born again, that rest in the law and reject the gospel, shall certainly be cast out. It is made to point particularly at the rejection of the unbelieving Jews, who, though they were the seed of Abraham, yet because they submitted not to the gospel-covenant, were unchurched and disfranchised: and that which, above any thing, provoked God to cast them off, was the unfruitfulness and persecuting of the gospel-church, God's Isaac, in its infancy, 1 Thess. 2. 16. Note, There are many who are unwillingly conversant with the children of God in this world, and yet shall not partake with them in the inheritance of sons. Ishmael might be Isaac's play-fellow and school-fellow, yet not his fellow-heir.

III. Abraham was averse to it, v. 11. The thing was very grievous in Abraham's sight. 1. It grieved him that Ishmael had given such a provocation. Note. Children ought to consider that the more their parents love them, the more they are grieved at their misconduct, and particularly their quarrels among themselves. 2. It grieved him that Sarah insisted upon such a punishment. "Might it not suffice to correct him; would nothing less serve than to expel him?" Note, Even the needful extremities which must be used with wicked and incorrigible children are grievous to tender parents, who cannot thus inflict willingly.

IV. God determined it. v. 12, 13. We may well suppose Abraham to be greatly agitated about this matter; leath to displease Sarah, and yet loath to expel Ishmael; in this difficulty, God tells him what his will was, and then he is satisfied. Note. A good man desires no more in doubtful cases than to know his duty, and what God would have him do; and when he is clear in that, he is, or should be. easy, to make Abraham to see, God sets this matter before him in a true light, and shows him, 1. That casting out of Ishmael was necessary to the establishment of Isaac in the rights and privileges of the covenant. In Isaac shall thy seed be called: both Christ and the church must descend from Abraham through the loins of Isaac: this is the entail of the promise upon Isaac, and is quoted by the apostle, (Rom. 9. 7-9,) to show that not all who came from Abraham's loins, were in the blessings of the covenant. Isaac, the promised son, must be the father of the promised seed; therefore, "Away with Ishmael, send him for enough, lest he corrupt the manners, or attempt to invade the rights of Isaac." It will be his security to have his rival banished. The covenant-seed of Abraham must be a peculiar people, a people by themselves, from the very first distinguished, not mingled with those that were out of covenant. He was resolved, Isaac must be separated. Abraham was called Abraham, because Isaac must be. See Isa. 51. 2. It is probable that Sarah little thought of this, (John 11. 51,) but God took what she said, and turned it into an oracle, as afterward, ch. 27. 10. 2. That the casting out of Ishmael should not be his ruin, v. 13. He shall be a nation, because he is thy seed. We are not sure that it was his eternal ruin; it is presumption to say that all the children of true external dispensation of God's covenant, are therefore excluded from all his mercies: those may be saved, who are not thus honoured. However, we are sure it was not his temporal ruin. Though he was chased out of the church, he was not chased out of the world. I will make him a nation. Note. (1.) Nations are of God's making; he founds them, he forms them, he fixes them. (2.) Many are full of the blessings of God's providence, that are strangers to the blessings of his covenant. (3.) The children of this world often fared the better, as to outward things, for their relation to the children of God.

14. And Abraham rose up early in the morning, and took bread, and a bottle of water, and gave it unto Hagar, putting it on her shoulder, and the child, and sent her away: and she departed, and wandered in the wilderness of Beer-sheba. 15. And the water was spent in the bottle, and she cast the child under one of the shrubs. 16. And she went, and sat her down over against him a good way off, as it were a bow-shot: for she said, Let me not see the death of the child. And she sat over against him, and lift up her voice, and wept. 17. And God heard the voice of the lad; and the angel of God called to Hagar out of heaven, and said unto her, What aileth thee, Hagar? Fear not; for God hath heard the voice of the lad where he is. 18. Arise, lift up the lad, and hold him in thine hand; for I will make him a great nation. 19. And God opened her eyes, and she saw a well of water; and she went, and filled the bottle with water, and gave the lad drink. 20. And God was with the lad; and he grew, and dwelt in the wilderness, and became an archer. 21. And he dwelt in the wilderness of Paran: and his mother took him a wife out of the land of Egypt.

1. The casting out of the bond-woman and her son from the family of Abraham, v. 14. Abraham's obedience to the divine command in this matter was speedy; early in the morning, we may suppose immediately after he had, in the night's visions, received orders to do this. It was also submissive; it was contrary to his judgment, at least, to his own inclination, to do it; yet as soon as he perceives that it is the mind of God, he makes no objections, but silently does as he is bid, as one trained up to an implicit obedience. In sending them away without any attendants, on foot, and slenderly provided for, it is probable that he observed the directions given him. If Hagar and Ishmael had conducted themselves well in Abraham's family, they might have continued there; but they threw themselves out by their own pride and insolence, which were thus justly chastised. Note, By abusing our privileges, we forfeit them. Those that know not when they are well off in such a desirable place as Abraham's family, deserve to be cashiered, and to be made to know the worth of mercies by the want of them.

II. Their wandering in the wilderness, missing their way to the place Abraham designed them for a settlement.

1. They were reduced to great distress there; their provisions were spent, and Ishmael was sick; he that used to be full fed in Abraham's house, where he waxed fat and kicked, now fainted and sunk, when he was brought to short allowance. Hagar is in tears, and sufficiently mortified; now she wishes for the crumbs she had wasted, and made light of, at her master's table; like one under the power of the spirit of bondage, she despairs of relief, counts upon nothing but the death of the child. (v. 15, 16,) though God had told her, before he was born, that he should live to be a man, a great man. We are apt to forget former promises, when present providences seem to contradict them; for we live by sense.

2. In this distress, God graciously appeared for their relief; he heard the voice of the lad, v. 17. We read not of a word he said; but his sighs, and groans, and calamitous state, cried loud in the ears of mercy. An angel was sent to comfort Hagar, and, with her consent, the child was redeemed from the first time of his distress. God's comforts in a wilderness; she had thankfully acknowledged the former kind visit which God made her in such a case, ch. 16. 13, and therefore God now visited her again with seasonable succours. (1.) The angel assures her of the cognizance God took of her distress; God has heard the voice of the lad where he is, though he is in a wilderness; for wherever we are, there is a way open heavenward; therefore lift up the lad, and hold him in thy hand, v. 18. Note, God's readiness to help us when we are in trouble, must not slacken, but quicken, our endeavours to help ourselves. (2.) He repeats the promise concerning her son, that he should be a great nation, as a reason why she should bestir herself to help him. Note, It should engage our care and pains about children and young people, to consider that we know not what God has determined for them; nor what they may make of them. (3.) He directs her to a present supply, v. 19, he opened her eyes, which were swollen, and almost blinded, with weeping; and then she saw a well of water. Note, Many that have reason enough to be comforted, go mourning from day to day, because they do not see the reason they have for comfort. There is a well of water by them in the covenant of grace, but they are not aware of it; they have not the benefit of it, till the same God that opened their eyes to see their wound, opens them to see their remedy, John 15, 6, 7. Now the apostle tells us, that those things concerning Hagar and Ishmael are allegorized, Gal. 4. 24, they are to be allegorized; this will serve to illustrate the folly of these, (1.) Who like the unbelieving Jews, seek for righteousness by the law and the carnal ordinances of it, and not by the promise of grace; they do not partake of the same God that opened their eyes to see their wound, and hence they are undone. (2.) Their folly also, who seek for satisfaction and happiness in the world and the things of it. Those that forsake the comforts of the covenant and communion with God, and choose their portion in this earth, take up with a bottle of water, poor and slender provision, and that, soon spent; they wander endlessly in pursuit of satisfaction, and, at length, sit down short of it.

III. The settlement of Ishmael, at last, in the wilderness of Paran, v. 20, 21, a wild place, fittest for a wild man; and such an one he was, ch. 16. 12. They that are born after the flesh, take up with the wilderness of this world, while the children of the promise aim at the heavenly Canaan, and cannot be at rest till they are there. Observe, 1. He had some tokens of God's presence, God was with the lad; his outward prosperity was owing to this. 2. By trade he was an archer, which intimates that craft was his excellency, and sprit his business; rejecting Esau was a cunning hunter. 3. He matched among his mother's relations; he took him a wife out of Egypt, as a great archer as he was; he did not think he took his aim well in the business of marriage, if he proceeded without his mother's advice and consent.

22. And it came to pass at that time, that Abimelech, and Phichol the chief captain of his host, spake unto Abraham, saying, God is with thee in all that thou doest. 23. Now therefore swear unto me here by God, that thou wilt not deal falsely with me, nor with my son, nor with my son's son: but according to the kindness that I have done unto thee, thou shalt do unto me, and to the land wherein thou hast sojourned. 24. And Abraham said, I will swear. 25. And Abraham reproved Abimelech, because of a well of water, which Abimelech's servants had violently taken away. 26. And Abimelech said, I wot not who hath done this thing: neither didst thou tell me, neither yet heard I of it but to-day. 27. And Abraham took sheep and oxen, and gave them unto Abimelech: and both of them made a covenant. 28. And Abraham set seven ewe-lambs of the flock by themselves. 29. And Abimelech said unto Abraham, What mean these seven ewe-lambs, which thou hast set by themselves? 30. And he said, For these seven ewe-lambs shalt thou take of my hand, that they may be a witness unto me, that I have digged this well. 31. Wherefore he called that place Beer-sheba: because there they sware both of them. 32. Thus they made a covenant at Beer-sheba: then Abimelech rose up, and Phichol he chief captain of his host, and they returned into the land of the Philistines.

We have here an account of the treaty between Abimelech and Abraham, in which appears the accomplishment of that promise, ch. 12. 2, that God would make his name great. His friendship is valued, is courted, though a stranger, though a tenant indeed of Canaan, but not an inhabitant, as in the former parts of this book.

I. The league is proposed by Abimelech, and Phichol his prime-minister of state, and general of his army. 1. The inducement to it was God's favour to Abraham, v. 22. "God is with thee in all thou doest, and we cannot but take notice of it." Note, (1.) God in his providence sometimes shows his people such tokens for good, that their neighbours cannot but take notice of it, Ps. 86. 17. Their affairs do so visibly prosper, and they have such remarkable success in their undertakings, that a confession is extorted from all about them, of God's presence with them. (2.) It is good being in favour with those that are in favour with God, and having an interest in them that have an interest in heaven, Zech. 8. 23. We will go with you, for we have heard that God is with you. We do well for ourselves, if we have fellowship with those that have fellowship with God, 1 John 1. 3. 2. The tenor of it was, in general, that there should be a firm and constant friendship between the two families, which should not upon any account be violated. This bond of friendship must be strengthened by the bond of an oath, in which the true God was appealed to, both as a Witness of their sincerity, and an Avenger, in case either side were treacherous, v. 23. Observe, (1.) He desires the entail of this league upon his posterity, and the extent of it to his people. He would have his son, and his son's son, and his land likewise, to have the benefit of it. Good men should secure an alliance and communion with the favourites of heaven, not for themselves only, but for their's also. (2.) He reminds Abraham of the fair treatment he had found among them, according to the kindness I have done unto thee. As those that have received kindness, must return it, so those that have showed kindness, may expect it.

II. It is consented to by Abraham, with a particular clause inserted about a well. In Abraham's part of this transaction, 1. He was ready to enter into this league with Abimelech, finding him to be a man of honour and conscience, and that he had the fear of God before his eyes, v. 24. I will swear. Note, (1.) Religion does not make men morose and uncontrollable; I am sure it ought not; we must not, under colour of shunning bad company, be sour to all company, and jealous of everyone. (2.) An honest mind does not startle at giving assurances: if Abraham say that he will be true to Abimelech, he is not afraid to swear it: an oath is for confirmation. 2. He prudently settled the matter concerning a well, which Abimelech's servants had quarrelled with Abraham about. Wells of water, it seems, were choice goods in that country; thanks be to God, that they are not so scarce in our's. (1.) Abraham mildly said Abimelech of it, v. 25. Note, If our brother trespass against us, we must, with the meekness of wisdom, tell him his fault, that the matter may be faithfully accommodated, and an end made of it, Matt. 18. 15. (2.) He acquiesced in Abimelech's justification of himself in this matter, v. 26. I wot not who has done this thing. Many are suspected of injustice and unkindness, that are perfectly innocent, which we ought to be glad to be convinced of: the faults of servants must not be imputed to their masters, unless they know of them, and justify them; and no more can be expected from an honest man, than that he be ready to do right, as soon as he knows that he has done wrong. (3.) He took care to have his title to the well cleared and confirmed, to prevent any disputes or quarrels for the future, v. 30. It is justice, as well as wisdom, to do thus, in perpetuum rei memoriam—that the circumstance may be perpetually remembered. 3. He made a very handsome present to Abimelech, v. 27. It was not any thing curious or fine that he presented to him, but that which was valuable and useful, sheep and oxen, in gratitude for Abimelech's kindness to him, and in token of hearty friendship between them: the interchange of kind offices is the improving of love; that which is mine, is my friend's. 4. He ratified the covenant by an oath, and registered it by giving a new name to the place, v. 31. Beer-sheba, the well of the oath, in remembrance of the covenant they swore to, that they might be ever careful of it; or, the well of seven, in remembrance of the seven lambs given to Abimelech, as a consideration for his confirming Abraham' title to that well. Note, Bargains made, must be remembered, that we may make them good, and may not break our word through oversight.

33. And Abraham planted a grove in Beer-sheba, and called there on the name of the Lord, the everlasting God. 34. And Abraham sojourned in the Philistines' land many days.

Observe, 1. Abraham, being got into a good neighbourlyhood, knew when he was well off, and continued a great while there: there he planted a grove for a shade to his tent, or perhaps an orchard for fruit trees and vines, though we cannot say, for God would have him, while he lived, to be a stranger and a pilgrim; yet he sojourned many days, as many as would consist with his character, as Abraham the Hebrew, or passenger.
2. There he made not only a constant practice, but an open profession of his religion. There he called on the name of the Lord, the everlasting God, probably, in the grove he planted, which was his oratory or house of prayer. Christ prayed in a garden, on a mountain. (1.) Abraham kept up public worship, to which, probably, his neighbours resorted, that they might join with him. Note, Good men should not only retain their goodness wherever they go, but do all they can to propagate it, and make others good. (2.) In calling on the Lord, we must cry him as the everlasting God, the God of the world; so some. Though God had made himself known to Abraham as his God in particular, and in covenant with him, yet he forgets not to give glory to him as the Lord of all: the everlasting God, who was before the worlds, and will be when time and days shall be no more. See Isa. 40. 28.

CHAP. XXII.

We have here that famous story of Abraham's offering up his son Isaac, that is, his offering to offer him, which is justly looked upon as one of the wonders of the church. Here is, I. The strange command which God gave to Abraham concerning it, v. 1, 2. II. Abraham's strange obedience to this command, v. 3. The strange state of this trial. I. The sacrificing of Isaac was commanded, v. 11, 12. 2. Another sacrifice was provided, v. 13, 14. 3. The covenant was renewed with Abraham, hereupon, v. 15.-19. Lastly, An account of some of Abraham's dealings, v. 19, 20.

1. AND it came to pass after these things, that God did tempt Abraham, and said unto him, Abraham. And he said, Behold here I am. 2. And he said, Take now thy son, thine only son Isaac, whom thou lovest, and get thee into the land of Moriah; and offer him there for a burnt-offering upon one of the mountains which I will tell thee of.

Here is the trial of Abraham's faith, whether it continued so strong, so vigorous, so victorious, after a long settlement in communion with God, as it was at first, when by the left hand of his country: then, it was made to appear that he loved God better than his father: now, that he loved him better than his son. Observe here,

I. The time when Abraham was thus tried; (v. 1.) after these things; after all the other exercises he had had, all the hardships and difficulties he had gone through: now, perhaps, he was beginning to think the storms were all blown over; but after all the former encounters, which is sharpness the more to the soul yet. Note, Many former trials will not supersede, or secure us from future trials; we have not yet put off the harness, 1 Kings 20. 11. See Ps. 30. 6, 7.

II. The Author of the trial; God tempted him, not to draw him to sin, so Satan tempts; if Abraham had sacrificed Isaac, he had not sinned; his orders would have justified him, and borne him out; God tempted him, to discover his graces, how strong they were, that they might be found to praise, and honour, and glory, 1 Pet. 1. 7. Thus God tempted Job, that he might appear not only a good man, but a great man. God did tempt Abraham; he did lift up Abraham, so some read it; as a scholar that improves well, is lifted up when he is put into a higher form. Note, Strong faith is often exercised with strong temptation, and tried by it, to the third hour, and then hardened.

III. The trial itself; God appeared to him as he had formerly done, called him by name, Abraham, that name which had been given him in ratification of the promise. Abraham, like a good servant, readily answered, "Here am I; what says my Lord unto his servant?" Probably, he expected some renewed promise like those, ch. 15. 1, and 17. 1. But, to his great amazement, that which God has to say to him, is, in short, Abraham, go, kill thy son; and this command is given him in such aggravating language, as makes the temptation abundantly more grievous. When God speaks, Abraham, no doubt, takes notice of every word, and listens attentively to it; and every word here is a sword in his bones; the trial is steeled with trying phrases. Is there any reason why he should not suffer? No, it is not; yet when Abraham's faith is to be tried, God seems to take pleasure in the aggravation of the trial, v. 2. Observe,

1. The person to be offered; (1.) Take thy son, not thy bullocks and thy lambs; how willingly would Abraham have parted with them by thousands to redeem Isaac! No, I will take no bullock out of thy burnt-offering. Ps. 50. 22. Here the only son of the promise, not servant, nor not the steward of thine house, that shall not serve the turn; I must have thy son." Jephthah, in pursuance of a vow, offered a daughter; but Abraham must offer his son, in whom the family was to be built up. "Lord let it be an adopted son," No, (2.) "Thine only son; thine only son by Sarah." Ishmael was lately cast out of the grief of Abraham; and now Isaac only was left, and must be offered too? Yes, (3.) "Take Ishmael, thine only son, and offer him for a burnt-offering that son indeed," ch. 17. 19, not "Send for Ishmael back, and offer him; no, it must be Isaac:" "But, Lord, I love Isaac, he is to me as my own soul; Ishmael is not, and wilt thou take Isaac also? All this is against me!" Yes, (4.) That son whom thou lovest. It was a trial of Abraham's love to God, and therefore it must be in a beloved son, that strong must be touched most upon: in the Hebrew it is expressed more emphatically, and, I think, might very well be read thus, Take now that son of thine, that only one of thine, whom thou lovest, that Isaac. God's command must overrule all these considerations.

2. The place; in the land of Moriah, three days' journey off, so that he might have time to consider it, and, if he did it, might do it deliberately, that it might be a service the more reasonable, and the more honourable.

3. The manner; offer him for a burnt-offering; he must not only kill his son, but kill him as a sacrifice, kill him devoutly, kill him by rule, kill him with all that pomp and ceremony, with all that sedateness and copiousness of mind, with which he used to offer his burnt-offerings.

3. And Abraham rose up early in the morning, and saddled his ass, and took two of his young men with him, and Isaac his son; and clave the wood for the burnt-offering, and rose up, and went unto the place of which God had told him. 4. Then on the third day Abraham lifted up his eyes, and saw the place afar off. 5. And Abraham said unto his young men, Abide ye here with the ass; and I and the lad will go yonder and worship, and come again to you. 6. And Abraham took the wood of the burnt-offering, and laid it upon Isaac his son; and he took the fire in his hand, and a knife; and they went both of them together. 7. And Isaac spake unto Abraham his father, and said, My father: and he said, Here am I, my son. And he said, Behold, the fire and the wood: but where is the lamb for a burnt-offering? 8. And Abraham said, My son, God will provide himself a lamb for a burnt-offering: so they went both of them together.

9. And they came to the place which God had told him of; and Abraham built an altar there, and he laid the wood in order, and bound Isaac his son, and laid him on the altar upon the wood. 10. And Abraham stretched forth his hand, and took a knife to slay his son.

We have here Abraham’s obedience to this severe command: Being tried, he offered up Isaac, His Only Son.

I. The difficulties which he brake through in this act of obedience; much might have been objected against it. As,

1. It seemed directly against an antecedent law of God, which forbids murder, under a severe penalty, ch. 9. 5, 6. Now can the unacceptable God contradict himself? He that hates robbery for burnt-offering, (Isa. 61. 8.) cannot delight in murder for it.

2. How would it consist with natural affection to his own son? It would be not only murder, but the worst of murders. Cannot Abraham be obedient, but he must be unnatural? If God insist upon a human sacrifice, is there none but Isaac to be the offering; and none but Abraham to be the offerer? Must the father of the faithful be the monster of all fathers?

God gave him no reason for it. When Ishmael was to be cast out, a just cause was assigned, which satisfied Abraham; but here Isaac must die, and Abraham must kill him, and neither the one nor the other must know on what account. If Isaac had been to die a martyr for the truth, or his life had been the ransom of some other life more precious, it had been another matter; or if he had died as a criminal, a rebel against God or his parents, as in the case of the idolater, (Deut. 13. 8, 9.) or the stubborn son, (Deut. 21. 18, 19.) it might have passed as a sacrifice to justice; but the case is not so: he is a dutiful, obedient, hopeful, son: “Lord, what profit is there in his blood?”

4. How would this consent with the promise? Was it not said that in Isaac shalt thy seed be called? But what comes of that seed, if this pregnant bud be broken off so soon?

How should he ever look Sarah in the face again? With what face can he return to her and his family, with the blood of Isaac sprinkled on his garments, and staining all his raiment? Surely a bloody husband hast thou been unto me, would Sarah say, as Exod. 24. 23, 26, and it would be likely to alienate her affection for ever both from him and from his God.

5. What would the Egyptians say, and the Canaanites and Perizzites which dwelt then in the land? It would be an eternal reproach to Abraham, and to his altar. “Welcome nature, if this be grace.” These, and many the like objections, might have been made; but he was infallibly assured that it was indeed a command of God, and not a delusion; and that was sufficient to answer them all. Note, God’s commands must not be disputed, but obeyed: we must not set flesh and blood against them, (Gal. 1. 15, 16.) but with gracious obstinacy persist in our obedience to them.

II. The several steps of this obedience: all which help to magnify it, and to show that he was guided by prudence, and governed by faith, in the whole transaction.

1. He rises early, v. 3. Probably, the command was in the visions of the night, and early the next morning, he set himself about the execution of it, did not delay, did not demur, did not take time to deliberate; for the command was peremptory, and would not admit a debate. Note, These that do the will of God heartily, will do it speedily: while we delay, time is lost, and the heart hardened.

2. He gets things ready for a sacrifice, and as if he himself had been a Gibeonite, it should seem, with his own hands he cleat Isaac’s limbs, the next offering, that might not be to seek, when the sacrifice was to be offered; spiritual sacrifices must be thus prepared for.

3. It is very probable that he said nothing of it to Sarah; this is a journey which she must know nothing of, lest she prevent it. There is so much in our own hearts to hinder our progress in duty, that we have need, as much as may be, to keep out of the way of our enemies.

4. He carefully looked about him, to discover the place appointed for the sacrifice, which God had promised by some sign to direct him to. Probably the direction was given by an appearance of the Divine Glory in the place, some pillar of fire reaching from heaven to earth, visible at a distance, and to which he pointed, when he said, (v. 5.) “We will go vender, where you see the light, and worship.”

5. He left his servants at some distance off, (v. 5.) lest they should have a interposed, and created him some disturbance in his strange oblation; for Isaac was, no doubt, the darling of the whole family. Thus, when Christ was entering upon his agony in the garden, he took only three of his disciples with him, and left the rest at the garden door. Note, It is our wisdom and duty, when we are going to worship God, to leave the service of others which may divert us from the service, leave them at the bottom of the hill, that we may attend on the Lord without distraction.

6. He obliged Isaac to carry the wood, (both to try his obedience in a lesser matter, first, and that he might typify Christ, who carried his own cross, John 19. 17.) while he himself, though he knew what he did, with a steady and undaunted resolution, carried the fatal knife and fire, v. 6. Note, Those that through grace are resolved upon the substance of any service or suffering for God, must overlook the little circumstances which make it doubly difficult to flesh and blood.

7. Without any ruffle or disorder, he talks it over with Isaac, as if it had been but a common sacrifice that he was going to offer, v. 7, 8. (1.) It was very affecting that Isaac asked him, as they were walking together: My father, said Isaac; it was a melting word, which, one would think, should strike deeper in the breast of Abraham, than his knife could in the breast of Isaac. He might have said, or thought at least, “Call me not thy father, who am now to be thy murderer; can a father be so barbarous, so perfectly lost to all the tenderness of a father?” Yet he keeps his temper, and keeps his countenance, to be amour de precé; he calmly waits for his son’s question, and this is it, Behold, the fire and the wood, but where is the lamb? See how expert Isaac was in the law and custom of sacrifices: this it is to be well-catechised. This is,

[1.] A trying question to Abraham. How could he endure to think that Isaac is himself the lamb? So it is, but Abraham, as yet, dares not tell him so: where God knows the truth to be arwe of proof indeed, without the Spirit, are but like wood without fire, but the Spirit works by them,) all things are now ready; but where is the lamb? Where is the heart? Is that ready to be offered up to God, to ascend to him as a burnt-offering? (2.) It was a very prudent thing for Abraham to bring him, v. 5. May God will provide himself a lamb. This was the language, either [1.] Of his obedience; "We must offer the lamb which God has appointed now to be offered;" thus giving him this general rule of submission to the wise will, to prepare him for the application of it to himself very quickly. Or, [2.] Of his faith; whether he meant it so or not, this proved to be the meaning of it; a sacrifice was made, of Isaac. Christ, the great Sacrifice of atonement, was of God's providing; when none in heaven or earth could have found a lamb for that burnt-offering, God himself found the rams. Ps. 89. 20. Secondly, All our sacrifices of acknowledgment are of God's providing too. It is he that prepares the heart, Ps. 10. 17. The broken and contrite spirit is a sacrifice of God, Ps. 51. 17, of his providing.

8. With the same resolution and confidence of mind, after many thoughts of heart, he applies himself to the completing of the sacrifice, v. 9, 10. He goes on with a holy wilfulness, after many a weary step, and with a heavy heart he arrives, at length, at the fatal place, builds the altar, an altar of earth, we may suppose, the saddest that ever he built, (and he had built many an one,) lays the wood in order for his Isaac's funeral pile, and now tells him the amazing news; Isaac, thou art the lamb which God has appointed. With Isaac, as appears, is as willing as Abraham; we do not find that he made any objection against it, any petition for his life, that he attempted to make his escape, much less that he struggled with his aged father, or made any resistance: Abraham does it, God will have it done, and Isaac has learned to submit to both; Abraham, no doubt, comforting him with the same hopes, with which he himself by faith was comforted. Yet it is necessary that a sacrifice be bound. The great Sacrifice, which, in the fulness of time, was to be offered up, must be bound, and therefore so must Isaac. But with what heart could tender Abraham tie those guiltless hands, that perhaps had often been lifted up to ask his blessing, and stretched out to embrace him, and were now the more straitly bound with the cords of love and duty! However, it must be done. Having bound him, he lays him upon the altar, and his head toward the south, his back toward the north, and appears, with floods of tears, he gives and takes, the final farewell of a parting kiss, perhaps he takes another for Sarah, from her dying son. This being done, he resolutely forgets the bowels of a father, and puts on the awful gravity of a sacrificer; with a fixed heart, and an eye lifted up to heaven, he takes the knife, and stretches out his hand to give the fatal cut to Isaac's throat. Isaac with him, and, wonder, O earth! Here is an act of faith and obedienc, which deserves to be a spectacle to God, angels, and men. Abraham's darling, Sarah's daughter, the church's hope, the heir of promise, lies ready to bleed and die by his own father's hand, who never shrinks at the doing of it. Now this obedience of Abraham in offering up Isaac, is a lively representation, (1.) Of the headship of Christ, who begotten Son to suffer and die for us, as a sacrifice; it pleased the Lord himself to bruise him. See Isa. 53. 10. Zech. 13. 7. Abraham was obliged, both in duty and gratitude, to part with Isaac, and parted with him to a friend; but God was under no obligations to us, for we were enemies. (2.) Of our duty to God, in return of that love; we must tread in the steps of this faith of Abraham. God, by his word, calls us to part with all for Christ; all our sins, though they have been as a right hand, a right eye, or an Isaac; all those things that are competitors and rivals with Christ for the sovereignty of the heart; (Luke 14. 26.) and we must cheerfully let them all go. God, by his providence, which is truly the voice of God, calls us to part with an Isaac sometimes, and we must do it with a cheerful resignation and submission to his holy will, 1 Sam. 3. 18.

11. And the angel of the Lord called unto him out of heaven, and said, Abraham; and he said, Here am I. 12. And he said, Lay not thine hand upon the lad, neither do thou any thing unto him: for now I know that thou fearest God, seeing thou hast not with-held thy son, thine only son, from me. 13. And Abraham lifted up his eyes, and looked, and beheld, behind him a ram caught in a thicket by his horns: and Abraham went and took the ram, and offered him up for a burnt-offering in the stead of his son. 14. And Abraham called the name of that place Jehovah-jireh: as it is said to this day. In the mount of the Lord it shall be seen.

Hitherto this story has been very melancholy, and seems to hasten towards a most trigical period; but here the sky, of a sudden, clears up, the sun breaks out, a bright and pleasant scene opens; the same hand that had wounded and cast down, here heals and lifts up; for though he cause grief, he will have compassion. The angel of the Lord, that is, God himself, the eternal Word, the Angel of the covenant, who was to be the great Redeemer and Comforter, he interposed, and gave a happy issue to this trial.

I. Isaac is rescued, v. 11, 12. The command to offer him was intended only for trial, and it appearing, upon trial, that Abraham did indeed love God better than he loved Isaac, the end of the command was answered; and therefore the order is countermanded, without any reflection at all upon the unchangeableness of the divine councils; Lay not thine hand upon the lad. Note, 1. Our creatures-comforts are the most likely to be continued to us, when we are most willing to resign them up to God's will. 2. God's time to help and relieve his people, is, when they are brought to the greatest extremity. The more imminent the danger is, and the nearer to be put into execution, the more wonderful, and the more welcome is the deliverance.

II. Abraham is not only approved, but applauded. He obtains an honourable testimony, that he is righteous. Now I know that thou fearest God. God knew it before, but now, Abraham had given a most memorable evidence of it. He needed do no more; what he had done, was sufficient to prove the religious regard he had to God and his authority. Note, 1. When God, by his providence, hinders the performance of our sincere intentions in his services, he graciously accepts the will for the deed, and the honest endeavour, though it come short of success. 2. That the doing of lesser things, for fearing God, is, our being willing to serve and honour him with that which is dearest to us, and to part with all to him, or for him.

III. Another sacrifice is provided instead of Isaac, v. 13. Now that the altar was built, and the wood laid in order, it was necessary that something should be offered. For, 1. God must be acknowledged with thankfulness for the deliverance of Isaac; and the sooner the better, when here is an altar ready. 2. Abraham's words must be made;
God, God will provide himself a lamb. God will not disappoint those expectations of his people, which are of his own raising; but, according to their faith, it is to them. Thou shalt decree a thing, and it shall be established. 3. Reference must be had to the promised Messiah, the blessed Seed. (1.) Christ was sacrificed in our stead, as this ram instead of Isaac, and his death was our discharge; (2 Cor. 5. 21.) Here am I, (said he) let these my ways. Though the sacrifice was late promised, and now typified by Isaac, yet the offering of him up should be suspended till the latter end of the world; and, in the mean time, the sacrifice of beasts should be accepted, as this ram was, as a pledge of that expectation which should one day be made by that great Sacrifice. And it is observable, that the temple, the place of sacrifice, was afterward built upon this mount Moriah, (2 Chron. 3. 1.) and mount Calvary, where Christ was crucified, was not far off.

IV. A new name was given to that place, to the honour of God, and for the encouragement of all believers to the end of the world, cheerfully to trust in God in the way of obedience; Jehovah-jireh, The Lord will provide, v. 14. probably alluding to what he had said, v. 8, God will provide himself a lamb. It was not owing to any contrivance of Abraham, nor was it in answer to his prayer, though he was a distinguished intercessor; but it was purely the Lord's doing. Let it be recorded for generations to come, 1. That the Lord will see; he will always have his eye upon his people, in their straits and distresses, that he may come in with seasonable succour in the critical juncture. 2. That he will be seen, be seen in the mount, in the greatest perplexities of his people; he will not only manifest, but manifest his wisdom, power, and goodness in their deliverance; where God sees and provides, he should be seen and praised: and, perhaps, it may refer to God manifest in the flesh.

15. And the angel of the Lord called unto Abraham out of heaven the second time, 16. And said, By myself have I sworn, saith the Lord, for because thou hast done this thing, and hast not with-held thy son, thine only son: 17. That in blessing I will bless thee, and in multiplying I will multiply thy seed as the stars of the heaven, and as the sand which is upon the sea-shore; and thy seed shall possess the gate of his enemies; 18. And in thy seed shall all the nations of the earth be blessed; because thou hast obeyed my voice. 19. So Abraham returned unto his young men, and they rose up, and went together to Beer-sheba; and Abraham dwelt at Beer-sheba.

Abraham's obedience was graciously accepted, but that was not all; here we have it recompensed, abundantly recompensed, before he stirred from the place; probably, while the ram, he had sacrificed, was yet burning, God sent him this gracious message, renewed and ratified his covenant with him. All covenants were made by sacrifice, so was this by the typical sacrifices of Isaac and the ram; very high expressions of God's favour to Abraham are employed in this confirmation of the covenant with him, expressions exceeding any he had yet been blessed with. Now all the sacrifices, and services shall be crowned with extraordinary honours and comforts; and favours in the promise, though not yet performed, ought to be accounted real and valuable recompenses.

I. God is pleased to make mention of Abraham's obedience as the consideration of the covenant; and he speaks of it with an excommunion, v. 1. Because thou hast done this thing, and hast not withheld thy son, thy only son; he lays a strong emphasis upon that, and, v. 18, praises it as an act of obedience; in it thou hast obeyed my voice, and to obey is better than sacrifice. Not that this was a proportionate consideration; but God graciously put this honour upon that by which Abraham had honoured God.

II. God now confirmed the promise with an oath. It was said and sealed before; but now, it is sworn. By myself have I sworn; for he could swear by no greater, Heb. 6. 13. Thus he interposed himself by an oath, as the apostle expresses it there, v. 17; he did (to speak with reverence) even pawn his own life and being upon it. As I live: that by all those immutable things, in which it is impossible for God to lie, he and his might have strong consolation. Note, If we exercise faith, God will encourage it. Improve the promises, and God will ratify them.

III. The particular promise here renewed, is that of a numerous c ipspring, v. 17. Multiplying, I will multiply thee. Note, Those that are willing to commit themselves to God's care, and give up themselves and all their concerns to his disposal, will find it made up to them with unspeakable advantage. Abraham has but one son, and is willing to part with that one, in obedience to God; "Wilt," said God, "thou shalt be recompensed with thousands and millions." What a figure does the seed of Abraham make in history! How numerously, how illustriously were his known descendants, who, to this day, triumph in this, that they have Abraham to their father! Furthermore, he receives a thousand-fold in this life, Matt. 19. 29.

IV. The promise, doubtless, points to the Messias, and the grace of the gospel. This is the oath sworn to our father Abraham, which Zecharias refers to, Luke 1, 73, &c. And so here is a promise, 1. Of the great blessing of the Spirit; In blessing I will bless thee, namely, with that best of blessings, the gift of the Holy Ghost; the promise of the Spirit was that blessing of Abraham, which was to come upon the Gentiles through Jesus Christ, Gal. 3. 14. 2. Of the increase of the church; that believers, his spiritual seed, should be as many as the stars of heaven. 3. Of spiritual victories; Thy seed shall possess the gate of his enemies. Believers, by their faith, overcome the world, and triumph over all the powers of darkness, and are more than conquerors. Probably, Zecharias refers to this part of the oath, Luke 1. 74, That we being delivered out of the hand of our enemies, might serve him without fear. But the crown of all, is, the last promise, 4. Of the incarnation of Christ. In thy seed, one particular person that shall descend from thee (for he speaks not of many, but of one, as the apostle observes, Gal. 3. 16.) shall all the nations of the earth be blessed, or shall bless themselves, as the phrase is, Isa. 66. 16. In him all may be happy if they will, and all that belong to him, shall be so, and shall think themselves so. Christ is the great Blessing of the world. Abraham was ready to give up his son for a sacrifice to the honour of God, and on that occasion God promised to give his son a sacrifice for the salvation of man.

20. And it came to pass after these things, that it was told Abraham, saying, Behold, Milcah, she hath also born children unto thy brother Nahor; 21. Huz his first-born, and Buz his brother, and Kemuel the father of Aram. 22. And Chesed, and Hazo, and Pildash, and Jidlaph, and Bethuel.
And Bethuel begat Rebekah: these eight Milcah did bear to Nahor Abraham's brother. 24. And his concubine, whose name was Reumah, she bare also Tebah, and Gaham, and Thahash, and Maachah.

This is recorded here. 1. To show that though Abraham saw his own family highly dignified with peculiar privileges, admitted into covenant, and blessed with the entail of the promise; yet he did not look with contempt and disdain upon his relations, but was glad to hear of the increase and prosperity of their families. 2. To make way for the following story of the marriage of Isaac to Rebekah, a daughter of this family.

CHAP. XXIII.

Here is, 1. Abraham a mourner for the death of Sarah, v. 1, 2. II. Abraham a purchaser of a burying-place for Sarah. 1. The purchase humbly proposed by Abraham, v. 3, 4. 2. Fairly treated of, and agreed to, with a great deal of mutual civility and respect, v. 5, 6, 7. The purchase-money paid, v. 16. 3. The premises conveyed and secured to Abraham, v. 17, 18, 20. 4. Sarah's funeral, v. 19.

And Sarah was an hundred and seven years old: these were the years of the life of Sarah. 2. And Sarah died in Kirjath-arba; the same is Hebron in the land of Canaan: and Abraham came to mourn for Sarah, and to weep for her.

We have here, 1. Sarah's age, v. 1. Almost 40 years before, she had called herself old, ch. 18. 12. Old people will die never the sooner, but may die the better, for reckoning themselves old. 2. Her death, v. 2. The longest liver must die at last. Abraham and Sarah had lived comfortably together many years; but death parts those whom nothing else could part. The special friends and favourites of heaven are not exempted from the stroke of death. She died in the land of Canaan, where she had lived 80 yeas as a stranger. 3. Abraham's mourning for her; and he was a true mourner. He did not only perform the ceremonies of mourning, according to the custom of those times, as the mourners that go about the streets; but he did sincerely lament the great loss he had of a good wife, and gave proof of the constancy of his affection to her to the last. Two words are used; he came both to mourn and to weep. His sorrow was not counterfeit, but real. He came to her tent, and sat down by the corpse, there to pay the tribute of his tears, that his eye might affect his heart, and that he might pay the greater respect to the memory of her that was gone. Note, It is not only lawful, but it is a duty, to lament the death of our near relations, both in compliance with the providence of God who thus calls us to weeping and mourning, and in honour of those to whom honour is due. Tears are a tribute due to our deceased friends: when the body is sown, it must be watered; but we must not sorrow as those that have no hope; for we have a good hope through grace both concerning them, and concerning ourselves.

3. And Abraham stood up from before his dead, and spake unto the sons of Heth, saying, 4. I am a stranger and a sojourner with you: give me a possession of a burying-place with you, that I may bury my dead out of my sight. 5. And the children of Heth answered Abraham, saying unto him, 6. Hear us, my lord: thou art a mighty prince among us: in the choice of our sepulchres bury thy dead; none of us shall withhold from thee his sepulchre, but that thou mayest bury thy dead. 7. And Abraham stood up, and bowed himself to the people of the land, even to the children of Heth. 8. And he communed with them, saying, If it be your mind that I should bury my dead out of my sight; hear me, and en treat for me to Ephron the son of Zohar, 9. That he may give me the cave of Machpelah, which he hath, which is in the end of his field; for as much money as it is worth, he shall give it me for a possession of a burying-place among you. 10. And Ephron dwelt among the children of Heth: and Ephron the Hittite answered Abraham in the audience of the children of Heth, even all that went in at the gate of his city, saying, 11. Nay, my lord, hear me: the field give I thee; and the cave that is therein, I give it thee; in the presence of the sons of my people give I it thee; bury thy dead. 12. And Abraham bowed down himself before the people of the land. 13. And he spake unto Ephron in the audience of the people of the land, saying, But if thou wilt give it, I pray thee, hear me: I will give thee money for the field; take it of me, and I will bury my dead there. 14. And Ephron answered Abraham, saying unto him, 15. My lord, hearken unto me: the land is worth four hundred shekels of silver; what is that betwixt me and thee? Bury therefore thy dead.

Here is, 1. The humble request which Abraham made to his neighbours the Hittites, for a burying-place among them, v. 3, 4. It was strange he had this to do now; but we are to impute it rather to God's providence than to his improvidence, as appears Acts 7. 5, where it is said God gave him no inheritance in Canaan. It were well, if all those who take care to provide burying-places for their bodies after death, were as careful to provide a resting-place for their souls. Observe here, 1. The convenient division which this affair gave, for the present, to Abraham's grief; he stood up from before his dead. Those that find themselves in danger of over-grieving for their dead relations, and are entering into that temptation, must take heed of putting upon their loss, and of sitting alone and melancholy. There must be a time of standing up from before their dead, and ceasing to mourn. For, thanks be to God, our happiness is not bound up in the life of any creature. Care of the funeral may be improved to divert grief for the death, as here, at first, when it is most in danger of tyrannising. Weeping must not hinder sowing. 2. The argument he used with the children of Heth; which was this, "I am a stranger and a sojourner with you: therefore I am unprovided, and must become a humble suitor to you for a burying-place." This was one occasion which Abraham took to confess that he was a stranger and a pilgrim.
upon earth; he was not ashamed to own it thus publicly, Heb. 11. 13. Note, The death of our relations should effectually remind us that we are not at home in this world. When they are gone, say, we are not alone.

3. His meanness, till th'o' his affair was settled, intimated in that word, that I may bury my dead out of my sight. Note, Death will make those unpleasant to our sight, who, while they lived, were the desire of our eyes. The counterenact that was fresh and lively becomes pale and ghastly, and fit to be removed into the land of darkness. While she was in his sight, it renewed his grief, which he would prevent.

If the generous offer which the children of Heth made to him, v. 5, 6. They compliment him. 1. With a title of respect; Thou art a prince of God among us. So the word is, not only great, but good. He called himself a stranger and a sojourner; they call him a great prince; for those that humble themselves, shall be exalted. God had promised to make Abraham's name great. 2. With a tender of the best of their burying-places. Even the light of nature teaches us to be civil and respectful towards all, though they be strangers and sojourners. The noble generosity of these Canaanites shames and condemns the closeness, and selfishness, and ill-humour, of many that call themselves Israelites. Observe, These Canaanites would be glad to mingle their dust with Abraham's, and to have their last end like his.

III. The particular proposal which Abraham made to them, v. 7, 9. He returns them his thanks for their kind offer, with all possible decency and respect; though a great man, an old man, and now a mourner, yet he stands up, and bows himself humbly before them, v. 7. Note, Religion teaches good manners; and those abuse it, that place it in rudeness and clownishness. He then pitches upon the place he thought most convenient, namely, the cave of Machpelah, which probably lay near him, and had not yet been used for a burying-place. The present owner was Ephron; Abraham cannot pretend to any interest in him, but he desires that they would improve their's with him, to get the purchase of that cave, and the field in which it was. Note, A moderate desire to obtain that which is convenient for us, by fair and honest means, is not such a coveting of that which is our neighbour's, as is forbidden in the tenth commandment.

IV. The present which Ephron made to Abraham of his field, v. 10, 11. The field give I thee. Abraham thought he must be entreated to sell it; but, upon the first mention of it, without entreaty, he freely gives it. Some men have more generosity than they are thought to have. Abraham, no doubt, had taken all occasions to oblige his neighbour, and do them any service that lay in his power; and now they return his kindness; for he that watereth, shall be watered also himself. Note, If those that profess religion, adorn their profession by eminent civility and serviceableness to all, they shall find it will redound to their own comfort and advantage, as well as to the glory of God.

V. Abraham's modest and sincere refusal to Ephron's kind offer, v. 12, 13. Abundance of the purchase purchased, v. 12; and yet, in his obedience to him before the people of the land, that they might respect Ephron the more, for the respect they saw Abraham give him, 1 Sam. 15. 30; but resolves to give him money for the field, even the full value of it. It was not in pride that Abraham refused the gift, because he scorned to be beholden to Ephron; but, 1. In justice. Abraham was rich in silver and gold, ch. 13. 2, and was able to pay for the field, and therefore would not take advantage of Ephron's generosity. Note, Honesty, as well as humour, forbids us to sponge upon our neighbours, and to impose upon their sufferings, or upon their comfort, when he was poor, that he had not eaten the fruits of his land without money, Job 31. 39. 2. In prudence, He would pay for it, lest Ephron, when this good humour was over, should upbraid him with it, and say, I have made Abraham rich, ch. 14. 23. Or, lest the next heir should question Abraham's title, (because that grant was made without any consideration,) and claim back the field. Thus David afterward refused Amnon's offer, 2 Sam. 24. 24. We know not what affronts we may hereafter receive from those that are now most kind and generous.

VI. The price of the land ascertainment by Ephron, but not insisted on, v. 14, 15. The land is worth 400 shekels of silver, about 50 pounds of our money; but what is that between me and thee? He would rather oblige his friend than have so much money in his pocket. Herein Ephron discovered, 1. A great contempt of worldly wealth. "What is that between me and thee? It is a small matter, not worth speaking of." Many a one would have said, "It is a deal of money, it will go far in a child's portion;" but Ephron says, "What is that?" Note, It is an excellent thing for people to have low and mean thoughts of this world and the wealth of it; it is that which is not, and in the abundance of which a man's life does not consist, 1-s.e. 12. 15. 2. Great courtesy and obligingness to his friend. And Abraham, and Ephron. Ephron was not jealous of Abraham as a foreigner and an inmate, nor envious at him as a man likely to thrive and grow rich; he bore him no ill-will for his singularity in religion, but was much kinder to him than most people new-arrivals are to their own brothers. What is that between me and thee? Note, No little thing should occasion our scandal and differences between true friends. When we are tempted to be hot in resenting affronts, high in demanding our rights, or hard in denying a kindness, we should answer the temptation with this question, "What is that between me and my friend?"
light, and choose to be clandestine; but they that design honestly in their bargains, care not who are witnesses to them. Our law countenances sales made in market-over, and by deed enrolled.
I. Abraham, without fraud, covin, or further delay, pays the money: v. 16. he pays it readily, without hesitation; it pays in full, without diminution; and pays it in weight, current in the market, without defraudion. See how honestly money was used for the help of commerce; and see how honestly money should be paid where it is due.
Observe, Though all the land of Canaan was Abraham's by promise, yet the time of his possessing being not come, what he had now occasion for, he bought and paid for. Note, Dominion is not founded in grace. The saints' title to an eternal inheritance does not destitute their possessing possessions of this world, by which we do for doing wrong.
II. Ephron honestly and fairly makes him a good title to the land, v. 17, 18, 20. The field, with all its appurtenances, is conveyed to Abraham and his heirs for ever, in open court, (not by writing, it does not appear that writing was then used,) by such a public solemn declaration before witnesses as was sufficient to pass it. Note, As that which is bought must be honestly purchased; so that which is sold, must honestly delivered and secured.
III. Abraham, thereupon, takes possession, and buries Sarah in the cave or vault, (whether framed by nature or art, is not certain,) which was in the purchased field. It is probable that Abraham had buried servants out of his family, since he came to Canaan, but the graves of the common people (2 Kings 23. 6.) might suffice for them; nor that Sarah was dead, a peculiar place, and Abraham found for her remains. It is worth noting. 1. That a burying-place was the first spot of ground Abraham was possessed of in Canaan. Note, When we are entering into the world, it is good to think of our going out of it; for as soon as we are born, we begin to die. 2. That it was the only piece of land he was ever possessed of, though it was all his own in re version. Those that have least of this earth find a grave in it. Abraham provided, not cities, as Cain and Nimrod, but a sepulchre, (1.) To be a constant memorandum of death to himself and his posterity, that he and they might learn to die daily. This sepulchre is said to be at the end of the field, v. 9, for whatever our possessions are, there is a sepulch re at the end of them. (2.) To be a token of his belief and expectation of the resurrection; for why should such care his steward abjections, if he be thereby, why ever, and must not rise again? Abraham, in this, said plainly that he sought a bet ner country, that is, a heavenly. Abraham is content to be still flowing, while he lives, but secures a place where, when he dies, his flesh may rest in hope.

CHAP. XXIV.

Marriages and funerals are the changes of families, and the common news among the inhabitants of the villages.
In the former, we had the burying the wife, here, we have him marrying his son. These stories concerning his family, with their minute circumstances, are largely related, while the histories of the kingdom of the world, these with their revol-tions, are buried in silence; for the Lord knows them that are his. The subjoining of Isaac's marriage to Sarah's funeral (with a particular reference to it, v. 67.)
shows the custom of the land, with their revolutions, generation comes; and thus the entail both of the human nature, and of the covenant, is preserved. Here is,
I. Abraham's care about the marrying of his son, and the contingent about his being married. II. His servant's journey into Abraham's country, to seek a wife for his young master among his own relations, v. 10, 14.
III. The kind providence which brought him acquainted with Rebekah, whose father was Isaac's cousin-german,

v. 15. 28. IV. The treaty of marriage with her relations
v. 29, 49. V. Their consent obtained, v. 60. 60. VI.
The happy meeting and marriage between Isaac and Rebekah, v. 61, 67.

1. AND Abraham was old, and well -stricken in age; and the Lord had blessed Abraham in all things. 2. And Abraham said unto his eldest servant of his house, that ruled over all that he had, Put,
I pray thee, thy hand under my thigh:
3. And I will make thee swear by the Lord, the God of heaven, and the God of the earth, that thou shalt not take a wife unto my son of the daughters of the Canaan tes, among whom I dwell: 4. But thou shalt go unto my country, and to my kindred, and take a wife unto my son Isaac. 5. And the servant said unto him, Peradventure the woman will not be willing to follow me unto this land: must I needs bring thy son again unto the land from whence thou camest? 6.
And Abraham said unto him, Beware thou,
that thou bring not my son thither again.
7. The Lord God of heaven, which took me from my father's house, and from the land of my kindred, and which spake unto me, and that spake unto me, saying, Unto thy seed will I give this land; he shall send his angel before thee, and thou shalt take a wife unto my son from thence. 8.
And if the woman will not be willing to follow thee, then thou shalt be clear from this my oath: only bring not my son thither again. 9. And the servant put his hand under the thigh of Abraham his master, and swear to him concerning that matter.

Three things we may observe here concerning Abraham.

I. The care he took of a good son, to get him married, well-married. It was high time to think of it now, for Isaac was about 40 years old, and it was high time he should be married by his ancestors to marry at 30, or sooner, ch. 11, 14, 18, 22, 24. Abraham believed the promise of the building up of his family, and therefore did not make haste; not more haste than good speed. Two considerations moved him to think of it now, (v. 1.) That he himself was likely to leave the world quickly, for he was old, and well-stricken in age, and it would be a satisfaction to him to see his son settled, before he died; and, 2. That he had a good estate to leave behind him, for the Lord had blessed him in all things; and the blessing of the Lord, that makes rich. See how much religion and piety befriended outward prosperity. New Abraham's pious care concerning his son, was, (1.) That he should not marry with a daughter of Canaan, but with one of his kindred; because he saw by observation, that the Canaanites were degenerating into great wickedness, and knew by revelation that they were designed for ruin; and therefore he would not marry his son among them, lest they should be either a snare to his soul, or, at least, a blot to his name. (2.) That yet he should not leave the land of Canaan, to go himself among his kindred, nor even for the purpose of choosing a wife, lest he should be tempted to settle there.
This caution is given, v. 6, and repeated, v. 8,
"Bring not my son thither again, whatever comes of it. Let him rather want a wife than expose himself to that temptation." Note, Parents, in disposing of their children, should carefully consult the welfare of their sons, and their furtherance in the way of grace. The way of grace is the road to heaven. Those who escape the corruption that is in the world through lust, and have brought up their children accordingly, should take heed of doing any thing by which they may be again entangled therein, and overcome, 2 Pet. 2. 20. Beware that you bring them not thither again, Heb. 11. 15.

11. The charge he gave to a good servant; probably a native of the city, one whose conduct, fidelity, and affection to him and his family, he had long experience of. He trusted him with this great affair, and not Isaac himself; because he would not have Isaac go at all into that country, but marry there by proxy; and no proxy so fit as this steward of his house. The matter is settled between the master and the servant with a great deal of care and solemnity. 1. The servant must be bound by an oath to do his utmost to get a wife for Isaac, from among his relations, v. 2-4. Abraham swears him to it, both for his own satisfaction, and for the engagement of his servant to all possible care and diligence in this matter. Thus God swears his servants to their work, that, having sworn, they may perform it. Honour is here done to the eternal God; for he it is, that is sworn by, to whom alone those appeals ought to be made. And some think honour is done to the covenant of circumcision, by the curse. "Fear not the putting of his hand under his thigh." Note, Swearing, being an ordinance, not peculiar to the church, but common to mankind, is to be performed by such signs as are the appointments and common usages of our country, for binding the person sworn. 2. He must be clear of his oath, if, when he had done his utmost, he could not prevail. This proviso the servant prudently inserted, v. 5, putting the case, that the woman would not follow him; and Abraham allowed the exception, v. 8. Note, Oaths are to be taken with great caution, and the matter sworn to should be rightly understood and limited, because it is a snare to devour that which is holy, and, after vows, to make the inquiry which should have been made before.

11. The confidence he put in a good God, who, he doubts not, will give his servant success in this undertaking. v. 7. He remembers that God had wonderfully brought him up out of his father's family, by the effectual call of his grace; and therefore doubts not but he will succeed him in his care not to bring his son thither again. He remembers also the promise God had made and confirmed to him, that he would give Canaan to his seed; and thence infers that God would own him in his endeavours to match his son, not among those devoted nations, but to one that was fit to be the mother of such a son. It is therefore probable, he thought, his angel before thee to make thy way prosperous, Note, 1. Those that carefully keep in the way of duty, and govern themselves by the principles of their religion in their designs and undertakings, have good reason to expect prosperity and success in them. God will cause that to issue in our comfort, in which we sincerely aim at his glory. 2. God's promises, and our own experiences, are sufficient to encourage us to put our trust upon God, and our expectations from him, in all the affairs of this life. 3. God's angels are ministering spirits, sent forth, not only for the protection, but for the guidance, of the heirs of promise, Heb. 1. 14. "He shall send his angel before thee, and then thou wilt speed well."

10. And the servant took ten camels, of the camels of his master, and departed; for all the goods of his master were in his hand: and he arose, and went to Mesopotamia, unto the city of Nahor. 11. And he made his camels to kneel down without the city by a well of water, at the time of the evening, even the time that women go out to draw water. 12. And he said, O Lord God of my master Abraham, I pray thee, send me good speed this day, and show kindness unto my master Abraham. 13. Behold, I stand here by the well of water; and the daughters of the men of the city come out to draw water: 14. And let it come to pass, that the damsel to whom I shall say, Let down thy pitcher, I pray thee, that I may drink; and she shall say, Drink, and I will give thy camels drink also: let the same be she that thou hast appointed for thy servant Isaac; and thereby shall I know thou hast showed kindness unto my master. 15. And it came to pass, before he had done speaking, that, behold, Rebekah came out, who was born to Bethuel, son of Milcah, the wife of Nahor, Abraham's brother, with her pitcher upon her shoulder. 16. And the damsel was very fair to look upon, a virgin, neither had any man known her: and she went down to the well, and filled her pitcher, and came up. 17. And the servant ran to meet her, and said, Let me, I pray thee, drink a little water of thy pitcher. 18. And she said, Drink, my lord: and she hasted, and let down her pitcher upon her hand, and gave him drink. 19. And when she had done giving him drink, she said, I will draw water for thy camels also, until they have done drinking. 20. And she hasted, and emptied her pitcher into the trough, and ran again unto the well to draw water, and drew for all his camels. 21. And the man, wondering at her, held his peace, to wit, whether the Lord had made his journey prosperous, or not. 22. And it came to pass, as the camels had done drinking, that the man took a golden ring of half a shekel weight, and two bracelets for her hands of ten shekels weight of gold; 23. And said, Whose daughter art thou? Tell me, I pray thee: is there room in thy father's house for us to lodge in? 24. And she said unto him, I am the daughter of Bethuel, the son of Milcah, which she bare unto Nahor. 25. She said moreover unto him, We have both straw and provender enough, and room to lodge in. 26. And the man bowed down his head, and worshipped the Lord. 27. And he said, Blessed be the Lord God of my master Abraham, who hath not left destitute my master of his mercy and his truth: I being in the playhouse or the park, and pray that he might meet one there, but to the well of water, expecting to find one there well-employed. [2.] That he would please to make his way, in this matter, plain and clear before him, by the concurrence of minute circumstances in his favour. Note, First, It is the comfort, as well as the belief, of a good man, that God's providence extends itself to the smallest occurrences, and admirably serves its own purposes by them. "Our times are in God's hand; not only events, but the means of them;" 1 Peter 3:15. Secondly, It is our wisdom, in all our affairs, to follow Providence; and folly to force it. Thirdly, It is very desirable, and that which we may lawfully pray for, while in the general we set God's will before us, as our rule, that he will, by hints of providence, direct us in the way of our duty, and give us indications what his mind is. Thus he guides his people, "As the horse for his7col. 3. 28.) and leads them in a plain path, Ps. 27. 11.

2. God owned him by a particular providence. He decreed the thing, and it was established to him, Job 22. 28. According to his faith, so was it unto him. The answer to this prayer, was, (1.) Speedily, before he had made an end of speaking, v. 13, as it is written, (Isa. 65. 24.) While they are yet speaking, I will hear. Though we are backward to pray, God is forward to answer. (2.) Satisfactorily, it was the first that came to draw water, and yet more, and much, in every thing, according to his own heart. [1.] She was so well qualified, that in all respects she answered the character he wished for in the woman that was to be his master's wife, handsome and healthful, humble and industrious, very courteous and obliging to a stranger, and having all the marks of a good disposition: when she came to the well, (v. 16.) she went down, and filled her pitcher, and came up to go home with it; she did not stand to gaze upon the strange man and his camels, but minded her business, and would not have been diverted from it but by an opportunity of doing good; she did not curiously or confidently enter into discourse with him, but modestly answered him with all the decorum that became her sex. What a degenerate age do we live in, in which appear all the unsavory things of the covenant, and of Rebekah's character, whose daughters few are. Those instances of goodness which were then in honour, are now in contempt. [2.] Providence so ordered it, that she did that which exactly answered to his sign, and was wonderfully the counterpart of his proposal; she not only gave him drink, but, which was more than could have been expected, she offered her service to give his camels drink, which was the very sign he proposed.

Note, First, God, in his providence, does sometimes wonderfully own the prayer of faith, and gratify the innocent desires of his praying people, even in little things; that he may show the extent of his care, and may encourage them all times to seek to him, and trust in him; yet we must take heed of being over bold in prescribing to God, lest the events should seem weak in our faith rather than strengthen it. Secondly, It is good to take all opportunities of showing a humble, courteous, charitable disposition, because, some time or other, it may turn more to our honour and benefit than we think of: some hereby have entertained angels, and Rebekah hereby, quite beyond her expectation at this time, was brought into the line of Christ and the covenant. Thirdly, There may be a great deal of obliging kindness in that which costs but little; our Saviour has promised a reward for a cup of cold water, like this here, Matt. 10. 42. Fourthly, The concurrence of providences and their minute circumstan-

Abraham's servant now begins to make a figure in this story; and though he is not named, yet much is here recorded, to his honour, and for an example to all servants, who shall be honoured, if, by faithfully serving God and their masters, they adorn the doctrine of Christ. Compare Prov. 27. 18, with Titus 2. 10, for there is no respect of persons with God, Col. 3. 24. 25. A good servant makes conscience of the duty of his place, and does it in the fear of God, though he make not a figure in the world, nor have praise of men, yet shall be owned and accepted of God, and have praise of him. Observe here, 1. That faithful Abraham's servant approved himself to his master. Having received his charge, with all expedition he took his journey, putting himself into an equipage fit for his negotiation, v. 10, and he had all the goods of his master, that is, a schedule or particular account of them, in his hand, to show to those with whom he was to treat for; from, from first to last, he consulted his master's honour. Isaac being a type of Christ, some make this fetching of goods to signify the espousing of the church, by the agency of his servants the ministers. The church is the bride, the Lamb's wife, Rev. 21. 9. Christ is the Bridegroom, and ministers the friends of the Bridegroom, (John 3. 28.) whose work it is to persuade souls to consent to him, 2 Cor. 11. 2. The spouse of Christ must not be of the Cannanites, but of his own kindred, born again from above. Ministers, like Abraham's servant, must say to themselves, with the utmost wisdom and care to serve their master's interest herein.

II. How devoutly he acknowledged God in this affair, like one of that happy household which Abraham had commanded to keep the way of the Lord, &c. ch. 18. 19. He arrived early in the evening (after many days' journeying) at the place he designed for, and reposèd himself by a well of water, to consider how he might manage his business for the best. And, 1. He acknowledged God by a particular prayer, v. 12. 14, wherein, (1.) He petitions for prosperity and good success in this affair; Send me good speed, this day. Note, We have leave to be particular in recommending our affairs to the conduct and care of the Divine Providence. Those that would have good speed, must pray for it, this day, in this affair; thus we must in all our undertakings acknowledge God, Prov. 3. 6. And if we thus look up to God in every undertaking which we are in care about, we shall have the comfort of having done our duty, whatever the issue be. (2.) He pleads God's covenant with his master Abraham; O God of my master Abraham, show kindness to him. Note, As the children of good parents, so the servants of good masters, have peculiar encouragement in the prayers they offer to God for prosperity and success. (3.) He proposes a sign, v. 14, not by it to limit God, or with a design to proceed no further, if he were not gratified in it; but it is a prayer, [1.] That God would provide a good wife for his young master; and that was a good prayer. He knew that a prudent wife is from the Lord, (Prov. 19. 14.) and therefore that for this he will be inquired of. He desires that his master's wife might be a humble and industrious woman, bred up to care and labour, and willing to put her hand to any work that was to be done; and that she might be of a courtious disposition, and charitable to strangers. When he came to seek a wife for his master, he did not go to the
Come in, thou blessed of the Lord, wherefore standest thou without? For I have prepared the house, and room for the camels. 32. And the man came into the house: and he ungirded his camels, and gave straw and provender for the camels, and water to wash his feet, and the men's feet that were with him. 33. And there was set meat before him to eat: but he said, I will not eat, until I have told mine errand. And he said, Speak on. 34. And he said, I am Abraham's servant. 35. And the Lord hath blessed my master great; and he is become great: and he hath given him flocks, and herds, and silver, and gold, and serviteurs, and maidservants, and camels, and asses. 36. And Sarah my master's wife bare a son to my master when she was old: and unto him hath he given all that he hath. 37. And my master made me swear, saying, Thou shalt not take a wife to my son of the daughters of the Canaanites, in whose land I dwell: 38. But thou shalt go unto my father's house, and to my kindred, and take a wife unto my son. 39. And I said unto my master, Peradventure the woman will not follow me. 40. And he said unto me, The Lord, before whom I walk, will send his angel with thee, and prosper thy way; and thou shalt take a wife for my son of my kindred, and of my father's house. 41. Then shalt thou be clear from this my oath, when thou comest to my kindred, and if they give not thee one, thou shalt be clear from my oath. 42. And I came this day unto the well, and said, O Lord God of my master Abraham, if now thou do prosper my way which I go: 43. Behold, I stand by the well of water; and it shall come to pass, that when the virgin cometh forth to draw water, and I say to her, Give me, I pray thee, a little water of thy pitcher to drink; 44. And she said to me, Both drink thou, and I will also draw for thy camels: let the same be the woman, whom the Lord hath appointed out for my master's son. 45. And before I had done speaking in mine heart, behold, Rebekah came forth with her pitcher on her shoulder; and she went down unto the well, and drew water; and I said unto her, Let me drink, I pray thee. 46. And she made haste, and let down her pitcher from her shoulder, and said, Drink, and I will give thy camels drink also: so I drank, and she made the camels drink also. 47. And I asked her, and said, Whose daughter art thou? And she said, The daughter of Bethuel, Nahor's son, whom Milcah bare unto him: and I put the ear ring upon her face, and the bracelets upon

29. And Rebekah had a brother, and his name was Laban: and Laban ran out unto the man, unto the well. 30. And it came to pass, when he saw the ear-ring, and bracelets upon his sister's hands, and when he heard the words of Rebekah his sister, saying, Thus spake the man unto me; that he came unto the man; and, behold, he stood by the camels by the well. 31. And he said, GENESIS, XXIV.

II. The full account which he gave them of his errand, and the count he makes to them for their consent respecting Rebekah. Observe, 1. How intent he was upon his business; though he was come off a journey, and come to a good house, he would not eat till he had told his errand, and had left doing of our work, and the fulfilling of our trust, either for God or man, should be preferred by us before our necessary food: it was our Saviour's meat and drink, John 4. 34. 2. How ingenious he was in the management of it: he approved himself in this matter, both a prudent man, and a man of integrity, faithful to his master by whom he was trusted, and just to those with whom he was born.

1. He gives a short account of the state of his master's family, v. 34. 36. He was welcome before, but we may suppose him doubly welcome, when he said, I am Abraham's servant; Abraham's name, no doubt, was well-known among them, and respected, and we may suppose them not altogether ignorant of his state, for Abraham knew their's, ch. 25. 20. 24. Two things he suggests, to recommend his proposal. [1.] That his master Abraham, through the blessing of God, had a very good estate; and, [2.] That he had settled it all upon Isaac, for whom he was now a suitor.

2. He tells them the charge his master had given him, to fetch a wife for his son from among his kindred, with the reason of it, v. 37, 38. Thus he insinuates a pleasing hint, that though Abraham was removed to a country at so great a distance, yet he could still run in the remembrance of, and a respect for his relations that he had left behind. The highest degrees of divine affection must not divest us of natural affection. He likewise obviates an objection, That if Isaac were deserving, he need not send so far off for a wife: why did he not marry nearest home? 'For a good reason,' (says he;) 'my master's son must not match with a Canaanitc.' He further recommends his proposal. [1.] From the knowledge of his master, who had been so long a time with Abraham, he took encouragement from the testimony of his conscience, that he walked before God in a regular course of holy living, and thence inferred that God would prosper him; probably, he refers to that covenant which God had made with him, ch. 17. 1. I am God all-sufficient, walk before me. Therefore, (says he,) the God before whom I walk, will send his angel. Note, While we make conscience of the respect of the providence of God to his comfort of God's part of it; and we should learn to apply general promises to particular cases, as there is occasion. [2.] From the care he himself had taken to preserve their liberty of giving or refusing their consent, as they should see cause, without incurring the guilt of perjury, v. 39. 41. which showed him, in general, to be a cautious man, and particularly careful that their consent might not be forced, but he either free, or not at all.

3. He relates to them the wonderful concurrence of providences, to countenance and further the proposal, plainly showing the finger of God in it. [1.] He tells them how he had prayed for direction by a sign, v. 42. 44. Note, It is good dealing with those, who by prayer take God along with them in their dealings. [2.] How God had answered his prayer in the memorable letter of it. Though he did but speak in his heart, (v. 45.) which perhaps he mentions, lest it should be suspected that Rebekah had overheard his prayer, and designedly humoured it; 'No,' says he, 'I spake it in my heart, so that none heard it but God, to whom thoughts are words, and from him the answer came,' v. 46, 47. [3.] How he had immediately acknowledged God's goodness to him therein, leading him, and all that was by him, to a clear present right way. Note, God's way is always the right way, Ps. 107. 7, and those are well-led, whom he leads.

4. He fairly refers the matter to their consideration, and waits their resolution, v. 49, "If you
...deal kindly and truly with my master, well and good; if you will be sincerely kind, you will accept the proposal, and I have what I come for; if not, do not hold me in suspense." Note, Those who deal fairly, have reason to expect fair dealing. (5.) They freely and cheerfully close with the proposal, upon a very good principle, v. 50, "The thing proceedeth from the Lord. Providence smiles upon it, and we have nothing to say against it." They do not object distance of place; Abraham’s forsaking them; his having no land in possession, but personal estate only: they do not question the truth of what this man said; but, [1.] They trust much to his integrity. It were well, if honesty did so universally prevail among men, that it might be as much an act of prudence, as it is of good nature, to take a man at word. [2.] They trust more to God’s providence, and therefore by silence give consent, because it appears to be directed and disposed by infinite wisdom. Note, A marriage is likely then to be comfortable, when it appears to proceed from the Lord.

(6.) Abraham’s servant makes a thankful acknowledgment of the good success he had met with, [1.] To God, v. 52, he worshipped the Lord. Observe, First, As his good success went on, he went on to bless God. Those that pray without ceasing, should in every thing give thanks, and own God in every step of mercy. Secondly, God sent his angel before him, and so gave him success, v. 7, 46. But when he has the desired success, he worships God, not the angel. Whatever benefit we have by the ministration of angels, all the glory must be given to the Lord of the angels, Rev. 19. [2.] He pays his respects to the family also, and particularly to the bride, v. 52. He presented her, and her mother, and brother, with many precious things; both to give a real proof of his master’s riches and generosity, and in gratitude for their civility to him, and further to ingratiate himself with them.

51. And they did eat and drink, he and the man that were with him, and tarried all night; and they rose up in the morning, and he said, Send me away unto my master. 55. And her brother and her mother said, Let the damsel abide with us a few days, at the least, ten; after that she shall go. 56. And he said unto them, Hinder me not, seeing the Lord hath prospered my way; send me away, that I may go to my master. 57. And they said, We will call the damsel, and inquire at her mouth. 58. And they called Rebekah, and said unto her, Wilt thou go with this man? And she said, I will go. 59. And they sent away Rebekah their sister, and her nurse, and Abraham’s servant, and his men. 60. And they blessed Rebekah, and said unto her, Thou art our sister; be thou the mother of thousands of millions, and let thy seed possess the gate of them which hate them. 61. And Rebekah arose, and her damsels, and they rode upon the camels, and followed the man: and the servant took Rebekah, and went his way.

of the tediousness of her journey, or the difficulty of leaving her relations, to come into a strange place; but having seen Providence going before her in the affair, she accommodates herself with cheerfulness to her new relation. These that by faith are espoused to Christ, and would be presented as chaste virgins to him, might have good conformity to this example, humble themselves, as Rebekah, who lighted, when she saw Isaac on foot, and must put themselves into subjection to him who is their head, Eph. 5. 24, as Rebekah, signifying it by the veil she put on, 1 Cor. 11. 10.

III. They were brought together, (probably, after some further acquaintance,) to their mutual comfort, v. 67. Observe here, 1. What an affectionate son he was to his mother: it was about three years since she died, and yet he was not, till now, comforted concerning it; the wound which that affliction gave to his tender spirit, bled so long, it was never healed, till God brought him into this new relation: thus crosses and comforts are balances to each other, (Eccl. 7. 14.) and help to keep the scale even. 2. What an affectionate husband he was to his wife, Note. Those that have approved themselves well in one relation, it may be hoped, will do so in another. She became his wife, and he loved her: there was all the reason in the world why he should, for so ought men to love their wives even as themselves. The duty of the relation is then done, and the comfort of the relation is then enjoyed, when mutual love governs; for there the Lord commands the blessing.

CHAP. XXV.

The sacred historian, in this chapter, 1. Takes his leave of Abraham, with an account, 1. Of his children by another wife, v. 1-4. 2. Of his last will and testament, v. 5, 6. 3. Of his age, death, and burial, v. 7-10. He takes his leave of Ishmael, with a short account of his children, v. 12-16. 2. Of his age and death, v. 17, 18. 3. He enters upon the history of Isaac. 1. His prosperity, v. 11. 2. The conception and birth of his two sons, with the oracle of God concerning them, v. 19-26. 3. Their different characters, v. 27, 28. 4. Esau's selling his birth-right to Jacob, v. 29-34.

1. THEN again Abraham took a wife; and her name was Keturah. 2. And she bare him Zimran, and Jokshan, and Medan, and Midian, and Ishbak, and Shuah. 3. And Jokshan begat Sheba, and Dedan. And the sons of Dedan were Asshurim, Letushim, and Leummim. 4. And the sons of Midian; Ephah, and Epher, and Hanoch, and Abida, and Eldaah. All these were the children of Keturah. 5. And Abraham gave all that he had unto Isaac. 6. But unto the sons of the concubines, which Abraham had, Abraham gave gifts, and sent them away from Isaac his son, while he yet lived, eastward, unto the east-country. 7. And these are the days of the years of Abraham's life which he lived, an hundred thirty and five and fifteen years. 8. Then Abraham gave up the ghost, and died in a good old age, an old man, and full of years; and was gathered to his people. 9. And his sons Isaac and Ishmael buried him in the cave of Machpelah, in the field of Ephron the son of Zohar the Hittite, which is before Mamre; 10. The field which Abraham purchased of the sons of Heth: there was Abraham buried, and Sarah his wife.

Abraham lived, after the marriage of Isaac, 35 years, and all that is recorded concerning him during that time, lies here in a very few verses; we hear no more of God's extraordinary appearances to him, or trials of him; for all the days, even of the best and greatest saints, are not eminent days, some slide fainently, and neither come respite with observation; such were these last days of Abraham.

We have here,

1. An account of his children by Keturah, another wife, which he married after the death of Sarah. He had buried Sarah, and married Isaac, the two dear companions of his life, and was now solitary; he wanted a nurse, his family wanted a governor, and it was not good for him to be thus alone; he therefore marries Keturah, probably the chief of his maid-servants, born in his house, or bought with money. Marriage is not forbidden to old age. By her he had six sons, in whom the promise made to Abraham, concerning the great increase of his posterity, was in part fulfilled, which, it is likely, he had an eye to in this marriage. The strength he received by the promise, still remained in him, to show how much the virtue of the promise exceeds the power of nature.

2. We have also at this time his account of the estate which Abraham made of his children. After the birth of these sons, he set his house in order, with prudence and justice. 1. He made Isaac his heir, as he was bound to do, in justice to Sarah his first and principal wife, and to Rebekah who married Isaac upon the assurance of it, ch. 24. 36. In this all which he settled upon Isaac, are included, perhaps the promise of the land of Canaan, and the enta 1 of the covenant. Or, God having made Isaac heir, he might have given him all that Abraham therefore made him heir of his estate. Our affection and gifts should attend God's. 2. He gave portions to the rest of his children, both to Ishmael, though at first he was sent empty away, and to his sons by Keturah. It was just to provide for them; parents that do not imitate him here are worse than infidels. It was prudent to settle them in places distant from Isaac, that they might not pretend to divide the inheritance with him, nor be under care or expense to him. Observe, He did this while he yet lived, lest it should not have been done, or not so well done, afterward. Note, In many cases, it is wisdom for men to make their own hands their executors, and what they find to do, to do it while they live, as far as they can. The sons of the concubines were sent into the country that lay east from Canaan, and their posterity were called the children of the east, because of their numbers, Judg. 6. 5, 33. Their great increase was the fruit of the promise made to Abraham, that God would multiply his seed. God, in dispensing his blessings, does as Abraham did; common blessings he gives to the children of this world, as to the sons of the bond-woman; but, covenant blessings he reserves for the heirs of promise. All that he has, is their's, for these are his Isaac's, from whom the rest shall be for ever separated.

III. The age and death of Abraham, v. 7, 8. He lived 175 years; just 100 years after he came to Canaan; so long he was a sojourner in a strange country. Though he lived long, and lived well, though he did good, and could be ill-spared, yet he died at last. Observe how his death is here described:

1. He gave up the ghost. His life was not extended, but his days were numbered; the sun went down, and he put his hand upon the edge of the day; his spirit departed from him. So he went to his fathers. 2. He died in a good old age, an old man; so God had promised him. His death was his discharge from the burthens of his age; an old man would not so live, always: it was also the crown of the glory of his old age. 3. He was full of years; or full of life, (as it might be supplied,) including all the conveniences and comforts of life. He did not live till the world was weary of him, but till he was weary of the world; he had had enough of it, and desired no more, Rixi quantum satis est — I have lived long enough. Sene. A good man, though he should not die old, dies full of days, satisfied with his being here, and longing to live in a better place. 4. He was gathered to his people. His body was gathered to the congregation of the dead, and his soul to the congregation of the blessed.

Note, Death gathers us to our people. Those that are our people while we live, whether the people of God, or the children of this world, are the people to whom death will gather us.

IV. His burial, v. 9, 10. Here is nothing recorded of the pomp or ceremony of his funeral; only we are told, 1. Who buried him; His sons Isaac and Ishmael. It was the last office of respect they had to pay to their good father. Some distance there had formerly been between Isaac and Ishmael; but it seems either that Abraham had himself brought them together while he lived, or, at least, that his death reconciled them. 2. Where they buried him, in his own burying-place, which, he had purchased, and in which he had buried Sarah. Note, Those that in life have been very dear to each other, may not only innocently, but laudably desire to be buried together, that in their deaths they may not be divided, and in token of their hopes of rising together.

11. And it came to pass after the death of Abraham, that God blessed his son Isaac; and Isaac dwelt by the well Lahai-roi. 12. Now these are the generations of Ishmael, Abraham's son, whom Hagar the Egyptian, Sarah's handmaid, bare unto Abraham. 13. And these are the names of the sons of Ishmael, by their names, according to their generations: the first-born of Ishmael, Nebajoth; and Kedar, and Adbeel, and Mibsam. 14. And Mishma, and Dumah, and Massa. 15. Hadar, and Tema, Jetur, Naphish, and Kedemah: 16. These are the sons of Ishmael, and these are their names by their towns, and by their castles; twelve princes according to their nations. 17. And these are the years of the life of Ishmael, an hundred and thirty and seven years: and he gave up the ghost and died; and was gathered unto his people. 18. And they dwelt from Havilah unto Shur, that is before Egypt, as thou goest toward Assyria: and he died in the presence of all his brethren.

Immediately after the account of Abraham's death, Moses begins the story of Isaac, (v. 11,) and tells us where he dwelt, and how remarkably God blessed him. Note, The blessing of Abraham did not die with him, but survived to all the children of the promise. But he presently digresses from the story of Isaac, to give a short account of Ishmael, forasmuch as he also was a son of Abraham, and God had made some promises concerning him, which it was requisite we should know the accomplishment of.

Observe here what is said,

1. Concerning his children; he had twelve sons, twelve princes they are called, (v. 16.) heads of families, which, in process of time, became nations, distinct tribes, numerous, and very considerable. They peopled a very large continent that lay between Egypt and Assyria, called Arabia. The names of his twelve sons are recorded. Medan and Kedar we often read of in scripture. And some very good expositors have taken notice of the signification of those three names which are put together, (v. 14.) as containing good advice to us all, Mishma, Dumah, and Massa, that is, hear, keep silence, and beary we have them together in the same order, Jam. 1. 19. Be swift to hear, slow to speak, slow to wrath. The posterity of Ishmael had not only made war in the fields, wherein they grew minute at times of peace; but they had towns and castles, (v. 16.) wherein they fortified themselves in time of war. Now the number and strength of this family were the fruit of the promise made to Hagar concerning Ishmael, ch. 16. 10. and to Abraham, ch. 17. 20. and 21. 13. Note, Many that are strangers to the covenants of promise, yet are blessed with outward prosperity for the sake of their godly ancestors. Wealth and riches shall be in their house.

2. Concerning himself; here is an account of his age; he lived 137 years, (v. 17.) which is recorded, to show the efficacy of Abraham's prayer for him, ch. 17. 18. O that Ishmael might live before thee! Here is an account too of his death; he also was gathered to his people; but it is not said that he was full of days, though he lived to so great an age: he was not so weary of the world, nor so willing to leave it, as his good father was. Those words, he fell in the presence of all his brethren, whether they mean, as we take them, he died, or as others, his lot fell, are designed to show the fulfilling of that word to Hagar, ch. 16. 12. He shall dwell in the presence of all his brethren, that is, he shall flourish and be eminent among them, and shall hold his own to the last. Or, he died with his friends about him, which is comfortable. 19. And these are the generations of Isaac, Abraham's son: Abraham begat Isaac: 20. And Isaac was forty years old when he took Rebekah to wife, the daughter of Bethuel the Syrian of Padan-aram, the sister to Laban the Syrian. 21. And Isaac entreated the Lord for his wife, because she was barren: and the Lord was entreated of him, and Rebekah his wife conceived. 22. And the children struggled together within her; and she said, If it be so, why am I thus? And she went to inquire of the Lord. 23. And the Lord said unto her, Two nations are in thy womb, and two manner of people shall be separated from thy bowels; and the one people shall be stronger than the other people; and the elder shall serve the younger. 24. And when her days to be delivered were fulfilled, behold, there were twins in her womb. 25. And the first came out red, all over like a hairy garment; and they called his name Esau. 26. And after that came his brother out, and his hand took hold on Esau's heel: and his name was called Jacob: and Isaac was threescore years old when she bare them. 27. And the boys grew: and Esau was a cunning hunter, a man of the field; and Jacob was a plain man, dwelling in tents. 28. And Isaac loved Esau, because he did eat of his venison: but Rebekah loved Jacob.

We have here an account of the birth of Jacob and Esau, the twin sons of Isaac and Rebekah: their entrance into the world was (which is not usual) one of the most considerable parts of their story; nor is much related concerning Isaac, but what had reference to his father while he lived, and to his sons afterward. For Isaac seems not to have been a man of action, nor much tried, but to have spent his days in quietness and silence.

Now concerning Jacob and Esau we are told,

That they were preferred for; their parents, after they had been long child, to recompense them by prayer, v. 20, 21. Isaac was 40 years old when he was married; though he was an only son, and the person from whom the promised seed was to come, yet he made no haste to marry. He was 60 years old when his sons were born, (v. 26.) so that, after he was married, he had no child for 20 years. Note, Though the accomplishment of God's promise is always sure, yet it is often slow, and seems contrary to the promise; and hence patience is required, that the faith of believers may be tried, their patience exercised, and mercies long waited for may be the more welcome when they come. While this mercy was delayed, Isaac did not approach to a handmaid's bed, as Abraham had done, and Jacob afterward; for he loved Rebekah, ch. 24. 67. But, 1. He prayed: he entreated the Lord for his wife; though God had promised to multiply his family, he prayed for it. For God's promises must not supersede, but encourage our prayers, and be improved as the ground of our faith. Though he had prayed for this mercy very often, and had continued his supplication many years, and it was not granted, yet he did not leave off praying for it: for men ought always to pray, and not to faint, (Luke 18. 1.) to pray without ceasing, and knock till the door be opened. He prayed for his wife: some read it, with his wife. Note, Husbands and wives should pray together, which is intimated in the apostle's caution, that their prayers be not hindered, 1 Pet. 3. 7. The Jews have a tradition, that Isaac, at length, took his wife with him to Mount Moriah, where God had promised that he would multiply Abraham's seed, ch. 22. 17, and there in his prayer with her; and for her, pleaded the promise made in the covenant of the father, and had been entreated of him. Note, Children are the gift of God. Those that continue instant in prayer, as Isaac did, shall find at last that they did not seek in vain, Isa. 45. 19.

II. That they were prophesied of before they were born; and great mysteries were wrapt up in the prophecies which went before of them, v. 22, 23. Long had Isaac prayed for a son; and now his prayers were yielded of two, to recompense him for his long waiting. Thus God often outdoes our prayers, and gives more than we are able to ask or think. Now Rebekah being with child of these two sons, observe here,

1. How she was perplexed in her mind concerning her present case: the children struggled together within her. The communion she felt, was altogether extraordinary, and made her very uneasie; while she was apprized that the birth would be her death, or that she was weary of the intestine tumult, or that she suspected it to be an ill omen, it seems she was ready to wish that either she had not been with child, or that she might die immediately, and not bring forth such a struggling brood. If it be so, or, since it is so, Why am I thus? Before the want of children was her trouble, n w, the struggle of the children is no less so. Note, (1.) The comforts we are most desirous of, are sometimes found to bring along with them more occasion of trouble and uneasiness than we thought of; vanity being written upon all things under the sun, God thus teaches us to read it. (2.) We are taught to be discontented, because of the uneasiness that attends them. We know not when we are pleased; we know neither how to want, nor how to abound. This struggle between Jacob and Esau in the womb, represents the struggle that is between the kingdom of God and the kingdom of Satan, [1.] In the world; the seed of the woman, and the seed of the serpent, have been contending ever since, and will be so to the end of the world. Note, (3.) Christ himself came to send fire on earth, and this division, Luke 12. 49, 51. But let not this be an offence to us. A holy war is better than the peace of the Devil's palace. [2.] In the hearts of believers; no sooner is Christ formed in the soul, than immediately there begins a conflict between the flesh and the spirit, Gal. 5. 17. The stream is not turned without a mighty struggle, which yet will not change us. It is better to have a conflict with sin, than tamely to submit to it.

2. What course she took for her relief. She went to inquire of the Lord. Some think Melchizedek was now consulted as an oracle, or, perhaps some Urin or Terahjim were now used to inquire of God by, as afterward in the breast-plate of judgment. Note, The word and prayer, by both which we now inquire of the Lord, give great relief to those that are, upon any account, perplexed. It is an ease to the mind to spread our case before the Lord, and ask counsel at his mouth, Go into the sanctuary, Ps. 73. 17.

3. The information given her upon her inquiry, which explained the mystery. Two nations are in thy womb, v. 23. She was now big, not only with two children, but two nations, which should not only in their manners and dispositions greatly differ from each other, but in their interests, clash and contend with each other; and the issue of the contest should be, that the elder should serve the younger, which was fulfilled in the subjection of the Edomites for many ages, to the house of David, till they revolted, 2 Chron. 21. 8. Observe here, (1.) That God is a Free Agent in dispersing his grace; it is his prerogative to make a difference between those who have not as yet themselves done either good or evil. This the Apostle infers from hence, Rom. 9. 12. (2.) That in the struggle between grace and corruption in the soul, grace, the younger, shall certainly get the upper hand at last.

III. That when they were born, there was a great difference between them, which served to confirm what had been foretold, (v. 23.) was a presage of the accomplishment of it, and served greatly to illustrate the type.

1. There was a great difference in their bodies, v. 25. Esau, when he was born, was rough and hairy, as if he had been already a grown man; whence he had his name Esau, made, reared already. This was an indication of a very strong constitution, and gave cause to suspect that he would be a very robust, daring, active man. But Jacob was soft and tender, like his mother. Note, (1.) The difference of men's capacities, and consequently of their condition in the world, arises very much from the difference of their natural constitution; some are plainly designed by nature for activity and honour, others as manifestly marked for obscurity. This instance of the divine sovereignty in the kingdom of providence, may perhaps help to reconcile us to the doctrine of the divine sovereignty in the kingdom of grace. (2.) It is God's usual way to choose the weak things of the world, and to pass by the mighty,

1 Cor. 1. 26, 27.

2. There was a manifest contest in their births; Esau, the stronger, came out first; but Jacob's hand took hold on his heel, v. 25. This signified, (1.) That he, in his pursuit of the birthright, was laboring; from the first, he seems to have had a strong mind, and if possible, to have prevented his brother. (2.) His prevailing for it at last; that, in process of time, he should undermine his brother, and gain his point. This passage is referred to, Hos. 12. 3, and from hence he had his name Jacob, a supplanter.

3. They were very unlike in the temper of their minds, and the way of living they chose, v. 27. The young man, Jacob, seems to have been of a quiet, studious turn of mind. (1.) Esau was a man for this world; a man addicted to his sports, for he was a hunter, and a man that knew how to live by his wits, for he was a cunning hunter; recreation was his business, he studied the art of it, and spent all his time in it. He never loved a book, nor cared for being within doors, but he was a man of the field; like Nimrod and Ishmael, all for the game, and never well but when he was upon the sport. He had business of a higher sort, he set up for a gentleman, and a soldier. (2.) Jacob was a man for the other world; he was not cut cut for a statesman, nor did he affect to look great, but he was a plain man, dwelling in tents; an honest man that always meant well, and dealt fairly, that preferred the true delights of solitude and retirement, to all the pretended pleasure of busy noisy sports; he dwelt in tents, [1.] As a shepherd. He was attached to that safe and silent employment of keeping sheep, to which also he bred up his children, ch. 46. 34. Or, [2.] As a student. He frequented the tents of Melchizedek, or Heber, as some understand it, to be taught by them divine things. And this was that son of Isaac, on whom the covenant was entailed.

4. Their interest in the affections of their parents was likewise different. They had but these two children, and it seems, one was the father's darling, and the other the mother's, v. 28. (1.) Isaac, though he was not a stirring man himself, (for when he went into the fields, he went to meditate and pray, not to hunt,) yet he loved to have his son active. Esau knew how to please him, and showed a great respect for him, by treating him often with venison, which gained him the affections of the good old man, and won upon him more than one would have thought. (2.) Rebekah was mindful of the oracle of God, which had given the preference to Jacob, and therefore she preferred him in her love. And if it be lawful for parents to make a difference between their children upon any account, doubtless Rebekah was in the right, that loved him whom God loved.
We have here a bargain made between Jacob and Esau about the birth-right, which was Esau's by natural birth-right, but with an eye to spiritual blessings, including the excellency of dignity, and the excellency of power, as well as the double portion, ch. 49. 3. It seemed to be such a birth-right as had then the blessing annexed to it, and the entail of the promise. Now see, 1. Jacob's pious desire of the birth-right, which yet he sought to obtain by indirect courses, not agreeable to his character as a plain man. It was not out of pride or ambition: he coveted the birth-right, but with an eye to spiritual blessings, which he had got well-acquainted with in his tents, while Esau had lost the scent of them in the field. For this, he is to be commended, that he coveted earnestly the best gifts; yet in this he cannot be justified, that he took advantage of his brother's necessity, to make him a very hard bargain, v. 31. Sell me this day thy birth-right. Probably, there had formerly been some communication between them about this matter, and then it was not so great a surprise upon Esau as here it seems to be; and, it may be, Esau had sometimes spoken slightly of the birth-right and its appurtenances, which encouraged Jacob to make this proposal to him. And so, Jacob is in some measure, excusable in what he did to gain his point. Note, plain men, that have their conversation in simplicity and godly sincerity, and without worldly cunning, are, in the sight of God, the wisest of all for their souls and eternity. These are wise indeed, that are wise for another world. Jacob's wisdom appeared in two things, 1. That he chose the exact time; took the opportunity when it offered itself, and did not let it slip. 2. That having made the bargain, he made it sure, and got it confirmed by Esau's oath, Swear to me this day, v. 33. He took Esau when he was in the mind, and would not leave him a chance of revocation. In a case of this nature, it is good to be sure, 2. Esau's profane contempt of the birth-right, and the foolish sale he made of it. He is called forsooke Esau for it, Heb. 12. 16, because, for one morsel of meat, he sold his birth-right; as dear a morsel as ever was eaten since the forbidden fruit; and he lived to regret it, when it was too late. Never was there such a foolish bargain as that which Esau now made; as Jacob urged him to return to his prayers, and raised the reputation of a cunning-man; and perhaps had often bantered his brother Jacob as a weak and simple man. Note, 1. There are those that are penny-wise and pound-foolish, cunning hunters that can out-wit others and draw them into their snares, and yet are themselves imposed upon by Satan's wiles, and led captive by him at his will. 2. God often chooses the foolish things of the world, by them to confound the wise. Plain Jacob makes a fool of cunning Esau. Observe the instances of Esau's folly. (1.) His appetite was very strong, v. 29, 30. Poor Jacob had got some bread and pottage (v. 34,) for his dinner, and was sitting down to it contentedly enough, without venison; when Esau came from hunting, hungry and weary, and perhaps had caught nothing. And now Jacob's pottage pleased his eye better than ever his game had done. Give me (says he) some of that red, that red, as it is in the original; it suited his own colour, v. 25, and, in reproach to him, for this he was ever afterward called Edom, Red. Nay, it should seem, he was so faint, that he could not feed himself, nor had he a servant at hand to help him, but entreats his brother to feed him. Note, [1.] Those that addict themselves to sport, squander themselves, for very vanity. How few do they make of the most needful business, and gain the greatest advantages, with half the pains they take, and half the perils they run, in pursuit of their foolish pleasures. [2.] Those that work with quietness, are more constantly and comfortably provided for than others, when the half of what they have is not always to the wise, but they that trust in the Lord do good, verily they shall be fed, fed with daily bread; not as Esau, sometimes feasting, and sometimes fainting. [3.] The gratifying of the sensual appetite, is that which ruins thousands of precious souls: surely if Esau was hungry and faint, he might have got a meat's meal cheaper than at the expense of his birth-right; but he was unaccountably fond of the red pottage, and could not deny himself the satisfaction of a mess of it, whatever it cost him. Never better can come of it, when men's hearts walk after their eyes, Job 31. 7, and when they serve their own bellies: therefore, Look not thou upon the wine, or, as Esau, upon the pottage, when it is red, when it gives that colour in the cup, in the dish, which is most inviting, Prov. 23. 31. If we use ourselves to deny ourselves, we break the force of most temptations. (2.) His reasoning was very weak, v. 32. Behold I am at the point to die; and if he were, would nothing serve to keep him alive but this pottage? It the famine were now in the land, (ch. 26. 1.) as Dr. Lightfoot conjectures, we cannot suppose Isaac so poor, or Rebekah so bad a housekeeper, but that he might have been supplied with food convenient, other ways, and might have saved his birth-right; and perhaps would have held it a good bargain, as it were, if by a longing condition, nothing will please him but this red, this red pottage, and to palliate his desire, he pretends he is at the point to die; if it had been so, was it not better for him to die in honour than to live in disgrace; to die under a blessing than to live under a curse? The birth-right was typical of spiritual privileges, those of the church of the first-born. Esau was now tried how he would value them, and how he would use them; as an instance of his own sensuality; may be he yet get relief against them, he cares not for his birth-right. Naboah was better principled, who would lose his life rather than sell his vineyard, because his part in the earthily Canaan signified his part in the heavenly, 1 Kings 21. 3. [1.] If we look on Esau's birth-right as only a temporal advantage, what he said, had something of truth in it, namely, that our worldly enjoyments, even those that we are most fond of, and most ready to part with for life, Ps. 49. 6. 8. They will not put by the stroke of death, nor cease the pangs, nor remove the sting; yet Esau, who set up for a gentleman, should have had a greater and more noble spirit, than to sell even such an honour a cheap bargain. [2.] But being of a spiritual nature, his undervaluing of it was the greatest profaneness imaginable. Note, It is egregious folly to part with our interest in God, and Christ, and Heaven, for the sake of the sensual enjoyments of this world; as bad a bargain as he that sold a birth-right for a dish of broth. (3.) Repentance was hid from his eyes, v. 34. He did eat and drink, pleased his palate, satisfied his cravings, blessed himself when he thought what a good meal's meat he had had, and then carelessly rose up and went his way, without any serious reflections upon the half bargain he had made. He, thus having abused himself, went his way, and revoked the bargain; made no appeal to his father about it, nor proposed to his brother to compound the matter; but the bargain which his necessity had made, (supposing it were so,) his profaneness confirmed ex post facto—after the deed; and by his subsequent neglect and contempt, he did, as it were, acknowledge a fraud against himself, for by his very conduct, he put the bargain past recall. Note, People are inclined, not so much by doing what is amiss, as by doing it and not repenting of it, doing it and standing to it
CHAP. XXVI.

In this chapter, we have, I. Isaac in adversity, by reason of a famine in the land, which 1. Obliges him to change his quarters, v. 1. But, 2. God visits him with direction and comfort, v. 2. 3. He foolishly denies his wife, being in distress, and is reproved for it by Abimelech, v. 6. 4. Isaac in prosperity, by the blessing of God upon him, v. 12. 4. And the Philistines were envious at him, v. 14. 17. 2. He continued industrious in his business, v. 18. 23. 3. God appeared to him, and encouraged him to be devotedly acknowledged. God, v. 24, 25. 4. The Philistines, at length, made court to him, and made a covenant with him, v. 26. 33. 5. The disgraceful marriage of his son Esau was an allay to the comfort of his prosperity, v. 34, 35.

1. AND there was a famine in the land, beside the first famine that was in the days of Abraham. And Isaac went unto Abimelech king of the Philistines unto Gerar. 2. And the Lord appeared unto him, and said, Go not down into Egypt; dwell in the land which I shall tell thee of; 3. Sojourn in this land, and I will be with thee, and will bless thee: for unto thee, and unto thy seed, I will give all these countries, and I will perform the oath which I sware unto Abraham thy father; 4. And I will make thy seed to multiply as the stars of heaven, and will give unto thy seed all these countries; and in thy seed shall all the nations of the earth be blessed; 5. Because that Abraham obeyed my voice, and kept my charge, my commandments, my statutes, and my laws.

I. God tried Isaac by providence: Isaac had been trained up in a believing dependence upon the divine grant of the land of Canaan to him and his heirs; yet now that there is a famine in the land, v. 1, what shall he think of the promise, when the promised land will not find him bread? Is such a grant worth accepting, upon such terms, and after so long a time? Yes, Isaac will still cleave to the covenant; and the less valuable Canaan in itself seems to be, the better he is taught to value it, 1. As a token of God's everlasting kindness to him; and 2. As a type of heaven's everlasting blessedness. Note, The intrinsic worth of God's promises cannot be lessened in a believer's eye by any cross providences. II. He directed him under this trial by his word. Isaac finds himself straitened by the scarcity of provisions; somewhither he must go for supply; it should seem, he intends for Egypt, whither his father went in the like strait, but he takes Gerar in his way, full of thoughts, no doubt, which way he had best steer his course, till God graciously appeared to him, and determined him, abundantly to his satisfaction. 1. God bid him stay where he was, and not go down into Egypt, v. 2. 3. Sojourn in this land: there was a famine in Jacob's days, and God bid him go down into Egypt, ch. 46. 3, 4; a famine in Isaac's days, and God left him to his liberty, directing him neither way; this variety in the divine procedure (considering that Egypt was always a place of trial and exercise to God's people) some ground upon the different characters of these three patriarchs. Abraham was a man of very high attainments, and intimate communion with God; and to him all places and conditions were alike. Isaac was a very good man, but not cut out for hardship; therefore he is forbidden to go to Egypt. Jacob was inured to difficulties, strong, and patient; and therefore he must go down into Egypt, that the trial of his faith might be to praise, and honour, and glory. Thus God proportions his people's trials to their strength. 2. He promised to be with him, and bless him, v. 3. As we may go any-where with comfort, when God's blessing goes with us; so we may stay any where contentedly, if that blessing rest upon us. 3. He renewed the covenant with him, which had so often been made with Abraham, repeating and ratifying the promises of the land of Canaan, a numerous issue, and the Messiah, v. 5. Note, Those that must live by faith, have need often to review, and repeat to themselves, the promises they are to live upon, especially when any are called to any instance of suffering or self-denial. 4. He recommended to him the good example of his father's obedience, as that which had preserved the entail of the covenant in his family, v. 5. Abraham obeyed my voice, Do thou do so too, and the promise shall be sure to thee. Abraham's obedience is here celebrated, to his honour; for by it he obtained a good report both with God and men. A great variety of words is here used to express the divine will, to which Abraham was obedient, my voice, my charge, my commandments, my statutes, and my laws, which may intimate that Abraham's obedience was universal; he obeyed the original laws of nature, the revealed laws of divine worship, particularly that of circumcision, and all the extraordinary precepts God gave him, as that of quitting his country, and that (which some think is more especially referred to) of the offering up of his son, which Isaac himself had reason enough to remember. Note, Those only shall have the benefit and comfort of God's covenant with their godly parents, that tread in the steps of their obedience. 6. And Isaac dwelt in Gerar: 7. And the men of the place asked him of his wife: and he said, She is my sister: for he feared to say, She is my wife; lest, said he, the men of the place should kill me for Rebekah, because she was fair to look upon. 8. And it came to pass, when he had been there a long time, that Abimelech king of the Philistines, looked out at a window, and saw, and beheld, Isaac was sporting with Rebekah his wife. 9. And Abimelech called Isaac, and said, Behold, of a surety she is thy wife: and how saidst thou, She is my sister? And Isaac said unto him, Because I said, lest I die for her. 10. And Abimelech said, What is this thou hast done unto us? one of the people might lightly have lien with thy wife, and thou shouldest have brought guiltiness upon us. 11. And Abimelech charged all his people, saying, He that toucheth this man or his wife, shall surely be put to death. Isaac had now laid aside all thoughts of going into Egypt, and in obedience to the heavenly vision, sets up his staff in Gerar, the country in which he was born, v. 6. yet there he enters into temptation, the same temptation that his good father had been once and again surprised and overcome by, namely, to deny his wife, and to give out that she was his sister. Observe, 1. How he sinned, v 7. Because his wife was handsome, he fancied the Philistines would find some way or other to take him off, that some of them might marry her; and therefore she must pass for his sister. It is an unaccountable thing, that both these great and good men should be guilty of so strange a piece of dissimulation, by which they so much exposed both their own and their wives' reputation. But we see, (1.) That very great men have sometimes been guilty of very great faults and follies. Let those therefore that stand, take heed lest they fall, and those that are fallen, not despair of being helped up again. We see, (2.) That there is an aptness in us to imitate even the weaknesses and infirmities of those we have a v.ue for; whereas we need only to k. o. our foot, lest we try to tread in the steps of godly men, we sometimes tread in their by-steps. 2. How he was detected, and the cheat discovered by the king himself. Abimelech (not the same that was in Abraham's days, ch. 20, for this was near 100 years after that) was the common name of the Philistine kings, as Caesar of the Roman emperors: he saw Isaac more familiar and pleasant with Rebekah than he knew he would be with his sister; (v. 8.) he saw him sporting with her, or laughing; it is the same word with that from which Isaac had his name; he was rejoicing with the wife of his youth, Prov. 5. 18. It becomes those in that relation to be pleasant with one another, as those that are pleased with one another. No where, may a man more allow himself to be innocently merry, than with his own wife and children. Abimelech dealt with him the fraud, (v. 9.) showed him how frivolous his excuse was, and what might have been the bad consequences of it; (v. 10.) and then, to convince him how groundless and unjust his jealousy of them was, took him and his family under his particular protection, forbidding any injury to be done to him or his wife, upon pain of death, v. 11. Note, (1.) A lying tongue is but for a moment. Truth is the daughter of time; and in time, it will out. (2.) One sin is often the inlet to many, and therefore the beginnings of sin ought to be avoided. (3.) The sins of professors shame them before those that are without. (4.) God can make those that are incensed against his people, though there may be some colour of cause for it, to know that it is at their peril, if they do them any hurt. See Ps. 105. 14, 15.

12. Then Isaac sowed in that land, and received in the same year an hundred fold: and the Lord blessed him: 13. And the man waxed great, and went forward, and grew until he became very great. 14. For he had possession of flocks, and possession of herds, and great store of servants: and the Philistines envied him. 15. For all the wells which his father's servants had digged in the days of Abraham his father, the Philistines had stopped them, and filled them with earth. 16. And Abimelech said unto Isaac, Go from us; for thou art much mightier than we. 17. And Isaac departed thence, and pitched his tent in the valley of Gerar, and dwelt there. 18. And Isaac digged again the wells of water, which they had digged in the days of Abraham his father: for the Philistines had stopped them after the death of Abraham: and he called their names after the names by which his father had called them. 19. And Isaac's servants digged in the valley, and found there a well of springing water. 20. And the herdsmen of Gerar did strive with Isaac's herdmen, saying, The water is our's: and he called the name of the well Esek; because they strove with him. 21. And they digged another well, and strove for that also: and he called the name of it Sitnah. 22. And he removed from thence, and digged another well; and for that they strove not: and he called the name of it Rehoboth; and he said, For now the Lord hath made room for us, and we shall be fruitful in the land. 23. And he went up from thence to Beer-sheba. 24. And the Lord appeared unto him the same night, and said, I am the God of Abraham thy father: fear not, for I am with thee, and will bless thee, and multiply thy seed for my servant Abraham's sake. 25. And he builded an altar there, and called upon the name of the Lord, and pitched his tent there: and there Isaac's servants digged a well.

Here we have,

I. The tokens of God's good will to Isaac; he blessed him, and prospered him, and made all that he had, to thrive under his hands. 1. His corn multiplied strangely, v. 12. He had no land of his own, but took land of the Philistines, and sowed it; and (he observed for the encouragement of poor tenants, that occupy other people's lands, and are honest and industrious) God blessed him with a great increase. He reaped an hundred fold; and there seems to be an emphasis laid upon the time; it was that same year, when there was a famine in the land; while others scarcely reaped at all, he reaped thus plentifully. See Isa. 65. 13, My servants shall eat, but ye shall be hungry, Ps. 37. 19, In the days of famine, they shall be satisfied. 2. His cattle also increased, v. 14. And they, v. 5. 13, have the great store of servants, whom he employed and maintained. Note, As goods are increased, they are increased that eat them, Excl. 5. 11.

II. The tokens of the Philistines' ill-will to him: they envied him, v. 14. It is an instance, 1. Of the vanity of the world, that the more men have of it, the more they are envied, and exposed to censure and injury. Who can stand before envy? Prov. 27. 4. See Excl. 4. 4. 2. Of the corruption of nature; for that is a bad principle indeed, which makes men grieve at the good of others; as if it must needs be ill with me, because it is well with my neighbour. (1.) They had already showed their ill-will to his family, by stopping up the wells which his father had digged, v. 15. This was spiteful and venal; because they had not their own water at these wells, they would not leave them for the use of others; so absurd a thing is malice. And it was perfidiously done; contrary to the covenant of friendship they had made with Abraham, ch. 21. 31, 32. No bonds will hold ill-nature. (2.) They expelled him out of their country, v. 16, 17. The king of Gerar began to look upon him with a jealous eye; Isaac's house was like a court, and his riches and retinue eclipsed Abimelech's; and therefore he must go further off: they were weary of his neighbourhood, because they saw that the Lord blessed him; whereas, for that reason, they should the rather have courted his stay, that they also might be blessed for his sake. Isaac does not insist upon the bargain he had made with them for the lands he held, nor upon his occupying and improving of them, nor does he offer to contest with them by force, though he was become very great; but very peaceably departs thence further from the royal city, and perhaps for a time very far from the Philistines. We should deny ourselves both in our rights and in our conveniences, rather than quarrel; a wise and a good man will rather retire into obscurity, like Isaac here into a valley, than sit high, to be the butt of envy and ill-will.

III. His constancy and continuance in his business still.

1. He kept up his husbandry, and continued industrious to find wells of water, and to fit them for his use, v. 18, &c. Though he was grown very rich, yet he was as solicitous as ever about the state of his flocks, and still looked well to his herds; when men grow great, they must take heed of thinking themselves too big and too high for their business. Though he was driven from the conveniences he had had, and could not follow his husbandry with the same ease and advantage as before, yet he was sole in the best of them; he was come into, which it is every man's prudence to do. Observe, (1.) He opened the wells that his father had digged, (v. 18.) and, out of respect to his father, called them by the same names that he had given them. Note, In our searches after truth, that fountain of living water, it is good to make use of the discoveries of former ages, which have been clouded by the corruptions of later times. Inquire for the way those wells which our fathers called which the adversaries of truth have stopped up; Ask thine elders, and they shall teach thee. (2.) His servants digged new wells, v. 19. Note, Though we must use the light of former ages, it does not therefore follow that we must rest in it, and make no advances; we must still be building upon their foundation, running to and fro, that knowledge may be increased, Dan. 12. 4.

In digging his wells, [1.] He met with much opposition, v. 20, 21. Those that open the fountains of truth, must expect contradiction. The two first wells they digged, were called Ezek and Sitnah, Contention and Hatred. See here, First, What is the nature of worldly things; they are make-bates, and occasions of strife. Secondly, What is often the lot even of the most quiet and peaceable men in this world; those that avoid strife, and avoiding it, cannot avoid being striven with, Ps. 120. 7. In this sense, Jeremiah was a man of contention, (Jer. 15. 10.) and Christ himself, though he is the Prince of peace. Thirdly, What a mercy it is to have plenty of water, to have it without striving for it! The more common this mercy is, the more reason we have to be thankful for it. [2.] At length he removed to a quiet settlement, cleaving to his peaceable profession. Possibly he saw that the days of his affairs were numbered, and did not wish to dwell with them that hated peace. Ps. 120. 6. He preferred quietness to victory. He digged a well, and for that they strvote not, v. 22. Note, Those that follow peace, sooner or later, shall find peace; those that study to be quiet, seldom fail of being so. How unlike was Isaac to his brother Ishmael, who, right or wrong, would hold what he had, against all the world, ch. 16. 12. And of which of these would we be found to partake? Rehoboth, Enlargements, room enough; in the two former wells we may see what the earth is, straitness and strife; men cannot thrive, for the throng of their neighbours; this well shows us what heaven is; it is enlargement and peace, room enough there, for there are many mansions.

2. He continued firm to his religion, and kept up his communion with God. (1.) God graciously affeared to him, v. 24. When the Philistines expelled him, forced him to remove from place to place, and gave him continual molestation, then God visited him, and gave him fresh assurances of his favour. Note, When men are found false and unkind, we may comfort ourselves that God is faithful and gracious; and his time to show himself so, is when we are most disappointed in our expectations from men. When Isaac was come to Beer-sheba, (v. 23.) it is probable that it troubled him to think of his unsettled condition, and that he could not be suffered to stay long in a place; and, in the multitude of these thoughts within him, that same night that he came weary and uneasy to Beer-sheba, God restored him his comforts to delight his heart. Probably, Isaac's minutes and apprehensions would not let him rest there! Fear not, says God to him, I am with thee, and will bless thee. Those may remove with comfort, that are sure of God's presence with them whithersoever they go. (2.) He was not wanting in his returns of duty to God; for there he built an altar, and called upon the name of the Lord, v. 25. Note, [1.] Whithersoever we go, we must take our religion along with us. Probably, Isaac's altars and his religious worship gave offence to the Philistines, and provoked them to be the more troublesome to him; yet he kept up his duty, whatever ill-will he might be exposed to by it. [2.] The comforts and encouragements God gives us by his word, should excite and quicken us to all instances of devotion, by which God may be honoured, and our intercourse with heaven maintained.

26. Then Abimelech went to him from Gerar, and Ahuzzath one of his friends, and Phichol the chief captain of his army. 27. And Isaac said unto them, Wherefore came ye to me, seeing ye hate me, and have sent me away from you? 28. And they said, We saw certainly that the Lord was with thee: and we said, Let there be now an oath betwixt us and thee, and let us make a covenant with thee; 29. That thou wilt do us no harm, as we have not touched thee, and as we have done unto thee nothing but good, and have sent thee away in peace: thou art now the blessed of the Lord. 30. And he made them a feast, and they did eat and drink. 31. And they rose up betimes in the morning, and sware one to another: and Isaac sent them away, and they departed from him in peace. 32. And it came to pass the same day, that Isaac's servants came, and told him concerning the well which they had digged, and said unto him, We have found water. 33. And he called it Sheba: therefore the name of the city is Beer-sheba unto this day.

We have here the contests that had been between Isaac and the Philistines issuing in a happy peace and reconciliation.

1. Abimelech makes a friendly visit to Isaac, in token of the respect he had for him, v. 26. Note, When a man's ways please the Lord, he makes even his enemies to be at peace with him, Prov. 16. 7. King's hearts are in his hands, and when he pleases, he can turn them to favour his people.

2. Isaac prudently and cautiously questions his sincerity in this visit, v. 27. Note, In settling friendships and correspondences, there is need of the wisdom of the serpent, as well as the innocence of the dove. Nor is it any transgression of the law of meekness and love, fairly to signify our strong perception of injuries received, and to stand upon our guard in dealing with those that have acted unfairly.

3. Abimelech professes his sincerity, in this address to Isaac, and earnestly courts his friendship, v. 28, 29. Some suggest that Abimelech pressed for this league with him, because he feared lest Isaac growing rich, should some time or other, avenge himself upon them for the injuries he had received. However, he professes to do it from a principle of love rather. (1.) He makes the best of their behaviour toward him. Isaac complained that they had hated him and sent him away; No, said Abimelech, we sent thee away in peace. They turned him off from the land he held of them; but they promised him to take away his stock, and all his effects with him. Note, The lessening of injuries is necessary to the preserving of friendship; for the aggravating of them exasperates and widens breaches. The unkindness done to us might have been worse. (2.) He acknowledges the tokens of God's favour to him, and makes that the ground of their desire to be in league with him. The Lord is with thee, and thou art the blessed of the Lord, as if he had said, "Be pursued to overlook and pass by the injuries offered thee; for God has abundantly made up to thee the damage they have done thee. The friendship, and favours, have reason enough to forgive those who hate them, since the worst enemy they have, cannot do them any real hurt. Or, "For this reason, we desire thy friendship, because God is with thee." Note, It is good to be in covenant and communion with those who are in covenant and communion with God, 1 John 1. 3. Zech 8. 23. (3.) He assures him that they have pressed him to this address, with the result of mature deliberation. We said, let there be an oath between us; whatever some of his peevish envious subjects might mean otherwise, he, and his prime-ministers of state whom he had now brought with him, designed no other than a cordial friendship. Perhaps Abimelech had received by tradition, the warning God gave to his predecessor not to hurt Abraham, (ch. 20. 7.) and that made him stand in such awe of the present person of the heir apparent, as much as the favourite of Heaven as Abraham was.

4. Isaac entertains him and his company, and enters into a league of friendship with him, v. 30, 31. Here see how generous the good man was, (1.) In giving; he made them a feast, and bid them welcome; (2.) In forgiving; he did not insist upon the unkindnesses they had done him, but freely entered into a covenant of friendship with them, and bound himself never to do them any injury. Note, Religiousness teaches us to be neighbourly, and as much as in us lies, to live peaceably with all men.

5. Providence smiled upon what Isaac did: for the same day that he made this covenant with Abimelech, his servants brought him the tidings of a well of water they had found, v. 32, 33. He had not insisted upon the restitution of the wells which the Philistines had taken from him, Genesis 26. 27; but he should have broken off the treaty, but sat down silently under the injury; and, to recompense him for that, immediately he is enriched with a new well, which, because it suited so well to the occurrence of the day, he called by an old name, Beer-sheba, The well of the oath.

34. And Esau was forty years old when he took to wife Judith the daughter of Beeri the Hittite, and Basemath the daughter of Elon the Hittite: 35. Which were a grief of mind unto Isaac and to Rebekah.
the common method of settlements, than he ought to have been, if he knew (as it is probable he did) the intimations God had given of his mind in this matter. Note, We are very apt to take our measures rather from our own reason than from divine revelation, and thereby often miss our way; we think the wise and learned, the mighty and noble, should inherit the promises; but God sees not as men see. See 1 Sam. 16. 6, 7.

2. The directions he gave to Esau, pursuant to this design: he calls him to him, v. 1. For Esau, though married, was not yet removed; and though he had greatly grieved his parents by his marriage, yet they had not expelled him, but, it seems, were pretty well reconciled to him, and made the best of it. Not that he was now reconciled to them, but his children, yet must not be incompatible towards them. (1.) He tells him upon what considerations he resolved to do this now, v. 2, "I am old, and therefore must die shortly, yet I know not the day of my death, nor when I must die; I will therefore do that at this time, which must be done some time." Note, (1.) Old people should be reminded by the growing infirmities of age, to do quickly, and with all the weight and solemnity of their hand. See J. sh. 13. 1. (2.) The consideration of the uncertainty of the time of our departure out of the world, (which God has wisely kept us in the dark about,) should quicken us to do the work of the day in its day. The heart and the house should both be set, and kept, in order, because at such an hour as we think not, the Son of man comes; because we know not the day of our death, we are concerned to mind the business of life. (2.) He bids him to get the things ready for the solemnity of executing his last will and testament, by which he designed to make him his heir, v. 3, 4. Esau must go a hunting, and bring some venison, which his father will eat of, and then bless him. In this, he designed, not so much the refreshment of his own spirits, that he might give the blessing in a lively manner, as it is commonly taken, but rather the receiving of a fresh instance of his son's filial duty and affection to him, before he bestowed this favour upon him; Perhaps Esau, since he was married, had brought his venison to his wives, and seldom to his father, as formerly, (ch. 25. 28.) and therefore Isaac, before he would bless him, would have him show this piece of respect to him. Note, It is fit, if the less be blessed of the greater, that the greater should be served and honoured by the lesser. Observe, he says, That my soul may bless thee before I die, [2.] Prayer is the work of the soul, and not of the lips only; as the soul must be employed in blessing God, (Ps. 103. 1.) so it must be in blessing ourselves and others: the blessing will not come to the heart, if it do not come from the heart. [2.] The work of life must be done before we die, for it cannot be done afterward; (Eccl. 9. 10.) and it is very desirable, when we come to die, to have nothing else to do but to die. Isa. 40. 12. 13. 31. 35. 45. 50. Observe, let none therefore think that they shall die the sooner, for making their wills, and getting ready for death.

6. And Rebekah spake unto Jacob her son, saying, Behold, I heard thy father speak unto Esau thy brother, saying, Bring me venison, and make me savoury meat, that I may eat, and bless thee before the Lord, before my death. 7. Now therefore, my son, obey my voice according to that which I command thee. 9. Go now to the flock, and fetch me from thence two good kids of the goats; and I will make them savoury meat for thy father, such as he loveth: 10. And thou shalt bring it to thy father, that he may eat, and that he may bless thee before his death. 11. And Jacob said to Rebekah his mother, Behold, Esau my brother is a hairy man, and I am a smooth man: 12. My father peradventure will feel me, and I shall seem to him as a deceiver: and I shall bring a curse upon me, and not a blessing. 13. And his mother said unto him, Upon me be thy curse, my son: only obey my voice, and go fetch me them. 14. And he went, and fetched, and brought them to his mother: and his mother made savoury meat, such as his father loved. 15. And Rebekah took goodly raiment of her eldest son Esau, which were with her in the house, and put them upon Jacob her youngest son: 16. And she put the skins of the kids of the goats upon his hands, and upon the smooth of his neck. 17. And she gave the savoury meat, and the bread, which she had prepared, into the hand of her son acob.

Rebekah is here contriving to procure for Jacob the blessing which was designed for Esau. And here, I. The end was good, for she was directed in this intention by the oracle of God, by which she had been governed in dispensing her afflictions. God had said it should be so, that the elder shall serve the younger: 18. Rebekah resolves it shall be so, and cannot bear to see her husband design ing to thwart the oracle of God. But II. The means were bad, and no way justifiable. If it were not a wrong to Esau, to deprive him of the blessing, (he himself having forfeited it by selling the birth-right,) yet it was a wrong to Isaac, taking advantage of his impartiality, to impose upon him; it was a wrong to Jacob too, whom she taught to deceive, by putting a lie into his mouth, or, at least, by putting one into his right hand. It would likewise expose him to endless scruples about the blessing, if he should obtain it thus fraudulently, whether it would stand him or his in any stead, especially if his father should revoke it, upon the discovery of the cheat, and plead, as he might, that it was nullified by an Error Personae.—A mistake of the Person. He himself also was aware of the danger, lest, (v. 12.) if he should miss of the blessing, as he might, probably, have done, he should bring upon himself his father's curse, which he dreaded above any thing; besides, he laid himself open to that divine curse which is pronounced upon him that causeth the blind to wander out of the way, Deut. 27. 18. If Rebekah, when she heard Isaac promise the blessing to Esau, had gone, at his return from hunting, to Isaac, and, with humility and seriousness, put him in remembrance of that which God had said concerning their sons; if she further had showed him how Esau had forfeited the blessing, by selling his birth-right, and by marrying strange wives; it is probable that Isaac would have been prevailed with knowingly and willingly to have conferred the blessing upon Jacob, and needed not thus to have been cheated into it. This had been honourable and laudable, and would have looked well in the history; but God left her herself, to take this indirect course, that he might have the glory of bringing good out of evil, and of serving his own purposes by the sins and follies of men, and that we might have the satisfaction of knowing that though there is so much wickedness and deceit in the world, God governs it according to his will, to his own praise. See Job 12. 16. With him are strength and wisdom, the deceived and the deceiver are his. Isaac had lost the sense of seeing, which, in this case, could not have been imposed upon, Providence having so admirably well ordered the difference of features, that no two faces are exactly alike: conversation and commerce could scarcely be maintained, if there were not some kind of disguise. Therefore she endeavours to deceive.

1. His sense of tasting, by dressing some choice pieces of kid, seasoning it, serving it up, so as to make him believe it was venison; which was no hard matter to do. See the folly of those that are nice and curious in their appetite, and take a pride in humouring it. It is easy to impose upon them with that which they pretend to despise and dislike, so little perhaps does it differ from that to which they give a decided preference. Solomon tells us that dainties are deceitful meat; for it is possible for us to be deceived by them, more ways than one, Prov. 23. 3.

2. His sense of feeling and smelling: she put Esau's clothes upon Jacob, his best clothes, which it might be supposed, Esau would put on, in token of joy and respect to his father, when he was to receive the blessing. Isaac knew these, by the stuff, shape, or smell, to be Esau's. If we would obtain a blessing of our heavenly Father, we must come for it in the garments of our elder Brother, clothed with his righteousness, who is the First-born among many brethren. Let the smoothness and softness of Jacob's hands and neck should betray him, she covered them, and, probably part of his face, with the skins of the kids that were newly killed, v. 16. Esau was rough indeed, when nothing less than these would serve to make Jacob like him. Those that affect to seem rough and rugged in their carriage, put the beast upon the man, and really shame themselves, by thus disguising themselves.

And lastly, it was a very rash word which Rebekah spake, when Jacob objected the danger of a curse, Upon me be thy curse, my son, v. 15. Christ indeed, who is mighty to save, because my name he hath said, Upon me be the curse, only when my voice, he hath born the burden of the curse, the curse of the law, for all that shall take upon them the yoke of the command, the command of the gospel. But it is too daring for any creature to say, Upon me be the curse, unless it be that curse causeless, which we are sure shall not come, Prov. 26. 2.

18. And he came unto his father, and said, My father: and he said, Here am I; who art thou, my son? 19. And Jacob said unto his father, I am Esau thy first-born; I have done according as thou hast required me: arise, I pray thee, sit and eat of my venison, that thy soul may bless me. 20. And Isaac said unto his son, How is it that thou hast found it so quickly, my son? And he said, Because the Lord thy God brought it to me. 21. And Isaac said unto Jacob, Come near me, I pray thee, that I may feel thee, my son, whether thou be my very son Esau, or not. 22. And Jacob went near unto Isaac, his father; and he felt him, and said, The voice is Jacob's voice, but the hands are the hands of Esau. 23. And he discerned him not, because his hands were hairy, as his brother Esau's hands: so he blessed him. 24. And he said, Art thou my very son Esau? And he said, I am. 25. And he said, Bring it near to me, and I will eat of my son's venison, that my soul may bless thee. And he brought it near to him, and he did eat; and he brought him wine, and he drank. 26. And his father Isaac said unto him, Come near me now, and kiss me, my son. 27. And he came near, and kissed him: and he smelled the smell of his garment, and blessed him, and said, See, the smell of my son is as the smell of a field, which the Lord hath blessed. 28. Therefore God give thee of the dew of heaven, and the fatness of the earth, and plenty of corn and wine; 29. Let people serve thee, and nations bow down to thee; be lord over thy brethren; and let thy mother's sons bow down to thee: cursed be every one that curseth thee, and blessed be he that blesseth thee.

Observe here,

1. The art and assurance with which Jacob managed this intrigue: who would have thought that this plain man could have played his part so well in a design of this nature? His mother having put him in the way of it, and encouraged him in it, he dexterously applies himself to these methods which he had never a thought about, and always concealed an abhorrence of. Note, Lying is soon learned. The Psalmist speaks of these, who, as soon as they are born, speak lies, Ps. 58. 3. Jer. 9. 5. I wonder how honest Jacob could so readily turn his tongue to say, (v. 19.) I am Esau, thy first born; nor do I see how the endeavour of some to bring him off, with that equivocation, I am made thy father's heir, namely my purchase, does him any good. v. 24.) Art thou my very son Esau? he said, I am. How could he say, I have done as thou badest me, when he had received no command from his father, but was doing as his mother bade him? How could he say, Eat of my venison, when he knew it came not from the field, but from the fold? But especially I wonder how he could have the assurance to father it upon God, and to use his name in the cheat, (v. 20.) The Lord thy God brought it to me. Is this Jacob? Is this Israel indeed without guile? It is certainly written, not for our imitation, but for our admonition. Let him that thinks he stands, take heed lest he fall. Good men have sometimes failed in the exercise of these graces for which they have been most eminent.

2. The success of this management: Jacob with some difficulty, gained his point, and got the blessing.

1. Isaac was, at first, dissatisfied, and would have discovered the fraud, if he could have trusted his own ears; for the voice was Jacob's voice, v. 22. Providence has ordered a strange variety of voices as well as faces, which is also of use to prevent our being imposed upon; and the voice is a thing not easily disguised or counterfeited. This may be added to, to illustrate the character of a hypocrite; his voice is Jacob's voice, but his hands are Esau's; he speaks the language of a saint, but does the works of a sinner; but the judgment will be (as here) by the hands.

2. At length he yielded to the power of the cheat, because the hands were hairy. (v. 23.) not considering how easy it was to counterfeit that circumstance; and now Jacob carries it on dexterously, sets his venison before his father, and waits at table very officiously, till dinner is done, and the blessing comes to be pronounced in the close of this solemn feast. That which in some small degree extenuates the crime of Rebekah and Jacob, is, that the fraud was intended, not so much to beget the blessing as to prevent the thwarting, of the oracle of God: the blessing was just going to be put upon the wrong ones, and they thought it was time to bestir themselves.

Now let us see how Isaac gave Jacob his blessing. (1.) He kissed him, (v. 26.) in token of a particular affection to him. Those that are blessed of God, are kissed with the kiss of salvation. (2.) He prayed for him, and therein prophesied concerning him. It is the duty of parents to pray for their children, and to bless them in the name of the Lord. And thus, as well as by their baptism, to do what they can, to preserve and perpetuate the entail of the covenant in their families. But this was an extraordinary blessing; and Providence so ordered it, that Isaac should bestow it upon Jacob ignorantly and by mistake, that it might appear he was beholden to God for it, and not to Isaac. Three things Jacob is here blessed with, [1.] Plenty; (v. 28.) heaven and earth concurring to make him rich. [2.] Power; (v. 29.) particularly dominion over his brethren, namely Esau and his posterity. [3.] Prevalency with God, and a great interest in Heaven; “Cursed be every one that curseth thee. Let God be a friend to all thy friends, and an enemy to all thine enemies.” More is certainly comprised in this’s blessing than appears, prima facie—at first sight; it must amount to an entail of the promise of the Messiah, and the church: that was, in the patriarchal dialect, the blessing; something spiritual, doubtless, is included in it. First, that from him should come the Messiah, who should have a sovereign dominion on earth. It was that top-branch of his family, which people should save, and not destroy, to be the head of all the families of the earth. 19, Out of Jacob shall come he that shall have dominion, the Star and Sceptre, v. 17. Jacob’s dominion over Esau was to be only typical of this, ch. 49. 10. Secondly, That from him should come the church that should be particularly owned and favoured by Heaven. It was part of the blessing of Abraham, when he was first called to be the father of the faithful, ch. 12. 3, I will bless them that bless thee, and curse him that curseth thee. Therefore when Isaac afterward confirmed the blessing to Jacob, he called it the blessing of Abraham, ch. 28. 4. Balaam explains this too, Num. 24. 9. Note, It is the best and most desirable blessing, to stand in relation to Christ and his church, and to be interested in Christ’s power, and the church’s favours.

30. And it came to pass, as soon as Isaac had made an end of blessing Jacob, and Jacob was yet scarce gone out from the presence of his father, that Esau his brother came in from his hunting. 31. And he also had made savoury meat, and brought it unto his father, and said unto his father,
1. This he desired; Bless me also, v. 34. Hast thou not reserved a blessing for me? v. 36. Note, (1.) The worst of men know how to wish well to themselves; and even those who profanely sell their birth-right, seem pious to desire the blessing; faint desires of happiness, with a right choice of the end, and right use of the means, deceive many into their own ruin. Multitudes go to hell with their mouths full of good wishes. The desire of the slothful and unbelieving kills them. Many will seek to enter in, as Esau, who shall not be able, because they do not strive, Luke 13. 24. (2.) It is the folly of most men, that they are willing to take up with any good, (Ps. 4. 6.) as Esau here, who desired the goodly blessing, but refused to be disdained by the birth-right. Profane hearts think any blessing as good as that from God's oracle: Hast thou but one? As if he had said, "I will take up with any: though I have not the blessing of the church, yet let me have some blessing." 2. This he had; and let him make his best of it, v. 39, 40. (1.) It was a good thing, and better than he deserves. It was promised him, [1.] That he should have a competent livelihood; the fitness of the earth, and the dew of heaven. Note, Those that come short of the blessings of the covenant, may yet have a very good share of outward blessings. God gives good ground, and good weather, to many that reject his covenant, and have no part or lot in it. [2.] That by degrees he should recover his liberty; if Jacob must rule, (v. 29.) Esau must serve; but he has this to comfort him, he shall live by his sword; he shall serve, but he shall not starve; and, at length, after much skirmishing, he shall break the yoke of bondage, and wear the marks of freedom. This was fulfilled, (2 Kings 8. 20, 22.) when the Edomites revolted. (2.) Yet it was far short of Jacob's blessing; for him God had reserved some better things. [1.] In Jacob's blessing, the dew of heaven is put first, as that which he most valued and desired, and depend ed upon; in Esau's, the fitness of the earth is put first, for that was it, which he had the first and principal regard to. [2.] Esau has these, but Jacob has them from God's hand. God give thou the dew of heaven, v. 28. It was enough to Esau to have the possession; but Jacob desired it by promise, and to have it from covenant love. [3.] Jacob shall have dominion over his brethren; for the Israelites often ruled over the Edomites. Esau shall have dominion, that is, he shall gain some power and interest, but shall never have dominion over his brother; we never find that the Jews were sold into the hands of the Edomites, or that they oppressed them, but the great difference is, that there is nothing in Esau's blessing that points at Christ; nothing that brings him or his into the church and covenant of God; and without that, the favourableness of God, the pliability of the heart, and the pliability of the field, will stand him in little stead. Thus Isaac by faith blessed them both according as their lot should be. Some observe that Jacob was blessed with a king, (v. 27.) so was not Esau.

41. And Esau hated Jacob because of the blessing wherewith his father blessed him: and Esau said in his heart, the days of mourning for my father are at hand; then will I slay my brother Jacob. 42. And these words of Esau her elder son, were told to Rebekah; and she sent and called Jacob her younger son, and said unto him, Behold, thy brother Esau, as touching thee, doth comfort himself, purposing to kill thee. 43. Now therefore, my son, obey my voice; and arise, flee thou to Laban my brother to Haran; 44. And tarry with him a few days, until thy brother’s fury turn away; 45. Until thy brother’s anger turn away from thee, and he forget that which thou hast done to him: then I will send and fetch thee from thence: why should I be deprived also of you both in one day? 46. And Rebekah said to Isaac, I am weary of my life because of the daughters of Heth: If Jacob take a wife of the daughters of Heth, such as these which are of the daughters of the land, what good shall my life do me?

Here is,

1. The malice Esau bore to Jacob upon account of the blessing which he had obtained, ver. 41. Thus he went in the way of Cain, who slew his brother, because he had gained that acceptance with God which he had rendered himself unworthy of. Esau’s hatred of Jacob was, 1. A causeless hatred; he hated him for no other reason, but because his father blessed him, and God loved him. Note, The happiness of saints is the envy of sinners. Whom Heaven blesses, Hell curses. 2. It was a cruel hatred; nothing less would satisfy him than to slay his brother. It is the blood of the saints that persecutors thirst after. I will slay my brother: how could he say that word, without horror? How could he call him brother, and yet vow his death? Note, The rage of persecutors will not be tied up by any bonds, no not the strongest and most sacred. 3. It was a hatred that calculated on gratifying its rage; he expected his father would soon die, and then titles must be tried, and interests contested, between the brothers, which would give him a fair opportunity of revenge. He thinks it not enough to live by his sword himself, (ver. 40,) unless his brother die by it. He is loath to grieve his father while he lives, and therefore puts off the intended murder till his death, not caring how much he then grieved his surviving mother. Note, (1.) Those are bad children to whom their good parents are a burthen, and who, upon any account, long for the days of mourning for them. (2.) Bad men are long held in by external restraints from doing the mischief they would do, and so their wicked purposes come to naught. (3.) Those who think to defeat God’s purposes, will undoubtedly be disappointed themselves. Esau aimed to prevent Jacob, or his seed from having the dominion, by taking away his life before he was married; but we can discern what God has spoken. Men may fret at God’s counsels, but cannot change them.

II. The method Rebekah took to prevent the mischief.

1. She gave Jacob warning of his danger, and advised him to withdraw for a while, and shift for his own safety. She tells him what she heard of Esau’s design, and asks him whether he had an opportunity to kill his brother, ver. 42. Would one think that such a bloody barbarous thought as this could be a comfort to a man? If Esau could have kept his design to himself, his mother had not suspected it; but men’s impudence in sin is often their infatuation; and they cannot accomplish their wickedness, because their rage is too violent to be concealed, and a bird of the air carries the voice.

Observe here, (1.) What Rebekah feared; lest she should be deprived of them both in one day; (v. 43.) deprived not only of the murdered, but of the murderer, who either by the magistrate, or by the immediate hand of God, would be sacrificed to justice; which she herself must acquiesce in, and not obstruct; or, if not so, yet thenceforward she would be deprived of all joy and comfort in him. Those that are lost to virtue, are in a manner lost to all their friends. With what pleasure can a child be lost upon, that can be lost upon no other than the child of the Devil? (2.) What Rebekah hopèd. That if Jacob for a while kept out of sight, the affront which his brother resented so fiercely, would by degrees go out of mind. The strength of passions is weakened and taken off by the distances both of time and place. She promised herself, that his brother’s anger would turn away. Note, Yielding pacifics great offences; and even those that have a good cause and God on their side, must yet use that with other prudent expedients for their own preservation.

2. She possessed Isaac with an apprehension of the necessity of Jacob’s going among her relations, upon another account, which was to get him a wife, ver. 46. She would not tell him of Esau’s wicked design against the life of Jacob, lest it should trouble him; but prudently took another way to gain her point. Isaac was as uneasy as she was, at Jacob’s being so thoughtlessly yoked with Hittites; and therefore with a very good colour of reason, she moves to have Jacob married to one that was better principled. Note, One miscarriage should serve as a warming to prevent another; those are careless indeed, that stumble twice at the same stone. Yet Rebekah seems to have expressed herself somewhat too warmly in the matter, when she said, What good will my life do me, if Jacob marry a Canaanitish woman? Perhaps she thought it unlikely she could not lodged in one hand; we may do the work of life, and enjoy the comforts of life, though every thing do not fall out to our mind, and though our relations be not in all respects agreeable to us. Perhaps Rebekah spoke with this concern, because she saw it necessary, for the quickening of Isaac, to give speedy orders in this matter. Observe, though Jacob was himself very terribly and well-fixed in his enemies, yet God has need to be put out of the way of temptation. Even he was in danger, both of following the bad example of his brother, and of being drawn into a snare by it. We must not presume too far upon the wisdom and resolution, no not of those children that are most hopeful and promising; but care must be taken to keep them out of harm’s way.

CHAP. XXVIII.

We have here, I. Jacob parting with his parents, to go to Padan-aram; the charge his father gave him, ver. 1, 2. the blessing he sent him away with, v. 3, 4. his obedience to the orders given him, v. 5, 7. and the influence this had upon Laban, v. 9, 11, 12. II. Jacob walking in free communion with him by the way. And there, 1. His vision of the ladder, v. 11, 12. 2. The gracious promises God made him, v. 13, 15. 3. The impression this made upon him, v. 16., 19, 4. The vow he made to God, upon this occasion, v. 20, 22.

1. AND Isaac called Jacob, and blessed him, and charged him, and said unto him, Thou shalt not take a wife of the daughters of Canaan. 2. Arise, go to Padan-aram, to the house of Bethuel, thy mother’s father; and take thee a wife from thence of the daughters of Laban, thy mother’s brother. 3. And God Almighty bless thee, and make thee fruitful, and multiply
And thee, that thou mayest be a multitude of people; 4. And give thee the blessing of Abraham, to thee, and to thy seed with thee; that thou mayest inherit the land wherein thou art a stranger, which God gave unto Abraham. 5. And Isaac sent away Jacob; and he went to Padan-aram, unto Laban, son of Bethuel the Syrian, the brother of Rebekah, Jacob's and Esau's mother.

Jacob had no sooner obtained the blessing, than immediately he was forced to run his country; and as if it were not enough that he was a stranger and sojourner there, he must go, to be more so, and no better than an exile in another country. Now Jacob fled into Syria, Hos. 12. 12. He was blessed with plenty of corn and wine, and yet he goes away poor; was blessed with government, and yet goes out to service, a hard service. This was, 1. Perhaps to correct him for his dealing fraudulently with his father. The blessing shall be confirmed to him, and yet he shall smart for the indirect course he takes to obtain it. While there is such an allay as there is of sin in our duties, we must expect an alchemy of trouble in our comforts. However, 2. It was to teach us, that they who inherit the blessing, must expect persecution; and that they who have peace in Christ, must expect that also. John 16. 32. We must neither think it strange, being told of it before, nor think it hard, being assured of a recompense for it hereafter. We may observe, likewise, that God's providences often seem to contradict his promises, and to go cross to them; and yet when the mystery of God shall be finished, we shall see that all was for the best; and that cross providences did but render the promises and the accomplishment of them the more illustrious.

Now Jacob is here dismissed by his father.

I. With a solemn charge, v. 1, 2. He blessed him, and charged him. Note, Those that have the blessing, must keep the charge annexed to it, and not think to separate what God has joined. The charge is like that, (2 Cor. 6. 14.) Be not unequally yoked with unbelievers; and all that inherit the promises of the remission of sins, and the rest of the blessings of the covenant, must not depart from them, but keep the charge, and observe the promise.

II. With a solemn blessing, v. 3. He charged him, 3. 14. It is a blessing from God Almighty, by which name God appeared to the patriarchs, Exod. 6. 3. Those are blessed indeed, whom God Almighty blesses; for he commands, and effects the blessing. Two great promises Abraham was blessed with, and Isaac here entails them both upon Jacob.

1. The promise of heirs: (v. 3.) God make thee fruitful and multiply thee. (1.) Through his lips should descend from Abraham, that people, which should be numerous as the stars of heaven, and the sand of the sea, and which should increase more than the rest of the nations, so as to be an assembly of people, as the margin reads it. And never was such a multitude of people so often gathered into one assembly, as the tribes of Israel were in the wilderness, and afterward. (2.) Through his loins should descend from Abraham, that Person, in whom all the families of the earth should be blessed, and to whom the gathering of the people should be. Jacob had in him a Messiah, who, though he was God's, for all things in heaven and earth are united in Christ; (Eph. 1. 10.) all centre in him, that corn of wheat, which falling to the ground, produced much fruit, John 12. 24.

2. The promise of an inheritance for those heirs; (v. 4.) that thou mayest inherit the land of thy so-journings. Canaan was hereby entailed upon the seed of Jacob, exclusive of the seed of Esau. Isaac was now sending Jacob away into a distant country, to settle there for some time; and lest this should look like disinheriting him, he here confirms the settlement of it upon him, that he might be assured that the discontinuance of his possession should be no defeasance of his right. Observe, he is here told that he should inherit the land wherein he sojourned. Those that are sojourners now, shall be heirs for ever; and even now, those do most inherit the earth, (though they do not inherit most of it,) that are most like strangers in it. Those have the best enjoyment of present things, that sit most loose to them. This promise looks as high as heaven, of which Canaan was a type. This was the better country, which Jacob with the other patriarchs, had in his eye, when he confessed himself a stranger and pilgrim on the earth, Heb. 11. 15.

Jacob having taken leave of his father, was hastened away, and speedily, lest his brother should find an opportunity to do him a mischief, and away he went to Padan-aram, v. 5. How unlike was he taking a wife from thence, to his father's? Isaac had servants and camels sent to fetch his; Jacob must go himself, go alone, and go afoot, to fetch his; he must go too in a fright from his father's house, not knowing when he might return. Note, If God, in his providence, disable us, we must be content, though we may have much of the present blessings of our ancestors. We should be more in care to maintain their piety than to maintain their port, and to be as good as they than to be as great. Rebekah is here called Jacob and Esau's mother; Jacob is named first, not only because he had always been his mother's darling, but because he was now made his father's heir, and Esau was, in this sense, set aside. Note, The time will come, when piety will have precedency, whatever it has now.

6. When Esau saw that Isaac had blessed Jacob, and sent him away to Padan-aram, to take him a wife from thence; and that he blessed him, he gave him a charge, saying, Thou shalt not take a wife of the daughters of Canaan; 7. And that Jacob obeyed his father and his mother, and was gone to Padan-aram. 8. And Esau seeing that the daughters of Canaan pleased not Isaac his father; 9. Then went Esau unto Ishmael, and took unto the wives which he had, Mahalath the daughter of Ishmael, Abraham's son, the sister of Nebajoth, to be his wife.

This passage concerning Esau comes in, in the
And have 13 and God shall be his father, and he might of Abraham. The elder children should give to the younger an example of tractableness and obedience; it is bad, if they do not; but it is some alleviation, if they take the example of it from them, as Esau were did from Jacob. Or, 2. To show the folly of an after-wit; Esau did well, but he did it when it was too late. He saw that the daughters of Canaan pleased not his father, and he might of them that long ago, if he had consulted his father’s judgment as much as he did his palate. And how did he now mend the matter? Why truly, so as, to make bad worse. 1. He married a daughter of Ishmael, the son of the bond-woman, who was cast out, and was not to inherit with Isaac and his seed; thus joining with a family which God had rejected, and seeking to strengthen his own pretensions by the aids of another pretender. 2. He took a third wife, while, for aught that appears, his other two were neither dead nor divorced. 3. He did it only to please his father, not to please God; now that Jacob was sent into a far country, Esau would be all in all at home, and he hoped so to humour his father, as to prevail with him to make a new will, and entail the promise upon him, revoking the settlement lately made upon Jacob. 4. And thus, [1.] He was so wise, when it was too late, like Israel that would venture when the decree was gone forth against them, Numb. 14. 40. and the foolish virgins, Matt. 25. 10. [2.] He rested in a partial reformation, and thought by pleasing his parents in one thing, to atone for all his other miscarriages. It is not said, that when he saw how obedient Jacob was, and how willing to please his parents, he repented of his malicious design against him; no, it appeared afterward that he persisted in that, and retained his malice. Note, Carnal hearts are apt to think themselves as good as they should be, because perhaps, in some one particular instance, they are not so bad as they have been. Thus Micah retains his idols, but thinks him self happy in having a Levite to be his priest, Judg. 17. 13.

10. And Jacob went out from Beer-sheba, and went toward Haran. 11. And he lighted upon a certain place, and tarried there all night, because the sun was set; and he took of the stones of that place, and put them for his pillows, and lay down in that place to sleep. 12. And he dreamed, and, behold, a ladder set upon the earth, and the top of it reached to heaven: and, behold, the angels of God ascending and descending on it. 13. And, behold, the Lord stood above it; and said, I am the Lord God of Abraham thy father, and the God of Isaac: the land wherein thou liest, to thee will I give it, and to thy seed. 14. And thy seed shall be as the dust of the earth, and thou shalt spread abroad to the west and to the east, and to the north, and to the south: and in thee and in thy seed shall all the families of the earth be blessed. 15. And, behold, I am with thee, and will keep thee in all places whither thou goest, and will bring thee again into this land; for I will not leave thee, until I have done that which I have spoken to thee of.

We have here Jacob upon his journey toward Syria, in a very desolate condition, like one that was sent to seek his fortune; but we find, that though he was alone, yet he was not alone, for the Father was with him, John 16. 32. If what is here recorded, happened (as it should seem it did) the first night, he had made a long day’s journey from Beer-sheba to Bethel, above forty miles. Providence brought him to a convenient place, probably shaded with trees, to rest him in that night; and there he had, 1. A place, Col. 3. 24. A place of safety, for lovers, and the heavens for his canopy and curtains. As the usage then was, perhaps this was not so bad as it seems now to us; but we should think, 1. He lay very cold; the cold ground for his bed, and, which, one would suppose, made the matter worse, a cold stone for his pillow, and in the cold air. 2. Very uneasy; if his bones were sore with his day’s journey, his night’s rest would but make them worse. 3. Very much exposed; he forgot that he was fleeing for his life; for bad his brother, in his rage, pursued, or sent a murderer after him, here lay ready to be sacrificed, and destitute of shelter and defence: we cannot think it was by reason of his poverty that he was so ill accommodated, but, (1.) It was owing to the plainness and simplicity of those times, when men did not take so much state, and could not afford an entertainment of the later times of softness and efficency. (2.) Jacob had been particularly used to hardships, as a plain man dwelling in tents; and, designing now to go to service, he was the more willing to inure himself to it; as it proved it was well, ch. 31. 40. (3.) His comfort in the divine blessing, and his confidence in the divine protection, made him easy, even then when he lay thus exposed; being sure that his God made him to dwell in safety, he could lie down and sleep upon a stone.

If in his hard lodging, he had a pleasant dream; any Israelite indeed would be willing to take up with Jacob’s pillow, provided he might have but Jacob’s dream. Then and there, he heard the words of God, and saw the visions of the Almighty: it was the best night’s sleep he ever had in his life. Note, Jacob’s time of his most perfect refreshment, is, when they are most destitute of other comforts, and other comforters; when afflictions in the way of duty (as these here were) do abound, then shall consolations so much the more abound. Now observe here.

I. The encouraging vision Jacob saw, v. 12. He saw a ladder which reached from earth to heaven, the angels ascending and descending upon it, and God himself at the head of it. Now this represents the two things that are very comfortable to good people at all times, and in all conditions.

(1.) The providence of God, by which there is a constant correspondence kept up between heaven and earth. The counsels of heaven are executed on earth, and the actions and affairs of this earth are all known in heaven, and judged there. Providence does it by a continual stream of its agents, as messengers, to see e all the purposes and designs of Providence, and the wisdom of God is at the upper end of the ladder, directing all the motions of second causes to the glory of the First Cause. The angels are active spirits, continually ascending and descending; they rest not day, nor night, from service, according to the posts assigned them. They ascend, to give account of what they have done; they descend to receive the orders they have received. Thus we should always abound in the work of the Lord, that we may do as the angels do it, Ps. 103. 20, 21. This vision gave very reasonable comfort to Jacob, letting him know that he had both a good guide, and a good guard, in his going out and coming in; that though he was made to wander from his father's house, yet still he was the care of a kind providence, and the charge of the only angels. This is remarkable of Jacob, though we should not admit the notion which some have, that the tutelar angels of Canaan were ascending, having guarded Jacob out of their land, and the angels of Syria descending to take him into their custody. Jacob was now the type and representative of the whole church, which the angels are intrusted with the guardianship of.

(2.) The consummation of Christ: he is the ladder, the foot-stool on earth in his human nature, the top in heaven in his divine nature: or, the former in his humiliation, the latter in his exaltation. All the intercourse between heaven and earth, since the fall, is by this ladder. Christ is the way; all God's favours come to us, and all our services go to him, by Christ. If God dwell with us, and we with him, it is by Christ; we have no way of getting to heaven than by this ladder; if we climb up any other way, we are unworthy of robbers. This vision our Saviour alludes to, when he speaks of the angels of God ascending and descending upon the Son of man; (John 1. 51.) for the kind offices the angels do us, and the benefits we receive by their ministration are all owing to Christ, who has reconciled things on earth, and things in heaven, (Col. 1. 20.) and made them all meet in himself, Eph. 1. 10.

2. The encouraging words Jacob heard. God now brought him into the wilderness, and spake comfortably to him, spake from the head of the ladder, for all the glad tidings we receive from heaven, come through Jesus Christ.

(1.) The former promises made to his father, are repeated and ratified to him, v. 13, 14. In general, God intimates to him that he would be the same to him, that he had been to Abraham and Isaac. Those that travel in the steps of their godly parents, are interested in their covenant, and entitled to their privileges. Particularly, [1.] The land of Canaan is settled upon him, the land whereon thou liest; as if by his lying so contentedly upon the bare ground, he had taken livery and seisin of the whole land. [2.] It is promised him that his posterity should multiply exceedingly, as the dust of the earth, that though he seemed now to be plucked off as a withered branch, yet he should become a flourishing tree that should send out his boughs into the sea. These were the blessings with which his father had blessed him, (v. 3, 4.) and God here said Amen to them, that he might have strong consolation. [3.] It is added that the Messiah should come from his loins, in whom all the families of the earth should be blessed. Christ is the great blessing of the world: all that are blessed, whatever family they are of, are blessed in him, and none of any family are excluded from blessedness, in him, but those that exclude themselves. (2.) Fresh promises were made him, accredited to his present condition, v. 15. [1.] Jacob was apprehensive of danger from his brother Esau; but God promises to keep him. Note, Those are safe, whom God protects, whoever pursues them. [2.] He had now a long journey before him, was to wander in his own country; but, behold I am with thee, says God. Note, Wherever we are, we are safe, and may be easy, if we have God's favourable presence with us. [3.] He knew not, but God foresaw, what hardships he would meet with in his uncle's service, and therefore promises to preserve him in all places. Note, God knows how to give his people graces and comforts accommodated to the events that shall be, as well as to those that are. [4.] He was now going as an exile into a place far distant, but God promises him to bring him back again to this land. Note, he that preserves his people's going out will also take care of their coming in, Ps. 121. 8. [5.] He seemed to be forsaken of all his friends, but God here gives him this assurance, I will not leave thee. Note, Whom God loves, he never leaves. This promise is sure to all the seed, Heb. 13. 5. [6.] Providence seemed to contradict the promises; he is therefore assured of the performance of them in their season: All shall be done that I have spoken to thee of. Note, Saying and doing are not two things with God, whatever they are with us.

16. And Jacob awaked out of his sleep, and he said, Surely the Lord is in this place; and I knew it not. 17. And he was afraid, and said, How dreadful is this place! This is none other but the house of God, and this is the gate of heaven. 18. And Jacob rose up early in the morning, and took the stone that he had put for his pillows, and set it up for a pillar, and poured oil upon the top of it. 19. And he called the name of that place Beth-el, but the name of that city was called Luz at the first. 20. And Jacob vowed a vow, saying, if God will be with me, and will keep me in this way that I go, and will give me bread to eat, and raiment to put on, 21. So that I come again to my father's house in peace; then shall the Lord be my God: 22. And this stone, which I have set for a pillar, shall be God's house: and of all that thou shalt give me I will surely give the tenth unto thee.

God manifested himself in his favour to Jacob, when he was asleep and purely passive; for the spirit Ike the wind, blows when and where he listeth, and God's grace, like the dew, toucheth not for the sins of men, Mich. 5. 7. But Jacob applied himself to the improvement of the visit God had made him, when he was awake; and we may well think he awakened, as the prophet did, (Jer. 31. 25.) and, behold his sleep was sweet to him. Here is much of Jacob's devotion on this occasion.

1. He expresses great surprise at the tokens he had of God's special presence with him in that place, v. 16, Surely the Lord is in this place, and I knew it not. Note, 1. God's manifestations of himself to his people, carry their own evidence along with them. God can give undeniable demonstrations of his presence, to give a general satisfaction to the souls of the faithful, that God is with them of a truth; satisfaction, not communicable to others, but convincing to themselves. 2. We sometimes meet with God there where we little thought of meeting with him. He is there where we did not think he had been; is found there where we asked not for him. No place excludes divine visits, (ch. 16, 13.) here we are, even in the city or in the desert, in the house or in the field, in the shop or in the street, we may keep up our intercourse with Heaven, if it be not our own fault.

II. It struck an awe upon him, v. 17, He was afraid; so far was he from being puffed up, and exalted above measure, with the abundance of the revelations, (2 Cor. 12. 7.) that he was afraid.
Note. The more we see of God, the more cause we see for holy trembling and blushing before Him. Those whom God is pleased to manifest Himself to, are thereby laid, and kept very low in their own eyes, and see cause to fear, even the Lord and His goodness. He has told us if this place! That is, 'The appearance of God in this place is never to be thought of, but with holy awe and reverence. I shall have a respect for this place, and remember it by this token, as long as I live:' not that he thought the place itself any nearer the divine visages than other places; but what he saw there at this time, was as it were, the house of God, the residence of the Divine Majesty, and the gate of angels, that is, the general rendezvous of all the inhabitants of the upper world, as the meetings of a city were in their gates; or, the angels ascending and descending, were like travellers passing and re-passing through the gates of a city. Note, 1. God is, in a special manner, present there where his grace is revealed, and where his covenants are published and sealed, as of old, by the ministry of angels, so now by instituted ordinances, Matt. 28. 20. 2. There where God meets with His special presence, we ought to meet him with the most humble reverence, remembering his justice and holiness, and our own meanness and vileness. III. He took care to preserve the memorial of it two ways.

1. He set up the stone for a pillar; (v. 18.) not as if he thought the visions of his head were any way omitted by what he saw in his travels, for he would mark the place against he came back, and erect a lasting monument of God's favour to him, and because he had not time now to build an altar here, as Abraham did in the places where God appeared to him, ch. 12. 7. He therefore poured oil on the top of this stone, which, probably, was the ceremony then used in dedicating their altars, as an earnest of his building one when he came back, and then he should have conveniences for it, as afterward he did, in gratitude to God for this vision, ch. 35. 7. Note, Grants of mercy call for returns of duty; and the sweet communion we have with God, ought ever to be remembered.

2. He gave a new name to the place, v. 19. It had been called Luz, an almond-tree; but he will have it henceforward called Bethel, the house of God, to show that we should put a greater honour upon it, and made it more remarkable, than all the almond-trees that flourished there. This is that Bethel, where, long after, it is said, God found Jacob, and there, in what he said to him, he spake with us, Hos. 12. 4. In process of time, this Bethel, the house of God, became Bethaven, a house of vanity and iniquity, when Jeroboam set up one of his calves there.

IV. He made a solemn vow upon this occasion, v. 20. 22. By religious vows we give glory to God, we own our dependence upon him, and we lay a bond upon our own souls, to engage and quicken our obedience to him. Jacob was now in fear and distress; and it is seasonable to make vows, in times of trouble, or when we are in pursuit of any set purpose of our own. Ps. 66. 13, 14. 1 Sam. 1. 11. Numb. 21. 1. 3. Jacob had now had a gracious visit from Heaven, God had renewed his covenant with him, and the covenant is mutual: when God ratifies his promises to us, it is proper for us to repeat our promises to him. Now in this vow, observe,

1. Jacob's faith God had said, v. 15. "I am with thee, and will keep thee;" and Jacob taketh a hold of that, and infers "Seeing God will be with me, and will keep me, as he has said, and (which is implied in that promise) will provide comfortably for me; and seeing he has promised to bring me again to this land, that is, to the house of my father, whom I hope to find alive at my return in peace," (so unlike was he to Esau who longed for the days of mourning for his father,) "I depend upon it." Note, God's promises are to be the guide and measure of our desires and expectations.

2. Jacob's piety and his regard to God, which appear here, (1.) In what he desired; that God would be with him; (2.) In what he promised; that he desired no more to make us easy and happy, wherever we are, than to have God's presence with us, and to be under his protection; it is comfortable, in a journey, to have a guide in an unknown way, a guard in a dangerous way, to be well-carried, well provided for, and to have good company in any way; and they that have God with them, have all this in the best manner. (2.) In what he designed; that in fulfilling his oath he should bear it as a covenant, that he might set the Lord, as his God in covenant. Then shall the Lord be my God. Not as if he would disown him and cast him off, if he should want food and raiment; no, though he slay us, we must cleave to him; but "then I will rejoice in him as my God; then, I will more strongly engage myself to abide with him." Note, Every mercy we receive from God, should be improved as an additional oblation to submit us to walk closely with him as our God. [2.] In particular, that he would perform some special acts of devotion, in token of his gratitude. First, "This pillar shall keep possession here, till I come back in peace, and then it shall be God's house," that is, "an altar shall be erected here to the honour of God." Secondly, "The house of God shall not be unfinished, nor his altar without a sacrifice; of all this, when thou dost me, give the tenth unto me, to be spent either upon God's altars, or upon his poor," both which are his receivers in the world. Probably, it was according to some general instructions received from Heaven, that Abraham and Jacob offered the tenth of their acquisitions to God. Note, 4. God must be honoured with our estates, and must have his dues out of them. When we receive more than ordinary mercy from God, we should study to give some signal instances of gratitude to him. 2. The tenth is a very fit proportion to be devoted to God, and employed for him; though, as circumstances vary, it may be more or less, as God prosperus us, I Cor. 16. 2.

This chapter gives us an account of God's providences concerning Jacob, pursuant to the promises made him in the foregoing chapter. 1. How he was brought in safety to his journey's end, and directed to his relations there, with whom he was welcome, v. 1-14. In how he was comfortably disposed of in marriage, v. 15. 30. How his family was built up in the birth of four sons, v. 31. 35. IV. The affairs of princes and mighty nations that were then being, are still and will be, under the guidance of God, but are left to be buried in oblivion; while these small domestic concerns of holy Jacob are particularly recorded, with their minute circumstances, that they may be an everlasting remembrance. For the memory of the just is blessed.
THEN Jacob went on his journey, and came into the land of the people of the east. 2 And he looked, and beheld, a well in the field, and, lo, there were three flocks of sheep lying by it; for out of that well they watered the flocks: and a great stone was upon the well's mouth. 3 And thither were all the flocks gathered: and they rolled the stone from the well's mouth, and watered the sheep, and put the stone again upon the well's mouth in his place. 4 And Jacob said unto them, My brethren, whence be ye? and they said, Of Haran are we. 5 And he said unto them, Know ye Laban the son of Nahor? And they said, We know him. 6. And he said unto them, Is he well? And they said, He is well: and, behold, Rachel his daughter cometh with the sheep. 7. And he said, Lo, it is yet high day, neither is it time that the cattle should be gathered together: water ye the sheep, and go and feed them. 8. And they said, We cannot, until all the flocks be gathered together, and till they roll the stone from the well's mouth; then we water the sheep.

All the stages of Israel's march to Canaan are distinctly noticed, but no particular journal is kept of Jacob's expedition further than Bethel; no, he had no more such happy nights as he had at Bethel, no more such visions of the Almighty; that was intended for a feast, he must not expect it to be his daily bread. But

1. We are here told how cheerfully he proceeded in his journey, after the sweet communion he had with God at Bethel: Then Jacob lifted up his feet, that the margin reads it, v. 1. Then he went on with cheerfulness and alacrity, not bethurkened with his cares, nor cramped with his fears, being assured of God's gracious presence with him. Note, After the visions we have had of God, and the vows we have made to him in solemn ordinances, we should run the way of his commandments with enlarged hearts, Heb. 12. 1.

2. How happily he arrived at his journey's end; Providence brought him to the very field where his uncle's flocks were to be watered, and there he met with Rachel that was to be his wife. Observe, (1.) The Divine Providence is to be acknowledged in all the little circumstances which concur to make a journey, or other undertaking, comfortable and successful. If when we are at a loss, we must reason reasonably with those that can direct us; if we meet with a disaster, and those are at hand, that will help us; we must not say that it was by chance, or that fortune therein favoured us, but that it was by Providence, and that God therein favoured us. Our ways are ways of pleasantness, if we continually acknowledge God in them. (2.) Those that have flocks must look well to them, and be diligent to preserve their state, Prov. 27. 23. What is here said of the constant care of the shepherds concerning their sheep, (v. 2, 3, 7, 8,) may serve to illustrate the tender concern which our Lord Jesus, the great shepherd of the sheep, has for his flock, the church; for he is the good Shepherd, that knows his sheep, and is known of them, John 10. 14. The stone at the well's mouth, which is so often mentioned here, was either to secure their property in it; for water was scarce, it was not there usuus communi aquarum—for every one's use; or, it was to save the well from receiving damage from the heat of the sun, or from any sartain hand, or to prevent the loss of the flock from being drowned in it. (3.) Separate interests should not take each other from joint and mutual help; when all the shepherds came together with their flocks, then like loving neighbours at watering time, they watered their flocks together. (4.) It becomes us to speak civilly and respectfully to strangers. Though Jacob was no courtier, but a plain man dwelling in tents, and a stranger to compliment, yet he addresses himself very obligingly to the people he met with, and calls them his brethren, v. 4. The law of kindness in the tongue has a commanding power, Prov. 31. 26. Some think he calls them brethren, because they were of the same trade, shepherds like him. Though he was now upon his preferment, he was not ashamed of his occupation. (5.) Those that shew respect, have usually, respect showed them. As Jacob was civil to these strangers, so he found them civil to him: When he undertook to teach them how to despatch their business, (v. 7,) they did not bid him meddle with his own concerns, and let them alone; but though he was a stranger, they gave him the reason of their delay, v. 8. Those that are neighbourly and friendly, shall have neighbourly and friendly usage.

9. And while he yet spake with them, Rachel came with her father's sheep: for she kept them. 10. And it came to pass, when Jacob saw Rachel the daughter of Laban his mother's brother, and the sheep of Laban his mother's brother, that Jacob went near, and rolled the stone from the well's mouth, and watered the flock of Laban his mother's brother. 11. And Jacob kissed Rachel, and lifted up his voice, and wept. 12. And Jacob told Rachel that he was her father's brother, and that he was Rebekah's son; and she ran and told her father. 13. And it came to pass, when Laban heard the tidings of Jacob his sister's son, that he ran to meet him, and embraced him, and kissed him; and brought him to his house. And he told Laban all these things. 14. And Laban said to him, Surely thou art my bone and my flesh. And he abode with him the space of a month.

Here we see, 1. Rachel's humility and industry; she kept her father's sheep, (v. 9,) that is, she took care of them, and was employed about them. Rachel's name signifies a sheph. Note, Honest useful labour is that which nobody needs be ashamed of, nor ought it to be a hindrance to any one's preferment. 2. Jacob's tenderness and affection; when he understood that this was his kinswoman, (probably, he had heard of her name before,) knowing what his errand was into that country, we may suppose it struck into his mind immediately that he must have her, he being already smitten with her ingenuous and comely face, though it was, probably, sun-burnt, and she was in the homely dress of a shephere; hence, he is attentive, and courteous, and peculiarly anxious to serve her, v. 10. Hence he addresses himself to her with tears of joy and kisses of affection, v. 11. She runs with all haste to tell her father; for she will by no means entertain her kinsman's address, without her father's knowledge and approbation, v. 12. These mutual respects, at their first interview, were good presages of their being a happy couple. 3. Providence made that which seemed contingent and fortuitous, to give speedy satisfaction to Jacob's mind, as soon as ever he came to the place where he was bound for. Abraham's servant, when he came upon a like errand, met with the like encouragement. Thus God guides his people with his eye, Ps. 32. 8. It is a groundless conceit which some of the Jewish writers have, that Jacob, when he kissed Rachel, had been set upon in his journey by Eliphaz the eldest son of Esau, at the command of his father, and robbed of all his money and jewels, which his mother had given him when she sent him away: it is plain that it was his passion for Rachel, and the surprise of this happy meeting, that drew these tears from his eyes. 4. Laban, though none of the best humoured men, bid him welcome, was satisfied in the account he gave of himself, and of the reason of his coming in such poor circumstances; while we avoid the extreme, on the one hand, of being foolishly credulous, we must take heed of falling into the other extreme, of being uncharitably jealous and suspicious. Laban owned him for his kinsman, (v. 14.) Thou art my bone and my flesh. Note, Those are hard-hearted indeed, that are unkind to their relations, and that hide themselves from their own flesh, Isa. 58. 7.

15. And Laban said unto Jacob, Because thou art my brother, shouldest thou therefore serve me for naught? Tell me, what shall thy wages be? 16. And Laban had two daughters: the name of the elder was Leah, and the name of the younger was Rachel. 17. Leah was tender-eyed; but Rachel was beautiful and well-favoured. 18. And Jacob loved Rachel; and said, I will serve thee seven years for Rachel thy younger daughter. 19. And Laban said, It is better that I give her to thee, than that I should give her to another man: abide with me. 20. And Jacob served seven years for Rachel: and they seemed unto him but a few days, for the love he had to her. 21. And Jacob said unto Laban, Give me my wife, for my days are fulfilled, that I may go in unto her. 22. And Laban gathered together all the men of the place, and made a feast. 23. And it came to pass in the evening, that he took Leah his daughter, and brought her to him; and he went in unto her. 24. And Laban gave unto his daughter Leah Zilpah his maid, for an hand-maid. 25. And it came to pass, that in the morning, behold, it was Leah: and he said to Laban, What is this thou hast done unto me? Did not I serve thee for Rachel? Wherefore then hast thou beguiled me? 26. And Laban said, It must not be so done in our country, to give the younger before the first-born. 27. Fulfil her week, and we will give thee this also for the service which thou shalt serve with me yet seven other years. 28. And Jacob did so, and fulfilled her week: and he gave him Rachel his daughter to wife also. 29. And Laban gave to Rachel his daughter Bilhah his handmaid to be her maid. 30. And he went in also unto Rachel, and he loved also Rachel more than Leah, and served with him yet seven other years.

I. The fair contract made between Laban and Jacob, during the month that Jacob spent there as a guest, v. 14. It seems, he was not idle, nor did he spend his time in idleness and idleness, but, like a man of business, though he had no stock of his own, he applied himself to serve his uncle, as he had begun, (v. 10.) when he watered his flock. Note, Wherever we are, it is good to be employing ourselves in some useful business, which will turn to a good account to ourselves or others. Laban, it seems, was so taken with Jacob's ingenuity and industry about his flocks, that he was desirous he should continue with him, and very fairly reasons thus, (v. 15.) "Because thou art my brother, shouldest thou therefore serve me for naught? No, what reason for that?" If Jacob be so respectful to his uncle as to give him his service without demanding any consideration for it, yet Laban will not be so unjust to his nephew as to take advantage either of his necessity or of his good-nature. Note, Inferior relations must not be imposed upon, if it be the Lord's will to serve us, it is our duty to reward them. Now Jacob had an fair opportunity to make known to Laban the affection he had for his daughter Rachel; and, having no worldly goods in his hand with which to endow her, he promises him seven years' service, upon condition that, at the end of seven years, he would bestow her upon him for his wife. It appears by computation that Jacob was now 77 years old when he bound himself; and yet he was not old, he continued to serve and to work and to increase, till he had 91 years of age, Gen. 47. 9. The success of Jacob's labours, and the reward he reaped, encouraged him to go on with his work; and the good he received, the encouragement it gave him, and the encouragement he got from others, were the more inducements to him to labour. Let us, like Jacob, endeavour to gain what God desires our efforts. 2. Jacob's honest performance of his part of the bargain, v. 20. He served seven years for Rachel: if Jacob still continued to be faithful to his uncle, as she did, (v. 9.) his innocent and religious conversation with her, while they kept the flocks, could not but increase their mutual acquaintance and affection; (Solomon's song of love is a pastoral;) if she now left off, his easing her of that care was very obliging. Jacob honestly served out his seven years, and did not forfeit his indentures, though he was old, he served them cheerfully, they seemed to him but a few days, for the love he had to her. As if it was more his desire to earn her than to have her. Note, Love makes long and hard services short and easy; hence we read of the labour of love, Heb. 6. 10. If we know how to value the happiness of heaven, the sufferings of this present time will be as nothing to us, in comparison of it. An age of work will be but as a few days to those that love God, and have Christ's love to serve, for Christ's love; 3. The base cheat which Laban put upon him when he was out of his time; he put Leah into his arms instead of Rachel, v. 23. This was Laban's sin; he wronged both Jacob and Rachel, whose affections, doubtless, were engaged to each other, and if (as some say) Leah was herein no better than an adulteress, it was no small wrong to her too. But God preserved Jacob's affection, his tenderness, and his marriage-feast, when in the morning, behold, it was Leah, v. 25. It is easy to observe here how Jacob was paid in his own coin. He had cheated his own father when he pretended to be Esau, and now his father-in-law cheated him. Herein, how unhonourable soever Laban was, the Lord was righteous; as Judg. 1. 7. Even the righteous, if they take a false view of things, are sometimes thus repremended in the eye. Many that are not, like Jacob, disappointed in the person, soon find themselves, as much to their grief, disappointed in the character. The choice of that relation therefore on both sides, ought to be made with good advice and consideration, that if there should be a disappointment, it may not be aggravated by a consciousness of management.

IV. The excuse and atonement Laban made for the cheat.

1. The excuse was frivolous, v. 26. It must not be so done in our country. We have reason to think there was no such custom of his country, as he pretends; only he banters Jacob with it, and laughs at his mistake. Note, Those that can do wickedly, and then think to turn it off with a jest, though they may deceive themselves and others, will find, at last, that God is not mocked. But if there had been such a custom, and he had resolved to observe it, he should have told Jacob so, when he undertook to serve him for his younger daughter. As saith the proverb of the ancients, Wickedness proceedeth from the wicked, 1 Sam. 24. 13. Those that deal with treacherous men, must expect to be dealt treacherously with.

2. The atonement of the matter did but make bad worse: We will give thee this also, v. 27. Hereby he drew Jacob into the sin, and snare, and discontent, of multiplying wives, which remains a blot in his censurate, and will be so to the end of the world. Honest Jacob did not design it, but to have kept as true to Rachel as his father had done to Rebekah; he that had lived without a wife to the 84th year of his age, could then have been very well content with one: but Leah, to dispose of his two daughters without portions, and to get seven years' service more out of Jacob, thus imposes upon him, and draws him into such a strait by his fraud, that (the matter not being yet settled as it was afterward by the divine law, Lev. 18. 18, and more fully since by our Saviour, Matt. 19. 5.) he had some colourable reason for marrying them both. He could not refuse Rachel, for he had espoused her; still less could he with Leah, and yet be content, and take two talents, 2 Kings 5. 23. Note, One sin is commonly the inlet of another. They that go in by one door of wickedness, seldom find the way out but by another. The polygamy of the patriarchs was, in some measure, excusable in them, because, though there was a reason against it as ancient as Adam's marriage, (Mal. 2. 15.) yet there was no express command against it; it was in them a sin of ignorance, it was not the product of any sinful lust, but for the building up of the church, which was the good that Providence brought out of it: but it will by no means justify the like practice now, when God's will is plainly made known, that one man and one woman only must be joined together, 1 Cor. 7. 2. The having of many wives suits well enough with the carnal sensual spirit of the Mohammedan impiety, which allows it; but we have not so learned Christ. Dr. Lightfoot makes Leah and Rachel to be figures of the two churches, the Jews under the law, and the Gentiles under the gospel: the younger, the more beautiful, and more in the thoughts of Christ when he came in the form of a servant; but the other, like Leah, first embraced him; yet, in this, the allegory does not hold, that the Gentiles, the younger, were more fruitful, Gal. 4. 27.

31. And when the Lord saw that Leah was hated, he opened her womb: but Rachel was barren. 32. And Leah conceived, and bare a son, and she called his name Reuben: for she said, Surely the Lord hath looked upon my affliction: now therefore my husband will love me. 33. And she conceived again, and bare a son; and said, Because the Lord hath heard that I was hated, he hath therefore given me this son also: and she called his name Simeon. 34. And she conceived again, and bare a son; and said, Now this time will my husband be joined unto me; because I have born him three sons: therefore was his name called Levi. 35. And she conceived again, and bare a son; and she said, Now will I praise the Lord: therefore she called his name Judah; and left bearing.

We have here the birth of four of Jacob's sons, all by Leah. Observe,

I. That Leah, who was less beloved, was blessed with children, when Rachel was denied that blessing, v. 31. See how Providence, in dispensing its gifts, observes a proportion, to keep the balance even, setting crosses and comforts one over against another, that none may be either too much elevated, or too much depressed. Rachel wants children, but she is blessed with her husband's love; Leah, who was more excusable, is without either. Thus it was between Elkanah's two wives: (1 Sam. 1.) that the Lord is wise and righteous. When the Lord saw that Leah was hated, that is loved less than Rachel, in which sense it is required that we hate father and mother, in comparison with Christ, (Luke 14. 26.) then the Lord granted her a child; which was a rebuke to Jacob, for making so great a difference between those that he was equally related to; a check to Rachel, who perhaps insulted over her sister upon that account; and a comfort to Leah, that she might not be overwhelmed with the contempt put upon her: thus God giveth abundant honour to that which lacked, 1 Cor. 12. 24.

II. That the names she gave her children, were expressive of her respectful regards both to God and to her husband. 1. She appears very ambitious to have her husband's love: she reckoned the want of it her affliction; (v. 32.) not regarding it as his fault, nor reproaching him for it, and so making herself uneasy to him, but laying it to heart as her grief, which yet she had reason to bear with the more patience, because she herself was consenting to the fraud by which she became his wife; and we may well bear that trouble with patience, which we bring upon ourselves by our own sin and folly. She promises herself, that, if her husband should join with her in the children she bare him, would gain her the interest she desired in his affections. She called her first-born Reuben, See a son, with this pleasant thought, Now will my husband love me; and her third son Levi, Joined, with this expectation, Now will my husband be joined unto me, v. 34. Mutual affection is both the duty, and comfort, of that relation; and yoke-fellows should smite one another, that children she bare him, would gain her the interest she desired in his affections. She called her first-born Reuben, See a son, with this pleasant thought, Now will my husband love me; and her third son Levi, Joined, with this expectation, Now will my husband be joined unto me, v. 34. Mutual affection is both the duty, and comfort, of that relation; and yoke-fellows should smite one another, that children she bare him, would gain her the interest she desired in his affections. She called her first-born Reuben, See a son, with this pleasant thought, Now will my husband love me; and her third son Levi, Joined, with this expectation, Now will my husband be joined unto me, v. 34. Mutual affection is both the duty, and comfort, of that relation; and yoke-fellows should smite one another, that children she bare him, would gain her the interest she desired in his affections.
and tender mercy. Her fourth she called Jokdeh, Praise, saying, Now will I praise the Lord, v. 32. And this was the woman of whom we concerning the flesh, Christ came. Note, (1.) Whatever is the matter of our rejoicing, ought to be the matter of our thanksgiving: fresh favours should quicken us to praise God for former favours. Now will I praise the Lord more and better than I have done. (2.) All our praises must centre in Christ, both as the matter of them, and as the Mediator of them. He descended from him whose name was Praise, for he is our Praise. Is Christ formed in my heart? Now will I praise the Lord.

CHAP. XXX.

In this chapter we have an account of the increase. I. Of Jacob's family. Eight children more we find registered in this chapter; Dan and Naphtali by Bilhah, Rachel's handmaid, v. 11. S. Gad and Asher by Zilpah, Leah's maid, v. 9. 13. Issachar, Zebulun, and Dinah, by Leah, v. 14. 21. And, last of all, Joseph, by Rachel, v. 22. 24. II. Of Jacob's estate. He makes a new bargain with Laban, v. 25. 34. And in the six years' further service he did to Laban, God wonderfully blessed him, so that his stock of cattle became very considerable, v. 35. 43. Herein was fulfilled the thing which God had disowned him of (ch. 28. 3.) God make thee fruitful, and multiply thee. Even these small matters concerning Jacob's house and field, though they seem inconsiderable, are improveable for our learning. For the scriptures were written, not for princes and statesmen, to instruct them in politics; but for all people, even the meanest, to direct them in their families and callings: yet some things are here recorded concerning Jacob, not for imitation but for admonition.

1. A ND when Rachel saw that she bare Jacob no children, Rachel envied her sister; and said unto Jacob, Give me children, or else I die. 2. And Jacob's anger was kindled against Rachel: and he said, Am I in God's stead, who hath withheld from thee the fruit of the womb? 3. And she said, Behold my maid Bilhah, go in unto her; and she shall bear upon my knees, that I may also have children by her. 4. And she gave him Bilhah her handmaid to wife: and Jacob went in unto her. 5. And Bilhah conceived, and bare Jacob a son. 6. And Rachel said, God hath judged me, and hath also heard my voice, and hath given me a son: therefore called she his name Dan. 7. And Bilhah Rachel's maid conceived again, and bare Jacob a second son. 8. And Rachel said, with great wrestlings have I wrestled with my sister, and I have prevailed: and she called his name Naphtali. 9. When Leah saw that she had left bearing, she took Zilpah her maid, and gave her Jacob to wife. 10. And Zilpah Leah's maid bare Jacob a son. 11. And Leah said, a troop cometh: and she called his name Gad. 12. And Zilpah Leah's maid bare Jacob a second son. 13. And Leah said, Happy am I, for the daughters will call me blessed: and she called his name Asher.

We have here the bad consequences of that strange marriage which Jacob made with the two sisters. Here is,

1. An unhappy disagreement between him and Rachel, (v. 1, 2.) occasioned, not so much by her own barrenness, as by her sister's fruitfulness. Rebekah, the only wife of Isaac, was long childless, and yet we find no uneasiness between her and Isaac; but here, because Leah bears children, Rachel cannot live peaceably with Jacob. 1. Rachel frets; (v. 1.) she envied her sister; envy is grieving at the good of another, than which no sin is more offensive to God, or more injurious to our neighbour and ourselves. Note, God that observeth the difference, and that though, in this single instance, her sister was preferred before her, yet in other things she had the advantage. Let us carefully watch against all the risings and workings of this passion in our minds. Let not our eye be evil towards any of our fellow-servants, because our master's is good. But this was not all; she said to Jacob, Give me children, or else I die. Note, We are very apt to us, as to other sinners, to give ourselves to the labour and solicitations of a sinner, yet to omit the fruits of mercy, as Rachel here; (1.) One child would not content her; but, because Leah has more than one, she must have more too; Give me children. (2.) Her heart is inordinately set upon it, and if she have not what she would have, she will throw away her life, and all the comforts of it. ''Give them me, or else I die.''' that is, I shall fret myself to death; the want of this satisfaction will slumber me. Note, We are very apt to us, as to other sinners, to give ourselves to the labour and solicitations of a sinner, yet to omit the fruits of mercy, as Rachel here; (1.) One child would not content her; but, because Leah has more than one, she must have more too; Give me children. (2.) Her heart is inordinately set upon it, and if she have not what she would have, she will throw away her life, and all the comforts of it. ''Give them me, or else I die.''' that is, I shall fret myself to death; the want of this satisfaction will slumber me. Note, We are very apt to us, as to other sinners, to give ourselves to the labour and solicitations of a sinner, yet to omit the fruits of mercy, as Rachel here; (1.) One child would not content her; but, because Leah has more than one, she must have more too; Give me children. (2.) Her heart is inordinately set upon it, and if she have not what she would have, she will throw away her life, and all the comforts of it. ''Give them me, or else I die.''' that is, I shall fret myself to death; the want of this satisfaction will slumber me.

2. Jacob chides, and most justly; (v. 2.) he loved Rachel, and therefore reproved her for what she said amiss. Note, Faithful reproofs are products and instances of true affection, Ps. 141. 5. Prov. 27. 5, 6. Job reproved his wife when she spake the language of the foolish woman, Job 2. 10. See I Cor. 7. 16. He was angry, not at the person, but at the sin; he expressed himself so as to show his displeasure. Note, Sometimes it is requisite that a reprover should be given with spirit, like a physical potion: not too cold, lest it scald the patient; yet not cold, lest it prove ineffective. It was a very grave and pious reply which Jacob gave to Rachel's peevish demand: Am I in God's stead? The Chaldee paraphrases it well, Dost thou ask sons of me? Oughtest thou not to ask from before the Lord? The Arabic reads it, "Am I above God; can I give thee that which God denies thee?" This was said like a plain man to observe. See He acknowledged the hand of God in the affliction which he was a sharer with her in. He hath withheld the fruit of the womb. Note, Whatever we want, it is God that withholds it, a sovereign Lord, most wise, holy, and just, that may do what he will with his own, and is debtor to no man; that never did, nor ever can do, any wrong to any of his creatures. The keys of the clouds, of the heart, of the grave, and of the womb, are four keys which God has in his hand, and which (the Rabbins say) he intrusts neither with angel nor seraphim. See Rev. 3. 7. Job 11. 10.—12. 14. (2.) He acknowledges his own inability to alter what God had appointed, Am I in God's stead? What! Dost thou make a god of me? Deos qui rogat illa facit—He to whom we offer supplications, is to us a God. Note, [1.] There is no creature that is or can be, to us, in God's stead. God may be to us instead of any creature, as the sun instead of the moon and stars; but the moon and all the stars will not be to us instead of the sun. No creature's wisdom, power, and love, will be to us instead of God's. [2.] It is therefore vain and foolish to place confidence in any creature, to which is to be placed in God only.

II. An unhappy agreement between him and the two handmaids.

1. At the persuasion of Rachel, he took Bilhah her handmaid to wife, that, according to the usage of those times, his children by her might be adopted and owned as her mistress's children, v. 3, &c. She would rather have children by reputation than none at all; children that she might fancy to be her own, and call her own, though they were not so. One would think her own sister's children were nearer akin to her than her maid's, and she might with more satisfaction have made them her own, if she had so pleased; but (so natural is it for us all to be fond of power) children that she had a right to, were more desirable to her than children that she had more reason to love; and, as an early instance of her dominion over the children born in her apartment, she takes a pleasure in giving them names that carry in them nothing but marks of emulation with her sister. As if she had overcome her, (1.) At w.; she calls the first son of her handmaid Dan, Judgment, saying, "God hath judged me," v. 6. (that is) "given sentence in my favour," (2.) In battle; she calls the next Naphtali, Wrestlings, saying, I have wrestled with my sister, and have prevailed; (v. 8,) as if all Jacob's sons should be born of struggle or contention. See what roots of bitterness, envy and strife are, and what mischief they make among relations.

2. At the persuasion of Leah, he took Zilpah her handmaid to wife also, v. 9. Rachel had done that absurd and preposterous thing, of giving her maid to her husband, in emulation with Leah; and now Leah (because she missed one year in bearing children) does the same, to be even with her, or rather, to keep before her. See the power of jealousy and rivalry, and admire the wisdom of the divine appointments, which joined together one man and two women only: God had called us to peace and purity, 1 Cor. 7. 15. Two sons Zilpah bare to Jacob, whom Leah looked upon herself as entitled to; in token of which, she called one Gad, (v. 11.) promising herself a little Troop of children; and children are the militia of a family, they fill the quiver, Ps. 127. 4, 5. The other she called Asher, Happy, thinking herself happy in him, and promising herself that her neighbours would think so too, v. 13. The daughters will call me blessed. Note, It is an instance of the vanity of the world, and the foolishness bound up in our hearts, that most people value themselves, and govern themselves, more by reputation, than either by reason or religion; they think themselves blessed, if the daughters do but call them so. There was much amiss in the contest and competition between these two sisters, yet God brought good out of this evil; for the time was not so at that hand when the seed of Abraham must begin to increase and multiply, thus Jacob's family was replenished with twelve sons, heads of the thousands of Israel, from whom the celebrated twelve tribes descended, and were named.

14. And Reuben went in the days of wheat-harvest, and found mandrakes in the field, and brought them unto his mother Leah. Then Rachel said to Leah, Give me, I pray thee, of thy son's mandrakes. 15. And she said unto her, Is it a small matter that thou hast taken my husband? And wouldst thou take away my son's mandrakes also? And Rachel said, Therefore he shall lie with thee to night for thy son's mandrakes. 16. And Jacob came out of the field in the evening, and Leah went out to meet him, and said, Thou must come unto me; for surely I have hired thee with my son's mandrakes. And he lay with her that night. 17. And God hearkened unto Leah, and she conceived, and bare Jacob the fifth son. 18. And Leah said, God hath given me my hire, because I have given my maid to my husband; and she called his name Issachar. 19. And Leah conceived again, and bare Jacob the sixth son. 20. And Leah said, God hath endowed me with a good dowry; now will my husband dwell with me, because I have born him six sons; and she called his name Zebulun. 21. And afterward she bare a daughter, and called her name Dinah. 22. And God remembered Rachel, and God hearkened unto her, and opened her womb. 23. And she conceived, and bare a son; and said, God hath taken away my reproach. 24. And she called his name Joseph; and said, The Lord shall add to me another son.

Here is, 1. Leah fruitful again, after she had, for some time, left bearing. Jacob, it should seem, associated more with Rachel than with Leah. The law of Moses supposes it a common case, that if a man had two wives, one would be loved, and the other hated, Gen. 21. 15. But, at length, Rachel's strong passions betrayed her into a bargain with Jacob, that Jacob should return to her apartment. Reuben, a little lad, five or six years old, playing in the field, found mandrakes, drudaim. It is uncertain what they were, the critics are not agreed about them; we are sure they were some rarities, either fruits or flowers that were very pleasant to the smell, Cant. 7. 15. Note, The God of nature has provided, not only for our necessities, but for our delights; there are products of the earth in the exposed fields, as well as in the planted protected gardens, that are very valuable and useful. How plentifully is nature's house furnished, and her table spread! Her precious fruits offer themselves to be gathered by the hands of little children. It is a laudable custom of the devout Jews, when they find pleasure, suppose in eating an apple, to lift up their hearts, and say, Blessed be he that made this fruit pleasant! Or, in smelling a flower, Blessed be he that made this flower sweet." Some think these mandrakes were jessamine flowers; whatever they were, Rachel could not see them in Leah's hands, into which the child had brought them, but she must covet them. She cannot bear the want of these pretty flowers, but, at any rate, she will purchase them. Note, There may be great sin in folly in the inordinate desire of a small thing. Leah takes this advantage, (as Jacob had of Esau's coveting his red pottage,) to obtain that which was justly due to her, but which Rachel would not otherwise have consented to. Note, Strong passions often thwart one another, and those cannot but be continually uneasy, that are hurried by them. Leah is overjoyed that she shall have her husband's company again, that her family might yet return his former love, which is the blessing she desires and devoutly prays for, as is intimated, v. 17, where it is said, God hearkened unto Leah. The learned Bishop Patrick very well suggests here, that the true reason of this contest between Jacob's wives for his company, and their giving him of their maid's to be his wives, was, the earnest desire they had to fulfill the promise made to Abraham, (and now lately renewed to Jacob,) that his seed should be as the stars of heaven for multitude, and that in the Seed of his, the Messiah, all the nations of the earth should be blessed. And he thinks it had been below the dignity of this sacred history, to take such particular notice of these things, if there had not been some such great consideration in them. Leah was now blessed with two sons; the first she called Issachar, A hire, (v. 18,) and reckoning herself well repaid for her manrakes, nay, (which is a strange construction of the providence,) rewarded for giving her maid to her husband. Note, We abuse God's mercy, when we reckon that his favours countenance and patronise our follies. The other she called Zebulun, Dwelling, (v. 20,) owning God's bounty to her, God has endowed me with a good dowry. Jacob had not endowed her when he married her, nor had he wherewith in possession; but she recks a family of children, not a bill of charges, but a good dowry, Ps. 113. 9. She promises herself more of her husband's company, now that she had born him six sons, and that, in love to his children, at least, he would often visit her lodging. Mention is made, v. 21, of the birth of a daughter, Dinah, because of the following story concerning her, ch. 34. Perhaps Jacob had other daughters, though not registered.

2. Rachel fruitful at last, v. 22, God remembered Rachel whom he seemed to have forgotten, and hearkened to her whose prayers had been long denied; and then she bare a son. Note, As God justly denies the mercy we have been inordinately desirous of, so sometimes he graciously grants, at length, that which we have long waited for. He corrects our folly, and yet considers our frame, and does not contend for ever. Rachel called her son Joseph, which, in Hebrew, is akin to two words of a contrary significance, for he has the Lord, and my reproach, as if the greatest mercy she had in this was that she had saved her credit; and Joseph, Addidit, The Lord shall add to me another son; which may be looked upon, either as the langua ge of her inordinate desire, (she scarcely knows how to be thankful for one, unless she may be sure of another,) or of her faith; she takes this mercy as an earnest of further mercy; 'Has God given me this grate? I can ask for it, Josph, He shall add more grace. Has he given me his joy? It may call it Josph, and say, He will give more joy. Has he begun, and shall he not make an end?'

25. And it came to pass, when Rachel had born Joseph, that Jacob said unto Laban, Send me away, that I may go unto mine own place, and to my country. 26. Give me my wives and my children, for whom I have served thee, and let me go; for thou knowest my service which I have done thee. 27. And Laban said unto him, I pray thee, if I have found favour in thine eyes, tarry: for I have learned by experience that the Lord hath blessed me for thy sake. 28. And he said, Appoint me thy wages, and I will give it. 29. And he said unto him, Thou knowest how I have served thee, and how thy cattle was with me. 30. For it was little which thou hadst before I came, and it is now increased unto a multitude; and the Lord hath blessed thee since my coming, and now when shall I provide for mine own house also? 31. And he said, What shall I give thee? And Jacob said, Thou shalt not give me any thing: if thou wilt do this thing for me, I will again feed and keep thy flock: 32. I will pass through all thy flock to day, removing from thence all the speckled and spotted cattle, and all the brown cattle among the sheep, and the spotted and speckled among the goats, and of such shall be my hire. 33. So shall my righteousness answer for me in time to come, when it shall come for my hire before thy face: every one that is not speckled and spotted amongst the goats, and brown amongst the sheep, that shall be accounted stollen with me. 34. And Laban said, Behold, I would it might be according to thy word. 35. And he removed that day the he-goats that were ringstraked and spotted, and all the she-goats that were speckled and spotted, and every one that had some white in it, and all the brown among the sheep, and gave them into the hands of his sons. 36. And he set three days' journey betwixt himself and Jacob: and Jacob fed the rest of Laban's flocks.

We have here,

1. Jacob's thoughts of home. He faithfully served his time out with Laban, even his second apprenticeship, though he was an old man, had a growing family to provide for, and it was high time for him to set up for himself; though Laban's service was hard, and he had cheated him in the first bargain he had made, yet, Jacob honestly performs his engagements. Note, A good man, though he swears to his own hurt, will not change. And though others have deceived us, that will not justly us in deceiving them. Our rule is, to do as we would be done by, not as we are done by. Jacob's term being expired, he begs leave to begone, v. 25. Observe, 1. He retained his affection for the land of Canaan, not only because it was the land of his nativity, and his father and mother were there, whom he longed to see; but because it was the land of promise, and in tender of his dependence upon its promise of it; though he sojourn in Haran, he can by no means think of settling there. Thus should we be affected towards our heavenly country, looking upon ourselves as strangers here, viewing the heavenly country as our home, and longing to be there, as soon as the days of our service upon earth are numbered and finished. We must not think of taking root here, for this is not our place and country, Heb. 13. 14. 2. He was desirous to go to Canaan, though he had a great family to take with him, and no provision yet made for them. He had got wives and children with Laban, but nothing else; yet he does not solicit Laban to give him either a portion with his wives, or the maintenance of some of his children. No, all his request is, Give me my wives and my children, and send me away, v. 25. 26. Note,
Those that trust in God, and in his providence and promise, though they have great families and small incomes, can cheerfully hope that he who sends mouths will send meat. He who feeds the birds of the ravens, will not starve the seed of the righteous.

II. Laban’s desire of his stay, v. 27. In love to himself, not to Jacob or to his wives or children, he speaks fairly and gently, that he may engage him to continue his chief shepherd; entreat him, by the regard he bore him, not to leave him; If I have found favour in thine eyes, tarry. Note, Churlish selfish men know how to give good words, when he is to leave Laban. Laban found that his stock had wonderfully increased with Jacob’s good management, and he owns it, with very good expressions of respect both to God and Jacob; I have learned by experience, that the Lord has blessed me for thy sake. Observe, 1. Laban’s learning. I have learned by experience. Note, There is many a profitable good lesson to be learned by experience. We are very unapt scholars, if we have not learned by experience the end of sin, the treachery of our own hearts, the base nature of the world, the goodness of God, the gains of godliness, and the like. 2. Laban’s lesson; he owns, (1.) That his prosperity was owing to God’s blessing; The Lord has blessed me. Note, Worldly men that choose their portion in this life, are often blessed with an abundance of this world’s goods. Common blessings are given plentifully to many that have no title to covenant blessings. (2.) That Jacob’s piety had brought this blessing upon him; The Lord has blessed me, not for my own sake, (let not such a man as Laban, that lives without God in the world, think that he shall receive any thing of the Lord, Jam. 1. 7.) but for thy sake. Note, (1.) Good men are bessresses to the places where they live, even there where they live meanly and obscurely, as Jacob in the field, and Joseph in the prison, ch. 39. 23. (2.) God often blesses his men with outward blessings, for the sake of their godly relations, though it is seldom that they have either the wit to see it, or the grace to own it, as Laban did here.

III. The new bargain they came upon. Laban’s craft and covetousness took advantage of Jacob’s plainness, honesty, and good nature; and, perceiving that Jacob began to be won upon by his fair speeches, instead of making him a generous offer, and bidding high, as he ought, he had almost all things conveyed, and put it upon him to make his demands; (v. 28.) Affright me thy wages; knowing he would be very modest in them, and would ask less than he could for shame offer. Jacob accordingly makes a proposal to him, in which, 1. He shows what reason he had to insist upon so much, considering, (1.) That Laban was bound in gratitude to do well for him, because he had served him not only faithfully, but successfully, v. 30. Yet he does so, how he speaks, like himself, very modestly. Laban had said, The Lord has blessed me for thy sake; Jacob will not say so, but, The Lord has blessed thee since my coming. Note, Humble saints take more pleasure in doing good than in hearing of it again. (2.) That he himself was bound in duty to take care of his own family; Now, when shall I provide for mine house? Note, Laban was doubtless ready, though they are excellent things, must not take us off from making necessary provisions for our own support, and the support of our families. We must, like Jacob, trust in the Lord, and do good, and yet we must, like him, provide for our own houses also; he that does not, is worse than an infidel, 1 Tim. 5. 8.

2. He is willing to refer himself to the providence of God, which, he knew, extends itself to the smallest things, eventhe colour of the cattle; and he will be content to have for his wages the sheep and goats of such and such a colour, speckled, spotted, and brown, which should hereafter be brought forth, v. 32, 33. This, he thinks, will be a most effectual way both to prevent Laban’s cheating him, and to secure himself from being suspected of cheating Laban. Some think he chose this colour, because in Canaan it was generally most desired, and delighted in; their shepherds in Canaan are called Nekodim, (Amos 1. 1.) the word here used for speckled; and Laban was willing to consent to this bargain, because he thought if the few he had that were now speckled and spotted, were separated from the rest, which by agreement was to be done immediately, the body of the flock which Jacob was to tend, being of one colour, either all black, or all white, would produce few or none of mixt colours, and so he should have Jacob’s service for nothing, or next to nothing. According to this bargain, those few that were party-coloured, were separated, and put into the hands of Laban’s sons, and sent three days’ journey off; so great was Laban’s jealousy, lest any should mix with the rest of the flock, in the advantage of Jacob. And now a fine bargain Jacob has made for himself! Is this his providing for his own house, to put it upon such an uncertainty? If these cattle bring forth, as usually cattle do, young ones of the same colour with themselves, he must still serve for nothing, and be a drudge and a beggar all the days of his life; but he knows whom he has trusted, and the event showed, (1.) That he took the best way that could be taken with Laban, who otherwise would certainly have been too hard for him. And, (2.) That it was not in vain to rely upon the Divine Providence, which owns and blesses honest humble diligence. Those that find men whom they deal with unjust and unkind, shall not find God so, but that, some way or other, he will right the injured, and be a good Pay-Master to those that commit their cause to him.

37. And Jacob took him rods of green poplar and of the hasel and Chesnut-tree, and pilled white strakes in them, and made the white appear, which was in the rods. 38. And he set the rods, which he had pilled, before the flocks in the gutters in the watering-troughs, when the flocks came to drink, that they should conceive when they came to drink. 39. And the flocks conceived before the rods, and brought forth cattle ring-straked, speckled, and spotted. 40. And Jacob did separate the lambs, and set the faces of the flocks toward the ring-straked, and all the brown in the flock of Laban; and he put his own flocks by themselves, and put them not into Laban’s cattle. 41. And it came to pass, whenever the stronger cattle did conceive, that Jacob laid the rods before the eyes of the cattle in the gutters, that they might conceive among the rods. 42. But when the cattle were feeble, he put them not in: so the feeble were Laban’s, and the stronger Jacob’s. 43. And the man increased exceedingly, and had much cattle, and maid-servants, and mon-servants, and camels, and asses.

Here is Jacob’s honest policy to make his bargain more advantageous to himself than it was likely to be: if he had not taken some course to help himself, it would have been a bad bargain indeed, which he knew Laban would never have considered, or rather, which he would have been well-pleased to see him loser by; so little did Laban consult any one's interest but his own. Now Jacob's contrivances were in vain.

1. To set pilled sticks before the cattle where they were watered, that, looking much at those unusual party-coloured sticks, by the power of imagination, they might bring forth young ones in like manner party-coloured, v. 37.; 38. Probably, this custom was commonly used by the shepherds of Canaan, who coveted to have their cattle of this motley colour. In many matters of trade, whatever it is, and to be not only industrious, but ingenious in it, and to be versed in all its lawful arts and mysteries; for what is a man but his trade? There is a discretion which God teaches the husbandman, (as plain a trade as that is,) and which he ought to learn, Isa. 28. 26.

2. When he began to have a stock of ring-straked and brown, he contrived to set them first, and to put the finest and fairest of them, the same design as he did the former with; but would not let his own that were motley-coloured, look at Laban's that were of one colour, v. 40. Strong improvements, it seems, are made by the eye, with which therefore we have need to make a covenant.

3. When he found that his project succeeded, through the special blessing of God upon it, he continued, by using it only by the stronger cattle, to secure to himself what he thought valuable, leaving the feebler to Laban, v. 41. 42. Thus Jacob increased exceedingly, (v. 43.) and grew very rich in a little time. This success of his policy, it is true, was not sufficient to justify it, if there had been any thing fraudulent or unjust in it, which we see there was not, for he did it by divine direction; (ch. 31. 12.) nor was there any thing in the thing itself, but the honest improvement of a fair bargain, which the Divine Providence wonderfully prospered, both in justice to Jacob, whom Laban had wronged and dealt hardly with, and in pursuance of the particular promises made to him of the tokens of the divine favour. Note, Those, who, while their beginning is small, are humble and honest, contented and industrious, are in a likely way to see their latter end greatly increasing; he that is faithful and honest shall be enriched with more; he that is faithful in that which another man's, shall be intrusted with something of his own. Jacob that had been a just servant, became a rich master.

CHAP. XXXI.

Jacob was a very honest good man, a man of great devotion, and integrity, and yet he had more trouble and vexation than any of the patriarchs. He had left his father's house in a fright, came to his uncle in distress, very hard usage he had met with there, and now is going back surrounded with distresses, and he could not stay among them with safety and satisfaction. III. His clandestine departure, v. 17.; 21. II. His pursuit of him in displeasure, v. 22.; 25. IV. The hot words that passed between them, v. 26.; 42. V. Their amicable agreement at last, v. 43.; 55.

AND he heard the words of Laban's sons, saying, Jacob hath taken away all that was our father's; and of that which was our father's hath he gotten all this glory. 2. And Jacob beheld the countenance of Laban, and, beheld, it was not toward him as before. 3. And the Lord said unto Jacob, Return unto the land of thy fathers, and to thy kindred; and I will be with thee. 4. And Jacob sent and called Rachel and Leah to the field unto his flock, 5. And said unto them, I see your father's countenance, that it is not toward me as before; but the God of my father hath been with me. 6. And ye know that with all my power I have served your father. 7. And your father hath deceived me and changed my wages ten times; but God suffered him not to hurt me. 8. If he said thus, The speckled shall be thy wages; then all the cattle bare speckled: and if he said thus, The ring-straked shall be thy hire; then all the cattle bare ring-straked. 9. Thus God hath taken away the cattle of your father, and given them to me. 10. And it came to pass at the time that the cattle conceived, that I lifted up nine eyes, and saw in a dream, saying, Jacob: And I said, Here am I. 12. And he said, Lift up now thine eyes, and see, all the rams which leap upon the cattle, are ring-straked, speckled, and grisled. 11. And the angel of God spake unto me in a dream, saying, Jacob: And I said, Here am I. 12. And he said, Lift up now thine eyes, and see, all the rams which leap upon the cattle, are ring-straked, speckled, and grisled: for I have seen all that Laban doeth unto thee. 13. I am the God of Beth-er, where thou didstst the pillar, and where thou wastest a vow unto me: now arise, get thee out from this land, and return unto the land of thy kindred. 14. And Rachel and Leah answered and said unto him, is there yet any portion or inheritance for us in our father's house? 15. Are we not counted of him strangers? For he hath sold us, and hath quite devoured our money. 16. For all the riches which God hath taken from our father, that is our's, and our children's: now then, whatsoever God hath said unto thee, do.

Jacob is here taking up a resolution immediately to quit his uncle's service, and to take what he had, and go back to Canaan. He took up this resolution, upon a just provocation by divine direction, and with the advice and consent of his wives.

I. Upon a just provocation; for Laban and his sons were become very cross and ill-natured toward him, so that he could not stay among them with safety and satisfaction. 1. Laban's sons showed it in what they said, v. 1. It should seem, they said it in Jacob's hearing, with a design to vex him. The last chapter began with Rachel's envying Leah; this begins with Laban's son's envying Jacob. Observe, (1.) How greatly they magnify Jacob's prosperity. He has got this glory! And what is this glory? And what is that which we make so much ado about? It was a parcel of brown sheep, and speckled goats, (and perhaps the fine colours made them seem more glorious,) and some camels and asses, and such like trading; and that was all this glory. Note, Riches are glorious things in the eyes of carnal people, while to all those that are conversant with heavenly things, they have no glory in comparison with the glory which excelleth. Men's over valuing worldly wealth, is that fundamental error which is the root of covetousness, envy, and all evil. (2.) How basely they reflect upon Jacob's fidelity, as if what he had, he had not gotten honestly; Jacob has taken leave of all that was our father's. Not all, sure. What he had of those cattle which were committed to the custody of Laban's sons, and sent three days' journey off? ch. 30. 35, 36. They mean all that was committed to him; but speaking invidiously, they express themselves thus generally. Note, [1.] Those that are ever so careful to keep a good conscience, yet cannot always be sure of a good name. [2.] This is often perverted to the advantage of the unrighteous, to their gain, to their worldly prosperity, that it makes a man to be envied of his neighbour; (Eccl. 4. 4.) and who can stand before envy? Prov. 26. 4. Whom Heaven blesses Hell curses, and all its children on earth.

2. Laban himself said false, but his countenance was not toward Jacob as it used to be; and Jacob could not but take notice of it, v. 2, 5. He was but a churl at the best; but the wrongs were righted toward formerly. Note, Envy is a sin that often appears in the countenance; hence we read of an evil eye, Prov. 23. 6. Sour looks may do a great deal toward the ruin of peace and love in a family, and the making of those uneasy, whose comfort we ought to be tender of. Laban's angry countenance lost him the greatest blessing his family ever had, and at last.

II. He resolved it by divine direction, and under the convey of a promise; (v. 3.) The Lord said unto Jacob, Return, and I will be with thee. Though Jacob had met with very hard usage here, yet he would not quit his place, till God bid him. He came thither by orders from Heaven, and there he would stay, till he was ordered back. Note, It is our duty to set ourselves, and it will be our comfort to see ourselves, under God's guidance, both in our going out, and in our coming in. The adventure he had from Heaven, is more fully related in the account, he gives of it to his wives, (v. 10. 13.) where he tells them of a dream he had about his cattle, and the wonderful increase of those of his colour; and how the angel of God, in that dream, (for I suppose the dream spoken of, v. 10. and that v. 11. to be the same,) took notice of the workings of his fancy in his sleep, and directed him, that it was not by chance, nor by his own policy, that he obtained that great advantage; but,

1. By the providence of God, who had taken notice of the hardships that Laban had put upon him, and took this way to right him; For I have seen all that Laban doeth unto thee, and herein I have an eye to that. Note, There is more of equity in the distributions of Divine Providence, than we are aware of, and by them the wrongs are righted, really, though perhaps insensibly. Nor was it only by the justice of Providence, that Jacob was thus enriched, but,

2. In performance of the promise intimated in what is said, v. 13, I am the God of Bethel. That was the place where the covenant was renewed with him. Note, We are wonderfully prosperous and success are then doubly sweet and comfortable, when we see them flowing not from common providence, but from covenant-love; to perform the mercy promised; when we have them from God, as the God of Bethel, from those promises of the life which now is, that belong to godliness. But we observe that Jacob, even when he had this hopeful prospect of growing rich, with Laban, must think of returning. When the world begins to smile upon us, we must remember it is not our home. Now arise, (v. 13.) and return, (1.) To thy devotions in Canaan; the solemnities of which had perhaps been much intermitted while he was with Laban. The times of this scruple God had winked at; but now, Return to the place where thou anointedst the fuller, and vowedst the vow. Now that thou beginnest to grow rich, it is time to think of an altar and sacrifices again. (2.) To thy comforts in Canaan; to the land of his birth. He was here among his near kindred; but those only he must look upon as his kindred in the best sense, the kindred he must live and die with, to whom pertained the covenant. Note, The heirs of Canaan must never reckon themselves at home, till they come thither, however they may seem to take root here.

III. He resolved it with the knowledge and counsel of God. He sent for Rachel and Leah to him to the field; (v. 4.) where they might converse with them more privately, or because one would not come to the other's apartment, and he would willingly talk with them together, or, because he had work to do in the field, which he would not leave. Note, Husbands that love their wives, will communicate their purposes and intentions to them. Where there is a mutual affection, there will be a mutual confidence. And the prudence of the wife should engage the heart of her husband s.fely to trust in her, Prov. 31. 1. He told his wives,

1. How faithfully he had served their father, v. 6. Note, if others do not do their duty to us, yet we shall have the comfort of having done our's to them.

2. How unfaithfully their father had dealt with him, v. 7. He would never keep to any bargain that he made with him, but after the first year, still as he saw Providence favour Jacob with the colour agreed on, every half year of the remaining five, he changed it for some other colour, which made it ten times; as if he thought not only to deceive Jacob, but the Divine Providence which manifestly smiled upon him. Note, Those that deal honestly, are not always honestly dealt with.

3. How God had, and wist him not with it; hiding not only protecting him from Laban's ill-will, (God suffered him not to hurt me. Note, Those that keep close to God, shall be kept safe by him,) but providing plentifully for him, notwithstanding Laban's design to ruin him; (v. 9.) God hath taken away the cattle of your father, and given them to me. Thus the righteous God did Jacobs for his hard service out of Laban's estate; as afterward he paid them the double of the debt for their serving him two years, of the Egyptians with their spoils. Note, (1.) God is just and righteous to forget his people's work and labour of love, though men be so, Heb. 6. 10. Providence has ways of making those honest in the event, that are not so in their design. (2.) The wealth of the sinner is laid up for the just, Prov. 13. 22.

4. He told them of the command God had given him, in a dream to return to his own country, (v. 13.) that they might not suspect his resolution to arise from inconstancy, or any disaffection to their country or family, but might see it to proceed from a principle of obedience to his God, and dependence on him.

Lastly, His wives cheerfully consented to his resolution. They also brought forward their grievances to complaining that their father had been not only unjust, but cruel, to them, (v. 14, 15.) that he looked upon them as strangers, and was without natural affection toward them; and that whereas Jacob had looked upon the wealth which God had transferred from Laban to him as his wages, they looked upon it as their portions; so that, both ways, God forced Laban to pay his debts, both to his servant, and to his daughters. So then it seemed, (1.) They were weary of the journey, and their journey's house, and they could easily forget this burden. Note, This good use we should make of the unkind usage we meet with from the world, we should sit the more loose to it, and be willing to leave it, and desirous to be at home. (2.) They were willing to go along with their husband, and to put themselves with him under the divine conduct; Wherever God hath said unto thee, do. Note, Those wives that are their husbands’ meet helps, will never be their hinderances in doing that which God calls them to.

17. Then Jacob rose up, and set his sons and his wives upon camels. 18. And he carried away all his cattle, and all his goods which he had gotten in Padan-aram, for to go to Isaac his father in the land of Canaan. 19. And Laban went to shear his sheep; and Rachel had stolen the images that were her father’s. 20. And Jacob stole away unawares to Laban the Syrian, in that he told him not that he fled. 21. So he fled with all that he had; and rose up, and passed over the river, and set his face toward the mount Gilead. 22. And it was told Laban on the third day, that Jacob was fled. 23. And he took his brethren with him, and pursued after him seven days’ journey; and they overtook him in the mount Gilead. 24. And God came to Laban the Syrian in a dream by night, and said unto him, Take heed that thou speak not to Jacob either good or bad.

JACOB’S FLIGHT FROM LABAN. We may suppose he had been long considering of it, and casting about in his mind respecting it; but, when now, at last, God had given him positive orders to go, he made no delay, nor was he disobedient to the heavenly vision. The first opportunity that offered itself he laid hold on, when Laban was shearing his sheep, (v. 19.) that part of his flock which was in the hands of his sons three days’ journey off. Now, 1. It is certain that it was lawful for Jacob to leave his service suddenly, without giving a quarter’s warning. It was not only justified by the particular instructions God gave him, but warranted by the fundamental law of self-preservation, which directs us when we are in danger, to shift for our own safety, as far as we can do it without wrongdoing our con- sciences. 2. It was his prudence to steal away unawares to Laban, lest, if Laban had known, he should have hindered him, or plundered him. 3. It was honestly done to take no more than his own with him, the cattle of his getting, v. 18. He took what Providence gave him, and was content with that, and would not take the repair of his damages into his own hands. Yet Rachel was not so honest as her husband; she stole her father’s images, (v. 19.) and carried them away with her. The Hebrew calls them Teraphim. Some think they were only little representations of the ancestors of the family in statues or pictures, which Rachel had a particular fondness for, and was desirous to have with her, now that she was going into another country. It should rather seem, they were images for a religious use, Penates, Household-Gods, either worshipped or consulted as oracles; and we are willing to hope (with Bishop Patrick) that she did not take them away as being covetous of the rich metal they were made of, much less for her own use, or out of any superstitious fear lest Laban, by consulting his Teraphim, might know which way they were gone. Jacob, no doubt, dwelt with his wives as a man of knowledge, and they were better taught than so; but she might design hereby to convince her father of the folly of his regard to those as gods, which could not secure themselves. Isa. 46. 9. 2. II. Laban’s pursuit of Jacob. Tidings were brought him on the third day, that Jacob was fled; he immediately raises the whole clan, takes his brethren, that is, the relations of his family, that were all in his interests, and he pursues Jacob, as Pharaoh and his Egyptians afterward pursued the seed of Jacob, to bring them back into bondage again, or with design to strip him of what he had. Seven days’ journey he marched in pursuit of him v. 23. He would not have taken half the pains to have visited his best friends. But the truth is, bad men will do more to serve their sinful passions, than good men will, to serve their just affections, and are more vehement in their anger, than in their love.

Well, at length, Laban overtook him, and the very night before he came up with him, God interposed in the quarrel, rebuked Laban, and sheltered Jacob, charging Laban not to speak unto him either good or bad, (v. 24.) that is, to say nothing against his going on with his journey, for that it proceeded from the Lord. The same Hebraism we have, ch. 24. 50. Laban, during his seven days’ march, had been full of rage against Jacob, and was now full of hopes that he should be satisfied upon him; (Exod. 15. 9.) but God comes to him, and with one word ties his hands, though he does not turn his heart. Note, 1. In a dream, and in slumberings upon the bed, God has ways of opening the ears of men, and sealing their instruction, Job 33. 15, 16. Thus he admonishes men by their consciences, in secret whispers which the man of wisdom will hear and heed. 2. The safety of good men is very much owing to the hold God has of the consciences of bad men, and the access he has to them. 2. God sometimes appears wonderfully for the deliverance of his people, then when they are upon the very brink of ruin. The Jews were saved from Haman’s plot, when the King’s decree drew near to be put in execution, Esth. 9. 1.

25. Then Laban overtook Jacob. Now Jacob had pitched his tent in the mount; and Laban with his brethren pitched in the mount of Gilead. 26. And Laban said to Jacob, What hast thou done, that thou hast stolen away unawares to me, and carried away my daughters, as captives taken with the sword? 27. Wherefore didst thou flee away secretly, and steal away from me; and didst not tell me, that I might have sent thee away with mirth, and with songs, with tabret, and with harp? 28. And hast not suffered me to kiss my sons and my daughters? Thou hast now done foolishly in so doing. 29. It is in the power of my hand to do you hurt: but the God of your father spake unto me yesternight, saying, Take thou heed that thou speak not to Jacob either good or bad. 30. And now, though thou wouldest needs be gone, because thou sore longedst after thy father’s house, yet wherefore hast thou stolen my gods? 31. And Jacob answered and said to Laban, Because I was afraid: for I said, Peradventure thou wouldest take by force my daughters from me. 32. With whomsoever thou findest thy gods, let him not live: before our brother discern what is thine with me, and take it to thee. For Jacob knew not that Rachel had stolen them. 33. And Laban went into Jacob's tent, and into Leah's tent, and into the two maid-servants' tents: but he found them not. Then went he out of Leah's tent, and entered into Rachel's tent. 34. Now Rachel had taken the images, and put them in the camel's furniture, and sat upon them: and Laban searched all the tent, but found them not. 35. And she said to her father, Let it not displease my lord, that I cannot rise up before thee: for the custom of women is upon me. And he searched, but found not the images.

We have here the reasoning, not to say the rallying, that was between Laban and Jacob at their meeting, in that mountain which was afterwards called Gilead, v. 25.

Here is,

I. The high charge which Laban exhibited against Jacob.

As a runagate, that had unjustly deserted his service. To represent him as a criminal, he will have it thought that he intended kindness to his daughters, (v. 27, 28.) that he would have dismissed them with all the marks of love and honour that could be, that he would have made a solemn business of it, would have kissed his little grand-children, (and that was what he intended, and, according to the foolish custom of the country, would have sent them away with pitch and with songs, with tabret and with harp:) not as Rebek h. was sent away out of the same family, about 120 years before, with prayers and blessings, (ch. 24. 60.) but with sport and merriment; which was a sign that religion was very much decayed in the family, and that they had lost their seriousness. However, he pretends that they should have been treated with respect at parting. Note, It is common for bad men, when they are disappointed in their malicious projects, to pretend that they designed nothing but what was kind and fair. When they cannot do the mischief they intended, they are loath it should be thought that they ever did intend it. When they have not done what they should have done, they come off with this excuse, that they would have done it. Men may thus be deceived, but God cannot. He likewise suggests that Jacob had some bad design in stealing away thus, (v. 26.) that he took his wives away as captives. Note, Those that mean ill to themselves, are most apt to put the worst construction upon what others do innocently. The insinuating and the aggravating of faults are the artifices of a designing malice, and those must be represented (though never so unfairly) as intending ill, against whom ill is intended. Upon the whole matter, (1.) He boasts of his own power, (v. 29.) It is in the power of my hand to do you hurt: he supposes that he had both right on his side, a good action (as we say) against Jacob, and strength on his side, either to avenge the wrong, or recover the right. Note, Bad people commonly value themselves much upon their power to do hurt, whereas a power to do good is much more valuable. Those that will do nothing to make themselves amiable, love to be thought formidable. And yet, (2.) He owns himself under the check and restraint of God's power; and though it redounded much to the credit and comfort of Jacob, he cannot avoid telling him the caution God had given him the night before, in a dream, Speak not to Jacob, good or bad. Note, As God has all wicked instruments in a chain, so when he pleases, he can make them sensible of it, and force them to own it to his praise, as Protector of the gods; as Balaam did. Or, we may look upon this as an instance of some conscientious regard felt by Laban for God's express prohibitions. As bad as he was, he was not so bad as he might have been; and there was particular care of Heaven. Note, A great deal of mischief would be prevented, if men would but attend to the cautions which their own consciences give them in small matters upon the bed, and regard to the voice of God in them.

2. He accuses him as a thief, v. 30. Rather than own that he had given him any colour of provocation to depart, he is willing to impute it to a foolish fancy for his father's house, which made him that he would needs be gone; but then (says he) wherefore hast thou stolen my gods? Foolish man! to call those his gods, that could be stolen! Could he expect protection from them that could neither resist, nor discover, their invaders? Happy are they who have the Lord for their God, for they have a God that they cannot be robbed of. Enemies may steal our goods, but not our God. Here Laban lays to Jacob's charge things that are not, the common distress of oppressed innocence.

II. Jacob's apology for himself. Those that commit their cause to God, yet are not forbidden to plead it themselves with meekness and fear. 1. As to the charge of stealing away his own wives, he clears himself by giving the true reason why he went away unknown to Laban, v. 31. He feared lest Laban would by honourable accounts of his having away his daughters, and so obligre, by the bonds of affection to his wives, to continue in his service. Note, Those that are unjust in the least, it may be suspected, will be unjust also in much, Luke 16. 10. If Laban received Jacob in his wages, it is likely he will make no conscience of robbing him of his wives, and putting those under whom God had joined together. What may not be feared from men that have no part and lot of heaven, or God's protection, who have an interest in stealing Laban's gods, he pleads not guilty, v. 32. He not only did not take them himself, (he was not so fond of them,) but he did not know that they were taken. Yet perhaps he spoke too hastily and inconsiderately, when he said, Whoever has taken them, let him not live; upon this he might reflect with some bitterness, when, not long after, Rachel, who had taken them, died suddenly in travail. How just soever we may ourselves be, it is best to forbear imprecations, lest they fall heavier than we imagine.

III. The diligent search Laban made for his gods, (v. 33, 34, 35.) partly out of hatred to Jacob, whom he would gladly have an occasion to quarrel with, partly out of love to his idols, which he was loath to part with. We do not find that he searched Jacob's flocks for stolen cattle: but he searched his furniture for stolen gods. He, who is the Messiah's mind, Ye have taken away my gods, and what have I more? Judg. 18. 24. Were the worshippers of false gods so set upon their idols; did they thus walk in the name of their gods? And shall not we be as solicitous in our inquiries after the true God? When he is justly departed from us, how carefully should we ask, Where is God my Maker? O that I knew where I might find him! Job 23. 3. Laban, after all, was not disappointed, for he was baffled in his inquiry with a sham; but our God will not only be found of those that seek him, but they shall find him bountiful Rewarder.

36. And Jacob was wroth, and chode with Laban: and Jacob answered and said to Laban, What is my trespass, what is my sin, that thou hast so hotly pursued after me? 37. Whereas thou hast searched all my stuff, what hast thou found of all thy household-stuff? Set it here before my brethren, and thy brethren, that they may judge betwixt us both. 38. This twenty years have I been with thee; thy ewes and thy she-goats have not cast their young, and the rams of the flock have I not eaten. 39. That which was torn of beasts I brought not unto thee; I bare the loss of it; of my hand didst thou require it, whether stolen by day, or stolen by night. 40. Thus I was; in the day the drought consumed me, and the frost by night; and my sleep departed from mine eyes. 41. Thus have I been twenty years in thy house; I served thee fourteen years for thy two daughters, and six years for thy cattle: and thou hast changed my wages ten times. 42. Except the God of my father, the God of Abraham, and the Fear of Isaac was with me, surely thou hadst sent me away now empty. God hath seen my affliction and the labour of my hands, and rebuked thee yesternight.

See in these verses, 1. The power of provocation. Jacob's natural temper was mild and calm, and grace had improved it, he was a smooth man, and a plain man; and yet Laban's unreasonable carriage toward him made him into a heat that transported him into some vehemence, v. 36, 37. His chiding with Laban, though it may admit of some excuse, was not justifiable, nor is it written for our imitation. Grievous words stir up anger, and commonly do but make bad worse. It is a very great affliction to one that bears an honest mind, to be charged with dishonesty, and yet even that we must learn to bear with patience, committing our cause to God.

2. The comfort of a good conscience. This was Jacob's rejoicing, that when Laban accused him, his own conscience acquitted him, and witnessed for him that he had been in all things willing, and careful to live honestly, Heb. 13. 18. Note, Those that in any employment have dealt faithfully, if they cannot obtain the credit of it with men, yet shall have the comfort of it in their own bosoms.

3. The character of a good servant and particularly of a faithful shepherd. Jacob had approved himself such a one, v. 38. 40. (1.) He was very careful, so that, through his oversight or neglect, the ewes did not cast their young. His piety also procured a blessing upon his master's effects that were under his hands. Note, Servants should take no less care of what they are intrusted with for their master's good, than if it were entirely their own. (2.) He was very honest, and took none of that for his own eating, which was not allowed him. He contented himself with mean fare, and coveted not to feast upon the rams of the flock. Note, Servants must not be dainty in their food, nor covet what is forbidden them; but in that, and other instances, show all good fidelity. (3.) He was very laborious, v. 40. He stuck to his business, all weathers; and bore both heat and cold with im- possible patience. Note, Men of business, that intend to make something of it, must resolve to endure hardness. Jacob is here an example to ministers; they also are shepherds, of whom it is required that they be true to their trust, and willing to take pains.

1. The character of a hard master. Laban had been such a one to Jacob. These are bad masters, (1.) Who exact from their servants that which is unjust, by obliging them to make good that which is not damaged by any default of their. This Laban did, v. 39. Nay, if there has been a neglect, yet it is unjust to punish above the proportion of the fault. That may be an incalculable damage to the master, which would go near to ruin a poor servant. (2.) These also are bad masters, who deny to their servants that which is just and equal. This Laban did, v. 41. It was unreasonable for him to make Jacob serve for his daughters, when he had in reversion so great an estate secured to him by the promise of God himself; as it was also to give him his daughters without portions, when it was in the power of his hands to do well for them. Thus he robb'd the poor because he was poor, as he did also by changing his wages.

5. The care of Providence for the protection of injured innocence, v. 42. God took cognizance of the wrong done to Jacob, and repaid him whom Laban would otherwise have sent empty away, and belied Laban whom otherwise would have swallowed him up. Note, God is the Patron of the oppressed; and those who are wronged and yet not ruined, cast down and yet not destroyed, must acknowledge him in their preservation, and give him the glory of it. Observe, (1.) Jacob speaks of God, as the God of his father, intimating that he thought himself unworthy to be thus regarded, but was belied for the father's sake. (2.) He calls him the God of Abraham, and the Fear of Isaac; for Abraham was dead, and gone to that world where perfect love casts out fear; but Isaac was yet alive, sanctifying the Lord in his heart, as his Fear and his Dread.

43. And Laban answered and said unto Jacob, These daughters are my daughters, and these children are my children, and these cattle are my cattle, and all that thou seest, is mine; and what can I do this day unto these my daughters, or unto their children which they have born? 44. Now therefore come thou, and let us make a covenant, I and thou; and let it be for a witness between me and thee. 45. And Jacob took a stone, and set it up for a pillar. 46. And Jacob said unto his brethren, Gather stones; and they took stones, and made an heap: and they did eat there upon the heap. 47. And Laban called it Jegar-sahadutha: but Jacob called it Galeed. 48. And Laban said, This heap is a witness between me and thee this day. Therefore was the name of it called Galeed: 49. And Mizpah; for he said, The Lord watch between me and thee, when we are absent one from another. 50. If thou shalt afflict my daughters, or if thou shalt take other wives beside my daughters, no man is with us; see, God is witness betwixt me and thee. 51. And Laban said to Jacob, Behold this heap, and behold this pillar, which I have cast betwixt me and thee; 52. This heap be witness, and this pillar be witness, that I will not pass over this heap to thee, and that thou shalt not pass over this heap and this pillar unto me, for harm. 53. The God of Abraham, and the God of Nahor, the God of their father, judge betwixt us. And Jacob swore by the Fear of his father Isaac. 54. Then Jacob offered sacrifice upon the mount, and called his brethren to eat bread: and they did eat bread, and tarried all night in the mount. 55. And early in the morning Laban rose up, and kissed his sons and his dughters, and blessed them: and Laban departed, and returned unto his place.

We have here the compromising of the matter between Laban and Jacob. Laban had nothing to say in reply to Jacob’s renoncement: he could ne\ither justify himself nor condemn Jacob, but was convicted by his own conscience of the wrong he had done him; and therefore desires to have no more of Jacob there. He is far from being a republican in a fair, nor to ask Jacob forgivenness, and make him satisfaction as he ought to have done.

But,
I. He turns it off with a profession of kindness for Jacob’s wives and children, (v. 43.) These daughters are my daughters. When he cannot excuse what he has done, he does in effect, own what he should have done: he should have treated them as his own, but he had counted them strangers,
v. 15. Note, It is common for those who are without a moral affection, to pretend much to it, when it will serve a turn. Or, perhaps Laban said this in a vain-glorious way, as one that loved to talk big, and use great swelling words of vanity; “All that thou seest, is mine.” It was not so, it was all Jacob’s, and he paid dear for it; yet Jacob let him have his say, in peevishness making him come into a better humour. Note, Property lies near the hearts of worldly people. They love to boast of it, “This is mine, and the other is mine,” as Nabal, 1. Sam.
25. 11, my bread and my water.

II. He proposes a covenant of friendship between them, which Jacob readily agrees to, without in\sisting upon Laban’s submission, much less his restitution. Note, When quarrels happen, we should be willing to be friends again upon any terms: peace and love are such valuable jewels, that we can scarcely buy them too dear. Better sit down losers than go on in strife. Now observe here,
1. The substance of this covenant; Jacob left it wholly to Laban to settle it. The tenor of it was, (1.) That Jacob should be a good husband to his wives, that he should not afflict them, nor marry other wife without her consent. 54. But Laban had given him any cause to suspect that he would be any other than a kind husband: yet, as if he had,
he was willing to come under this engagement.
Though Laban had afflieted them himself, yet he will bind Jacob, that he shall not affliet them. Note, Those that are injurious themselves, are com\monly most jealous of others; and those that do not the round it, are no more gracious in demand ing indulgence from others. 2.) That he should never be a bad neighbour to Laban, v. 32. It was agreed that no act of hostility should ever pass between them, th Jacob should forgive and forget all the wrongs he had received, and not remember them against Laban or his family in after times. Note,
We may have a strong perception of an injury,
which yet we may not revenge.
2. The ceremony of this covenant; it was made and ratified with great solemnity, according to the usages of those times. (1.) A pillar was erected, (v. 43.) and a heap of stones raised, (v. 46.) to perpetuate a remembrance of their treaty of friend\ship, recording agreements, by writing, being then either not known, or not used. (2.) A sacrifice was of\fered, (v. 54.) a sacrifice of peace-offerings. Note, Our peace with God is that which puts true comfort into our peace with our friends. If parties contend, the reconciliation of both to Him will facil\itate their reconciliation one to another. (3.) The dinner was laid together, (v. 46.) partaking of the feast upon the sacrifice, v. 54. This was in token of a hearty reconciliation. Covenants of friendship were annually ratified by the parties eating and drinking together. It was in the nature of a love-feast. (4.) They solemnly appealed to God concerning their sincerity herein; [1.] As a Witness, (v. 49.) The Lord watch between me and other, that is, “The Lord take cognizance of every thing that shall happen between us, and be God’s judge between us, and have His eye on us both.” [2.] As a Judge, v. 53. The God of Abraham, from whom Jacob was descended and the God of Nahor, from whom Laban was descen\ded, the God of their father, the common ancestor, from whom they were both descended, judge bet\ixt us. God’s relation to them is thus expressed, to intimate that they worshipped one and the same God, upon which consideration there ought to be no enmity betwixt them. Note, Those that have one God, should have one heart: those that agree in re\ligion, should have one love for religion. We ought to consider ourselves as God’s agents, and God is judge between contending parties, and he will judge righteously; whoever does wrong, it is at his peril. (5.) They gave a new name to the place,
v. 47, 48. Laban called it in Syriac, and Jacob in Hebrew, the heat of witness. And v. 49, it was called Mizpah, A watch-tower. Posterity being included in the league, care was taken that the name should be memorable; it is applicable to the seals of the gospel-covenant, which are witnesses to us, if we be faithful, but wit\nnesses against us, if we be false. The name Jacob gave this heap, stuck by it, Galeed, not the name Laban gave it. In all this encounter, Laban was noisy and full of words, affecting to say much; Ja\cob was silent, and said little; when Laban appeal\ed to God under many titles, Jacob only spared by the Fear of his father Isaac, that all the injuries of his father Isaac feared, who had never served other gods, as Abraham and Nahor had done. Two words of Jacob’s were more memorable than all Laban’s speeches and vain repetitions. For the words of wise men are heard in quiet, more than the cry of him that ruleth among fools, Eccl. 9. 17.
Lastly, After all this angry parley, they part friends, v. 55, Laban very gratefully blessed his cousins and near kinsmen, and blessed them; and then went back in peace. Note, God is often better to us than our fears, and strangely over-rules the spirits of men in our favour, beyond what we could have expected; for it is not in vain to trust in him.

CHAP. XXXII.

We have here Jacob still upon his journey towards Canaan.
Never did so many memorable things occur in any march, as in this of Jacob’s little family. By the way he meets, I. With good tidings from his God, v. 1, 2. II. With bad tidings from his brother, to whom he sent a message of his father’s death, v. 2, 4. In his distress, 1. He divides his company, v. 7, 8, 2. He makes his prayer to God, v. 9. 12. He sends a present to his brother, v. 13. 23. 4. He wrestles with the angel, v. 24. 32.

1. AND Jacob went on his way, and the angels of God met him. 2 And when Jacob saw them, he said, This is God's host: and he called the name of that place Mahanaim.

Jacob is here got clear of Laban, and pursuing his journey homeward, toward Canaan: when God has helped us through difficulties, we should go on our way heaven-ward with so much the more cheerfulness and resolution.

Now, 1. Here is Jacob's convoy in his journey, v. 1, The angels of God met him, in a visible appearance, whether in a vision by day, or in a dream by night, as when he saw them upon the ladder, (ch. 28. 12.) is uncertain. Note, Those that keep in a good way, have always a good guard; angels themselves are ministering spirits for their safety, Hcb. 1. 14. Where Jacob pitched his tents, they pitched their's him: Ps. 34. 7. They met him, to bid him welcome to Canaan again: a more honourable reception this was, than ever any prince had, that was met by the magistrates of a city in their formalities. They met him, to congratulate him on his arrival, and particularly on his escape from Laban; for they have pleasure in the prosperity of God's servants. They had invisibly attended him all along, but now they appeared to him, because he had greater dangers before him than those he had had to be encountered. Note, Where God designs his people for extraordinary trials, he prepares them by extraordinary comforts. We should think it had been more seasonable for these angels to have appeared to him amidst the perplexity and agitation occasioned first by Laban, and afterward by Esau, than in this calm and quiet interval, when he saw not himself in any imminent peril; but God will have us, when we are in peace, to provide for trouble, and when trouble comes, to live upon former observations and experiences; for we walk by faith, not by sight. God's people, at death, are returning to Canaan, to their father's house; and then the angels of God will meet them, to congratulate them on the happy finishing of their servitude, and carry them to their rest.

2. The comfortable notice he took of this convoy, v. 2. This in God's host, and therefore, (1.) It is a powerful host; very great is he that is thus attended, and very safe that is thus guarded. (2.) God must have the praise of this protection: "This I may think God for, for it is his host." A good man may with an eye of faith, see the same that Jacob saw with his bodily eyes, by believing that promise, (Ps. 91. 11.) He shall give his angels charge over thee. What need have we to dispute whether every particular saint has a guardian angel allotted to him, when we are sure he has a guard of angels about him? To preserve the remembrance of this favour, Jacob gave a name to the place from it, Mahanaim, two hosts, or two camps. That is, say some of the Rabbins, one host of the guardian angels of Mesopotamia, who conducted Jacob thence, and delivered him safe to the other host of the angels of Canaan, who met him upon the borders where he now was, and are appeared to him in two hosts, one on either side, or one in front, and the other in rear, to protect him from Laban behind, and Esau before, that they might be a complete guard. Thus he is compassed with God's favour. Perhaps, in allusion to this, the church is called Mahanaim, two armies. Cant. 6. 13. Here was Jacob's family, which was one army, representing the church militant and itinerant on earth; and the angels another army, representing the church triumphant, and at rest in heaven.

3. And Jacob sent messengers before him to Esau his brother unto the land of Seir, the country of Edom. 4. And he commanded them, saying, Thus shall ye speak unto my lord Esau: Thy servant Jacob saith thus, I have sojourned with Laban, and stayed there until now; 5. And I have oxen, and asses, flocks, and men-servants, and women servants: and I have sent to tell my lord, that I may find grace in thy sight. 6. And the messengers returned to Jacob, saying, We came to thy brother Esau, and also he cometh to meet thee, and four hundred men with him. 7. Then Jacob was greatly afraid and distressed: and he divided the people that were with him, and the flocks, and herds, and the camels, into two bands; 8. And said, If Esau come to the one company, and smite it, then the other company which is left shall escape.

Now that Jacob was re-entering Canaan, God, by the vision of angels, reminded him of the friends he had when he left it, and thence he took occasion to remind himself of the enemies he had, particularly Esau. It is probable that Rebekah had sent him word of Esau's settlement in Seir, and of the continuance of his enmity to him. What shall poor Jacob do? He longs to see his father, and yet he dreads to see his brother. He rejoices to see Canaan again, and yet cannot but rejoice with trembling because of Esau. 1. He sends a very kind and humble message to Esau. It does not appear that his way lay through Esau's country, or that he needed to ask his leave for a passage; but his way lay near it, and he would not go by him without paying him the respect due to a brother, a twin-brother, an only brother, an elder brother, a brother offended. Note, Though our relations fall in their duty to us, yet we must make conscience of doing our duty to them. 2. It is a piece of friendship and brotherly love, to acquaint our friends with our state, and inquire into their's. Acts of civility may help to slay enmities. Jacob's message to him is very obliging, v. 4, 5. (1.) He calls Esau his lord, himself his servant, to intimate that he did not insist upon the prerogatives of the birth-right and blessing he had obtained for himself, but left it to God to fulfil his own purpose in his seed. Note, Yielding justices great offences, 1 Pe. 10. 4. We must not refuse to speak in a respectful and submissive manner, to those that are ever so unjustly exasperated against us. (2.) He gives him a short account of himself; that he was not a fugitive and a vagabond, but, though long absent, had had a certain dwelling-place, with his own relations, I have sojourned with Laban, and stayed there till now; and that he was not a beggar, nor did he come home empty-handed, but likely to be a charge to his relations; No, I have oxen and asses. This, he knew, would (if any thing) recommend him to Esau's good opinion. And, (3.) He courts his favour; I have sent, that I might find grace in thy sight. Note, It is no disparagement to those that have the better cause, to become petitioners for reconciliation, and to sue for peace as well as right.
II. He receives a very formidable account of Esau's warlike preparations against him, (v. 6.) not a word, but a blow; a very coarse return to his kind request, and a sorry welcome home to a poor brother; He comes to meet thee, and four hundred men with him. He is now weary of waiting for the days of mourning for his good father, and even before they come, he resolves to slay his brother. He remembers the old quarrel, and will now be avenged on him for the right-hand and blessing, and if possible, defeat Jacob's expectations from both. Note, Malice harboured will last long, and find an occasion to break out with violence a great while after the provocations given. Angry men have good memories. 2. He invites Jacob what little estate he had, and though he himself was now possessed of much better, yet nothing will serve him but to feed his eyes upon Jacob's ruin, and fill his fields with Jacob's spoils. Perhaps the account Jacob sent him of his wealth, did but provoke him the more. 3. He concludes it easy to destroy him, now that he was upon the road, a poor weary traveller, unfixed, and (as he thinks) unguarded. They that have the serpent's poison, have commonly the serpent's policy, to take the first and finest opportunity of effecting their purposes. He resolves to do it suddenly, and before Jacob was come to his father, lest he should interpose and mediate between them. Esau was one of those that hated peace; when Jacob speaks, speaks peaceably, he is for war, Ps. 126. 6, 7. Out he marches, spurred on with rage, and intent on blood and murder; four hundred men he had with him, probably, such as used to follow him, armed, no doubt, to model like the Romans, ready to execute the word of command though ever so barbarous, and now breathing nothing but threatenings and slanders. The tenth part of these were enough to cut off poor Jacob, and his guiltless helpless family, root and branch. No marvel therefore that it follows, (v. 7.) Then Jacob was greatly afraid and distressed, perhaps the more so, having scarcely recovered the fright Laban had put him in. Note, Many are the troubles of the righteous in this world, and sometimes the end of one is the beginning of another. The clouds return after the rain. Jacob, though a man of great faith, yet was now greatly afraid. Note, A lively apprehension of danger, and a quickening fear arising from it, may very well consist with a humble confidence in God's power, and promise. Christ himself, in his agony, was sore amazed.

III. He puts himself into the best posture of defence that his present circumstances will admit of. It was absurd to think of making resistance, all his contrivances must make an escape, v. 7, 8. He thinks it prudent not to venture all in one bottom, and therefore divides what he had into two companies, that if one were smitten, the other might escape. Like a tender and careful master of a family, he is more solicitous for their safety than for his own. He divided his company, not as Abraham, (ch. 14. 13.) for fight, but for flight.

9. And Jacob said, O God of my father Abraham, and God of my father Isaac, the Lord which saidst unto me, Return unto thy country, and to thy kindred, and I will deal well with thee: 10. I am not worthy of the least of all the mercies, and of all the truth, which thou hast shown unto thy servant; for with my staff I passed over this Jordan; and now I am become two bands. 11. Deliver me, I pray thee, from the hand of my brother, from the hand of Esau: for I fear him, lest he will come and smite me, and the mother with the children. 12. And thou saidst, I will surely do thee good, and make thy seed as the sand of the sea, which cannot be numbered for multitude.

Our rule is to call upon God in the time of trouble; we have here an example to that rule, and the success encourages us to follow that example. It was now a time of Jacob's trouble, but he shall be saved out of it; and here we have him praying for that salvation, Jer. 30. 7. In his distress he sought the Lord, and he heard him. Note, Times of fear should be times of prayer; whatever frights us should drive us to our knees, to our God. Jacob had said he would guard his angels, but in this distress he applied himself to God, not to them; he knew they were his fellow-servants, (Rev. 22. 9.) nor did he consult Laban's Targum, it was enough for him that he had a God to go to. To him he addresses himself with all possible solemnity, so, running for safety into the name of the Lord, as a strong tower, Prov. 18. 10. This prayer is the more remarkable because of being on Israel, a prince with God, and the father of the praying remnant, who are hence called the seed of Jacob, to whom he never said, Seek ye me in vain. Now it is worth while to inquire what there was extraordinary in th' prayer, that it should gain the petitioner all this honour.

1. The request itself is one, and very express, (v. 11.) Deliver me from the hand of my brother. Though it was not so much of personal danger as Providence might suppose, yet he believed the power of God could rescue him as a lamb out of the bloody jaws of the lion. Note, 1. We have leave to be particular in our addresses to God, to mention the particular straits and difficulties we are in; for the God with whom we have to do, is one we may be free with; we have liberty of speech (παραγεῖον) at the throne of grace. 2. When our brethren aim to be our destroyers, it is our comfort, they have a Father to whom we may apply ourselves as our Deliverer.

II. The plea are many, and very powerful; 1. he was cause better ordered, Job 23. 4. He offers up his request with great faith, fervency, and humility. How earnestly does he beg! (v. 11.) Deliver me, I pray thee. His fear made him importunate. With what holy docility does he argue! With what divine eloquence does he plead! Here is a noble copy to write after.

1. He addresses himself to God as the God of his fathers, v. 9. Such was the humble self-denying sense he had of his own unworthiness, that he did not call God his own God, but a God in covenant with his ancestors, O God of my father Abraham, and God of my father Isaac; and this he could the better plead, because the covenant by which he was numbered up to him. Note, God's covenant with our fathers may be a comfort to us when we are in distress. It has often been so to the Lord's people, Ps. 22. 4, 5. Being born in God's house, we are taken under his special protection.

2. He produces his warrant, Thou saidst unto me, Return unto thy country, he did not rashly leave his place with Laban, nor undertake his journey, out of a fickle humour, or a foolish fancy, but to that native country, but in obedience to God's command. Note, (1.) We may be in the way of our duty, and yet we may meet with trouble and distress in that way. As prosperity will not prove us in the right, so cross events will not prove us in the wrong: we may be going whether God calls us, and yet may think our way hedged up with thorns. (2.)
We may comfortably trust God with our safety, while we carefully keep to our duty. If God be our Guide, we may venture.

3. He humbly acknowledges his own unworthiness to receive any favour from God, (v. 10.) I am not worthy; it is an unusual plea. Some would think he should have pleaded that what was now in danger, was his own, against all the world, and that he had earned it dear enough; no, he pleads, Lord, I am not worthy of it. Note, Self-denyal and self-abasement are the utmost of the works of grace.

4. He speaks the mercies of God to himself. We have here, mercy, in the plural number, an immutably spring, and innumerable streams; mercies and truth, that is, past mercies given according to the promise, and further mercies secured by the promise. Note, What is laid up in God's truth, as well as what is laid out in God's mercies, is the matter both of the comforts, and the praises, of active believers. Nay, observe, it is all the mercies, and all the truth; the manner of expressing it is copious, and it is expressed by God's heart, and by all of God's good.

(2.) How meanly and humbly he speaks of himself, disclaiming all thought of his own merit. "I am not worthy of the least of all thy mercies, much less am I worthy of so great a favour as this I am now singing for." Jacob was a considerable man, and, upon many accounts, very deserving, and, in treating with Laban, had justly insisted on his merits, but not before God. I am less than all thy mercies; so the word is. Note, The best and greatest of men are utterly unworthy of the least favour from God, and must be ready to own it upon all occasions. It was the excellent Mr. Herbert's motto, Less than the least of all God's mercies. Those are the best prepared for the greatest mercies, that see themselves unworthy of the least.

5. He thankfully owns God's goodness to him in his bondage, and how much it had out done his expectations. "With my staff I passed over this Jordan, poor and desolate like a forlorn and despaired pilgrim," he had no guides, no companions, no attendants, no conveniences for travel, but his staff only, nothing else to stay himself upon; "and now I am become two bands," now I am surrounded with a numerous and comfortable retinue of children and servants: "though it was his distress that had now obliged him to divide his family into two bands, yet he makes use of that for the magnifying of the mercy of his increase. Note, (1.) The increase of our families is then comfortable indeed to us, when we see God's mercies, and his truth, in it. (2.) Those whose latter end greatly increases, ought, with humility and thankfulness, to remember how small their beginnings. Jacob pleads, "Lord, thou didst keep me when I went out, and I have neither lived prosperity, but one life to lose; wilt not thou keep me now that so many are embarked with me?"

6. He urges the extremity of the peril he was in, Lord, deliver me from Esau, for I fear him, v. 11. The people of God have not been shy of telling God their fears; for they know he takes cognizance of them, and considers them. The fear that quickens prayer, is itself pleasurable. It was not a robber, but a murderer, that he was afraid of; nor was it his own life only that lay at stake, but the mother's and the children's, that had left their native soil to go along with him. Note, Natural affection may furnish us with allowable acceptable pleas in prayer.

7. He insists especially upon the promise God had made in the, (v. 8.) Thou saidst, I will deal well with thee, and again in the close, (v. 12.) Thou saidst, I will surely do thee good. Note, (1.) The best we can say to God in prayer, is, what he has said before. God's promises, as they are the surest guide of our desires in prayer, and furnish us with the best petitions, so they are the firmest ground of our hopes, and furnish us with the best pleas. "Lord, thou saidst thou and thus; and wilt thou not be as good as thy word, the word upon which thou hast caused me to hope? Ps. 119. 49. (2.) The most general promises are applicable to particular cases. "Thou saidst, I will do thee good; Lord, do me good in this matter." He pleads also a particular promise, that of multiplying his seed. "Lord what will become of that promise, if they be all cut off?" Note, [1.] There are promises to the families of good people, which are improvable in prayer for family mercies, ordinary and extraordinary, ch. 17. 7. Ps. 112. 2. 102. 28. [2.] The world's threatenings should drive us to God's promises.

13. And he lodged there that same night; and took of that which came to his hand, a present for Esau his brother; 14. Two hundred she-goats and twenty he-goats, two hundred ewes and twenty rams, 15. Thirty natch camels with their colts, forty kine, and ten bulls, twenty she-asses, and ten foals. 16. And he delivered them into the hands of his servants, every drove by themselves; and said unto his servants, Pass over before me, and put a space betwixt drove and drove. 17. And he commanded the foremost, saying, When Esau my brother meeteth thee, and asketh thee, saying, Whose art thou? and whither goest thou? and Whose are these before thee? 18. Then thou shalt say, They be thy servant Jacob's; it is a present sent unto my lord Esau: and, behold, also he is behind us. 19. And so commanded he the second and the third, and all that followed the droves, saying, On this manner shall ye speak unto Esau, when ye find him. 20. And say ye moreover, Behold, thy servant Jacob is behind us. For he said, I will appease him with the present that goeth before me, and afterward I will see his face; peradventure he will accept of me. 21. So went the present over before him: and himself lodged that night in the company. 22. And he rose up that night, and took his two wives, and his two women-servants, and his eleven sons, and passed over the ford Jabbok. 23. And he took them, and sent them over the brook, and sent over that he had.

Jacob having previously made God his Friend by a prayer, is here prudently endeavouring to make Esau his friend by a present. He had prayed to God to deliver him from the hand of Esau; for he feared him; but neither did his fear sink into such a despair as dissipists for the use of means, nor did his prayer make him presume upon God's mercy, without the use of means. Note, When we have prayed to God for any mercy, we must second our prayers with our endeavours; else, instead of trusting God we tempt him; we must so depend upon God's providence, as to make use of
And Jacob asked him, and said, Tell me, I pray thee, what is thy name. And he said, Wherefore is it that thou dost ask after my name? And he blessed him there. 30. And Jacob called the name of the place Peniel: for I have seen God face to face, and my life is preserved. 31. And as he passed over Peniel, the sun rose upon him, and he halted upon his thigh. 32. Therefore the children of Israel call the name of that place Peniel: for I have seen God face to face, and my life was preserved.

We have here the remarkable story of Jacob's wrestling with the angel. It was not a battle of brute force, but a spiritual wrestling, by the vigorous actions of faith and holy desire; and thus all the spiritual seed of Jacob that pray, in praying, still wrestle with God.

I. How Jacob and this angel engaged, v. 24. It was a single combat, hand to hand, they had neither of them any seconds. Jacob was now full of care and fear about the interview he expected, next day, with his brother; and to aggravate the trial, God himself seemed to come forth against him as an enemy, to oppose his entrance into the land of promise, and to dispute the pass with him, not suffering him to follow his wives and children whom he had sent before. Note, Strong believers must expect many temptations and strong trials. We are told by the prophet, (Hos. 12. 4.) how Jacob wrestled; he wept and made supplication; prayers and tears were his weapons. It was not only a corporeal, but a spiritual wrestling, by the vigorous actions of faith and holy desire; and thus all the spiritual seed of Jacob that pray, in praying, still wrestle with God.

II. What was the success of the engagement.

1. Jacob kept his ground; though the struggle continued long, the angel prevailed not against him, (v. 25.) that is, this discouragement did not shake his faith; but, on the contrary, he saw in his present case, in his own strength that he wrestled, not by his own strength that he prevails, but in and by strength derived from Heaven. That of Job illustrates this, (Job 23. 6.) Will he plead against me with his great power? No, (had the angel done so, Jacob had been crushed,) but he would put strength in me; and by that strength Jacob had power over the angel, Hos. 12. 4. Jacob was armament not with God, but in his own strength. It is his Spirit that intercedes in us, and helps our infirmities, Rom. 8. 26.

2. The angel put out Jacob's thigh, to show him what he could do, and that it was God he was wrestling with, for no man could disjoint his thigh with a touch. Some think that Jacob felt little or no pain.
from this hurt; it is probable that he did not, for he did not so much as halt till the struggle was over; (v. 31.) and if so, that was an evidence of a divine touch indeed, which wounded and healed at the same time. Jacob prevailed, and yet had his foot out. Note, Wrestling believers may obtain glorious victories, and yet come off with broken bones; for when they are weak, then are they strong, weak in themselves, but strong in Christ, 2 Cor. 12. 10. Our honours and comforts in this world have their allays.

3. The angel, by an admirable condescension, gently requests Jacob to let him go, (v. 28.) as God said to Moses, (Exod. 32. 10.) Let (say he) my fear be gracious upon Jacob's grapples? He could, but thus he would put an honour upon Jacob's faith and prayer, and further try his constancy. "The king is held in the galleries;" (Cant. 7.) I held him, (says the spouse,) and would not let him go, Cant. 3. 4. The reason the angel gives why he would be gone, is, because the day breaks, and therefore he would not any longer detain Jacob, who had business to do, a journey to go, a family to look after, which especially in this critical juncture, called for his attendance. Note, Every thing is beautiful in its season; even the business of religion, and the comforts of communion with God, must sometimes give way to the necessary affairs of life: God will have mercy, and not sacrifice.

4. Jacob persists in his holy importunity; I will not let thee go, except thou bless me; whatever be the cost of his journey, he resolves to make the best he can of this opportunity, and not to lose the advantage of his victory: he does not mean to wrestle all night for nothing, but humbly resolves he will have a blessing, and rather shall all his bones be put out of joint, than he will go away without one. The credit of a conquest will do him no good without the comfort of a blessing. In begging this blessing, he owns his inferiority, though he seemed to have the upper hand in the struggle; for the less is blessed of the better. Note, Those that would have the blessing of Christ, must be in good earnest, and be importunate for it, as those that resolve to have no denial. It is the fervent prayer, that is the effectual prayer.

5. The angel puts a perpetual mark of honour upon him, by changing his name; (v. 27, 28.) "Thou shalt no more be called Jacob, but Israel; a man of heroic resolution; What is thy name?" "Jacob," says he, a supplanter; so Jacob signifies; "Well," says the angel, "be thou never so called any more; henceforth shalt thou be celebrated, not for craft and artful management, but for true valor; thou shalt be called Israel, a prince with God, a name greater than those of the great men of the earth." He is a prince indeed, that is a prince with God, and those are truly honourable, that are mighty in prayer, Isa. 19. 20. Israelites indeed. Jacob is here knighted in the field, as it were, and has a title of honour given him by him that is the Fountain of honour, which will remain, to his praise, to the end of time. Yet this was not all; having power with God, he shall have power with men too. Having prevailed for a blessing from Heaven, he shall prevail in various other ways. Whatver enemies we have, if we can but make God our Friend, we are well off; they that by faith have power in Heaven, have thereby as much power on earth as they have occasion for.

6. He dismisses him with a blessing, v. 29. Jacob desired to know the angel's name, that he might according to his capacity, do him honour, Judg. 13. 18. But that request was denied, that he might not be too proud of his conquest, nor think he had the angel at such an advantage as to oblige him to what he pleased; No, "Wherefore dost thou ask after my name?" What good will it do thee to know that?" The discovery of that was reserved for his death-bed, upon which he was taught to call him Shiloh. But, instead of telling him his name, he gave him his blessing, which was the thing he wrestled for; be blessed him there, repeated and ratified the blessing formerly given him. Note, Spiritual blessings which secure our felicity, are better and much more desirable than fine notions which sift our curiosity. An interest in the angel's blessing is better than acquaintance with his name. The tree of life is better than the tree of knowledge. Thus Jacob carried his point; a blessing he wrestled for, and a blessing he had; nor did ever any of his praying seeing or seeking, nor ever any of God's friends, but they did. In this, I, wrestled with God, and prevailed; but, "In this place, I saw God face to face, and my life was preserved;" not, "It was my praise that I came off a conqueror, but it was God's mercy that I escaped with my life." Note, It becomes those whom God honours, to take shame to themselves, and to admire the condescensions of his grace to them. Thus David did, after God had sent him a gracious message, (2 Sam. 7. 16.) Who am I, O Lord God?

Lastly, The memorandum Jacob carried of this in his bones, He halted on his thigh; (v. 31.) some think he continued to do so to his dying-day; and if he did, he had no reason to complain; for the honour and comfort he obtained by this struggle, were abundantly sufficient to counteract the damage, though he went limping to his grave. He had no reason to look upon it as his reproach, thus to bear in his body the marks of the Lord Jesus; (Gal. 6. 17.) yet it might serve, like St. Paul's thorn in the flesh, to keep him from being lifted up with the abundance of the revelations. Notice is taken of the sun's rising upon him when he passed over Peniel; for it is sun-rise with that soul that has communion with God. The inspired penman mentions a traditional custom, with which he who had, in remembrance of this, never to eat of that sinew, or muscle in any beast by which the hip-bone is fixed in its cup; by this observance they preserved the memorial of this story, and gave occasion to their children to inquire concerning it; they also did honour to the memory of Jacob. And this use we may still make of it, to acknowledge the mercy of God, and our obligations to Jesus Christ, that we may now lay up our communion with God, in faith, hope, and love, without peril, either of life or limb.

CHAP. XXXIII.

We read in the former chapter, how Jacob had power with God, and prevailed; here we find what power he had with men too, and how his brother Esau was mollified, and, on a reconciliation, forsook his former designs on Jacob. We have written, Jacob, 16. 7. When a man's ways please the Lord, he maketh even his enemies to be at peace with him. Here is, 1. A very friendly meeting between Jacob and Esau, v. 1. 4. 2. Their conference at the fountain, in which they came to terms of peace, and kind expressions. Their discourse is, 1. About Jacob's family, v. 5. 7. 2. About the present he had sent, v. 8. 11. 3. About the progress of their journey, v. 15. 16. 3. Jacob's settlement in Canaan, his house, ground, and altar, v. 16. 20.
AND Jacob lifted up his eyes, and looked, and, behold, Esau came, and with him four hundred men. And he divided the children unto Leah, and unto Rachel, and unto the two handmaids. 2. And he put the handmaids and their children foremost, and Leah and her children after, and Rachel and Joseph hinder-most. 3. And he passed over before them, and bowed himself to the ground seven times, until he came near to his brother. 4. And Esau ran to meet him, and embrac'd him, and fell on his neck, and kissed him: and they wept.

Here,

I. Jacob discovers Esau's approach, v. 1. Some think that his lifting up his eyes denotes his cheerfulness and confidence, in opposition to a dejected countenance; having by prayer committed his case to God, he went on his way, and his countenance was no more sad, 1 Sam. 1. 18. Note, Those that have cast their care upon God, may look before them with satisfaction and composure of mind, cheerfully expecting the issue, whatever it may be;

come what will, nothing can come amiss to him whose heart is fixed, trusting in God. Jacob sets himself upon his watch-tower, to see what answer

God will give to his prayers, Hab. 2. 1.

II. He pats his family into the best order he could, to receive him, whether he should come as a friend, or as an enemy; consulting their decency if he come as a friend, and their safety if he come as an enemy, v. 1, 2. Observe what a different figure these two brothers made. Esau is attended with a guard of 400 men, and looks big; Jacob is followed by a cumbersome train of women and children that are his care, and he looks tender and solicitous for their safety; and yet Jacob had the birth-right, and was to have the dominion, and was every way the better man. Note, It is no disparagement to very great and good men, to give a personal attendance to their families, and to their family-affairs. Jacob, at the head of his household, set a better example than Esau at the head of his regiment.

III. At their meeting, the expressions of kindness were interchanged in the best manner that could be between them.

1. Jacob bowed to Esau, v. 3. Though he feared

Esau as an enemy, yet he did obeisance to him as an elder brother; knowing and remembering perhaps that when Abel was preferred in God's ac-teptance before his elder brother Cain, yet God undertook for him to Cain that he should not be wanting in the duty and respect owing by a younger brother shall be his desire, and thou shalt have superiority over him, ch. 4. 7. Note, (1.) The way to recover peace where it has been broken, is, to do our duty, and pay our respects, upon all occasions, as if it had never been broken. It is the remembering and repeating of matters, that separates friends, and perpetuates the separation. (2.) A humble repeated submission goes a great way toward the turning away of wrath. Many preserve themselves by injuring themselves; the bullet flies over him that stoops.

2. Esau embrac'd Jacob, (v. 4.) He ran to meet him, not in passion, but in love; and as one heartily reconcil'd to him, he receiv'd him with all the encouragements imaginable, embrac'd him, fell on his neck, and kiss'd him. Some think that when Esau came out to meet Jacob, it was with no bad design, but that he brought his 400 men, only for state, that he might pay so much the greater respect to his returning brother. It is certain that Jacob understood the report of his messengers otherwise, ch. 32. 5, 6.

Jacob was a man of prudence and fortitude, and we cannot suppose him to admit of a groundless fear, to such a degree as he did this, nor that the Spirit of God would stir him up to pray such a prayer as he did, for deliverance from a mere imaginary danger;

and if there was not some wonderful change wrought upon the spirit of Esau at this time, we may be of the sudden, convert enemies into friends, as he did to Sauls, one by restraining grace, (1 Sam. 26. 21, 25.) the other by renewing grace, Acts 9. 24, 25. (2.) It is not in vain to trust in God, and to call upon him in the day of trouble; they that do so, often find the issue much better than they expected.

3. They both wept. Jacob wept for joy, to be thus kindly received by his brother whom he had feared; and Esau perhaps wept for grief and shame, to think of the bad design he had conceived against his brother, which he found himself strangely and unaccountably prevented from the execution of.

5. And he lifted up his eyes, and saw the women and the children; and said, who are those with thee? And he said, The children which God hath graciously given thy servant. 6. Then the handmaidens came near, they and their children, and they bowed themselves. 7. And Leah also with her children came near, and bowed dthemselves: and after came Joseph near and Rachel, and they bowed themselves. 8. And he said, What meanest thou by all this drove which I met! And he said, These are to find grace in the sight of my lord. 9. And Esau said, I have enough, my brother; keep that thou hast unto thyself. 10. And Jacob said, Nay, I pray thee, if now I have found grace in thy sight, then receive my present at my hand: for therefore I have seen thy face, as though I had seen the face of God, and thou wast pleased with me. 11. Take, I pray thee, my blessing that is brought to thee: because God hath dealt graciously with me, and because I have enough. And he urged him, and he took it. 12. And he said, Let us take our journey; and let us go, and I will go before thee. 13. And he said unto him, My lord knoweth that the children are tender, and the flocks and herds with young are with me; and if men should over-drive them one day, all the flock will die. 14. Let my lord, I pray thee, pass over before his servant: and I will lead on softly, according as the cattle that goeth before me and the children, be able to endure; until I come unto my lord unto Seir. 15. And Esau said, Let me now leave with thee some of the folk that are with me. And he said, What needeth it? Let me find grace in the sight of my lord.

We have here the discourse between the two brothers at their meeting, which is very free and friendly, without the least intimation of the old quarrel. It was the best way to say nothing of it. They converse, as Jacob's retinue, v. 5, 7. Eleven or twelve little ones followed Jacob close, the eldest of them not fourteen years old; Who are these? says Esau. Jacob had sent him an account of the increase of his estate, (ch. 32, 5.) but made no mention of his children; perhaps, because he would not expose them to his rage, if he should meet him as an enemy, or would persuade him with the unexpected sight, if he should meet him as a friend: Esau thought he had more need of it; he was ever toward the Lord to pray, and therefore sent him a request. It becomes us, to consider the common actions, but to speak of them, after a godly sort, 3 John 6. Jacob speaks of his children, 1. As God's gifts; they are a heritage of the Lord, Ps. 127. 3. — 113. 9. — 107. 41. 2. As choice gifts; he hath graciously given them. Though they were many, and now much his care, and as yet but slenderly provided for, yet he accounts them his greatest blessings; his wives and children hereupon come up in order, and pay their duty to Esau, as he had done before them; (v. 6, 7.) for it becomes the family to show respect to those whom the master of the family shows respect to.

II. About the present he had sent him. 1. Esau modestly refused it, because he had enough, and did not need it, v. 9. Note, Those who wish to be considered men of honour, will not seem to be mercenary in their friendship; whatever influence Jacob's present had upon Esau to pacify him, he would not have it thought that it had any, and therefore he refused it. His reason is, I have enough, I have much; so the word is; so much, that he was not willing to take any thing that was his brother's. Note, (1.) Many that come short of spiritual blessings, and are out of covenant, yet have much of this world's we lth. Esau had what was passing good in the faculties of his heart, and a livelihood by his sword. (2.) It is a good thing for those that have much, to know that they have enough, though they have not so much as some others have. Even Esau can say, I have enough. (3.) Those that are content with what they have, must show it by not coveting what others have. Esau bids Jacob keep what he had to himself, supposing he had need of it; Esau, for his part, needs it not, either to supply him, for he was not hungry for it, or to pacify him, for he was reconciled; we should take heed, lest at any time our covetousness impose upon the courtesy of others, and meanly take advantage of their generosity.

2. Jacob affectionately urges him to accept it, and prevails, v. 10, 11. Jacob sent it through fear, (ch. 32, 20.) but, the fear being over, he now imprisons upon it, that he may recover his friendship with him, and he desired his brother's friendship, and did not merely dread his wrath; two things he urges, (1.) The satisfaction he had in his brother's favour, which he thought himself bound to make this thankful acknowledgment of. It is a very high compliment that he pays upon him, I have seen thy face, as though I had seen the face of God, that is, I have seen thee reconciled to me, and at peace with me, as I desire to see God reconcile him. Or, the meaning is, that Jacob saw God's favour to him in Esau's: it was a token for good to him, that God had accepted his prayers. Note, [1.] Creature-comforts are then comforts indeed to us, when they are granted as answers to prayer, and are tokens of our acceptance with God. [2.] It is matter of great joy to those that are of a peaceable and affectionate disposition to see the friends they love over themselves in their relations that they have been at variance with. (2.) The competency he had of this world's goods, God has dealt graciously with me. Note, If what we have in this world, increase under our hands, we must take notice of it with thankfulness, to the glory of God, and own that therein he has dealt graciously with us, better than we deserve: it is evident, that everyone is to get wealth, Deut. 8. 18. He adds, (And I have enough,) the word is. Esau's enough was much, but Jacob's enough was all. Note, A Godly man, though he have but little in the world, yet may truly say, "I have all," [1.] Because he has the God of all, and has all in him; all is your's if ye be Christ's, 1 Cor. 3. 22. [2.] Because he has the comfort of all; I have all, and abound, Phil. 4. 18. He that has much, worships God, but he that thinks he has all, is sure he has enough. He has all, because he has possession; he will have all shortly, when he comes to heaven; upon this principle, Jacob urged Esau, and he took his present. Note, It is an excellent thing when men's religion makes them generous, free-hearted, and open-handed, scorning to do a thing that is paletry and sneaking.

III. About the progress of their journey. In which, 1. Esau offers himself to be his guide and companion, in token of sincere reconciliation, v. 12. We never find that Jacob and Esau were so sociable with one another, and so affectionate, as they were now. Note, As for God, his work is perfect. He made Esau, not only not an enemy, but a friend. This bone that had been broken, being well set, became stronger than ever. Esau is become fond of Jacob's company, courts him to mount Seir; let us never despair of any, nor distrust God, in whose hand all hearts are. Yet Jacob saw cause modestly to refuse this offer, (v. 13, 14.) wherein he shows a tender concern for his own family and flocks, like a good shepherd and a good father. He must consider the children and flocks with, and not lead the one, or drive the other, too fast. This evidence and confidence of Jacob ought to be imitated by those that have the care of young people in the things of God. They must not be over-driven, at first, by heavy tasks in religious services, but led as they can bear, having their work made as easy to them as possible. Christ, the good shepherd does so, Isa. 40. 11. Now Jacob will neither desire Esau to slacken his pace, nor force his family to quicken their's, nor leave them, though he keep company with him. When many would have done, that love any society better than they would of their own house; but he desires Esau to march before, and promises to follow him leisurely, as he could get forward. Note, It is an unreasonable thing to tie others to our rate; we may come with comfort, at last to the same journey's end, though we do not journey together, either in the same path, or with the same pace. There may be those, with whom we cannot fall in, and yet with whom we need not fall out by the way. Jacob intimates to him, that it was his present design to come to him to mount Seir; and we may presume he did so, after he had settled his family and concerns elsewhere, though that visit is not recorded. Note, When we have happily recovered peace with our friends, we must take care to cultivate it, and not to be behind hand with them in civilities.

Esau offered some of his men to be his guard and convoy, v. 5. He saw Jacob but poorly attended, no servants but his husbandsmen and shepherds, no pages or footmen; and therefore, thinking he was as desirous as himself (if he could afford it) to take state upon him, and look great, he would needs lend him some of his retaine, to attend upon him, that he might appear like Esau's brother; but Jacob humbly refuses his offer, only desiring that he would not take it amiss that he did not accept it; What needeth it? (1.) Jacob is humble, and needs it not for state; he desires not to make a fair show in the flesh, by encumbering himself, with a needless retinue. Note, It is the vanity of pomp and grandeur, that they are attended with a great deal, of which it may be said, What needeth it? (2.) Jacob is under the divine protection, and needs it not for safety. Note, Those are sufficiently guarded, that have God for their Guard, and are under a convoy of his hosts, as Jacob was. They need not be beholden to an arm of flesh, that have God for their Arm every morning. Jacob adds, "Only let me find grace in the sight of my Lord; having thy favour, I have all I need, all I desire from thee." If Jacob thus valued the good-will of a brother, much more reason have we to reckon that we have enough, if we have the good will of our God.

16. So Esau returned that day on his way to Seir. 17. And Jacob journeyed to Succoth, and built him an house, and made booths for his cattle: therefore the name of the place is called Succoth. 18. And Jacob came to Shalem, a city of Shechem, which is in the land of Canaan, when he came from Padan-aram; and pitched his tent before the city. 19. And he bought a parcel of a field, where he had spread his tent, at the hand of the children of Hamor, Shechem's father, for an hundred pieces of money. 20. And he erected there an altar, and called it El-ehole-Israel.

Here, 1. Jacob comes to Succoth; having in a friendly manner parted with Esau, who was gone to his own country, (v. 16.) he comes to a place where, it should seem, he rested for some time, set up booths for his cattle, and other conveniences for himself and family. The place was afterward known by the name of Succoth, a city in the tribe of Gad, on the other side Jordan; it signifies booths: that when his posterity afterward dwelt in houses of stone, they might remember that "the Syrian ready to perish was their father, who was glad of booths." (Deut. 26. 3.) such was the rock whence they were hewn.

2. He comes to Shechem; we read it to Shalem, a city of Shechem; the critics generally incline to read it appallatively; he came safe, or, in peace, to the city of Shechem: after a perilous journey, in which he had met with many difficulties, he came safe at last, into Canaan. Note, Diseases and dangers should teach us how to value health and safety, and should help to enlarge our hearts in thankfulness, when our going out and coming in have been signal preserved.

Here, (1.) He buys a field, v. 19. Though the land of Canaan was his by promise, yet the time for taking possession being not yet come, he is content to pay for his own, to prevent disputes with the present occupants. Note, Dominion is not founded in grace. Those that have heaven on free-cost, must not expect to have earth so.

(2.) He builds an altar, v. 20. [1.] In thankfulness to God, for the good hand of his providence over him. He did not content himself with verbal acknowledgments of God's favour to him, but made real ones. [2.] That he might keep up religion, and the worship of God, in his family. Note, Where we have a tent, God must have an altar; where we have a house, he must have a church in it. He dedicated this altar to the honour of El-ehole-Israel, God the God of Israel: to the honour of God, in general, the only living and true God, the best of beings and first of causes; and to the honour of the God of Israel, as a God in covenant with him. Note, in our worship of God, we must be guided and governed by the joint discoveries, both of natural and revealed religion. God had lately called him by the name of Israel, and now he calls God the God of Israel; though he is styled a "gracious God," God shall still be a Prince with him, his Lord and his God. Note, Our honours then become honours indeed to us, when they are consecrated to God's honour; Israel's God is Israel's glory.

CHAP. XXXIV.

At this chapter begins the story of Jacob's afflications in his children, which were very great, and are recorded to show, 1. The vanity of this world. That which is dearest to us, may prove our greatest vexation, and we may meet with the greatest crosses in those things of which we said, This some shall comfort us, 2. The common gripe of good people. Jacob's children were circumcised, were well- taught, and prayed for, and had very good examples set them; yet some of them proved very untoward: The race is not to the swift, nor the battle to the strong, but to them that wait for him. 3. The interrupting of the entail of grace does not cut off the entail of profession and visible church-privileges: my, Jacob's sons, though they were his grief in some things, yet were all taken into covenant with God. In this chapter we have, I. Dinah debauched, v. 1-5. II. A treaty of marriage between her and Shechem who had defiled her, v. 6-19. III. The circumcision of the Shechemites, pursuant to that treaty, v. 20-24. IV. The perfidious and bloody revenge which Simeon and Levi took upon them, v. 25-31.

1. AND Dinah the daughter of Leah, which she bare unto Jacob, went out to see the daughters of the land. 2. And when Shechem the son of Hamor the Hivite, prince of the country, saw her, he took her, and lay with her, and defiled her. 3. And his soul clave unto Dinah the daughter of Jacob, and he loved the damsel, and spake kindly unto the damsel. 4. And Shechem spake unto his father Hamor, saying, Get me this damsel to wife. 5. And Jacob heard that he had defiled Dinah his daughter: now his sons were with his cattle in the field: and Jacob held his peace until they were come.

Dinah was, for aught that appears, Jacob's only daughter, and we may suppose her therefore the mother's fondling, and the darling of the family; and yet she provoked them to an injury and a credit to them; for those children seldom prove either the best, or the happiest, that are most indulged. She is reckoned now but fifteen or sixteen years of age, when she here occasioned so much mischief.

Observe, 1. Her vain curiosity, which exposed her; she went out, perhaps unknown to her father, but by the connivance of her mother, to see the daughter... of the land; (v. 1.) probably, it was at a ball, or on some public day. Being an only daughter, she thought herself solitary at home, having none of her own age and sex to converse with; and therefore she must needs go abroad to divert herself, to keep off melancholy, and to accomplish herself by conversation better than she would in her father's tenement. It was a good thing for her, and a love to her; it is parents' wisdom to make it easy to them, and children's duty then to be easy in it. Her pretense was, to see the daughters of the land, to see how they dressed, and how they danced, and what was fashionable among them; she went to see; yet that was not all, she went to be seen too; she went to see the daughters of the land, but, it may be, with some thoughts of the sons of the land too. I doubt she was frequently and honorably received with these Canaanites, and to learn their way. Note, The pride and vanity of young people betray them into many snares.

2. The loss of her honour by this means; (v. 2.) Shecham the prince of the country, but a slave to his own lusts, took her, and lay with her, it should seem not so much by force as by surprise. Note, Great men think they may do any thing; and what may not one man's daughter do to another? See what came of Dinah's gadding; young women must learn to chaste, keepers at home; these properties are put together, Tit. 2. 5, for those that are not keepers at home, expose their chastity. Dinah went abroad to look about her; but if she had looked about her as she ought, she had not fallen into this snare. Note, The beginning of sin is as the letting forth of water. How great a matter does a little fire kindle! We should therefore carefully avoid all occasions of sin and approaches to it.

3. The court Shechem made to her, after he had defiled her; this was fair and commendable, and made the best of what was bad; he loved her, (not as Amnon, 2 Sam. 13, 15,) and he engaged his father to make a match for him with her, v. 4.

4. The tidings brought to poor Jacob, v. 5. As soon as his children grew up, they began to be a grief to him; let not guilty passions, that are lamenting the miscarriages of their children, think their case singular or unprecedented. The good man held his peace, as one astonished, that knows not what to say; or, he said nothing, for fear of saying amiss, as David; (Ps. 39. 1, 2,) he smothered his resentments, lest, if he had suffered them to break out, they should have transported him into any indemnity. Or, it should seem, he had left the management of his affairs very much (too much I doubt) to his sons, and he would do nothing without them; or, at least, he knew they would make him uneasy, if he did, they having showed themselves, of late, upon all occasions, bold, forward and assuming. Note, Things never go well, when the authority of a parent runs low in a family. Let every man bear rule in his own house, and have his children in subjection with all gravity.

6. And Hamor the father of Shechem went out unto Jacob to commune with him.

7. And the sons of Jacob came out of the field when they heard it: and the men were grieved, and they were very wroth; because he had wrought folly in Israel, in lying with Jacob's daughter; which thing ought not to be done. 8. And Hamor communed with them, saying, The soul of my son Shechem longeth for your daughter: I pray you give her him to wife. 9. And make ye marriage with us, and give your daughters unto us, and take our daughters unto you. 10. And ye shall dwell with us: and the land shall be before you; dwell and trade ye therein, and get you possessions therein. 11. And Shechem said unto his father and unto his brethren, Let me find grace in your eyes, and what ye shall say unto me I will give.

12. Ask me never so much dowry and gift, and I will give according as ye shall say unto me: but give me the damsel to wife. 13. And the sons of Jacob answered Shechem and Hamor his father deceitfully, and said, because he had defiled Dinah their sister; 14. And they said unto them, We cannot do this thing, to give our sister to one that is uncircumcised; for that were a reproach unto us. 15. But in this we will consent unto you: if ye will be as we be, that every male of you be circumcised; 16. Then will we give our daughters unto you, and we will take your daughters to us, and we will dwell with you, and we will become one people. 17. But if ye will not hearken unto us, to be circumcised; then will we take your daughter, and we will be gone.

Notes:

Jacob's sons when they heard of the injury done to Dinah, showed a very great resentment of it, influenced it no doubt by jealousy for the honour of their family, than by a sense of virtue. Many are concerned at the shamefulness of sin, that never lay to heart the sinfulness of it.

It is here called folly in Israel, (v. 7.) according to the language of after-times; for Israel was not yet a people, but a family only. Note, 1. uncleanness is folly; for it sacrifices the favour of God, peace of conscience, and all the soul can pretend to, that is polluted and brutish lust. 2. This folly is most shameful in Israel; in a family, where God is known and worshipped, as he was in Jacob's tents, by the name of the God of Israel. Folly in Israel is scandalous indeed. 3. It is a good thing to have sin stamped with a bad name; uncleanness is here proverbially called folly in Israel, 2 Sam. 13, 12. Dinah is here called Jacob's daughter, for warning to all the daughters of Israel, that they betray not themselves to this folly.

Hamor came to treat with Jacob himself, but he turns them over to his sons; and here we have a particular account of the treaty, in which it is a shame to say, the Canaanites were more honest than the Israelites.

1. Hamor and Shechem fairly propose this match, in order to a coalition in trade. Shechem is deeply in love with Dinah; he will have her upon any terms, v. 11, 12. His father not only consents, but solicits for him, and gravely insists upon the advantages that would follow from the union of the families, v. 9, 10. He shows no jealousy of Jacob, though he was a stranger, but rather an earnest desire to settle a correspondence with him and his family, making him that generous offer, The land shall be before you, trade ye therein.

2. Jacob's sons, basely, pretend to insist upon a coalition in religion, when really they designed nothing less. If Jacob had taken the management of this affair into his own hands, it is probable that he and Hamor would soon have concluded it; but Jacob's sons meditate only revenge; and a strange project they have for the compassing of it—the Shechem-ites must be circumcised: not to make them holy,
they never intended that, but to make them sore,
that they might become an easier prey to their sword.

1. The pretence was specious; "It is the honour of Jacob's family, that they carry about with them the token of God's covenant with them; and it will be a reproach to them that are thus dignified and distinguished, to enter into such a strict alliance with them that are uncircumcised (v. 14.) and therefore, if ye will be circumcised, then we will become one people with you." v. 15, 16. Had they been sincere herein, their proposals of these terms would have had in it something commendable: for, (1.) Israelites should not intermarry with Canaanites, professors with profane; it is a great sin, or, at least, the cause and inlet of a great deal, and has often been of pernicious consequence. (2.) The interest we have in any persons, and the hold we have of them, should be wisely improved by us, to bring them to the love and practice of religion; (He that winneth souls is wise;) but then we must not like Jacob's sons, think it enough to persuade them to submit to the external rites of religion, but must endeaavour to convince them of its reasonableness, and bring them acquainted with the reason of it.

2. The intention was malicious, as appears by the sequel of the story; all they aimed at was to prepare them for the day of slaughter. Note, Bloody designs have often been covered and carried on,
with a pretence of religion; thus they have been accomplished most plausibly, and most secretly: But this dissembled piety is, doubtless, double iniquity. Religion is never more injured, nor God's sacraments more profaned, than when they are thus used for a cloak of maliciousness. Nay, If Jacob's sons had not had this bloody design, I do not see how they could justify their offering the sacred sign of circumcision, the seal of God's covenant, to these devoted Canaanites, who had no part nor lot in the matter.
They had no right to the seal, that had no right to the promise; it is not meet to take the children's bread, and cast it to dogs: but Jacob's sons valued not this, while they could make it serve their turn.

18. And their words pleased Hamor, and Shechem Hamor's son. 19. And the young man deferred not to do the thing, because he had delight in Jacob's daughter: and he was more honourable than all the house of his father. 20. And Hamor and Shechem his son came unto the gate of their city, and communed with the men of their city, saying, 21. These men are peaceable with us, therefore let them dwell in the land, and trade therein; for the land, behold, it is large enough for them; let us take their daughters to us for wives, and let us give them our daughters. 22. Only herein will the men consent unto us for to dwell with us, to be one people, if every male among us be circumcised, as they are circumcised. 23.
Shall not their cattle, and their substance, and every beast of their's, be ours? Only let us consent unto them, and they will dwell with us. 24. And unto Hamor and unto Shechem his son harkened all that went out of the gate of the city: and every male was circumcised, all that went out of the gate of his city.

Here, 1. Hamor and Shechem gave consent themselves to be circumcised, v. 18, 19. To this perhaps they were moved, not only by the strong desire they had to bring ab ut this match, but by what they might have heard of the sacred and honourable intentions of this sign, in the family of Abraham, which, it is probable, they had some confused notions of, and of the promises confirmed by it, which made them the more desirous to incorporate with the family of Jacob, Zech. 8. 23. Note, (1.)
Many who knew little of religion, yet knew so much of it as makes them willing to join themselves with those that are religious. (2.) If a man would take upon him a form of religion, to gain a good wife, much more should we embrace the power of it, to gain the favour of a good God; even circumcision of our hearts to love him, and as Shechem here, not to defer to do the thing. 2. They gained the consent of the men of their city, Jacob's sons requiring that they also should be circumcised. (1.) They themselves had great influence upon them by their conversation and example. Note, Religion would greatly prevail, if those in authority, who, like Shechem, are more honourable than their neighbours, would appear holier, and more religious, than they are. (2.)
The argument which was very cogent, (v. 23.)
Shall not their cattle and their substance be ours?
They observed that Jacob's sons were industrious thriving people, and promised themselves and their neighbours advantage by an alliance with them; it would improve ground and trade, and bring money into their country. New, (1.) It was bad enough to marry upon this principle; yet we see covetous desires that work in the world, and nothing designed so much, with many, as the laying of house to house, and field to field, without regard had to any other consideration. (2.) It was worse to be circumcised upon this principle. The Shechemites will embrace the religion of Jacob's family, only in hopes of interesting themselves thereby in the riches of that family. Thus there are many, with whom gain is godliness, and who are more governed and influenced by their secular interest, than by any principle of their religion.

23. And it came to pass on the third day, when they were sore, that two of the sons of Jacob, Simeon and Levi, Dinah's brethren, took each man his sword, and came upon the city boldly, and slew all the males. 24.
And they slew Hamor and Shechem his son with the edge of the sword, and took Dinah out of Shechem's house, and went out. 27.
The sons of Jacob came upon the slain, and spoiled the city, because they had defiled their sister. 25. They took their sheep, and their oxen, and their asses, and that which was in the city, and that which was in the field. 28. And all their wealth, and all their little ones, and their wives, took they captive, and spoiled even all that was in the house. 30. And Jacob said to Simeon and Levi, Ye have troubled me, to make me to stink among the inhabitants of the land, among the Canaanites and the Perizzites:
and being few in number, they shall gather themselves together against me, and slay me, and I shall be destroyed, I and my house.
31. And they said, Should he deal with our sister as with an harlot?
Here we have Simeon and Levi, two of Jacob's sons, young men not much above twenty years old, cutting the throats of the Shechemites, and thereby breaking the heart of their good father.

1. Here is the hateful murder of the Shechemites; himself was used to the sheep-look, but his sons had got swords by their sides, as if they had been the seed of Esau, who was to live by his sword; we have them here,

1. Slaving the inhabitants of Shechem, all the males; Hanor and Shechem particularly, with whom they had been treating in a friendly manner but the other day, yet with a design upon their lives. Some think that all Jacob's sons, when they entered to defile the Shechemites to be circumcised, designed to take advantage of their soreness, and to rescue Dinah from among them; but that Simeon and Levi, with content with that, would themselves avenge the injury; they did it with a witness. Now, (1.) It is manifest that God was righteous in it. Had the Shechemites been circumcised, in obedience to any command of God, their violence would have been their punishment; but when the, submitted to that sacred rite, only to serve a turn, to please their prince, and to enrich themselves, it was just with God to bring this upon them. Note, As nothing secures us better than true religion, no thing exposes us more than religion only pretends to. (2.) But Simeon and Levi were of unrighteous. [1.] It was true that Shechem had sinned in Israel, in defiling Dinah; but it ought to have been considered how far Dinah herself bad been accessory to it. Had Shechem abused her in her own mother's tent, it had been another matter; but she went upon this ground, and perhaps by her indecent carriage had struck the spark which began the fire. [2.] But we are to see upon the sin, we sought to consider who was the first mover? It was true that Shechem had done ill, but he was endeavouring to atone for it, and was honest and honourable, ex post facto—after the deed, as the case would admit: it was not the case of the Levite's concubine that was abused to death, nor does he justify what he has done, but courts a reconciliation up in any terms. [3.] It was true that Shechem had done ill; but he was not the first to abuse the Shechemites? Does one man sin, and will they be barbarous with all the town? Must the innocent fall with the guilty? This was barbarous indeed. [4.] But that which above all aggravated the cruelty, was, the most perfidious treachery that was in it. The Shechemites had submitted to their conditions, and had done that upon which they had promised to become one people with them; (v. 16.) yet they acted as sworn enemies to those to whom they were lately became sworn friends, making as light of their covenant, as they did of the laws of humanity. And are these the sons of Israel? Cursed be their anger, for it was fierce. [5.] This also added to the crime that they made a holy ordinance of God subservient to their wicked design, so making that ridiculous; as if it were not enough for them to shame themselves and their family, they bring a reproach upon that honourable badge of their religion; justly would it be called a bloody ordinance.

2. Seizing the prey of Shechem, and plundering the town; they rescued Dinah, (v. 26.) and if that was all they came for, they might have done that without blood, as appears by their own saying, (v. 17.) but they aimed at the spoil; and though Simeon and Levi only were the murderers, yet it is intimate that others which were severe upon the sinners, came upon the slain, and spoiled the city, (v. 27.) and so became accessory to the murder; in them it was manifest injustice, yet here we may observe the righteousness of God. The Shechemites were willing to gratify the sons of Jacob by submitting to the penance of circumcision, upon this principle, Shall not their cattle and their substance be ours? (v. 23.) and see what was the issue; instead of making themselves masters of the wealth of Jacob's family, Jacob's family became masters of their wealth. Note, Those who unjustly grasp at that which is another's, justly lose that which is their own. II. Here is Jacob's resentment of this bloody deed of Simeon and Levi, (v. 30.) Two things he bitterly complains of,

1. The reproach they had brought upon him thereby; Je have troubled me, put me into a disorder, for ye have made me to stink among the inhab- itants of the land, and to change the name of my family and my family edious: me; What will they say of us and our religion? We shall be looked upon as the most pernicious barbarous people in the world." Note, The gross misconduct of wicked children is the grief and shame of their godly parents. Children should be the joy of their parents; but wicked children are their trouble, sadden their hearts, break their spirits, and make them go mourning from day to day. Children should be an ornament to their parents; but wicked children are their reproach, and as dead flies in their pot of ointment: but let such children know, that if they repent not, the grief they have caused to their parents, and the damage religion has sustained in its reputation through them, will come into the account and be reckoned for.

2. The ruin they had exposed him to; what could be expected, but that the Canaanites, who were numerous and formidable, would confederate against him, and he and his little family would become an easy prey to them? I shall be destroyed, I and my house. If all the Shechemites must be destroyed for the offence of one, why not all the Israelites for the sake of one? Children should be an ornament to their parents; but he might justly fear that these vile practices of his children would amount to a forfeiture, and cut off the entail. Note, When sin is in the house there is reason to fear ruin at the door. The tender parents foresee those bad consequences of sin, which the wicked children have no dread of. One would think this should have made them to work for their children: instead of countenancing them to their good father, and begging his pardon for them, instead of that they justify themselves, and give him this insolent reply, Should he deal with our sister as with an harlot? No, he should not; but if he do, must they be their own avengers? Will nothing less than so many lives, and the ruin of a whole city, serve to atone for an abuse done to one foolish girl? By their question they tacitly reflect upon their father, as if he would have been content to let them deal with his daughter as with an harlot. Note, It is common for those who run into one extreme, to reproach and censure those who keep the mean, as if they ran into the other. Those who condemn the rigour of revenge, shall be misrepresented, as if they contemnenced and justified the offence.

CHAP. XXXV.

In this chapter, we have three communions, and three funerals. I. Three communions between God and Jacob. 1. God ordered Jacob to Beth-el; and, in obedience to that command, he forsook his father's altar, and laid his cottage and his flocks behind him, and journeyed for that journey, v. 1, 5. 2. Jacob built an altar at Bethel, to the honour of God that had appeared to him, and in performance of his vows, v. 6, 7. 3. God appeared to him again, and confirmed the change of his name, and the covenant with him, (v. 9, 13,) of which appearance Jacob made a grateful acknowledgment, v. 14, 15. II. Three funerals. 1. Deborah's, v. 8, 2. Rachel's, v. 18, 20. 3. Isaac's, v. 27, 29. Here is also Reuben's incest, (v. 25,) and an account of Jacob's sons, v. 23, 26.
AND God said unto Jacob, Arise, go up to Beth-el, and dwell there: and make thee an altar unto God, that appeared unto thee when thou fleddest from the face of Esau thy brother. 2. Then Jacob said unto his household, and to all that were with him, Put away the strange gods that are among you, and be clean, and change your garments: 3. And let us arise, and go up to Beth-el; and I will make there an altar unto God, who answered me in the day of my distress, and was with me in the way which I went. 4. And they gave unto Jacob all the strange gods which were in their hand, and all their earrings which were in their ears; and Jacob hid them under the oak which was by Shechem. 5. And they journeyed: and the terror of God was upon the cities that were round about them, and they did not pursue the sons of Jacob.

Here God reminds Jacob of his vow at Beth-el, and sends him thither to perform it, v. 1. Jacob had said in the day of his distress, If I come again in peace this stone shall be God's house, ch. 28. 22. God had performed his part of the bargain, and had given Jacob more than bread to eat, and raiment to put on—he had got an estate, and was become two bands; but, it should seem, he had forgotten his vow, or, at least, had too long deferred the performance of it. Seven or eight years it was now, since he came to Canaan; he had purchased ground there, and had built an altar in remembrance of God's last appearance to him when he called him Israel; (ch. 33. 19, 20.) but Bethel still is forgotten. Note, Time is apt to wear out the sense of mercies, and the impressions made upon us by them, it should not be so, but so it is. God had exercised Jacob with a very sore temptation in his youth, (ch. 34.) to see if he would bring his vow to his remembrance, and put him upon the performance of it, but it had not that effect; therefore God comes himself and puts him in mind of it, Arise, go to Bethel. Note, 1. As many as God loves, he will remind of neglected duties, one way or other, by conscience or by providences. 2. When we have vowed a vow to God, it is best not to defer the performance of it, (Ecc. 5. 4.) yet better late than never. God bade him go to Bethel and dwell there, that is, not only go himself, but take his family with him, that they might join with him in his devotions. Note, In Bethel, the house of God, we should desire to dwell, Ps. 27. 4. That should be our home, not our inn. God reminds him not expressly of his vow, but of the occasion of it, when thou fleddest from the face of Esau. Note, The remembrance of former afflictions should bring to mind the workings of our souls under them, Ps. 66. 13, 14.

II. Jacob commands his household to prepare for this solemnity; not only for the journey and remove, but for the religious services that were to be performed, v. 2, 3. Note, 1. Before solemn ordinances, there should be solemn preparation. 2. Wash you, make you clean, and then come, and let us reason together, Isa. 1. 16. 18. 2. Masters of families should use their authority for the promoting of religion in their families. Not only we, but our houses also, should serve the Lord, Josh. 24. 15. Observe the commands he gives his household, like Abraham, ch. 18, 19. (1.) They must put away the strange gods. Strange gods in Jacob's family! Strange things indeed! Could such a family, that was taught the good knowledge of the Lord, admit, that they could such a master, to whom God had appeared twice, and oftener, commune at them? Doubtless, this was his infirmity. Note, Those that are good themselves, cannot have those about them so good as they should be. In those families where there is a face of religion, and an altar to God, yet many times there is much amiss, and more strange gods in one household, than are found in some others. So Rachel had her Teraphim, which, it is to be feared, she secretly made some superstitious use of. * The captives of Shechem brought their gods along with them, and perhaps Jacob's sons took some with the plunder. However they came by them, now they must put them away. (2.) They must be clean, and change their garments; they must observe it, and make the best appearance they could, being carefully to wash, and dress their persons, and the garments that were so stained. These he knew were abominations, and must be taken out, and the place purified, and the altar washed, and the people washed, and the vessels washed; that so God's house might be made clean. Note, 1. Jerusalem was a holy city, and those enemies of God should be the more dismayed, and, as it were, shrunk from it, that it was made holy, even when it became as one of God's courts. 2. When we are brought to God, we must not only use all diligence to be clean ourselves, but use all diligence to make those about us clean. 3. But, though we should thus use all means to draw sinners out of the pollutions of the world, yet it is not to be supposed that we can bring them into a state of new birth, without the grace of God. * In his note on ch. 31. 19. our Author expresses a more favourable opinion; but the opinion expressed here seems more probable. - Es
6. So Jacob came to Luz, which is in the land of Canaan, that is Beth-el, he and all the people that were with him. 7. And he built there an altar, and called the place El-beth-el: because there God appeared unto him, when he fled from the face of his brother. 8. But Deborah, Reuben's nurse died, and she was buried beneath Beth-el, under an oak; and the name of it was called Allon-bachuth. 9. And God appeared unto Jacob again, when he came out of Padan-aram, and blessed him. 10. And God said unto him, Thy name is Jacob; thy name shall not be called any more Jacob, but Israel shall be thy name; and he called his name Israel. 11. And God said unto him, I am God Almighty: be fruitful and multiply; a nation and a company of nations shall be of thee: and kings shall come out of thy loins; 12. And the land which I gave Abraham and Isaac, to thee I will give it, and to thy seed after thee will I give the land. 13. And God went up from him, in the place where he talked with him. 14. And Jacob set up a pillar in the place where he talked with him, even a pillar of stone: and he poured a drink offering thereon, and he poured oil thereon: 15. And Jacob called the name of the place where God spake with him, Beth-el.

Jacob and his retinue being come safe to Beth-el, we are here told what passed there.

I. There he built an altar, (v. 7.) and, no doubt, offered sacrifice upon it, perhaps the tenth of his cattle, according to the vow, I will give the tenth unto thee. With these sacrifices he joined praises for former mercies, particularly that which the sight of the place brought fresh to his remembrance; and he added prayers for the continuance of God's favour to him and his family. And he called the place, that is, the altar, El-beth-el, the God of Beth-el. As, when he made a thankful acknowledgment of the honour God had lately done him in calling him Israel, he worshipped God by the name of El-e-loke-Israel; so, now that he was making a grateful recognition of God's favour to him at Beth-el, he worships God by the name of El-beth-el, the God of Beth-el, because there God appeared to him. Note, The comfort which the saints have in holy ordinances, is not so much from Beth-el, the house of God, as from El-beth-el, the God of the house. The ordinances are but empty things, if we do not meet with God in them.

II. There he buried Deborah, Reuben's nurse, v. 8. We have reason to think that Jacob, after he came to Canaan, while his family dwelt near Shechem, went himself (it is likely often) to visit his father Isaac at Heb'en. Reuben, probably, was dead, but her old nurse (of whom mention is made, ch. 24, 59.) survived her: and Jacob took her to his family, to be a companion to his wives, her country-women, and an instructor to his children; while they were at Beth-el, she died, and died lamented, so much lamented, that the oak under which she was buried, was called Allon-Bachuth, the oak of weeping. Note, 1. Old servants in a family, that have in their time been faithful and useful, ought to be respected. Honour was done to this lady, at her death, by Jacob's family, though she was not related to them, and though she was aged. Former services, in such a case, must be remembered. 2. We do not know where death may meet us; perhaps at Beth-el, the house of God. Therefore let us be always ready. 3. Family-adoration is long continued even then, when family-reformation and religion are on foot. Therefore, rejoice with trembling.

III. There God appeared to him, (v. 9.) to own his altar, and to answer to the name by which he had called him, The God of Beth-el, (v. 7.) and to comfort him under his affliction, v. 8. Note, God will appear to them in a way of grace, that attend on him in a way of duty.

Here, 1. He confirmed the change of his name, v. 10. It was done before by the angel that wrestled with him, (ch. 32. 28.) and here it was ratified by the Divine Majesty, or Shechinah, that appeared to him. There were two promises, which we have met with often before. (1.) That he should be the father of a great nation; great in number, A company of nations shall be of thee; every tribe of Israel was a nation, and all the twelve a company of nations, great in honour and power, kings shall come out of thy loins. (2.) That he should be the master of a good land, (v. 12.) described by the grantees, Abraham and Isaac, to whom it was promised, not by the occupants, the Canaanites, in whose possession it now was. The land that was given to Abraham and Isaac, is here entailed on Jacob and his seed. He shall not have children without an estate, which is often the case of the poor; nor an estate without children, which is often the grief of the rich; but both. These two promises had a spiritual signification, which we may suppose Jacob himself had some notion of, though not the exact distinction which we make. They are not without doubt, Christ is the promised Seed, and heaven is the promised land; the former is the foundation, and the latter the top-stone, of all God's favours.

He then went up from him, or from over him, in some visible display of glory, which had hovered over him while he talked with him, v. 13. Note, The sweetest communion the saints have with God in this world, are short and transient, and soon have an end. Our vision of God in heaven will be everlasting; there we shall be ever with the Lord; it is not so here.

IV. There Jacob erected a memorial of this, v. 14. 1. He set up a pillar. When he was going to Padan-aram, he set up that stone which he had laid his head on, for a pillar: that was agreeable enough to his low condition, and his hasty flight; but now he took time to erect one more stately, more distinguishable and durable, probably, inserting that stone into it. In token of it's intending it for a sacred memorial of it's communion with God, he poured oil upon the top-stone, and blessed the ingredients of a divine hewing unto it. His vow was, This stone shall be God's house, that is, shall be set up for his honour, as houses to the praise of their builders; and here he performs it, transferring it to God by anointing it. 2. He confirmed the name he had formerly given to the place, (v. 13.) Beth-el, the house of God. Yet this very place afterward lost the honour of its name, and he came Beth-aven, a house of ingratitude; for here it was... that Jeroboam set up one of his calves. It is impossible for the best men to entail upon a place so much as the profanation and form of religion.

16. And they journeyed from Beth-el; and there was but a little way to come to Ephrath: and Rachel travailed, and she had hard labour. 17. And it came to pass, when she was in hard labour, that the midwife said unto her, Fear not; thou shalt have this son also. 18. And it came to pass, as her soul was in departing, (for she died,) that she called his name Ben-oni: but his father called him Benjamin. 19. And Rachel died, and was buried in the way to Ephrath, which is Beth-lehem. 20. And Jacob set a pillar upon her grave: that is the pillar of Rachel's grave unto this day.

We have here the story of the death of Rachel, the beloved wife of Jacob.

1. She fell in travail by the way, not able to reach to Beth-lehem the next town, though they were near it; so suddenly does pain come upon a woman in travail, which she cannot escape, or put off. We may suppose that Jacob had soon a tent up, convenient enough for her reception.

2. Her pain was violent. She had hard labour; literally the mean: this was the effect of sin, ch. 3. 16. Note, Human life begins with sorrow, and the roses of its joy are surrounded with thorns.

3. The midwife encouraged her, v. 17. No doubt, she had her midwife with her, ready at hand, yet that would not secure her. Rachel had said, when she bare Joseph, God shall add another son: which now the midwife remembers, and tells her her words were made good. Yet this did not avail to keep up her spirits; unless God command away fear, no one else can. He only says, as one having authority, Fear not. We are apt in extreme perils, to comfort ourselves and our friends with the hopes of a temporal deliverance, in which we may be disappointed; we had better found our comforts on that which cannot fail us, the hope of eternal life.

4. Her travail was, to the life of the child, but to her own extremity. Note, Though the pains and perils of child-bearing were introduced by sin, yet they have sometimes been fatal to very holy women, who, though not saved in child-bearing, are saved through it with an everlasting salvation. Rachel had passionately said, Give me children, or else I die; and now that she had children, (for this was her second,) she died. Her dying is here called the departing of her soul. Note, The death of the body is but the departure of the soul to the world of spirits. Her dying lips called her new-born son Ben-oni, the son of my sorrow. And many a son, not born in such hard labour, yet proves the son of his parent's sorrow, and the heaviness of that bare him. Children are enough the sorrow of their poor mothers, in the breeding, bearing, and nursing, of them; they should therefore, when they grow up, study to be their joy, and so, if possible, to make them some amends. But Jacob, because he would not renew the sorrowful remembrance of the mother's death, every time he called his son by his name, changed his name, and called him Benjamin, the son of my right hand, that is, very dear to me; set on my right hand for a blessing; the support of my age, like the staff in my right-hand.

6. Jacob buried her near the place where she died; as she died in child-bed, it was convenient to bury her quickly; and therefore he did not bring her to the burying-place of his family. If the soul be at rest after death, it matters little where the body lies. In the place where the tree falls, there let it be. No mention is made of the mourning that was at her death, because that might easily be taken for grant ed. Jacob, no doubt was a true mourner. Note, Great afflictions sometimes befal us immediately after great comforts. Lest Jacob should be lifted up with the visions of the Almighty which he was honoured with, this was sent as a thorn in the flesh to humble him. These that enjoy the favours peculiar to the children of God, must yet expect the troubles that are common to the children of men. Deborah, when she was married, had been as comfortable to Rachel in her extremity, died but a little before. Note, When death comes into a family, it often strikes double. God by it speaks once, yea twice. The Jewish writers say, "The death of Deborah and Rachel was to expiate the murder of the Shechemites, occasioned by Dinah, a daughter of the family."

Lastly, Observe Jacob set up a pillar upon her grave, so that it was known long after, to be Rachel's sepulchre. (1 Sam. 10. 2.) and Providence so ordered it, that this place afterward fell in the lot of Ben jamin. Jacob set up a pillar in remembrance of his joy, (v. 14.) and here he sets up one in remembrance of his sorrows; for, as it may be of use to ourselves to keep both in mind, so it may be of use to others to transmit the memorials of both: the church, long afterward, owned that what God said to Jacob at Beth-el, both by his word and by his rod, he intended for their instruction, (Hos. 12. 4.) There he spake with us.

21. And Israel journeyed, and spread his tent beyond the tower of Edar. 22. And it came to pass, when Israel dwelt in that land, that Reuben went and lay with Bilhah his father's concubine: and Israel heard it. Now the sons of Jacob were twelve. 23. The sons of Leah; Reuben, Jacob's first-born, and Simeon, and Levi, and Judah, and Issachar, and Zebulun: 24. The sons of Rachel; Joseph, and Benjamin: 25. And the sons of Bilhah, Rachel's handmaid; Dan, and Naphtali: 26. And the sons of Zilpah, Leah's handmaid; Gad, and Asher: these are the sons of Jacob, which were born to him in Padan-aram. 27. And Jacob came unto Isaac his father, unto Mamre, unto the city of Arbah, which is Hebron, where Abraham and Isaac sojourned. 28. And the days of Isaac were an hundred and fourscore years. 29. And Isaac gave up the ghost, and died, and was gathered unto his people, being old and full of days: and his sons Esau and Jacob buried him.

Here is,

1. Jacob's remove, v. 21. He also, as his fathers, sojourned in the land of promise as in a strange country, and was not long in a place. Immediately after the story of Rachel's death, he is here called Israel, (v. 21, 22.) and not often so, afterward: the Jews say, "The historian doth him this honour here, because he bore that affliction with such admirable patience and submission to Providence." Note, Those are Israels indeed, princes with God, that support the government of their own passions. He that has this rule over his own spirit, is better than the mighty. Israel, a prince with God, yet dwells in tents; the city is reserved for him in the other world.

2. The sin of Reuben; a piece of abominable wickedness it was, that he was guilty of; (v. 22.) that very sin which, the apostle says, (1 Cor. 5. 1.) is not so much as named among the Gentiles, that one should have his father's wife. It is said to be when Isaac was old, and his eyes were dim, 25. if he went thence absent from his family, which might be the unhappy occasion of these disorders. Though perhaps Bilhah was the greater criminal, and, it is probable, was abandoned by Jacob for it, yet Reuben's crime was so provoking, that, for it, he lost his birth-right and blessing, ch. 49. 4. The first-born is not always the best, nor the most promising. This was Reuben's sin, but it was Jacob's affliction; and what a sure and striking instance of the absence of God's grace, that he who was the first-born of his family, and the son of his father's bosom, and had his father's blessing, and his father's love, and his father's affection, and now, when his father is absent, and his father's household is absent, God has forsaken him. These are all instances of those who lived in the land of Canaan, and Jacob: 2. And Esau took his wives of the daughters of Canaan; Ada, the daughter of Elon the Hittite, and Abil-bannah the daughter of Anah the daughter of Zibeon the Hivite; 3. And Basemath, Ishmael's daughter, sister of Nebajoth. 4. And Ada-bare to Esau, Eliphaaz; and Basemath bare Reuel, 5. And Abil-bannah bare Jeush, and Jalam, and Korah: these are the sons of Esau, which were born unto him in the land of Canaan. 6. And Esau took his wives, and his sons, and his daughters, and all the persons of his house, and his cattle, and all his beasts, and all his substance, which he had got in the land of Canaan; and went into the country, from the face of his brother Jacob. 7. For their riches were more than that they might dwell together; and the land wherein they were strangers, could not bear them, because of their cattle. 8. Thus dwelt Esau in mount Seir: Esau is Edom.

CHAP. XXXVI.
In this chapter, we have an account of the posterity of Esau, who, from him, were called Edomites, that Esau sold his birth-right, and lost his blessing, and was not loved of God as Jacob was. Here is a brief register kept of his family for some generations. 1. Because he was the first-born of his father, and the name is put upon him. 2. Because the Edomites were neighbours to Israel, and their genealogy would be of use to give light to the following stories of what passed between them. 3. It is the record of the performance of the promise of Abraham, that he should be the father of many nations; and of that answer which Rebekah had from the oracle she consulted, Two nations are in thy womb; and of the blessing of Isaac, Thy seed shall be the bond of the earth. We have here, 1. 20. 30. 31. 2. 31. 32. 3. 6. 8. 9. 14. 14. 15. 19. 20. 25. 30. 51. 52. The names of his sons, v. 9. 14. 14. 15. 19. 51. 52. The sons of Edom, v. 20. 25. 51. 52. The kings and dukes of Edom, v. 25. 33. 51. 52. The more is recorded than their names, because the history of those that were out of the church, (though perhaps it might have been serviceable in politics,) yet would have been but little use in divinity. It is in the church that the memorable instances are found of special grace, and special providences; for that is the enclosure, the rest is common. This chapter is abridged. 1 Chron. 1. 33. &c.

1. NOW these are the generations of Esau, who is Edom. 2. Esau took his wives of the daughters of Canaan; Ada, the daughter of Elon the Hittite, and Abil-bannah the daughter of Anah the daughter of Zibeon the Hivite; 3. And Basemath, Ishmael's daughter, sister of Nebajoth. 4. And Ada-bare to Esau, Eliphaaz; and Basemath bare Reuel. 5. And Abil-bannah bare Jeush, and Jalam, and Korah: these are the sons of Esau, which were born unto him in the land of Canaan. 6. And Esau took his wives, and his sons, and his daughters, and all the persons of his house, and his cattle, and all his beasts, and all his substance, which he had got in the land of Canaan; and went into the country, from the face of his brother Jacob. 7. For their riches were more than that they might dwell together; and the land wherein they were strangers, could not bear them, because of their cattle. 8. Thus dwelt Esau in mount Seir: Esau is Edom.

Observe here,
1. Concerning Esau himself, v. 1. He is called Edom, (and Edom, v. 6.) that name by which he perpetuated the remembrance of the foolish bargain he made, when he sold his birth-right for that red, that red figgates. The very mention of that name is enough to intimate the reason why his family is turned off with such a short account. Note, If men do a wrong thing, they must thank them selves, when it is, long afterward, remembered against them to their reproach.
2. Concerning his wife, and the children they bare him in the land of Canaan. He had three wives, and, by them all, but five sons: many a one has more by one wife. God in his providence often disappoints those who take indirect courses to build up a family; yet here the promise prevailed, and Esau's family was built up.
3. Concerning his removal to mount Seir, which was the country God had given him for a possession, when he reserved Canaan for the seed of Jacob. God owns it, long afterward, I gave to Esau mount Seir, (Deut. 2. 5. Josh. 24. 4.) which was the reason why the Edomites must not be disturbed in their possession. These that have not a right by promise, such as Jacob had, to Canaan, may have a very good tie by providence, to their estates, such as Esau had to mount Seir. Esau had begun to settle among his wives' relations, in Seir, before Jacob came from Padan-aram, ch. 29. 3. Isaac, it is likely, had sent him thither, (as Abraham in his life-time had sent the sons of the concubines from Isaac his son into the east-country, ch. 25. 6.) that Jacob might have the clearer way made before him in the possession of the promised land; but, probably, during the life of Isaac, Esau had still some effects remaining in Canaan. But, after his death, he wholly withdrew to mount Seir, took with him what came to his share of his father's personal estate, and left Canaan to Jacob; not only because he had the promise of it, but because he saw that if they should both continue to thrive as they had begun, there would not be room for both.
Thus dwelt Esau in mount Seir, v. 8. Note, Whatever opposition may be made, God's word will be accomplished, and even those that have opposed it, will see themselves, some time or other, under a necessity of yielding to it, and acquiescing in it. Esau had struggled for Canaan, but now he timidly retires to mount Seir; for God's counsels shall certainly stand, concerning the times before appointed, and the bounds of our habitation.

9. And these are the generations of Esau the father of the Edomites in mount Seir. 10. These are the names of Esau's sons; Eliphaz the son of Adah the wife of Esau, Reuel the son of Basemath the wife of Esau. 11. And the sons of Eliphaz were Teman, Omar, Zepho, and Gatam, and Kenaz. 12. And Timna was concubine to Eliphaz Esau's son; and she bare to Eliphaz Amalek: these were the sons of Adah Esau's wife. 13. And these are the sons of Reuel; Nahath, and Zerah, Shammah, and Mizzah: these were the sons of Basemath Esau's wife. 14. And these were the sons of Aholibamah, the daughter of Anah the daughter of Zibeon, Esau's wife: and she bare to Esau Jeush, and Jaalam, and Korah. 15. These were the sons of Esau: the sons of Eliphaz the first born son of Esau; duke Teman, duke Omar, duke Zepho, duke Kenaz. 16. Duke Korah, duke Gatam, and duke Amalek: these are the dukes that came of Eliphaz in the land of Edom; these were the sons of Adah. 17. And these are the sons of Reuel Esau's son; duke Nahath, duke Zerah, duke Shammah, duke Mizzah: these are the dukes that came of Reuel in the land of Edom; these are the sons of Basemath Esau's wife. 18. And these are the sons of Aholibamah Esau's wife; duke Jeush, duke Jaalam, duke Korah: these were the dukes that came of Aholibamah the daughter of Anah Esau's wife. 19. These are the sons of Esau, who is Edom, and these are their dukes.

Observe here, 1. That only the names of Esau's sons and grandsons are recorded; only their names, not their history; for it is the church that Moses preserves the records of, not the record of those that were without. The elders only that lived by faith, obtained a good report. It is Zion that produces the men of renown, not Seir, Ps. 87. 5. Nor does the genealogy go any farther than the third and fourth generation, the very names of all after are buried in oblivion; it is only the pedigree of the Israelites, who were to be the heirs of Canaan, and of whom were to come the promised Seed, and the holy Seed, that is drawn out to any length, as far as there was occasion for it; even of all the tribes, till Canaan was divided among them, and of the royal line, till Christ came. 2. That these sons and grandsons of Esau are called dukes, v. 15. 19. Probably, they were military commanders, dukes, or captains, that had soldiers under them; for Esau and his family lived by the sword, ch. 27. 40. Note, Titles of honour have been more ancient, out of the church, than in it. Esau's sons were dukes, when Jacob's sons were but plain shepherds, ch. 47. 5. This is not a reason why such titles should not be used among Christians; but it is a reason why men should not overvalue themselves, or others, for the sake of them. There is an honour that comes from God, and a name in his house that is infinitely more valuable. Edomites may be dukes with men, but Israelites indeed are made to our God kings and priests. 3. We may suppose those dukes had numerous families of children and servants, that were their dukedoms. God promised to multiply Jacob, and to enrich him; yet Esau increases, and is enriched first. Note, It is no new thing for the men of this world to be full of children, and to have their bellies too filled with hid treasure, Ps. 17. 14. God's promise to Jacob began to work late, but the effect of it remained longer, and it had its complete accomplishment in the spiritual Israel.

20. These are the sons of Seir the Horite, who inhabited the land; Lotan, and Shobal, and Zibeon, and Anah. 21. And Dishon, and Ezer, and Dishan: these are the dukes of the Horites, the children of Seir in the land of Edom. 22. And the children of Lotan were Hori and Hemnann; and Lotan's sister was Timna. 23. And the children of Shobal were these; Alvan, and Manahath, and Ebal, Shepho, and Onam. 24. And these are the children of Zibeon; both Ajah, and Anah; this was that Anah that found the mules in the wilderness, as he fed the asses of Zibeon his father. 25. And the children of Anah were these; Dishon, and Aholibamah the daughter of Anah. 26. And these are the children of Dishon; Hemdan, and Eshton, and Ithran, and Cheran. 27. The children of Ezer are these; Bilhan, and Zaavan; and Achau. 28. The children of Dishan, are these; Uz, and Haran. 29. These are the dukes that came of the Horites; duke Lotan, duke Shobal, duke Zibeon, duke Anah. 30 Duke Dishon, duke Ezer, duke Dishan: these are the dukes that came of Hori, among their dukes in the land of Seir.

In the midst of this genealogy of the Edomites, here is inserted the genealogy of the Horites, those Canaanites, or Hittites, (compare ch. 26. 31.) that were the natives of mount Seir. Mention is made of them, (ch. 14. 6.) and of their interest in mount Seir, before the Edomites took possession of it, Deut. 2. 13, 22. This comes in here, not only to give light to the story, but to be a standing reflection upon the Edomites for intermarrying with them, by which it is probable, they learned their way, and corrupted themselves. Esau having sold his birth-right, and lost his blessing, and entered into alliance with the Hittites, his posterity and the sons of Seir are here reckoned together. Note, Those that treacherously desert God's church, are justly numbered with those that were never in it; apostate Edomites stand on the same ground with accursed Horites. Particular notice is taken of one Anah who fed the asses of Zibeon his father, (v. 24.) and yet is called duke Anah, v. 29. Note, Those that expect to rise high, should begin low. An honourable descent should not keep men from
31. And these are the kings that reigned in the land of Edom, before there reigned any king over the children of Israel. 32. And Bela the son of Beor reigned in Edom: and the name of his city was Dinhabah. 33. And Bela died, and Jobab the son of Zerah of Bozrah reigned in his stead. 34. And Jobab died, and Husham of the land of Temani reigned in his stead. 35. And Husham died, and Hadad the son of Bedad, who smote Midian in the field of Moab, reigned in his stead: and the name of his city was Avith. 36. And Hadad died, and Samlah of Masrekah reigned in his stead. 37. And Samlah died, and Saul of Rehoboth by the river reigned in his stead. 38. And Saul died, and Baal-hanan the son of Achbor reigned in his stead. 39. And Baal-hanan the son of Achbor died, and Hadar reigned in his stead: and the name of his city was Pau: and his wife's name was Mehetabal, the daughter of Matred, the daughter of Mezalah. 40. And these are the names of the dukes that came of Esau, according to their families, after their places, by their names; duke Timnah, duke Alah, duke Jetheth, 41. Duke Aholibamah, duke Elah, duke Pinon, 42. Duke Kenaz, duke Teman, duke Mibzar, 43. Duke Magdiel, duke Iram: these be the dukes of Edom, according to their habitations in the land of their possession: he is Esau the father of the Edomites.

By degrees, it seems, the Edomites wormed out the Horites, and got full possession of the country, and had a government of their own. 1. They were ruled by kings who governed the whole country; and seem to have come to the throne by election, and not by lineal descent; so Bishop Patrick observes. These kings reigned in Edom before there reigned any king over the children of Israel, that is, before Moses's time, for he reigned in Edom, as the text saith, v. 3. God had lately promised Jacob, that kings should come out of his loins, (ch. 35. 11. ) yet Esau's blood becomes royal long before any of Jacob's did. Note, In external prosperity and honour, the children of the covenant are often cast behind, and those that are out of covenant get the start. The triumphing of the wicked may be quick, but it is short; soon ripe, and soon past; the fruits of the promise, though they are slow, are sure and lasting; at the end it shall speak, and not lie. We may suppose it a great trial to the faith of God's Israel, to hear of the pomp and power of the kings of Edom, while they were bond-slaves in Egypt; but those that look for great things from God, must be content to wait for them; God's time is the best time. 2. They were afterward governed by dukes, again here named, who, I suppose, ruled all at the same time in several places in the country. Either they set up this form of government in conformity to the Horites, who had used it, (v. 29. ) or God's providence reduced them to it, as some conjecture, to correct them for their unkindness to his people, by withdrawing them a passage through their country, Num. 20. 18. Note, When power is abused, it is just with God to weaken it, by turning it into divers channels. For the transgression of a land, many are the princes thereof. Sin brought Edom from kings to dukes, from crowns to cornets. We read of the dukes of Edom, (Exod. 15. 15. ) yet, long afterward, of their kings again.

CHAP. XXXVII.

At this chapter, begins the story of Joseph, who, from hence, in every chapter (but one) to the end of this book, makes the greatest figure. He was Jacob's eldest son by his beloved Rachel; his mother's name was, of a mother that had been long barren. His story is so remarkably divided between his humiliation and his exaltation, that we cannot avoid seeing something of Christ in it. He was first humbled and then exalted, and, in many instances, so as to answer the type of Joseph. It also shows the lot of christians, who must through many tribulations enter into the kingdom. In this chapter, we have, I. The malice his brethren bore against him, v. 1-4. II. The favor the Egyptians showed him, v. 5-11. III. The mischief his brethren designed and did to him, v. 12-17. IV. The kindness the Egyptians showed him, v. 18-22. V. Joseph's wisdom and prudence, v. 23-29. VI. Joseph's love and kindness to his brethren, v. 30-36. All this was working together for good.

AND Jacob dwelt in the land wherein his father was a stranger, in the land of Canaan. 2. These are the generations of Jacob. Joseph, being seventeen years old, was feeding the flock with his brethren; and the lad was with the sons of Bilhah, and with the sons of Zilpah, his father's wives: and Joseph brought unto his father their evil report. 3. Now Israel loved Joseph more than all his children, because he was the son of his old age; and he made him a coat of many colours. 4. And when his brethren saw that their father loved him more than all his brethren, they hated him, and could not speak peaceably unto him.

Moses has no more to say of the Edomites, unless as they happen to fall in Israel's way; but now applies himself closely to the story of Jacob's family, These are the generations of Jacob. His is not a bare barren genealogy as that of Esau, (ch. 36. 1. ) but a memorable, useful history. Here is, 1. Jacob a sojourner with his father Isaac, who was yet living, v. 1. We shall never be at home, till we come to heaven. 2. Joseph, a shepherd, feeding the flock with his brethren, v. 2. Though he was his father's darling, yet he was not bred up in idleness or delicacy. Those do not truly love their children, that do not inure them to business, and labour and mortification. The fondling of children is with good reason commonly called the spoiling of them. Those that are trained up to do nothing, are likely to be good for nothing. 3. Joseph beloved by his father, (v. 3.) partly for his dear mother's sake that was dead, and partly for his own sake, because he was the greatest comfort of his old age; probably, he waited on him, and was more observant of him than the rest of his sons; he was the son of the ancient, to some; that is, when he was a child, he was as grave and discreet as if he had been an old man; a child, but not childish. Jacob proclaimed his affection to him by dressing him finer than the rest of his children; he made him a coat of divers colours, which, probably, was significant of further honours intended him. Note, Though those children are happy, that have in them which justly recommends them to their parents' particular love; yet it is the prudence of parents not to make a difference between one child and another, unless there be a great and manifest cause given for it by the children's distresses or privileges; partial government must be impartial, and managed with a steady hand. 4. Joseph hated by his brethren, (1.) Because his father loved him; when parents make a difference, children soon take notice of it, and it often occasions feuds and quarrels in families. (2.) Because he brought to his father their evil report. Jacob's sons did that, when they were from under his eye, which they durst not have done, if they had seen him at home with him; but Joseph gave his father an account of their bad carriage, that he might reprove and restrain them, not as a malicious tale bearer, to sow discord, but as a faithful brother, who, when he durst not admonish them himself, represented their faults to one that had authority to admonish them. Note, [1.] It is common for friendly monitors to be looked upon as enemies. They that hate to be reformed, hate those that would reform them, Prov. 9. 8. [2.] It is common for those that are beloved of God, to be hated by the world; whom heaven blesses, hell curses; those whom God speaks comfortably to, wicked men will not speak peaceably to. It is said here of Joseph, the lad was with the sons of Bilhah; some read it, and he was servant to them, they made him their drudge. 5. And Joseph dreamed a dream, and he told it his brethren: and they hated him yet the more. 6. And he said unto them, Hear, I pray you, this dream which I have dreamed: 7. For, behold, we were binding sheaves in the field, and, lo, my sheaf arose, and also stood upright; and, behold, your sheaves stood round about, and made obeisance to my sheaf. 8. And his brethren said unto him, Shalt thou indeed reign over us? Or shalt thou indeed have dominion over us? And they hated him yet the more for his dreams, and for his words. 9. And he dreamed yet another dream, and told it his brethren, and said, Behold, I have dreamed a dream more; and, behold, the sun and the moon, and the eleven stars, made obeisance to me. 10. And he told it to his father, and to his brethren; and his father rebuked him, and said unto him, What is this dream that thou hast dreamed? Shall I and thy mother and thy brethren indeed come to bow down ourselves to thee to the earth? 11. And his brethren envied him; but his father observed the saying. Here, 1. Joseph relates the prophetic dreams he had, v. 6, 7, 9, 10. Though he was now very young, (about seventeen years old,) yet he was pious and devout, and well-inclined, and this fitted him for God's gracious discoveries of himself to Joseph. Joseph had a great deal of trouble before him, and therefore God gave him betimes this prospect of his advancement, to support and comfort him under the long and grievous troubles with which he was so he exercised. The words, 'It was | joy set before him,' and so have Christians. Note, God has ways of preparing his people beforehand for the trials which they cannot foresee, but which he has an eye to, in the comforts he furnishes them with. His dreams were, (1.) That his brethren's sheaves all bowed to his, intimating upon what occasion they should be brought to do obeisance to him, namely, in seeking to him for corn; their empty sheaves could not go to his full one. (2.) That the sun, and moon, and the eleven stars, did obeisance to him, v. 9. Joseph was more of a prophet than a politician, else he would have kept this to himself, when he could not but know that his brethren did already hate him, and that this would but the more exasperate them. But if he told it in his simplicity, yet God directed it for the mortification of his brethren. Observe, Joseph dreamed of his preferment, but did not dream of his imprisonment. Thus many young people, when they are setting out in the world, think of nothing but prosperity and pleasure, and never dream of trouble. 2. His brethren take it very ill, and are more and more enraged against him, (v. 8.) Shalt thou indeed reign over us? See here, (1.) How truly they interpreted his dream, that he should reign over them. Joseph dreamed of becoming the executioner of his dream, who were enemies to the accomplishment of it, as in Gideon's story; (Judg. 7. 13, 14.) they perceived that he spake of them, Matt. 21. 45. The event exactly answered to this interpretation, ch. 42. 6, &c. (2.) How scornfully they resented it; "Shalt thou, that art but one, reign over us, that are many? Thou, that art the youngest, over us that are elders." Note, The reign and dominion of Christ, our Joseph, is absolute and universal, and are, strive against, by a carnal and unbelieving world, who cannot endure to think that this man should reign over them. The dominion also of the upright, in the morning of the resurrection, is thought of with the utmost disdain. 3. His father gives him a gentle rebuke for it, yet observes the saying, v. 10, 11. Probably, he checked him for his expressions of faith in God's promises is often sorely shaken by their misunderstanding of the promises, and then suggesting the improbabilities that attend the performance. But God is doing his own work, and will do it, whether we understand him aright or no. Jacob, like Mary, (Luke 2. 51.) kept these sayings in his heart, and, no doubt, remembered them long afterward, when the event answered to the prediction.
12. And his brethren went to feed their father's flock in Shechem. 13. And Israel said unto Joseph, Do not thy brethren feed the flock in Shechem? Come, and I will send thee unto them. And he said to him, Here am I. 14. And he said to him, Go, I pray thee, see whether it be well with thy brethren, and with the flock; and bring me word again. So he sent him out of the vale of Hebron, and he came to Shechem. 15. And a certain man found him, and, behold, he was wandering in the field: and the man asked him, saying, What seekest thou? 16. And he said, I seek my brethren: tell me, I pray thee, where they feed their flocks. 17. And the man said, They are departed hence; for I heard them say, Let us go to Dothan. And Joseph went after his brethren, and found them in Dothan. 18. And when they saw him afar off, even before he came near unto them, they conspired against him to slay him. 19. And they said one to another, Behold, this dreamer cometh. 20. Come now therefore, and let us slay him, and cast him into some pit; and we will say, Some evil beast hath devoured him: and we shall see what will become of his dreams. 21. And Reuben heard it, and he delivered him out of their hands; and said, Let us not kill him. 22. And Reuben said unto them, Shed no blood, but cast him into this pit that is in the wilderness, and lay no hand upon him; that he might rid him out of their hands, to deliver him to his father again.

I. The kind visit which Joseph, in obedience to his father's command, made to his brethren, who were feeding the flocks at Shechem, many miles off. Some say that they went thither on purpose, expecting that Joseph would be sent to see them, and that then they should have an opportunity to do him a mischief. However, Joseph and his father had both of them more of the innocence of the dove than of the wisdom of the serpent; else he had never come thus into the hands of those that hated him: but God designed it all for good. See in Joseph an instance, 1. Of Dutifulness to his father; thereof he was his father's darling, yet he was made, and was willing to be, his father's servant. How readily does he wait his father's orders! Here am I, v. 13. Note, Those children that are best loved by their parents, should be most obedient to their parents; and then their love is well-bestowed, and well-return'd. 2. Of Kindness to his brethren; though he knew they hated him, and envied him, yet he made no objections against his father's command, either from the distance of the place, or the danger of the journey, but cheerfully embraced the opportunity of showing his respect to his brethren. Note, It is a very good lesson, though it is hardly learnt, and rarely practised, to love those that hate us: if our relations do not their duty to us, yet we must not be wanting in our duty to them. This is thank-worthy, Joseph was sent by his father to Shechem, to see whether his brethren were well there, and whether the country had not risen upon them, and destroyed them, in revenge of their barbarous murder of the Shechmites, some years before. But Joseph, not finding them there, went to Dothan, which showed that he undertook this journey, not only in obedience to his father, (for then he might have returned, when he missed them at Shechem,) and doing what his father bid him,) but out of love to his brethren, and himself, he sought diligently, till he found them. Thus let brotherly love continue, and let us give proofs of it. 11. The bloody and malicious plot of his brethren against him, who rendered good for evil, and, for his love, were his adversaries. Observe, 1. How deliberate they were in the contrivance of this mischief: when they saw him afar off, they conspired against him, v. 18. It was in a heat, or upon a sudden provocation, that they thought to slay him, but from malice prepense, and in cold blood. Note, Whosoever has his brother, is a murderer; for he will be one, if he have an opportunity, 1 John, 3. 15. Malice is a most mischievous thing, and is in danger of making bloody work where it is harboured and indulged. The more there is of a project and design in a sin, the worse it is; it is bad to do evil, but worse to design it; and the more cruel they were in their design: nothing less than his blood must satisfy them, Come, and let us slay him, v. 20. Note, The old enmity hunts for the precious life. They are the blood-thirsty, that hate the upright, (Prov. 29. 10.) and it is the blood of the saints that the harlot daintly with. 3. How truly they reproached him for his dreams; (v. 19.) This is amiserable cometh, and (v. 20.) We shall see what will become of his dreams. This shows what it was that fretted and enraged them; they could not endure to think of doing obedience to him, that was it which they were plotting to prevent by the murder of him. Note, Men that fret and rage at God's counsels, are impiously aiming to defeat them; but they imagine a vain thing, Ps. 2. 1... 3. God's counsels will stand. 4. How they agreed to keep one another's counsel, and to cover the murder with a lie; We will say some evil beast hath devoured him; whereas they were worse than the most evil beasts, being now engaged in consultation to devour him; for evil beasts prey not on those of their own kind, but these were tearing a piece of themselves. III. Reuben's project to deliver him, v. 21, 22. Note, God can raise a friend for his people, even among their enemies: for he has all hearts in his hands. Reuben, of all the brothers, had most reason to be jealous of Joseph, for he was the first-born, and so, entitled to those distinguishing favours which Jacob was conferring on Joseph; yet he proves his best friend. Reuben's temper seems to have been most soft and effeminate, which had betrayed him to the sin of uncleanness; while the temper of the others, being hard and oppressive, did, w s he, which betrayed them to the sin of murder, a sin which Reuben started at the thought of. Note, Our natural constitution should be guarded against these sins to which it is most inclinable, and improved (as Reuben's here) against those sins to which it is most averse. Reuben made a proposal which they thought would effectually answer their intentions, and they consented to it, yet which he designed should answer his intention of slaying Joseph out of their hands, and restoring him to his father, probably, hoping thereby to recover his father's favour, which he had lately lost; but God over-ruled all to serve his own purpose of making Joseph an instrument to save much people alive. Joseph was here a type of Christ; though he was the beloved Son of his Father, and hated by a wicked world, yet the Father sent him out of his bosom to visit us in great humility and love; he came from heaven to earth, to seek and save us, yet then malicious plots were laid against him; he came to his own, and his own not only received him not, but consulted, This is the heir, come let us kill him; Crucify him, crucify him. This he submitted to, in pursuance of his design to redeem and save us.

23. And it came to pass, when Joseph was come unto his brethren, that they strip Joseph out of his coat, his coat of many colours that was on him; 24. And they took him, and cast him into a pit: and the pit was empty, there was no water in it. 25. And they sat down to eat bread: and they lifted up their eyes and looked, and, behold, a company of Ishmeelites came from Gilead, with their camels bearing spicery and balm and myrrh, going to carry it down to Egypt. 26. And Judah said unto his brethren, What profit is it if we slay our brother, and conceal his blood? 27. Come, and let us sell him to the Ishmeelites, and let not our hand be upon him; for he is our brother, and our flesh. And his brethren were content. 28. Then there passed by Midianites merchants; and they drew and lifted up Joseph out of the pit, and sold Joseph to the Ishmeelites for twenty pieces of silver: and they brought Joseph into Egypt. 29. And Reuben returned unto the pit; and, behold, Joseph was not in the pit; and he rent his clothes. 30. And he returned unto his brethren, and said, The child is not; and I, whither shall I go? We have here the execution of their plot against Joseph.

1. They strip him: each striving to seize the envied coat of many colours, v. 23. Thus, in imagination, they degraded him from the birth-right, which perhaps this was the badge of, grieving him, affronting their father, and making themselves sport, while they insulted over him, Now, Joseph, where is the fine coat? Thus our Lord Jesus was strip of his seamless coat, and thus his suffering saints have first been industriously divested of their privileges and honours, and then made the off-scouring of all things.

II. They went about to starve him; throwing him into a dry pit, to perish there with hunger and cold, so cruel were their tender mercies, v. 24. Note, Where envy reigns, pity is banished, and humanity itself is forgotten, Prov. 27. 4. So full of deadly poison is malice, that the more barbarous any thing is, the more grateful it is. Now Joseph begged for his life, in the anguish of his soul, (ch. 42. 21.) entreated by all imaginable endearments, that they would be content with his coat, and spare his life; he pleads innocence, relation, affection, submission; he weeps, and makes supplication, but all in vain: Renben only relents and intercedes for him, ch. 42. 22. But he cannot prevail to save Joseph from the horrible pit, in which they resolve he shall die by degrees, and be buried alive. Is this he to whom his brethren must do obedience? None of God's providences often seem to contradict his purposes, even then when they are serving them, and working at a distance toward the accomplishment of them.

III. They slighted him when he was in distress, and were not grieved for the affliction of Joseph; for when he was pining away in the pit, bemoaning his own misery, and with a languishing cry calling to them for pity, they eat down to eat bread, v. 25. 1. They felt no remorse of conscience for the sin; if they had, it would have spoiled their appetite for their meat, and the relish of it. Note, A great force put upon conscience, commonly stupifies it, and, for the time, deprives it both of sense and speech. Daring sinners are secure ones: but the consciences of Joseph's brethren, though asleep, were not so affected as to prevent them from the flight and slavery of their soul. 2. They were now pleased to think how they were freed from the fear of their brother's dominion over them, and that on the contrary, they had turned the wheel upon him. They made merry over him, as the persecutors over the two witnesses that had tormented them, Rev. 11. 10. Note Those that oppose God's counsels, may possibly prevail so far as to think they have gained their point and yet be deceived.

IV. They sold him; a caravan of merchants very opportunely passed by; (Providence so ordering it;) and Judah made the motion, that they should sell Joseph to them, to be carried far enough off into Egypt, where in all probability, he would be lost and never heard of more. 1. Judah moved it in compassion to Joseph, (v. 26.) what profit is it, if we slay our brother? It will be less guilt and more gain to sell him. Note, When we are tempted to wrong, we should consider the unprofitableness of it. It is what there is nothing to be get by. 2. They acquiesced in it, because they thought that if he were sold for a slave, he would never be a lord, if sold into Egypt would never be their lord; yet all this was working towards it. Note, The wrath of man shall praise God, and the remainder of wrath he will restrin, Ps. 76. 10. Joseph's brethren were wonderfully restrained from murdering him, and their selling him as wonderfully turned to God's praise: as Joseph was sold by the contrivance of Judah, for twenty pieces of silver, so was our Lord Jesus for thirty, and by one of the same name, Judas.

Reuben (it seems) was gone away from his brethren, when they sold Joseph, intending to come and rescue him, yet peradventure they would stop Joseph out of it, and return him safe to his father. This was a kind project, but if it had taken effect, what had become of God's purpose concerning his preferment in Egypt? Note, There are many devices in man's heart, many devices of the enemies of God's people to destroy them, and of their friends to help them, which perhaps are both disapproved, as these here; but the counsel of the Lord, that shall stand. Reuben thought himself undone, because the child was sold; I, whither shall I go? v. 30. He being the eldest; his father would expect from him an account of him; but it proved that they had all been undone, if he had not been sold.

31. And they took Joseph's coat, and kill'd a kid of the goats, and dipped the coat in the blood; 32. And they sent the coat of many colours, and they brought it to their father; and said, This have we found: know now whether it be thy son's coat or no. 33. And he knew it, and said, It is my son's coat; an evil beast hath devoured him; Joseph is without doubt rent in pieces. 34. And Jacob rent his clothes, and put sackcloth upon his loins, and mourned for his son many days. 35. And all his son and all his daughters rose up to comfort him; but he refused to be comforted; and he said, For I will go down into the grave unto my son mourning. Thus his father wept for him. 36. And the Midianites sold him into Egypt unto Potiphar, an officer of Pharaoh's, and captain of the guard.

Joseph would soon be missed, great inquiry would be made for him, and therefore his brethren have a further design to make the world believe that Joseph was torn in pieces by a wild beast; and this they did.

I. To clear themselves, that they might not be suspected to have done him any mischief. Note, We have all learned of Adam to cover our transgressions, Job. 31. 33. When the Devil has taught men to commit evil, he then teaches them how to conceal it with another; theft and murder, with lying and perjury; but he that covers his sin, shall not prosper long.

Joseph's brethren kept their own and another's counsel for some time, but their villany came to light at last, and it is here published to the world, and the remembrance of it transmitted to every age.

II. To show that good father; it seems designed by them on purpose to be avenged upon him for his distinguishing love of Joseph: it was contrived on purpose to create the utmost vexation to him; they sent him Joseph's coat of many colours, with one colour more than it had had, a bloody colour, v. 32. They pretend they had found it in the fields, and Jacob himself must be sorrowfully asked, Is this thy son's coat? Now the badge of his honour is the discovery of his fate; and it is rashly inferred from the bloody coat, that Joseph, without doubt, is rent in pieces. Love is always apt to fear the worst concerning the person loved; there is a love that casteth out fear, but that is a perfect love. Now let those that know the heart of a parent, suppose the agonies of poor Jacob, and put their souls into his soul's stead. How strongly does he represent to himself the dreadful idea of Joseph's misery! Sleeping or waking, he imagines he sees the wild beasts setting upon Joseph; thinks he hears his piteous shrieks, when the lion roared against him; makes himself tremble and grow chill, many a time, when he fancies how the beasts sucked his blood, tore him limb from limb, and left no remains of him, but the coat of many colours, to carry the tidings. And, no doubt, it added no little to the grief of his heart to consider how much he was thinking on him, and sending him all alone, on this dangerous journey, which proved so fatal to him. This cuts him to the heart, and he is ready to look upon himself as an accessory to the death of his son.

Now, 1. Endeavours were used to comfort him; his sons beseechingly pretended to do it, (v. 35.) but miserable hypocritical comforters were they all. Had Joseph been taken away, to what extremity might they easily have done it, by telling him the truth, "Joseph is alive, he is indeed sold into Egypt, but it will be an easy thing to send thither and ransom him." This would have loosed his satchel, and girded him with gladness presently. I wonder their coun tenances did not betray their guilt, and with what face they could pretend to condole with Jacob in the death of Joseph, when they knew he was alive. No heart is more strongly hardened by the deceitfulness of sin.

But, 2. It was all in vain; Jacob refused to be comforted, v. 35. He was an obstinate mourner, resolved to go down to the grave mourning: it was not a sudden transport of passion, like that of David, Would God I had died for thee, my son, my son! But, like Job, he hardened himself in sorrow.

Note, (1.) Great affection to any creature does but prepare for so much the greater affliction, when it is taken from us. Thus theordinate love commonly ends in immoderate grief; as much as the swing of the pendulum throws one way, so much it will throw the other way. (2.) Those consult neither the comfort of their souls, nor the credit of their religion, that are determined to sorrow, upon any occasion whatsoever; we must never say, all things work together for good; we must not think, "I am in a kind of mourning," because we know not what joyful days Providence may yet reserve for us, and it is our wisdom and duty to accommodate ourselves to Providence. (3.) We often perplex ourselves with imaginary troubles; we fancy things worse than they are, and then afflict ourselves more than we need: sometimes there needs no more to comfort us, than to undeceive us; it is good to hope the best.

Lastly, The Ishmaelites and Midianites having bought Joseph, only to make their markets of him, here we have him sold again. (with gain enough to the merchants, no doubt,) to Potiphar, v. 36. Jacob was lamenting the loss of his life; had he known all, he would have lamented, though not so passionately, for the loss of his liberty. Shall Jacob's free-born son, the idol of his posterity, the darling of his heart, the very apple of his eye, be bought for the livery of an Egyptian lord, and all the marks of servitude? How soon was the land of Egypt made a house of bondage to the seed of Jacob! Note, It is the wisdom of parents not to bring up their children too delicately, because they know not what hardships and martifications Providence may reduce them to before they die. Jacob little thought that ever his beloved Joseph should be thus bought and sold for a servant.

CHAP. XXXVIII.

This chapter gives us an account of Judah and his family, and such an account it is, that one would wonder that, of all Jacob's sons, our Lord should spring out of Judah, Heb. 11. 37. If we were to form a character of him by this story here, we should not say, Judah, thou art he whom the brethren shall praise, ch. 49. 8. But God will show that his choice is of grace, and not of merit, and that Christ came into the world to save sinners, even the chief, and is not ashamed, upon their repentance, to be allied to them. Also, that the worth and worthiness of Jesus Christ are personal, of himself, and not derived from his ancestors; humbling himself to be made in the likeness of man, and in the likeness of his brethren, and despised from some that were infamous. How little reason had the Jews, who were so called from this Judah, to boast as they did, that they were not born of fornication! John 8. 41. We have little to do in the affair of this obscure and uneventful tribe, and a curious family, and a disputed and unsolvent issue, and the untimely death of his two eldest sons, v. 1. 11. II. Judah's incest with his daughter-in-law Tamar, without his knowing it, v. 12 - 23. III. His confusion, when it was discovered, v. 24 - 26. IV. The birth of his twin sons, in whom his family was built up, v. 27 - 30.

1. AND it came to pass at that time, that Judah went down from his brethren, and turned in to a certain Adullamite, whose name was Hirah. 2. And Judah saw there a daughter of a certain Canaanite, whose name was Shuaah; and he took her, and went in unto her. 3. And she conceived, and bare a son; and he called his name Er. 4. And she conceived again, and bare a son; and she called his name Onan. 5. And she yet again conceived, and bare a son; and called his name Sheelah: and he was at Chezib, when she bare him. 6. And Judah took a wife for Er his first-born, whose name was Tamar. 7. And Er, Judah’s first-born, was wicked in the sight of the Lord; and the Lord slew him. 3. And Judah said unto Onan, Go in unto thy brother’s wife, and marry her; and raise up seed to thy brother. 9. And Onan knew that the seed should not be his; and it came to pass, when he went in unto his brother’s wife, that he spilled it on the ground, lest that he should give seed to his brother. 10. And the thing which he did displeased the Lord: wherefore he slew him also. 11. Then said Judah to Tamar his daughter-in-law, remain a widow at thy father’s house, till Shelah my son be grown: for he said, Lest peradventure he die also, and Tamar went and dwelt in her father’s house.

I. Judah’s foolish friendship with a Canaanite-man; he went down from his brethren, and withdrew for a time from their society, and his father’s family, and got to be intimately acquainted with one Hirah, an Adullamite, v. 1. It is computed that he was not much above fifteen or sixteen years of age, an easy prey to the tempter. Note, When young people that have been well educated, begin to change their company, they will soon change their manners, and lose their good education, unless they go down from their brethren, that despise and forsake the society of the seed of Israel, and pick up Canaanites for their companions, are going down the hill apace. It is of great consequence to young people to choose proper associates; for these they will imitate, study to recommend themselves to, and by their opinion of them, value themselves: an error in this choice’s often fatal.

II. His foolish marriage with a Canaanite-woman; a match made, not by his father, who, it should seem was not consulted, but by his new friend Hirah, v. 2. Many have been drawn into marriages, scandals and pernicious to themselves and their families, by keeping bad company, and growing familiar with bad people: one wicked league entangles men in another. Let young people be admonished by this, to take their good advice from their best friends, and be advised by them, and not by flatterers, who wheedle them to make a prey of them.

III. His children by this Canaanite, and his disposal of them. Three sons he had by her, Er, Onan, and Shelah. It is probable that she embraced the worship of the God of Israel, at least in profession, but, for aught that appears, there was little of the fear of God in the family. Judah marrying too young, and very rashly; he also married his sons too young, when they had neither wit nor grace to govern themselves, and the consequences were very bad.

1. His first-born, Er, was notoriously wicked, he was so in the sight of the Lord, that is, in defiance of God and his law; or, if perhaps he was not wicked in the sight of the world, he was so in the sight of God, and the Lord’s displeasure came upon him. But what came of it? Why God cut him off presently, (v. 7.) The Lord slew him. Note, Sometimes God makes quick work with sinners, and takes them away in his wrath, when they are but just setting out in a wicked course of life.

2. The next son, Onan, was according to the ancient usage, married to the widow, to preserve the name of his deceased brother that died childless. Though God had taken away his life for his wickedness, yet they were solicitous to preserve his memory; and their disappointment therein, through Onan’s sin, was a further punishment of his wickedness. The custom of marrying the brother’s widow was afterward made one of the laws of Moses, Deut. 25. 5. Onan, though he consented to marry the widow, yet, to the great abuse of his own family, of the Lord, and of the memory of his brother that was gone, he did not go so far as to raise up seed unto his brother, as he was in duty bound. This was so much the worse, because the Messiah was to descend from Judah, and had he not been guilty of this wickedness, he might have had the honour of being one of his ancestors. Note, Those sins that dishonour the body and defile it, are very displeasing to God, and evidence of vile affections.

3. Shelah, the third son, was reserved for the widow, (v. 11.) yet with a design that he should not marry so young as his brothers had done, lest he die also. Some think that Judah never intended to marry Shelah to Tamar, but unjustly suspected her to have been the death of her two former husbands, (whereas it was their own wickedness that slew them,) and then sent her to her father’s house, with a charge to remain a widow. If so, it was an inexplicable piece of prevarication that he was guilty of; however, Tamar acquiesced for the present, and waited the issue.

12. And in process of time the daughter of Shuah Judah’s wife died; and Judah was comforted, and went up into his sheep-shearers to Timnath, he and his friend Hirah the Adullamite. 13. And it was told Tamar, saying, Behold, thy father-in-law goeth up to Timnath to shear his sheep. 14. And she put her widow’s garments off from her, and covered her with a vail, and wrapped herself, and sat in an open place, which is by the way to Timnath; for she saw that Shelah was grown, and she was not given unto him to wife. 15. When Judah saw her, he thought her to be an harlot, because she had covered her face. 16. And he turned unto her by the way, and said, Go to, I pray thee, let me come into unto thee; (for he knew not that she was his daughter-in-law,) and she said, What wilt thou give me, that thou mayest come in unto me? 17. And he said, I will send thee a kid from the flock. And she said, Wilt thou give me a pledge, till thou send it? 18. And he said, What pledge shall I give thee? And she said, Thy signet, and thy bracelets, and thy staff that is in thine hand. And he gave it her, and came in unto her, and she conceived by him. 19. And she arose, and went away, and laid by her vail from her, and put on the garments of her widowhood. 20. And Judah sent the kid by the hand of his friend the Adullamite, to receive his pledge from the woman’s hand, but he found her not. 21. Then he asked the men of that place, saying, Where is the harlot, that was openly by the way-side? And they said, There was no harlot in this place. 22. And he returned to Judah, and said, I cannot find her; and also the men of the place said, that there was no harlot in this place. 23. And Judah said, Let her take it to her, lest we be shamed : behold, I sent this kid, and thou hast not found her.

It is a very ill-favoured story that is here told concerning Judah; one would not have suspected such folly in Israel. Judah had buried his wife; and widowers have need to stand upon their guard with the utmost caution and resolution against all fleshly lusts. He was unjust to his daughter-in-law, either through negligence or design, in not giving her his son's portion, and this exposed her to temptation.

I. Tamar wickedly prostituted herself as a harlot to Judah, that if the sea might not, the father might, raise up seed to the deceased. Some excuse this, by suggesting that though she was a Canaanite, yet she had embraced the true religion, and believed the promise made to Abraham and his seed, particularly that of the Messiah, who was to descend from the loins of Judah, and that she was therefore thus earnestly the hire of a harlot (than which none more criminal) that she might have the honour, or, at least, stand fair for the honour, of being the mother of the Messiah. And if this was indeed her desire, it had its success; she is one of the four women particularly named in the genealogy of Christ, Matt. 1. 3. Her sinful practice was pardoned, and her good intention was accepted; which magnifies the grace of God, but will by no means be admitted to justify or encourage the like. Bishop Patrick thinks it probable that she hoped Shelah, who was by right her husband, might have come along with his father, and that he might have been allured to her embraces.

There was a great deal of plot and contrivance in Tamar's sin. 1. She took an opportunity for it, when Judah had a time of mirth and feasting with his sheep-shearers. Note, Times of jollity often prove times of temptation, particularly to the sin of uncleanness; when men are fed to the full, the reins are apt to be let loose. 2. She exposed herself as a harlot in an open place, v. 14. Those that are, and would be chaste, must be keepers at home, Tit. 2. 5. It should seem, it was the custom of harlots, in those times, to cover their faces, that though they were not ashamed, yet they might seem to be so. The sin of uncleanness did not then go so bare-faced as it doth now.

II. Judah was taken in the snare, and though it was ignorantly that he was guilty of incest with his daughter-in-law, (not knowing who she was,) yet he was wilfully guilty of fornication; whoever she was, he knew she was not his wife, and therefore not to be touched: nor was his sin capable, in the least, of such a charitable excuse as some make for Tamar, that though the action was bad, the intention partly good. Observe, 1. Observe his sin began in the eye; (v. 15.) he saw her. Note, Those have eyes and hearts full of adultery, (as it is 2 Pet. 2. 14.) that catch at every bate that presents itself to them, and are as tender to every spark. We have need to make a covenant with our eyes, and to turn them from beholding vanity, lest the eye infect the heart. 2. It is added to the scandal, that the harlot, though (more infamous) was demanded, offered, and accepted; a kid from the flock, a goodly price at which her chastity and honour were valued! Nay, had the consideration been thousands of rams, and ten thousand rivers of oil, it had not been a valuable consideration. The favour of God, the purity of the soul, the peace of conscience, and the hope of heaven, are too precious to be exposed to sale at any such rates.

Note. The people of Ethiopia cannot equal them what are those prized, that lose their souls to gain the world? 3. It turned to the reproach of Judah, that he left his jewels in pawn for a kid. Note, Fleshly lusts are not only brutish, but seditious, and ruining to men's secular interests. It is plain, that whoredom, as well as wine, and new wine, takes away the heart first, else it would never take away the signet and the bracelets.

III. He lost his jewels by the bargain; he sent the kid, according to his promise, to redeem his pawn, but the supposed harlot could not be found. He sent it by his friend, (who was indeed his back friend, because he was aiding and abetting in his evil deeds,) the Adulamite, who came back without the pledge. It is a good account (if it be but true) of any place, which they here gave, that there is no harlot in this place; for such sinners are the scandals and plagues of any place. Judah sits down, content to lose his signet and his bracelets, and forbids his friend to make any further inquiry after them, giving this reason, lest we be ashamed, v. 23. Either, 1. Let his sin should come to be known publicly, and be talked of. Fornication and all uncleanness have ever been looked upon as scandalous things, and the research and shame of the sinners are convicted of them. Nothing will make those blush, that are not ashamed of these. Or, 2. Lest he should be laughed at as a fool, for trusting a strumpet with his signet and his bracelets. He expresses no concern about the sin, to get that pardoned, only about the shame, to prevent that. Note, There are many who are more solicitous to preserve their reputation with men, than to secure the favour of God and a good conscience; lest we be ashamed, goes further with them, than lest we be damned.

24. And it came to pass about three months after, that it was told Judah, saying, Tamar thy daughter-in-law hath played the harlot; and also, behold, she is with child by whoredom: and Judah said, Bring her forth, and let her be burnt. 25. When she was brought forth, she sent to her father-in-law, saying, By the man, whose these are, am I with child: and she said, Discern, I pray thee, whose are these, the signet, and bracelets, and staff. 26. And Judah acknowledged them, and said, She hath been more righteous than I; because that I gave her not to Shelah my son. And he knew her again no more. 27. And it came to pass in the time of her travail, that, behold, twins were in her womb. 28. And it came to pass, when she travailed, that the one put out his hand: and the midwife took and bound upon his hand a scarlet thread, saying, This came out first. 29. And it came to pass, as he drew back his hand, that, behold, his brother came out: and she said, How hast thou broken forth? This breach be upon thee: therefore his name was called Pharez. 30. And afterward came out his brother, that had the scarlet thread upon his hand: and his name was called Zarah.

Here is, 1. Judah's rigour against Tamar, when he heard she was an adulteress; she was, in the eye of the law, Shelah's wife, and therefore, had being with child by another, was look¬ed upon as an injury and reproach to Judah's family; Bring her forth there¬fore, says Judah, thou art my eldest son of the family, and let me bury her, but, burst to death, but burn in the cheek or forehead, stigm¬ized for a harlot. This seems probable, v. 24. Note, It is a common thing for men to be severe against those very sins in others, which yet they allow themselves in; and so in judging others, they condemn themselves, Rom. 2. 1—14. 22. If he designed that she should be burnt to death, perhaps under pretence of zeal against the sin, yet he leaves his daughter-in-law, being loath to marry Shelah to her. Note, It is a common thing, but a very bad thing, to cover malice against men's persons with a show of zeal against their vices.

II. Judah's shame, when it was made to appear that he was the adulterer; she produced the ring and the bracelets in court, which justified the father¬ing of the child upon Judah, v. 25, 26. Note, The wickedness that has been most secretly committed, and most indifferently concealed, yet sometimes is strangely brought to light, to the shame and confusion of those who have said, No eyes sees. A bird of the air may carry the voice; however, there is a discovering day coming, when all will be laid open. Some of the Jewish writers observe, that as Judah had said to his father, See, is this thy son's coat? (ch. 37. 32.) so it was now said to him, See, are these thy father's bracelets? Judah became convicted by his own conscience. 1. Confesses his sin, She has been more righteous than I. He owns that a perpetual mark of infamy should be fastened rather upon him, who had been so much accessory to it. Note, Those offenders ought to be treated with the greatest tenderness to whom we have any way given occasion of offending. If servants pardon, and their masters, by withholding from them what is due, tempt them to it, theyought to forgive them. 2. He never returned to it again; he knew her again no more. Note, Those do not truly repent of their sins, that do not forsake them.

III. The building up of Judah's family hereby, notwithstanding, in the birth of Pharez and Zara¬rah, from whom descended the most considerable fami¬lies of the illustrious tribe of Judah. It should seem, the birth was hard to the mother, by way of contri¬bution; and the father also, like Jacob and Esau, struggled for the birth-right, and Pharez got it, who is ever named first, and from him Christ descended. He had his name from his breaking forth before his brother; This breach be upon thee, which is applicable to those that sow disc¬ord, and create distance between brethren. The Jews, as Zara¬rah, had fair for the birth-right, and were marked with a scarlet thread, as those that came out first; but the Gentiles, like Pharez, as a son of violence, got the start of them, by that vio¬lence which the kingdom of heaven suffers, and attained to the righteousness which the Jews came short of. Yet, when the fulness of time is come, all Israel shall be saved. Both these sons are named, in the genealogy of our Saviour, (Matt. 1. 3.) to per¬petuate the story, as an instance of the humiliation of all these. Some observe, that the four eldest sons of Jacob fell under very foul guilt. Reu¬ben and Judah under the guilt of incest, Simeon and Levi under the guilt of murder; yet they were patri¬archs; of Levi came the priests, of Judah the kings and Messiah; thus they became examples of repentance, and monuments of pardoning mercy.

CHAP. XXXIX.

At this chapter, we return to the story of Joseph. We have him here, 1. A servant, a slave in Potiphar's house, (v. 1.) yet there greatly honoured and favoured, 1. By the providence of God, which made him, in effect, a master, v. 2. 6. 2. By the grace of God, which made him more than a conqueror over a strong temptation to uncleanness, v. 7. 12. II. We have him here a sufferer, falsely accused, (v. 13. 18.) imprisoned; (v. 19, 30.) and yet his imprisonment made him both honourable and comfort¬able, by the tokens of God's special presence with him, v. 21—23. And herein Joseph was a type of Christ, who took upon him the form of a servant, and yet then did that which made it evident that God was with him, who was not only above suspicion, but was the object of the tempt¬ation, who was falsely accused and bound, and yet had all things committed to his hand.

1. AND Joseph was brought down to Egypt; and Potiphar, captain of the guard, an Egyptian, bought him of the hands of the Ishmeelites, which had brought him down thither. 2. And the Lord was with Joseph, and he was a prosperous man; and he was in the house of his master the Egyptian. 3. And his master saw that the Lord was with him, and that the Lord made all that he did to prosper in his hand. 4. And Joseph found grace in his sight, and he served him: and he made him overseer over his house, and all that he had he put into his hand. 5. And it came to pass from the time that he had made him overseer in his house, and over all that he had, that the Lord blessed the Egyptian's house for Joseph's sake; and the blessing of the Lord was upon all that he had in the house, and in the field. 6. And he left all that he had in Joseph's hand; and he knew not ought he had, save the bread which he did eat. And Joseph was a goodly person, and well favoured.

I. Joseph bought; (v. 1.) he that bought him, whatever he gave for him, had a good bargain of him; it was better than the merchandise of silver. The Jews have a saying, "he that knows the worth of good men, they would hodge them about with pearls." He was sold to an officer of Pharaoh, with whom he might get acquainted with public persons and public business, and so be fitted for the preferment he was designed for afterward. Note, 1. What God intends men for, he will be sure some way or other, to qualify them for. 2. Providence is to be acknowledged in the disposal even of poor servants, and in their settle¬ments, and therein may perhaps be working toward something great and considerable.

II. Joseph blessed, wonderfully blessed, even in the house of his servitude. 1. God prospered him, v. 2, 3. Perhaps the affairs of Potiphar's family had remarkably gone backward before; but, upon Joseph's coming into it, a discernible turn was given to them, and the face and posture of them altered on a sudden. Though, at first, we may suppose that his hand was put to the meanest services, even in those appeared his ingenuity and industry, and a par¬ticular blessing of Heaven attending him; and as he rose in his employment, it became more and more discernible. Note, (1.) Those that have wisdom and grace, have that which cannot be taken away from them, whatever else they are robbed of. Joseph's brethren had stripped him of his coat of many colours, but they could not strip him of his virtue and prudence. (2.) Those that can separate us from all our friends, yet cannot deprive us of the gracious presence of our God. When Joseph had none of all his relations with him, he had his God with him, even in the house of the Egyptian. Joseph was separated from his brethren, but not from his God; banished from his father's house, but the Lord was with him, and that comforted him. It is God's presence with us that makes all we do prosperous. Those that would prosper, must therefore make God their friend; and those that do prosper must therefore give God the praise. 2. His master preferred him; by degrees made him steward of his household, v. 4. Note, (1.) Industry and honesty are the surest and safest guide to rising, and to all good things: See thou a man prudent, and faithful, and diligent in his business? He shall stand before kings at length, and not always before mean men. (2.) It is the wisdom of those that are in any sort of authority, to countenance and employ those with whom it appears that the presence of God is, Ps. 101. 6. Potipher knew what he did, when he put all into the hand of Joseph; for he knew it would prosper better there than in his own hand. (3.) He that is faithful in a few things, stands fair for being made ruler over many things, Matt. 25. 21. Christ goes by this rule with his servants. It is a great ease to a master to have those employed under him, that are trusty; Potipher was so well satisfied with Joseph's conduct, that he knew not ought he had, save the breach which he did eat, v. 6. The servant had all the care and trouble of the estate, and Joseph had only the reward of it; he had the enjoyment of all places where they live; even good servants may be so, though mean and lightly esteemed. The prosperity of the wicked is, one way or other, for the sake of the godly. Here was a wicked family blessed for the sake of one good servant in it.

7. And it came to pass after these things, that his master's wife cast her eyes upon Joseph; and she said, Lie with me. 8. But he refused, and said unto his master's wife, Behold, my master woteth not what is with me in the house, and he hath committed all that he hath to my hand; 9. There is none greater in this house than I; neither hath he kept back any thing from me, but thee, because thou art his wife: how then can I do this great wickedness, and sin against God? 10. And it came to pass, as she spake to Joseph day by day, that he hearkened not unto her, to lie by her, or to be with her. 11. And it came to pass about this time, that Joseph went into the house to do his business; and there was none of the men of the house there within. 12. And she caught him by his garment, saying, Lie with me: and he left his garment in her hand, and fled, and got him out.

1. A most shameless instance of impudence and immodesty in Joseph's mistress, the shame and scandal of her sex, perfectly lost to all virtue and honour, and not to be mentioned or thought of, without the utmost indignation. It was well that she was an Egyptian; for we must be borne with, if such folly had been found in Israel. Observe, 1. Her sin began in the eye; she cast her eyes upon Joseph, (v. 7,) who was a goodly person, and well-favoured, v. 6. Note, (1.) Remarkable beauty, either of men or women, often proves a dangerous snare both to themselves and others; which forbids pride in it, and commands constant watchfulness against temptation that attends it; favour is decedent, that is deceiving. 2. We have great need to make a covenant with our eyes, (Job 23. 8;) to keep our eyes from the desires of them that are separated from us, and to take care that we have not been to her for a covering of the eyes from all others, ch. 20. 16. 2. She was daring and shameless in the sin; with an impudent face, and a bold heart, she said, Lie with me; having already, by her wanton looks and unchaste desires, committed adultery with him in her heart. Note, Where the unclean spirit gets possession and dominion in a soul, it is as with the possessed of the devils, (Luke 8. 27, 29,) the clothes of modesty are thrown off, and the bands and fetters of shame are broken in pieces. When lust has got head, it will stick at nothing, blush at nothing; decency, and reputation, and conscience, are all sacrificed to that Baal-pear. 3. She was urgent and violent in the temptation; often she had been denied with the strongest reasons, and yet she was as eager and importunate, as if she were the eminently saved, and all others perished, to be spake to him day by day, v. 10. Now this was a great wickedness in her, and showed her heart fully set to do evil. A great temptation to Joseph. The hand of Satan, no doubt, was in it, who, when he found he could not overcome him with troubles and the frowns of the world, (for in them he still held fast his integrity,) assaulted him with soft and charming pleasures, which have ruined more than the former, and have slain their ten thousands.

II. Here is a most illustrious instance of virtue and resolved chastity in Joseph, who, by the grace of God, was enabled to resist and overcome this temptation; and all things considered, his escape was, for ought I know, as great an instance of the divine power, as the deliverance of the three children out of the furnace, ch. 39. 9, 10. Of his fidelity,

1. The temptation he was assaulted with, was very strong; never was a more violent onset made upon the fort of chastity than this recorded here. The sin which he was tempted to was uncleanness, which, considering his youth, his beauty, his single state, and his plentiful living at the table of a ruler, was a sin which, one would think, might most easily beset him, and betray him. The tempter was his mistress, a person of quality, whom it was his place to obey, and his interest to oblige, whose favour would contribute more than any thing to his preferment, and by whose means he might arrive at the highest honours of the court. On the other hand, it was at his utmost peril, if he slighted her, and made her his enemy. Opportunity makes a thief, makes an adulterer; and that favoured the temptation. Joseph, on his part, was in no condition of rising with him; his business led him to be, without any suspicion, where she was: none of the family were with, (v. 11,) there appeared no danger of its being ever discovered, or, if it should be suspected, his mistress would protect him. To this all this was added importunity, frequent constant importunity, to such a degree, that, at last she laid violent hands on him.

2. His resistance of the temptation was very brave, and the victory truly honourable. The almighty grace of God enabled him to overcome this assault of the enemy.
(1.) By strength of reason; and wherever right reason may be heard, religion, no doubt, will carry the day. He argues from the respect he owed both to God and his master, v. 8, 9. [1.] He would not wrong his master, nor do such an irreparable injury to his honour. He considers, and urges it, how kind his master had been to him, what a confidence he had reposed in him, in how many instances he had befriended him, for which he abhorred the thought of making such an ungrateful return. Note, We are bound in honour, as well as justice and gratitude, not in any thing to injure those that have a good opinion of us, and place a trust in us, how secretly soever it may be done. See how he argues, (v. 9.) "There is no greater in this house than I, therefore I will not do it." Note, Those that are great, instead of being proud of their greatness, should use it as an argument against sin; "Is there none greater than I? Then I will scorn to do a wicked thing; it is below me to serve a base lust; I will not disfigure myself so much." [2.] He would not offend his God. This is the chief argument with which he strengthens his aversion to the sin. How can I do this? not only, How shall I? or How dare I? but How can I? &c. Joseph's words show a great sense of sin, an apprehension of the sinfulness of sin, a just idea of the great wickedness there is in it; let sin appear sin, (Rom. 7. 13.) call it by its own name, and never go about to lessen it. Particularly, let the sin of uncleanness always be looked upon as great wickedness, as an excelling sin, that bears against the soul as much as against the body. Thirdly, Against whom? not only himself, but against his master, against his mistress, against God, and against his God. Note, Gracious souls look upon this as the worst thing in sin, that it is against God, against his nature and his dominion, against his love and his design. They that love God, by this reason hate sin.

(2.) By steadfastness of resolution. The grace of God enabled him to overcome the temptation, by avoiding the tempter. [1.] He hearten ted not to her, so much as to be with her, v. 10. Note, Those that would be kept from harm, must keep themselves out of harm's way: Avoid it, pass not by it. Nay, [2.] When she laid hold on him, he left his garment in her hand, v. 12. He would not stay so much as to parley with the temptation, but flew out from it with the utmost abhorrence; he left his garment, as one escaping for his life. Note, It is better to lose a good coat than a good conscience.

13. And it came to pass, when she saw that he had left his garment in her hand, and was fled forth. 14. That she called unto the men of her house, and spake unto them, saying, See, he hath brought in an Hebrew unto us to mock us: he came in unto me to lie with me, and I cried with a loud voice: 15. And it came to pass, when he heard that I lifted up my voice and cried, that he left his garment with me, and fled, and got him out. 16. And she laid up his garment by her, until his lord came home. 17. And she spake unto him according to these words, saying, The Hebrew servant, which thou hast brought unto us, came in unto me to mock me: 18. And it came to pass, as I lifted up my voice and cried, that he left his garment with me, and fled out.

Joseph's mistress, having tried in vain to make him a criminal, now endeavours to represent him as one; so to be avenged on him for his virtue. Now was her love turned into the utmost rage and malice, and she pretends she cannot endure the sight of him, whom a while ago she could not endure out of her sight. Chaste and holy love will continue, though slighted; but sinful love, like Aaron's to Tamar, is easily changed into sinful hatred.

1. She accused him to his fellow servants, (v. 12., 15.) and gave him a bad name among them. Probably, they envied him his interest in their master's favour, and his authority in the house; and perhaps found themselves aggrieved, sometimes by his fidelity, which prevented their purloining; and therefore they were glad to hear any thing that might tend to his disgrace, and, if there was room for it, increased their mistress yet more against him. Observe, When she speaks of her husband, she does not call him her husband, or her lord, but only he; for she had forgotten the covenant of her God, that was between them. Thus the adulteress (Prov. 7. 19.) calls her husband the good man. Note, Innocence itself cannot secure a man's reputation. Not every one that keeps a good conscience, can keep a good name.

2. She accused him to his master, who had power in his hand to punish him, which his fellow servants had not, v. 17, 18. Observe, 1. What an improbable story she tells; producing his garments as an evidence that he had offered violence to her, which was a plain indication that she had offered violence to him. Note, Those that have broken the bonds of modesty, will never be held by the bonds of truth. No marvel that she who had impudence enough to say, Lie with me, had front enough to say, "He would have lain with me." Had the lie been told to conceal her own crime, it had been bad enough, yet in some degree, excusable; but it was told, to be avenged upon his virtue; a most malicious lie. And yet, 2. She manages it so as to incense her husband against him; reflecting upon him for bringing this Hebrew servant among them, perhaps, at first against her mind, because he was a Hebrew. Note, It is no new thing for the husband of a woman to be falsely accused of the worst of crimes by those who themselves are the worst of criminals. As this matter here was represented, one would have thought chaste Joseph a very bad man, and his wanton mistress a virtuous woman; it is well that there is a day of discovery coming, in which all shall appear in their true characters. This was not the first time that Joseph's coat was used for the purpose of a false witness concerning him; his father had been deceived by it before, now his master.

19. And it came to pass, when his master heard the words of his wife, which she spake unto him, saying, after this manner did thy servant to me; that his wrath was kindled. 20. And Joseph's master took him, and put him into the prison, a place where the king's prisoners were bound: and he was there in the prison. 21. But the LORD was with Joseph, and showed him mercy, and gave him favour in the sight of the keeper of the prison. 22. And the keeper of the prison committed to Joseph's hand all the prisoners that were in the prison; and whatsoever they did there, he was the doer of it. 23. The keeper of the prison looked not to anything that was under his hand; because the LORD was with him, and that which he did, the LORD made it to prosper.

Here is,

1. Joseph wronged by his master. He believed the accusation, and either Joseph harbored or made his defence built on the truth; it would not be too much upon his mistress, or, his master would not hear it, or would not believe it, and there is no remedy, he is condemned to perpetual imprisonment, v. 19, 20. God restrained his wrath, else he had put him to death; and that wrath which imprisoned him, God made to turn to his praise; in order to which, Providence so disposed, that he should be shut up among the king's prisoners, the state-prisoners. Potiphar, it is likely, chose that prison, because it was the worst; for there the irons entered into the soul, (Ps. 105. 18.) but God designed to pave the way to his enlargement. He was committed to the king's prison, that from thence he might be preferred to the king's person. Note, Many an action of false imprisonment will, in the great day, be found to lie against the enemies and persecutors of God's people. Our Lord Jesus, like Joseph here, was bound, and numbered with the transgressors.

2. Joseph owned and righted by his God, who is, and will be, the just and powerful Patron of oppressed innocence. Joseph was at a distance from all his friends and relations, had not them with him to comfort him, or to minister to him, or to mediate for him; but the Lord was with Joseph, and showed him mercy, v. 21. Note, (1.) God designs the ruin of his enemies. He does not his prisoners, Ps. 69. 33. No gates or bars can shut out his gracious presence from his people; for he has promised that he will never leave them. (2.) Those that have a good conscience in a prison, have a good God there. Integrity and uprightness qualify us for the divine favour, wherever we are. Joseph is not long a prisoner, before he becomes a little ruler even in the prison; which is to be attributed, under God, [1.] To the keeper's favour. God gave him favour in the sight of the keeper of the prison. Note, God can raise up friends for his people, even there where they little expect to find them, and can make them to be fitted even of those that carry them captive, Ps. 106. 46. [2.] To Joseph's fitness for business. The keeper saw that God was with him, and that every thing prospered under his hand; and therefore intrusted him with the management of the affairs of the prison, v. 22, 23. Note, Wisdom and virtue will shine in the narrowest spheres. A good man will do good wherever he is, and will be a blessing even in bonds and banishments; for the Spirit of the Lord is not bound or banished, witness St. Paul, Phil. i. 12. 13.

CHAP. XL.

In this chapter, things are working, though slowly, toward Joseph's advancement. 1. Two of Pharaoh's servants are committed to prison, and there to Joseph's care, and so become witnesses of his extraordinary conduct, v. 1-4. II. They dreamed each of them a dream, which Joseph interpreted, (v. 5-13.) and the event verified the interpretation, (v. 20-25.) and so they became witnesses of his extraordinary skill. III. Joseph recommends his case to one of them, whose preference he foresaw, (v. 14, 15.) but in vain, v. 23.

1. AND it came to pass after these things, that the butler of the king of Egypt and his baker offended their lord the king of Egypt. 2. And Pharaoh was wroth against two of his officers, against the chief of the butlers, and against the chief of the bakers. 3. And he put them in ward in the house of the captain of the guard, into the prison, the place where Joseph was bound. 4. And the captain of the guard charged Joseph with them, and he served them; and they continued a season in ward.

We should not have had this story of Pharaoh's butler and baker recorded in Scripture, if it had not been serviceable to Joseph's preferment. The world stands for the sake of the church, and is governed for its good. Observe, 1. Two of the great officers of Pharaoh's court having offended the king, are committed to prison. Note, High places are slippery places; nothing more uncertain than the favour of princes. Joseph, by which God's favour their happiness, and his service their business, will find him a better master than Pharaoh was, and not so extreme to mark what they do amiss. Many conjectures there are concerning the offence of these servants of Pharaoh; some make it no less than an attempt to take away his life, and others no more than the casual lighting of a fire into his cup, and a little sand into his bread. Whatever it was, Providence by this means brought them into the prison where Joseph was. 2. The captain of the guard himself, who was Potiphar, charged Joseph with them, (v. 4.) which intimates that he began now to be reconciled to him, and perhaps to be convinced of his innocence, though he durst not release him, for fear of disobliging his prince. John Baptist must lose his head, to please Herodias.

5. And they dreamed a dream both of them, each man his dream in one night, each man according to the interpretation of his dream, the butler and the baker of the king of Egypt, which were bound in the prison. 6. And Joseph came in unto them in the morning, and looked upon them, and beheld, they were sad. 7. And he asked Pharaoh's officers that were with him in the ward of his lord's house, saying, Wherefore look ye so sadly to-day? 8. And they said unto him, We have dreamed a dream, and there is no interpreter of it. And Joseph said unto them, Do not interpretations belong to God? Tell me them, I pray you. 9. And the chief butler told his dream to Joseph, and said to him, in my dream, behold, a vine was before me; 10. And in the vine were three branches; and it was as though it budded, and her blossoms shot forth; and the clusters thereof brought forth ripe grapes: 11. And Pharaoh's cup was in my hand: and I took the grapes, and pressed them into Pharaoh's cup, and I gave the cup into Pharaoh's hand. 12. And Joseph said unto him, This is the interpretation of it: The three branches are three days: 13. Yet within three days shall Pharaoh lift up thine head, and restore thee unto thy place: and thou shalt deliver Pharaoh's cup into his hand, after the former manner when thou wast his butler. 14. But think on me when it shall be well with thee, and show kindness, I pray thee, unto me, and make mention of me unto Pharaoh, and bring me out of this house: 15. For indeed I was stolen away out of the land of the Hebrews: and here also have I done nothing, that they should put me into the dungeon. 16. When the chief baker saw that the interpretation was good, he said unto Joseph, I also was in my dream, and, behold, I had three white baskets on my head: 17. And in the uppermost basket there was of all manner of bake-meats for Pharaoh; and the birds did eat them out of the basket upon my head. 18. And Joseph answered, and said, This is the interpretation thereof: The three baskets are three days: 19. Yet within three days shall Pharaoh lift up thy head from off thee, and shall hang thee on a tree; and the birds shall eat thy flesh from off thee.

Observe,
I. The special providence of God, which filled the heads of these two prisoners with unusual dreams, such as made extraordinary impressions upon them, and carried with them evidences of a divine original, both in one night. Note, God has immediate access to the spirits of men, which he can make serviceable to his own purposes whenever he pleases, quite beyond the intention of those concerned. To him all hearts are open, and ancietly he spake not only to his own people, but to others, in dreams, Job 33. 15. Things to come were thus foretold, but very obscurely.

Observe,
II. The impression which was made upon these prisoners by their dreams; (v. 8.) they were sad. It was not the prison that made them sad, (they were very well used to that, and perhaps lived joyfully there,) but the dream. Note, God has more ways than one to sadden the spirits of those that are to be made sad. Those sinners that are hardy enough under outward troubles, and will not yield to them, yet God can find out a way to punish; he can take off their wheels, by wounding their spirits, and laying heads upon them. Observe,
Joseph's great tenderness and compassion toward them. He inquired with concern, Wherefore look ye sadly to day? v. 7. Joseph was their keeper, and in that office he was mild. Note, It becomes us to take cognizance of the sorrows even of those that are under our check. Joseph was their companion in tribulation, he was now a prisoner with them, and had been a dreamer too. Note, Communication in sufferings helps to work compassion toward those that do suffer. Let us learn hence, 1. To concern ourselves in the sorrows and troubles of others, and to inquire into the reason of the sadness of our brethren's countenances; we should be often considering the tears of the oppressed, Eccl. 4. 1. It is some relief to those that are in trouble, to be taken notice of. 2. To inquire into the causes of our own sorrow. "Wherefore do I look so sadly? Is there a reason? Is it a good reason? Is there not a reason for comfort sufficient to balance it, whatever it is? Why art thou cast down, O my soul?"

Observe,
IV. The dreams themselves, and the interpretation of them. That which troubled these prisoners, was, that being confined, they could not have recourse to the diviners of Egypt who pretended to interpret dreams; there is no interpreter here in the prison, v. 8. Note, There are interpreters, which those that are in prison and sorrow, should wish to have with them, to instruct them in the meaning and design of Providence; (Elithu alludes to such, from whom he says, If there be an interpreter, one among a thousand, to show unto men his uprightness, Job, 33. 23, 24.) Interpreters to guide their consciences, not to satisfy their curiosity. Joseph, hereupon, directed them which way to look, Do not interpretations belong to God? He means the God whom he worshipped, to the knowledge of whom he endeavoured hereby to lead them. Note, 1. It is God's prerogative to foretell things to come, Isa. 46. 10. 2. He has given them in the word, thus manifesting the gifts of foresight which men have ordinary or extraordinary. Joseph precipitates a caveat against his own praise, and is careful to transmit the glory to God, as Daniel, ch. 2. 20. Joseph suggests, "If interpretations belong to God, he is a free Agent, and may communicate the power to whom he pleases, and therefore tell me your dreams."

Now, (1.) The chief butler's dream was a happy prelude of his enlargement, and re-embassiation, within three days; and so Joseph explained it to him, v. 12, 13. Probably it had been usual with him to press the full ripe grapes immediately into Pharaoh's cup, the simplicity of that age not being acquainted with the modern arts of making the wine fine. Observe, Joseph foretold the chief butler's deliverance, but he did not foresee his own. He had long before dreamt of his own honour, and indeed it was the chief of his brethren should do to him, with the remembrance of which he must now support himself, without any new or fresh discoveries. The visions that are for the comfort of God's saints, are for a great while to come, and relate to things that are very far off, while the foresights of others, like this recorded here, look but three days before them.

(2.) The chief baker's dream portended his ignominious death, v. 18, 19. The happy interpretation of the other's dream encouraged him to relate his. Thus hypocrites, when they hear good things promised to good christians, would put in for a share, though they have no part or lot in the matter. It was not Joseph's fault that he brought him no better tidings: ministers are but interpreters, they cannot make the thing otherwise than it is; if therefore they deal faithfully, and their message prove unplesing, it is not their fault. Bad dreams cannot expect a good interpretation.

Observe,
V. The improvement Joseph made of this opportunity, to get a friend at court, v. 14, 15. He modestly bespake the favour of the chief butler, whose preference he foretold; But think on me, when it shall be well with thee. Though the respect paid to Joseph, made the prison as easy to him as a prison could be, yet none can blame him for being desirous of liberty. See here, 1. What a modest representation he makes of his own case, v. 15. He does not reflect upon his brethren that sold him, he only says, I was stolen out of the land of the Hebrews, that is, unjustly sent away thence, no matter where the fault was. Nor does he reflect on the wrong done him in this imprisonment by his mistress who was his proconsul, and his master that was his judge, but mildly and his own innocence: Here have I done nothing, that they should put me into the dungeon. Note, When we are called to vindicate ourselves, we should carefully avoid, as much as may be, speaking ill of others. Let us be content to prove ourselves innocent, and not be fond of upbraiding others with their guilt.

2. What a modest request he makes to the chief butcher: No, think on me. Pray, do me a kindness, it is in your way. And his particular petition is, Bring me out of this house. He does not say, "Bring me into Pharaoh's house, get me a place at court." No, he begs for enlargement, not preferment. Note, Providence sometimes designs the greatest honours for those that least covet or expect them.

20. And it came to pass the third day, which was Pharaoh's birthday, that he made a feast unto all his servants; and he lifted up the head of the chief butler and of the chief baker among his servants. 21. And he restored the chief butler unto his butlership again; and he gave the cup into Pharaoh's hand: 22. But he hanged the chief baker; as Joseph had interpreted to them. 23. Yet did not the chief butler remember Joseph, but forgot him.

1. The verifying of Joseph's interpretation of the dreams, on the very day prefixed. The chief butler and baker were both advanced, one to his office, the other to the gallows, and both at the three days' end. Note, Very great changes, both for the better, and for the worse, often happen in a very little time; so sudden are the revolutions of the wheel of nature. The occasion of giving judgment severally upon their case, was, the solemnizing of Pharaoh's birth day, on which, all his servants being obliged by custom to attend him, these two came to be inquired after, and the cause of their commitment being brought to his knowledge. The interpretation of the dreams, which was now the work of Princes has been an ancient piece of respect done them; and if it be not abused, as Jerobam's was, (Hos. 7. 5.) and Herod's, (Mark 6. 21.) is a usage innocent enough: and we may all profitably take notice of our birth-days, with thankfulness for the mercies of our birth, sorrow for the sinfulness of it, and an expectation of the day of our death as better than the day of our birth. On Pharaoh's birth-day, he lifted up the head of those two prisoners, that is, arraigned and tried them, (when Nabath was tried) he was set on high among the people, 1 Kings 21. 9. and he restored the chief butler, and hanged the chief baker. If the butler was innocent, and the baker guilty, we must own the equity of Providence in clearing up the innocence of the innocent, and marking the sin of the guilty to find him out. If either the butler or the baker was guilty, it is an instance of the arbitrariness of such great princes as pride themselves in that power which Nebuchadnezzar set up for, (Dan. 5. 19. whom he would, he slew, and whom he would, he kept alive,) forgetting that there is a higher than they, to whom they are accountable.

2. The disappointing of Joseph's expectation from the chief butler; he remembered not Joseph, but forgot him, v. 23. (1.) See here an instance of base ingratitude; Joseph had deserved well at his hands, had ministered unto him, sympathized with him, helped him to a favourable interpretation of his dream, had recommended himself to him as an extraordinary person upon all accounts; and yet he forgot him. We must not think it strange, if in this world we have hatred shown us for our love, and slight for our respects. (2.) See how apt those that are themselves at ease, are to forget others in distress. Perhaps it is in allusion to this story, that the prophet speaks of those that drink wine in bowls, and are not grieved for the affliction of Joseph, Amos 6. 6. Let us learn hence to cease from man. Joseph perhaps depended too much upon his interest in the chief butler, and promised himself too much from him; he learned by his disappointment to trust in God only. We can hardly expect too little from men, nor too much from God.

Some observe the resemblance between Joseph and Christ in this story. Joseph's fellow-sufferers were like the two thieves that were crucified with Christ; the one saved, the other condemned. (It is Dr. Lightfoot's remark, from Mr. Broughton.) One of these, when Joseph said to him, Remember me, when thou comest into thy kingdom, was not forgotten. We justly blame the chief butler's ingratitude to Joseph, yet we blame our conduct ourselves much more ingenuously toward the Lord Jesus. Joseph had but foretold the chief butler's enlargement, but Christ wrought our sins, mediated with the King of kings for us; yet we forget him, though often reminded of him; though we have promised never to forget him: thus ill do we require him, like foolish people and unwise.

CHAP. XLI.

Two things Providence is here bringing about. 1. The advancement of Joseph. 2. The maintenance of Jacob and his family in a time of famine; for the eyes of the Lord run to and fro through the earth, and direct the affairs of the children of men for the benefit of those few whose hearts are upright with him. In order to these, here is, 1. Pharaoh's dreams. v. 1. 2. The recommendation of Joseph to him for an interpreter, v. 9. 13. 3. The interpretation of the dreams, and the prediction of seven years plenty, and seven years famine in Egypt, with the prudent advice given to Pharaoh thereupon, v. 14. 36. 4. The preferment of Joseph to the highest power and trust in Egypt, v. 37. 45. 5. The accomplishment of Joseph's prediction, and his fidelity to his trust, v. 46. 57.

1. And it came to pass at the end of two full years, that Pharaoh dreamed, and beheld, he stood by the river. 2. And, behold, there came up out of the river seven wellfavoured kine, and fat-fleshed; and they fed in a meadow. 3. And, behold, seven other kine came up after them out of the river, ill-favoured and lean-fleshed; and stood by the other kine upon the brink of the river. 4. And the ill-favoured and lean-fleshed kine did eat up the seven well-favoured and fat kine. So Pharaoh awoke. 5. And he slept and dreamed the second time: and, behold, seven ears of corn came up upon one stalk, rank and good. 6. And, behold, seven thin ears and blasted with the east wind sprang up after them. 7. And the seven thin ears devoured the seven rank and full ears. And Pharaoh awoke, and beheld, it was a dream. 8. And it came to pass in the morning, that his spirit was trou bled; and he sent and called for all the mag- nicians of Egypt, and all the wise men thereof: and Pharaoh told them his dream; but there was none that could interpret them unto Pharaoh.

Observe,
1. The delay of Joseph’s enlargement; it was not till the end of two full years, (v. 1.) so long he waited, after he had intrusted the chief butler with his case, and began to have some prospect of relief. Note, We have need of patience, not only bearing, but waiting, patience. Joseph lay in prison until the time that his word came, Ps. 105. 19. There is a time set for the deliverance of God’s people; that time will come, though it seem to tarry; and when it comes, it will appear to have been the best time, and therefore we ought to wait for it, (Hab. 2. 3.) and not think two full years too long to continue wait- ing.

2. The means of Joseph’s enlargement, which were Pharaoh’s dreams, here related. If we were to look upon them as ordinary dreams, we might observe from them the follies and absurdities of a roving, working, fancy; how it represents to itself tame cows as beasts of prey, nay, more ravenous than eating up those of their own kind; and ears of corn devouring one another. Surely in the multitude of dreams, hay, even in one dream, there are divers va- nities, Eccl. 5. 7. Now that God no longer speaks to us in that way, I think it is no matter how little we either heed them or tell them. * Foolish dreams related can make no better than foolish talk. But these dreams which Pharaoh dreamed, carried their own evidence with them, that they were not of God; and therefore when he awoke, his spirit was troubled, v. 8. It cannot but put us into a concern, to consider by what means a false prophet may be raised up, because we are conscious to ourselves that we have no reason to expect any good tidings from thence. His magicians were puzzled, the rules of their art failed them; these dreams of Pharaoh it seems, did not fall within the compass of them, so that they could not offer at the interpretation of them. This was to make Joseph’s performance by the spirit of God the more admirable. Human reason, prudence, and foresight, must be non-plussed, that divine revelation may appear the more glorious in the contrivance of our redemption, 1. Cor. 2. 13, 14. Compare with this story, Dan. 2. 27.—4. 7.—5. 8. Joseph’s own dreams were the occasion of his troubles, and now Pharaoh’s dreams were the occasion of his enlarge- ment.

9. Then spake the chief butler unto Pha- rah, saying, I do remember my faults this day. 10. Pharaoh was wroth with his serv- ants, and put me in ward in the captain of the guard’s house, both me and the chief baker. 11. And we dreamed a dream in one night, I and he; we dreamed each man ac- cording to the interpretation of his dream. 12. And there was there with us a young man, an Hebrew, servant to the captain of the guard; and we told him, and he inter- preted to us our dreams; to each man ac- cording to his dream he did interpret. 13. And it came to pass, as he interpreted to us, so it was; me he restored unto mine office, and him he hanged. 14. Then Pharaoh sent and called Joseph, and they brought him hastily out of the dungeon: and he shaved himself, and changed his raiment, and came in unto Pharaoh. 15. And Pharaoh said unto Joseph, I have dreamed a dream, and there is none that can interpret it: and I have heard say of thee, that thou canst un- derstand a dream to interpret it. 16. And Joseph answered Pharaoh, saying, It is not in me: God shall give Pharaoh an answer of peace.

1. Thus recommending of Joseph to Pharaoh for an interpreter. The chief butler did it more in com- pliment to Pharaoh, to oblige him, than in gratitude to Joseph, or in compassion for his case. He makes a fair confession, (v. 9.) “I remember my faults this day, in forgetting Joseph.” Note, It is best to remember our duty, and to do it in its time; but if we have neglected that, it is next best to remember our faults, and repent of them, and do our duty at last; better late than never. Some think he means his faults against Pharaoh, for which he was imprison- ed; and then he would insinuate that though Pharaoh had forgiven him, he had not forgiven him- self. The story he had to tell, was, in short, That there was an obscure young man in the king’s prison, who had very properly interpreted his dream, and the chief baker’s (the event corresponding in each with the interpretation,) and that he would recom- mend him to the king his master for an interpreter. Note, God’s time for the enlargement of his people will appear at last to be the fittest time. If the chief butler had at first used his interest for Joseph’s enlargement, and had obtained it, it is probable that, upon his release, he would have gone back to the land of the Hebrews again, which he spake of so feelingly, (ch. 40. 15.) and then he had neither been so blessed himself, nor such a blessing to his family, as afterwards he proved. But staying two years longer, and coming out now upon this occasion, at last, to interpret the king’s dreams, way was made for his very great preferment. Those that patient- ly wait for God, shall be paid for their waiting, not only principal but interest, Lam. 3. 26.

2. The introducing of Joseph to Pharaoh. The king’s business required haste; Joseph is sent for out of the dungeon with all speed; Pharaoh’s order dis- charged him, both from his imprisonment, and from his servitude, and made him a candidate for some of the highest trusts at court. The king can scarcely allow him time, but that decency required it, to shave himself, and to change his raiment, v. 14. It is done with all possible expedition, and Joseph is brought in, perhaps almost as much surprised as Pe- ter was, Acts 12. 9. So suddenly is his captivity brought back, that he is not, as he was, a prisoner, but a captive; and then he cannot take the noise of them to themselves, but give it to God. To such God gives more grace. (2.) He shows respect to Pharaoh, and hearty good will to him and his government, in supposing that the interpretation would be an answer of peace. Note, Those that consult God's oracles, may expect an answer of peace. If Joseph be made the interpreter hope the best.

17. And Pharaoh said unto Joseph, In my dream, behold, I stood upon the bank of the river. 18. And, behold, there came up out of the river seven kine, fat-fleshed and well-favoured; and they fed in a meadow. 19. And, behold, seven other kine came up after them, poor, and very ill-favoured, and lean-fleshed, such as I never saw in all the land of Egypt for badness. 20. And the lean and the ill-favoured kine did eat up the first seven fat kine. 21. And when they had eaten them up, it could not be known that they had eaten them; but they were still ill-favoured, as at the beginning. So I awoke.

22. And I saw in my dream, and, behold, seven ears came up in one stalk, full and good. 23. And, behold, seven ears, withered, thin, and blasted with the east wind, sprung up after them. 24. And the thin ears devoured the seven good ears: and I told this unto the magicians; but there was none that could declare it to me. 25. And Joseph said unto Pharaoh, The dream of Pharaoh is one: God hath showed Pharaoh what he is about to do. 26. The seven good kine are seven years; and the seven good ears are seven years: the dream is one. 27. And the seven thin and ill-favoured kine that came up after them, are seven years; and the seven empty ears blasted with the east wind, shall be seven years of famine.

28. This is the thing which I have spoken unto Pharaoh; What God is about to do, he sheweth unto Pharaoh. 29. Behold, there come seven years of great plenty throughout all the land of Egypt. 30. And there shall arise after them seven years of famine; and all the plenty shall be forgotten in the land of Egypt; and the famine shall consume the land. 31. And the plenty shall not be known in the land by reason of that famine following; for it shall be very grievous. 32. And for that the dream was doubled unto Pharaoh twice; it is because the thing is established by God, and God will shortly bring it to pass.

Here, I. Pharaoh relates his dream. He dreamt that he stood upon the bank of the river Nile, and saw the kine, both the fat ones, and the lean ones, come out of the river. For the kingdom of Egypt had no rain, as appears, Zech. 14. 18, but the plenty of the year depended upon the overflowing of the river, and it was about one certain time of the year that it overflowed. If it rose to fifteen or sixteen cubits, there was plenty; if to twelve or thirteen only, or under, there was scarcity. See how many ways Providence has of dispensing its gifts; yet what ever the second causes are, our dependence is still the same upon the First Cause, who makes every creature that to us, that it is, be it rain or river.

II. Joseph interprets his dream, and tells him that it signified seven years of plenty now immediately to ensue, which should be succeeded by as many years of famine.

1. The two dreams signify the same thing, but the repetition was to denote the certainty, the nearness, and the importance, of the event, v. 32. Thus has God been showed the import of his counsel by two immutable things, Heb. 6. 17, 18. The covenant is sealed with two sacraments; and in the one of them there are both bread and wine, wherein the dream is one, and yet it is doubled, for the thing is certain.

2. Yet the two dreams had a distinct reference to the two things wherein we most experience plenty and scarcity; namely, grain and corn. The plenty and scarcity of grass for the cattle were signified by the fat kine and the lean ones; the plenty and scarcity of herb for the service of man, by the full ears and the thin ones.

3. See what changes the comforts of this life are subject to. After great plenty, may come great scarcity; how strong soever we may think our mountain stands, if God speak the word, it will soon be moved. We cannot be sure that tomorrow shall be as this day, next year as this, and much more abundant, Is. 56. 12. We must learn how to want, as well as how to abound.

4. See the goodness of God, in sending the seven years of plenty before those of famine, that provision might be made accordingly. Thus he sets the one over against the other, Eccl. 7. 14. With what wonderful wisdom has Providence, that great House-Keeper, ordered the affairs of this numerous family from the beginning hitherto! Great variety of seasons there have been, and the produce of the earth is sometimes more and sometimes less; yet, take one time with another, what was miraculous concerning the manna, is ordinarily verified in the common course of Providence, He that gathers much, has nothing over, and he that gathers little, heu laus, Is. 16. 18.

5. See the perishing nature of our worldly enjoyments. The great increase of the years of plenty was quite lost and swallowed up in the years of famine; and the overplus of it, which seemed very much, yet did but just serve to keep men alive, v. 29. 31. Melts for the belly, and the belly for meats, but God shall destroy both it and them, 1 Cor. 6. 13. There is bread which endures to everlasting life, which shall not be forgotten, and which is worth while to labour for, John 6. 27. They that make the things of this world their good things, will find but little pleasure in remembering that they have received them, Luke 16. 25.

6. Observe, God revealed this beforehand to Pharaoh, who, as king of Egypt, was to be the father of his country, and to make prudent provision for them. Magistrates are God's shepherds, whose care it must be, not only to rule, but to feed.

33. Now therefore let Pharaoh look out a man discreet and wise, and set him over the land of Egypt. 34. Let Pharaoh do this, and let him appoint officers over the land, and take up the fifth part of the land of Egypt in the seven plenteous years. 35. And let them gather all the food of those good years that come, and lay up corn under the hand of Pharaoh, and let them keep food in the cities. 36. And that food shall be for store to the land against the seven years of famine, which shall be in the land of Egypt; that the land perish not through the famine. 37. And the thing was good in the eyes of Pharaoh, and in the eyes of all his servants. 38. And Pharaoh said unto his servants, Can we find such a one as this is, a man in whom the spirit of God is? 39. And Pharaoh said unto Joseph, Forasmuch as God hath showed thee all this; there is none so discreet and wise as thou art. 40. Thou shalt be over my house, and according unto thy word shall all my people be ruled: only in the throne will I be greater than thou. 41. And Pharaoh said unto Joseph, See, I have set thee over all the land of Egypt. 42. And Pharaoh took off his ring from his hand, and put it upon Joseph's hand, and arrayed him in vestures of fine linen, and put a gold chain about his neck; 43. And he made him to ride in the second chariot which he had; and they cried before him, Bow the knee; and he made him ruler over all the land of Egypt. 44. And Pharaoh said unto Joseph, I am Pharaoh, and without thee shall no man lift up his hand or foot in all the land of Egypt. 45. And Pharaoh called Joseph's name Zaphnath-paaneah; and he gave him to wife Asenath the daughter of Poti-pherah priest of On. And Joseph went out over all the land of Egypt. Here is, 1. The good advice that Joseph gave to Pharaoh, which was, 1/That in the years of plenty he should lay up for the years of famine; buy up corn when it was cheap, that he might both enrich himself, and supply the country, when it would be dear and scarce. Note, (1.) Fair warning should always be followed with good counsel. Therefore the prudent man foreseeth the evil, and hideth himself. God has in his word told us of a day of trial and exigence before us, when we shall need all the grace we can get, and all little enough, "Now, therefore, provide accordingly." (2.) Times of gathering must be diligently improved, because there will come a time of spending. Let us go to the ant, and learn of her this wisdom, Prov. 6. 6. 8. 2. Because that which is every body's work, commonly proves nobody's; he advises Pharaoh to appoint officers who should make it their business, and to pitch upon some one person to preside in the affair, v. 33. Probably, if Joseph had not advised this, it had not been done; Pharaoh's counsellors could no more improve the dream, than his magicians interpret it; therefore, it is said of him, (Ps. 105. 22.) that he taught the senators wisdom. Hence, Joseph justly infer, with Solomon, Eccle. 4. 13.) Better is a poor and a wise child, than an old and foolish king. II. The great honour that Pharaoh did to Joseph. 1. He gave him an honourable testimony; He is a man in whom the Spirit of God is; and that puts a great excellency upon any man; such men ought to be valued, v. 38. He is a nonsuch for prudence, There is none so discreet and wise as thou art, v. 39. Now he is abundantly recompensed for the disgrace that had been done him; and his righteousness is as the morning-light, Ps. 37. 6.

2. He puts him into an honourable office; not only employed him to buy up corn, but made him prime-minister of state, comptroller of the household, Thou shalt be over my house, Chief Justice of the kingdom, according to the word shall all my people be ruled or armed, as some read it, and then he bespeaks him General of the forces. His commission was very ample, I have set thee over all the land of Egypt; (v. 41.) without thee shall no man lift up his hand or foot; (v. 44.) all the affairs of the kingdom must pass through his hand. Nay, (v. 46.) only in the throne will I be greater than thou. Note, It is the wisdom of princes to prefer those, and the hands of princes to confer those, who are next in places to power and trust, in whom the Spirit of God is. It is probable, that there were those about the court who opposed Joseph's preference, which occasioned Pharaoh so often to repeat the grant, and with that solemn sanction, (v. 44.) I am Pharaoh. When the proposal was made that there should be a corn-master-general nominated, it is said, (v. 37.) Pharaoh's servants were all pleased with the motion, each hoping for the place; but when Pharaoh said to them, "Joseph shall be the man," we do not read that they made him any answer, being uneasy at it, and acquiescing, only because they could not help it. Joseph had enemies, no doubt, archers that shot at him, and hated him, ch. 49. 23. as Daniel, ch. 6. 4.

3. He put upon him all the marks of honour imaginable, to confirm him in the esteem and respect of the people, as the king's favourite, and one whom he delighted to honour. (1.) He gave him his own ring, as a ratification of his commission, and in token of peculiar favour; or it was like delivering him the great seal. (2.) He put fine clothes upon him, instead of his prison-garments. For they that are in kings' palaces must wear soft clothing; he that, in the morning, was dragging his fetters of iron, before night, was adorned with a crown of gold. (3.) He made him ride in the second chariot, next his own, and ordered all to do obeisance to him: "Bow the knee, as to Pharaoh himself." (4.) He gave him a new name, to show his authority over him, and yet such a name as bespoke the value he had for him, Zaphnath-paaneah—A revealer of secrets. (5.) He married him honourably to the daughter of Poti-pherah, priest of On, and so enriched him in giving wisdom and other merits, Pharaoh was not sparing in conferring honours. Now this preference of Joseph was, [1.] An abundant recompense for his innocent and patient suffering, a lasting instance of the equity and goodness of Providence, and an encouragement to all good people to trust in a good God. [2.] It was typical of the exaltation of Christ, that great Revealer of secrets, John 1. 14.) or, as some translate it, 18. of his new name, the Saviour of the world. The brightest glories of the upper world are put upon him, the highest trust lodged in his hand, and all power given him both in heaven and earth. He is Gatherer, Keeper, and Disposer, of all the stores of divine grace, and Chief Ruler of the kingdom of God among men. The work of ministers is to cry before him, "Bow the knee; kiss the Son." 46. And Joseph was thirty years old when he stood before Pharaoh king of Egypt: and Joseph went out from the presence of Pharaoh, and went throughout all the land of Egypt. 47. And in the seven plenteous years the earth brought forth by handfuls. 48. And he gathered up all the food of the seven years, which were in the land of Egypt, and laid up the food in the cities: the food of the field, which was round about every city, laid he up in the same. 49. And Joseph gathered corn as the sand of the sea, very much, until he left numbering; for it was without number. 50. And unto Joseph were born two sons before the years of famine came, which Asenath the daughter of Potipherah priest of On bare unto him. 51. And Joseph called the name of the first-born Manasseh; For God, said he, hath made me forget all my toil, and all my father's house. 52. And the name of the second he called Ephraim: For God hath caused me to be fruitful in the land of my affliction. 53. And the seven years of plenteousness, that was in the land of Egypt, were ended. 54. And the seven years of drought began to come, according as Joseph had said: and the drought was in all lands; but in all the land of Egypt there was bread. 55. And when all the land of Egypt was famished, the people cried to Pharaoh for bread: and Pharaoh said unto all the Egyptians, Go unto Joseph; what he saith to you, do. 56. And the famine was over all the face of the earth: and Joseph opened all the storehouses, and sold unto the Egyptians; and the famine waxed sore in the land of Egypt. 57. And all countries came into Egypt to Joseph for to buy corn; because that the famine was sore in all lands.

Observe here,

I. The building of Joseph's family in the birth of two sons, Manasseh and Ephraim, v. 50. 52. In the names they gave them he owned the Divine Providence giving this happy turn to his affairs. 1. He was made to forget his misery, Job 11. 16. We should bear our afflictions when they are present, as those that now but Providence may so outweigh them by after-comforts, as that we may even forget them when they are past. But could he be so unnatural as to forget all his father's house? He means the unkindness he received from his brethren, or perhaps the wealth and honour he expected from his father, with the birth-right. The robes which he now wore, made him forget the coat of divers colours which he wore in his father's house. 2. He was made fruitful in the land of his affliction; it had been the land of his affliction, and in some sense it was still so, for it was not Canaan, the land of promise. His distance from his father was still his affliction. Note, Light is sometimes sown for the righteous in a barren and unlikely soil; and yet if God sow it, and water it, it will come up again. The afflictions of the saints promote their fruitfulness. Ephraim signifies Fruitfulness, and Manasseh, Forgetfulness; for these two often go together; when Jehoshurun waxed fat, he forgot God his Maker.

II. The accomplishment of Joseph's predictions; Pharaoh had great confidence in the truth of them, perhaps finding in his own mind, beyond what another person could, an exact correspondence between them and his dreams as between the key and the lock; and the event showed that he was not deceived. The seven plenteous years came, (v. 47.) and at length, they were ended, v. 53. Note, we ought to foresee the approaching period of the days both of our prosperity and of our opportunity; and therefore must not be secure in the enjoyment of our prosperity, nor slothful in the improvement of our opportunity; years of plenty will end, therefore, What thy hand finds to do, do it; and gather in gathering time. In the mean time, be fruitful and multiply, (Gen. 9. 1.) and of the famine. The seven years of dearth began to come, v. 54. See what changes of conditions we are liable to in this world, and what need we have to be joyful in a day of prosperity, and in a day of adversity to consider, Eccl. 7. 14. This famine, it seems, was not only in Egypt, but in other lands, in all lands, that is, all the neighbouring countries: fruitful lands are soon turned into barrenness for want of grace that dwell therein, Ps. 107. 34. It is here said, that in the land of Egypt there was bread; meaning, probably, not that only which Joseph had bought up for the king, but that which private persons, by his example, and upon the public notice of this prediction, as well as by the rules of common prudence, had laid up.

III. The performance of Joseph's trust; he was found faithful to it, as a steward ought to be. 1. He was diligent in laying up, while the plenty lasted, v. 48, 49. He that thus gathers, is a wise son. 2. He was prudent and careful in giving out, when the famine came, and kept the markets low by furnishing them at reasonable rates out of his stores. The people in distress came to Pharaoh, as that woman to the king of Israel, (2 Kings 6. 26.) Help, my lord, O king he sent them to his treasurer, to Joseph. Thus God in the gospel directs those that apply themselves to him for mercy and grace, to go to the Lord Jesus, in whom all fulness dwells; and, What he saith to you, do. Joseph, no doubt, with wisdom and justice fixed the price of the corn he sold, so that Pharaoh, whose money had bought it up, might have a reasonable profit, and yet the country might not be oppressed, nor advantage taken of their prevailing necessity; while he that withheld corn, when it is dear, in hopes it will yet grow dearer, though people perish for want of it, has many a curse for so doing, (and it is not a curse causeless,) blessings shall be upon the head of him that thus selleth it, Prov. 11. 26. And let the price be determined by that golden rule of justice, to do as we would be done by.

CHAP. XLII.

We had in the foregoing chapter, the fulfilling of the dreams which Joseph had interpreted: in this and the following chapters, we have the fulfilling of the dreams which Joseph himself had dreamt, that his father's family should do obeisance to him. The story is very largely and particularly related of what passed between Joseph and his brethren, not only because it is an entertaining story, and, probably, was much talked of, both among the Israelites and among the Egyptians, but because it is very instructive, that it may be the more a confession of Jacob's family into Egypt, on which so many great events afterward depended. We have, in this chapter,

I. The humble application of Jacob's sons to Joseph, to buy corn, v. 1. 2. Their father's fear for their trial, v. 7. 9. III. The conviction they were now under of their sin concerning Joseph long before, v. 21. 24. IV. Their return to Canaan with corn, and the greater dread of their father Joseph upon hearing the account of their expedition, v. 25. 58.

1. Now when Jacob saw that there was corn in Egypt, Jacob said unto his sons, Why do ye look one upon another? 2. And he said, Behold, I have heard that there is corn in Egypt: get you down thither, and buy for us from thence; that we may live, and not die. 3. And Joseph's ten brethren went down to buy corn in Egypt.

4. But Benjamin, Joseph's brother, Jacob sent not with his brethren; for he said, Lest peradventure mischief befall him. 5. And the sons of Israel came to buy corn among those that came: for the famine was in the land of Canaan. 6. And Joseph was the governor over the land, and he it was that sold to all the people of the land: and Joseph's brethren came, and bowed down themselves before him with their faces to the earth.

Though Jacob's sons were all married, and had families of their own, yet, it should seem, they were still incorporated in one society, under the conduct and presidency of their father Jacob.

We have here,

1. The orders he gave them to go and buy corn in Egypt, v. 1. 2. Observe, 1. The famine was grievous in the land of Canaan. 2. It was available that all the land of Egypt should, as it were, be their granary. 3. Jacob's sons were sent into the land of Canaan for corn; but Joseph was sent into the land of Egypt to sell corn, and to provide it for his brethren.

3. They could not come hither, but send for corn, and then their brethren. This was the manner of barter; it is now the manner of trading in all places of commerce.

4. But Benjamin, Joseph's brother, Jacob sent not with his brethren; for he said, Lest peradventure mischief befall him. And, indeed, it might appear to him, that Benjamin might have fallen into their hands; for perhaps the Egyptians might have kept him, and disposed of his brethren. Joseph's father here took care of his youngest son; perhaps his father had taken care of Joseph, and the Egyptians might have kept him. He had the greatest reason to take care of Benjamin, for his sons had left him: Benjamin was the only son of his natural wife. And, perhaps, his father had been severe upon his sons, and his youngest son had not been to his heart; he might therefore have been unwilling to send him into a strange land, and to be parted from him. He might have thought his eldest son was of the better sort; he was the eldest, and therefore better fit for the service of the king; and the Egyptians might have taken him, and have put him into such employments as they pleased. And, perhaps, they might have sent him to the king, and he might have been kept in his service. So he said to his sons, Lest peradventure mischief befall him. To beguile his mind, he said, Lest peradventure mischief befall him.

5. And the sons of Israel came to buy corn among those that came: for the famine was in the land of Canaan. And Joseph was the governor over the land, and he it was that sold to all the people of the land; and Joseph's brethren came, and bowed down themselves before him with their faces to the earth.

6. Joseph's brother, Benjamin, Jacob sent not with his brethren; for he said, Lest peradventure mischief befall him. 5. And the sons of Israel came to buy corn among those that came: for the famine was in the land of Canaan. 6. And Joseph was the governor over the land, and he it was that sold to all the people of the land; and Joseph's brethren came, and bowed down themselves before him with their faces to the earth.

7. And Joseph saw his brethren, and he knew them, but made himself strange unto them, and spake roughly unto them; and he said unto them, Whence come ye? And they said, From the land of Canaan to buy food. 8. And Joseph knew his brethren, but they knew not him. 9. And Joseph remembered the dreams which he dreamed of them, and said unto them, Ye are spies; to see the nakedness of the land ye are come. 10. And they said unto him, Nay, my lord, but to buy food are thy servants come. 11. We are all one man's sons; we are true men; thy servants are no spies. 12. And he said unto them, Nay, but to see the nakedness of the land ye are come. 13. And they said, Thy servants are twelve brethren, the sons of one man in the land of Canaan; and, behold, the youngest is this day with our father, and one is not. 14. And Joseph said unto them, That is it that I spake unto you, saying, Ye are spies. 15. Hereby ye shall be proved: by the life of Pharaoh ye shall not go forth hence, except your youngest brother come hither. 16. Send one of you, and let him fetch your brother, and ye shall be kept in prison, that your words may be proved, whether there be any truth in you: or else by the life of Pharaoh surely ye are spies. 17. And he put them together into ward three days. 18. And Joseph said unto them the third day, This do, and live; for I fear God. 19. If ye be true men, let one of your brethren be bound in the house of your prison: go ye, carry corn for the famine of your houses: 20. But bring your youngest brother unto me; so shall your words be verified, and ye shall not die. And they did so.

We may well wonder that Joseph during the 20 years that he had now been in Egypt, especially during the last 7 years that he had been in power there, never sent to his father to acquaint him with his circumstances; nay it is strange that he who so often went throughout all the land of Egypt, (ch. 41. 45, 46.) never made an excursion to Canaan, to visit his aged father, when he was in the borders of Egypt, that lay next to Canaan; perhaps it would not have been above three or four days journey for him in his chariot. It is a probable conjecture, that his whole management of himself in this affair was by special direction from Heaven, that the purpose of God concerning Jacob and his family might be accomplished. When Joseph's brethren came, he knew them by no satisfactory token, but they knew not him, little thinking to find him there, v. 8. He remembered the dreams, (v. 9.) but they had forgotten them. The laying up of God’s oracles in our hearts, will be of excellent use to us in all our conduct. Joseph had an eye to his dreams which he knew to be divine, in his carriage toward his brethren, and aimed at the accomplishment of them, and the bringing of his brethren to repentance for their former sins; and both those points were gained.

1. He showed himself very rigorous and harsh with them; the very manner of his speaking, considering the post he was in, was enough to frighten them; for he spake roughly to them, v. 7. He charged them with bad designs against the government, (v. 9.) treated them as dangerous persons, Ye are spies, protesting by the life of Pharaoh that they were so, v. 16. Some make that an oath, others make it no more than a vehement and profane oath, like that, as thy soul liveth; however, it was more than yea, yea, and nay, nay, and therefore came of evil. Note, Bad words are soon learned by converse with those that use them, but not so soon unlearned. Joseph, by being much at court, got the courtier’s oath, By the life of Pharaoh; perhaps designed hereby to confirm his brethren in their belief that he was an Egyptian, and not an Israelite; though he knew this was a lie, and that he was an Hebrew, an Israelite, an Abraham; when Peter would prove himself no disciple of Christ, he cursed and swore. Now, why was Joseph thus hard upon his brethren? We may be sure it was not from a spirit of revenge, that he might trample upon them now, who had formerly trampled upon him; he was not a man of that temper. But, (1.) It was to enrich his own dreams, and complete the accomplishment of them. (2.) It was to try the sincerity of his gratitude, that he should get to out of them an account of the state of their family, which he longed to know: they would have discovered him, if he had asked as a friend, therefore he asks as a judge. Not seeing his brother Benjamin with them, perhaps he began to suspect that they had made away with him too, and therefore gives them occasion to speak of their father and brother.

Note, God in his providence sometimes makes harsh with those he loves, and speaks roughly to those whom he has yet great mercy in store for.

They, hereupon, were very submissive; they spake to him with all the respect imaginable; Nay, my lord; (v. 10.) a great change since they said, Behold, this dreamer comes. They very modestly deny the charge, We are no spies; they tell him their business, that they came to buy food, a justifiable errand, and the same that many strangers came to Egypt upon at this time; they undertake to give a particular account of themselves and their family; (v. 13.) that was what he wanted.

3. He clapped them all up in prison for three days, v. 17. Thus God deals with the souls he designs for special comfort and honour; he first humbles them, and terrifies them, and brings them under a spirit of bondage, and then binds up their wounds by the spirit of adoption. 4. He concluded with them, at last, that one of them should be left as an hostage, and the rest should go home and fetch Benjamin. It was a very encouraging word he said to them, (v. 18.) I fear God; as if he had said, You may assures yourselves I will do you no wrong; I dare not, for I know that, high as I am, there is one higher than I. Note, With what fear God, we have reason to expect fair dealing. The fear of God will be a check upon those that are in power, to restrain them from abusing their power to oppression and tyranny; those that have no one else to stand in awe of, ought to stand in awe of their own consciences. See Neh. 5. 15. So did not I, because of the fear of God. 21. And they said one to another, We are very guilty concerning our brother, in that we saw the anguish of his soul, when he besought us, and we would not hear; therefore is this distress come upon us. 22. And Reuben answered them, saying, Spake I not unto you, saying, Do not sin against the child; and ye would not hear! Therefore, behold, also, his blood is required. 23. And they knew not that Joseph understood them; for he spake unto them by an interpreter.

24. And he turned himself about from them, and wept; and returned to them again, and communed with them, and took from them Simeon, and bound him before their eyes. 25. Then Joseph commanded to fill their sacks with corn, and to restore every man’s money into his sack, and to give them provision for the way: and thus did he unto them. 26. And they laded their asses with the corn, and departed thence. 27. And as one of them opened his sack to give his ass provender in the inn, he espied his money; for, behold, it was in his sack’s mouth. 28. And he said unto his brethren, My money is restored; and, lo, it is even in my sack: and their heart failed them, and they were afraid, saying one to another, What is this that God hath done unto us?

Here is, I. The penitent reflection Joseph’s brethren made upon the wrong they had formerly done to him, v. 21. They talked the matter over in the Hebrew tongue, not suspecting that Joseph, whom they took for a native of Egypt, understood them, much less that he was the person they spake of. 1. They remembered with regret the barbarous cruelty whereby they persecuted him, We are very guilty concerning our brother: we do not read that they said this, during their three days’ imprisonment; but now when the matter was come to some issue, and they saw themselves still embarrassed, now they began to relent. Perhaps Joseph’s mention of the fear of God, (v. 18.) put them upon consideration, and extricated this reflectively. Now see here, (1.) The office of conscience; it is a remembrancer, to bring to mind things long since said and done, to show us wherein we have erred, though it was long ago, as this reflection here was above twenty years after the sin was committed. As time will not wear out the guilt of sin, so it will not blot out the records of conscience; when the guilt of this sin of Joseph’s brethren was fresh, they made light of it, and sat down to eat bread; but now, long afterward, their consciences reminded them of it. (2.) The benefit of afflictions; they often prove the happy and effectual means of awakening conscience, and bringing sin to our remembrance, Job 13. 26. (3.) The evil of guilt concerning our brethren; of all their sins, that was it that conscience now reproached them for; whenever we think we have wrong done us, we ought to remember the wrong we have done to others, Ecc. 7. 21. 22. Reuben only remembered with comfort, that he had been an advocate for his brother, and had done what he could to prevent the mischief they did him, (v. 22.) Spake
I met you, saying, Do not sin against the child? ] Note, (1.) It is an aggravation of the sin, that it was committed against adorning. (2.) When we come to share with others in their calamities, it will be a comfort to us, if we have the testimony of our conscience, that we did not curse with them in their iniquities, but, in our places, witnessed against them. This shall be our rejoicing in the day of evil, and take out the sting.

II. Joseph's tenderness toward them upon this occasion. He retired from them to weep, v. 24. Though his reason directed that he should still carry himself as a stranger to them, because they were not as yet humbled enough for natural affection could not but work for, he was a man of a tender spirit. This represents the tender mercies of our God toward repenting sinners. See Jer. 31. 20. Since I spake against him, I do earnestly remember him still. See Judg. 10. 16.

III. The imprisonment of Simeon, v. 24. He chose him for the hostage, probably, because he remembered him to have been his most bitter enemy, or because he observed him now to be least humbled and concerned; he bound him before their eyes, to affect them all; or perhaps it is intimated that though he bound him with some severity before them, yet afterward, when they were gone, he took off his bands.

IV. The dismissal of the rest of them. They came for corn, and corn they had; and not only so, but every man had his money restored in his sack's mouth. Thus Christ, our Joseph, gives out supplies without money and without price. Therefore the poor are invited to buy, Rev. 3. 17, 18. This put them into great consternation, v. 28. Their heart failed them, and they were afraid, saying one to another, What is this that God hath done to us? (1.) It was really a merciful event; for I hope it will be allowed they had no wrong done to them, (when they had their money given them back,) but a kindness; yet they were thus terrified by it. Note, (1.) Guilty consciences are apt to take good providences in a bad sense, and to put wrong constructions even upon those things that make for them. They flee when none pursues. (2.) Wealth sometimes brings as much care along with it as want does, and more too. If they had been robbed of their money, they could not have been worse frightened than they were now at the possibility of finding money in their sacks. Thus he whose ground brought forth plentifully, said, What shall I do? Luke 12. 17. 2. Yet, in their circumstances, it was very amazing. They knew that the Egyptians abhorred a Hebrew, (ch. 43. 32.) and therefore, since they could not expect to receive any kindness from them, they concluded that this was done with a design to pick a quarrel with them; the rather, because the man of the land, had warned them as spies. Their own consciences also were awake, and their sins set in order before them; and this puts them into confusion. Note, (1.) When men's spirits are sinking, every thing helps to sink them. (2.) When the events of Providence concerning us are surprising, it is good to inquire what it is that God has done, and is doing with us, and to consider the operation of his hands.

29. And they came unto Jacob their father unto the land of Canaan, and told him all that befell unto them, saving, 30. The man who is the lord of the land, spake roughly to us, and took us for spies of the country. 31. And we said unto him, We are true men; we are no spies of our father; one is not, and the youngest is this day with our father in the land of Canaan. 33. And the man, the lord of the country, said unto us, hereby shall I know that ye are true men: leave one of your brethren here with me, and take food for the famine of your households, and be gone: 34. And bring your youngest brother unto me: then shall I know that ye are no spies, but that ye are true men: so will I deliver you your brother, and ye shall traffic in the land. 35. And it came to pass as they emptied their sacks, that, behold, every man's bundle of money was in his sack: and when both they and their father saw the bundles of money, they were afraid. 36. And Jacob their father said unto them, Me have ye bereaved of my children: Joseph is not, and Simeon is not, and ye will take Benjamin away: all these things are against me. 27. And Reuben spake unto his father, saying, Slay my two sons, if I bring him not to thee: deliver him into my hand, and I will bring him to thee again. 38. And he said, My son shall not go down with you, for his brother is dead, and he is left alone: if mischief befall him by the way in which ye go, then shall ye bring down my gray hairs with sorrow to the grave.

1. The report which Jacob's sons made to their father, of the great distress they had been in Egypt; how they had been suspected, and threatened, and obliged to leave Simeon a prisoner there, till they should bring Benjamin with them thither. Who would have thought of this, when they left home? When we go abroad, we should consider how many sad accidents, that we little think of, may befall us before we return home. We know not what a day may bring forth, we ought therefore to be always ready for the worst.

2. The deep impression this made upon the good man. They who now have bundles of money which Joseph returned, in kindness, to his father, frightened him; (v. 35.) for he concluded it was done with some mischievous design, or perhaps suspected his own sons to have committed some effence, and so to have run themselves into a pretermunire—a penalty; which is intimated in what he says, (v. 36.) Me have ye bereaved. He seems to lay the fault upon them; knowing their characters, he feared they had profaned the Egyptian, and perhaps forcibly and rudely, brought home their money. Jacob is here much out of temper. (1.) He has very melancholy apprehensions concerning the present state of his family; Joseph is not, and Simeon is not; whereas Joseph was in honour, and Simeon in the way to it. Note, We often perplex ourselves with our own mistakes, even in matters of fact. True griefs may arise from false intelligence and suppositions. 2 Sam. 13. 31. Jacob gives up Joseph for gone, and Simeon and Benjamin as being in danger; and concludes, All these things are against me. It proved otherwise, that all these were for him, were working together for his good, and the good of his family; yet here he thinks them all against him. Note, Through our ignorance or mistake, and the weakness of our faith, we often apprehend that to be against us, which is really for us. We are afflicted in body, Judah urges him to consent that Benjamin should go down with them, how much soever it went against his feelings and previous determination. Note, it is not at all inconsistent with the honour and duty which children owe their parents, humbly and modestly to advise them, and, as occasion is, to reason with them: *Plead with your mother, plead, Hos. 2. 2. (1.) He insists upon the absolute necessity they were under of bringing Benjamin with them; which he, who was a witness to all that had passed in Egypt, was a more competent judge of than Jacob could be. Joseph's protestation (v. 3.) may be alluded to, to show upon what terms we must draw nigh to God; unless we bring Christ along with us in the arms of faith, we cannot see the face of God with comfort. (2.) He engages to take all possible care of him, and to do his utmost for his safety, v. 8, 9. Judah's conscience had lately smitten him for what he had done a great while ago against Joseph; (ch. 42. 21.) and as an evidence of the truth of his repentance, he is ready to undertake, as far as a man could do it, for Benjamin's security. He will not only not wrong him, but will take all he can to protect him: *This is as the case will admit; when he knew not how he could retrieve Joseph, he would make some amends for the irreparable injury he had done him, by doubling his care concerning Benjamin. 11. And their father Israel said unto them, *If it must be so now, do this; take of the best fruits in the land in your vessels, and carry down the man a present, a little balm, and a little honey, spices, and myrrh, nuts, and almonds: 12. And take double money in your hand; and the money that was brought again in the mouth of your sacks, carry it again in your hand; peradventure it was an oversight: 13. Take also your brother, and arise, go again unto the man: 14. And God Almighty give you mercy before the man, that he may send away your other brother, and Benjamin. If I be bereaved of my children, I am bereaved. Observe here, 1. Jacob's persuadableness. He would be ruled by reason, though they were his inferiors that urged it. He saw the necessity of the case; and, since there was no remedy, he consented to yield to the necessity, (v. 11.) *If it must be so now, take your brother. If no corn be had, but upon these terms, we may as well expose him to the perils of the journey, as suffer ourselves and families, and Benjamin among the rest, to perish for want of bread. So he can, if he will, resist the devil, and so be his instrument; and will he, the dearest of all, will he give for his life. No death so dreadful as that by famine, Lam. 4. 9. Jacob had said, (ch. 42. 38.) *My son shall not go down; but now he is over-persuaded to consent. Note, It is no fault, but our wisdom and duty, to alter our purposes and resolutions, when there is a good reason for our so doing. Constancy is a virtue, but obstinacy is a vice: not to be so is not negative, not to repent, and to make unchangeable revolts. II. Jacob's prudence and justice, which appeared in three things. 1. He sent back the money which they had found in the sack's mouth, with this discreet construction of it, *Peradventure it was an oversight. Note, Honesty obliges us to make restitution, not only of that which comes to us by our own fault, but of that which comes to us by the mistakes of others. Though we get it by oversight, if we keep it, when the oversight is discovered, it is kept by deceit. In the stating of accounts, errors must be excepted, even those that make for us, as well as those that make against us. Jacob's words furnish us with a favourable construction to put upon that which we are tempted to resent as an injury and affront; pass it by, and say, Peradventure it was an oversight. 2. He sent double money, as much again as they took the time before, upon supposition that the price of corn might be risen; or, that if it should be insisted upon, they might pay a ransom for Simeon, or his pris n-fees? or, to show a generous spirit, that they might be the more likely to find generous treatment with the man, the lord of the land. 3. He sent a present of such things as the land afforded, and as were scarce in Egypt, baln and honey, &c. (v. 11.) the commodities that Canaan exported, ch. 37. 25. Note, (1.) Providence dispenses its gifts variously. Some countries produce one commodity, others another, that commerce may be preserved. (2.) Honey and spice will never make up the want of bread-corn. The famine was sore in Canaan, and yet they had balm and myrrh, &c. We may it e well enough up a plain food without dainties; but we cannot live upon dainties without plain food. Let us thank God, that that which is most needful and useful, is generally most cheap and common. (3.) A gift in se-cret pacifies wrath, Prov. 21. 14. Jacob's sons were unjustly accused as spies, yet Jacob is willing to be at the expense of a present, to pacify the accuser. Sometime it is not think much to buy peace, even there where we may justly demand it, and insist upon it as our right.

III. Jacob's piety appearing in his prayer, v. 14. God Almighty give you mercy before the man! Jacob had formerly turned an angry brother into a kind one with a present and a prayer; and here he betakes himself to the same tried method, and it sped well. Note, Those that would find mercy with men, must seek it of God, who has all hearts in his hands, and turns them as he pleases.

IV. Jacob's patience; he concludes all with this, "If I be bereaved of my children, I am bereaved; If I must part with them thus one after another, I must acquiesce, and say, The will of the Lord be done." Note, It is our wisdom to reconcile ourselves to the sorest afflictions, and make the best of them; for there is n't thing got by striving with our Maker, 2 Sam. 15. 25, 26.

15. And the men took that present, and they took double money in their hand, and Benjamin; and rose up, and went down to Egypt, and stood before Joseph. 16. And when Joseph saw Benjamin with them, he said to the ruler of his house, Bring these men home, and slay, and make ready; for these men shall dine with me at noon. 17. And the man did as Joseph bade; and the man brought the men into Joseph's house. 18. And the men were afraid, because they were brought into Joseph's house; and they said, Because of the money that was returned in our sacks at the first time are we brought in; that he may seek occasion against us, and fall upon us, and take us for bondmen, and our asses. 19. And they came near to the steward of Joseph's house, and they communed with him at the door of the house. 20. And said, O sir, we came indeed down at the first time to buy food:

21. And it came to pass, when we came to the inn, that we opened our sacks, and, behold, every man's money was in the mouth of his sack, our money in full weight: and we have brought it again in our hand. 22. And other money have we brought down in our hands to buy food: we cannot tell who put our money in our sacks. 23. And he said, Peace be to you, fear not: your God, and the God of your father, hath given you treasure in your sacks: I had your money. And he brought Simeon out unto them. 24. And the man brought the men into Joseph's house, and gave them water, and they washed their feet; and he gave their asses provender. 25. And they made ready the present against Joseph came at noon; for they heard that they should eat bread there.

Jacob's sons, having got leave to take Benjamin with them, were observant of the orders their father had given them, and went down the second time into Egypt to buy corn. If we should ever know what a famine of the word means, let us not think it much to travel as far for spiritual food, as they did from here to Cophenague; and if we have an answer of what passed between them and Joseph's steward, who, some conjecture was in the secret, and knew them to be Joseph's brethren, and helped to humour the thing; I rather think not, because no man must be present when Joseph afterward made himself known to them, ch. 45. 1.

I. Joseph's steward has orders from his master, (who was busy selling corn, and receiving money,) to take them to his house, and make ready for their entertainment. Though Joseph, saw Benjamin there, he would not leave his work at working-time, nor trust another with it. Note, Business must take place of civility in its season. Our needful employments must not be neglected, no, not to pay respects to our friends.

II. Even this frightened them; (v. 18.) They were afraid, because they were brought into Joseph's house. The just challenges of their own consciences, and Joseph's violent suspicions of them, forbade them to expect any favour, and suggested to them, that this was done with a bad design upon them. Note, Those that are guilty and timorous, are apt to make the worst of every thing. Now they thought they should be reckoned with about the money in the sacks' mouths, and should be charged as cheats, and men not fit to be dealt with, who had taken advantage of the hurry of the market, to carry off their corn unpaid for. They therefore laid the case before the steward, that he, being apprised of it, might stand between them and danger. Herein they gave substantial proof of their honesty, that, before they were charged with taking back their money, they produced it. Note, Integrity and uprightness will be found to be good for, and will clear themselves as the light of the morning.

III. The steward encouraged them; (v. 23.) Peace be to you, fear not; though he knew not what his master drove at, yet, he was aware, these were men whom he meant no harm to, while he thus amused them; and therefore he directs them to look at the Divine Providence in the return of their money. Your God, and the God of your father, has given you treasure in your sacks. Observe, 1. Hereby he shows that he had no suspicion at all of dishonesty in them: for, of what we get by deceit, we cannot say, "God gives it us."
III. The great kindness that Joseph showed to them, while they had little thought it was a brotherly kindness. He is—

1. His kind inquiry concerning Jacob, Is he yet alive? A very fit question to be asked concerning any, especially concerning old people; for we are dying daily; it is strange, that we are yet alive. Jacob had said, many years before, I will go to the grave to my son; but he is yet alive: we must not die till then.

2. The kind notice he took of Benjamin, his own brother. (1) He put up a prayer for him, (v. 29.) God be gracious unto thee, my son. Joseph's favour, though he was the lord of the land, would do him little good, unless God were gracious to him. Many seek the ruler's favour, but he directs him to seek the favour of the Ruler of rulers. (2) He shed some tears for him, v. 30. His natural affection to his brother, his joy to see him, his concern to see him and the rest of them in distress for bread, and the remembrance of his own griefs since he last saw him, produced a great agitation in him, which perhaps was the more uneasy, because he endeavoured to stifle and suppress it; but he was forced to retire into his closet, there to give vent to his feelings by tears. Note, [1.] Tears of tenderness and affection are no disarrayment at all, even to the great and wise men. [2.] Great men should not proclaim their tears, My soul shall weep in secret, says the prophet, Jer. 13. 17. Peter went out and wept bitterly. See Matt. 26. 75. 3. His kind entertainment of them all; when his weeping had subsided so that he could restrain himself, he sat down to dinner with them, treated them nobly, and yet contrived every thing to amuse them. (1.) He ordered three tables to be spread, one for his brethren, another for his domestics that dined with him, (for so different were their customs, that they did not care to eat together,) another for himself, who durst not own himself a Hebrew, and yet would not sit with the Egyptians. See here an instance, [1.] Of hospitality and good house-keeping, which is a very commendable thing, according to the ability is, [2.] Of compliance with people's customs, and of remembering ourselves, as Bishop Patrick calls this of the Egyptians not eating with the Hebrews. Though Joseph was the lord of the land, and orders were given that all people should obey him; yet he would not force the Egyptians to eat with the Hebrews, against their minds, but let them enjoy their humours; spirits truly generous hate to impose. [3.] Of the early distance between Jews and Gentiles; one table would not hold them. (2.) He placed his brethren according to their seniority, (v. 33.) as if he could certainly divine. Some think they placed themselves so, according to their custom; but if so, I see not why such particular notice is taken of it, especially as a thing they marvelled at. (3.) He gave them a very plentiful entertainment, sent refreshments to them from his own table, v. 34. This was the more generous in him, and the more engaging to them, because of the present scarcity of provisions. In a day of famine, it is enough to be fed; but they here were feasted. Perhaps they had not had such a good dinner for many months. It is said, They drank and were merry; their cares and fears were now over, and they ate their bread with joy, concluding they were now upon good terms with the man, the lord of the land. If God accepts our works, our present, we have reason to be cheerful. Yet when we sit, as they here did, to eat with a ruler, we should consider what is before us, and not indulge our appetite, or be desirous of dainties. Prov. 23. 1-3. Joseph gave them to understand that Benjamin was his favourite; for his mess was five times as much as any of theirs, not as if he... would have him eat so much more than the rest, for then he must eat more than would do him good; (and it is no act of friendship, but an injury and unkindness rather, to press any either to eat or drink to excess;) but thus he would testify his particular respect for him, that he might try whether his brethren would envy Benjamin his larger messes, as formerly they had envied him a finer coat. And it must be our rule, in such cases, to be content with what we have, and not to grieve at what others have.

CHAP. XLIV.

Joseph having entertained his brethren, dismissed them; but here we have them brought back in a manner fright than any they had been in yet. Observe, I. What method he took, both to humble them further, and also to try their affection to his brother Benjamin, by which he would be able to judge of the sincerity of their repentance for what they had done against him, which he was desirous to be satisfied of, before he manifested his reconciliation to them. This he contrived to do by bringing Benjamin into distress, v. 1-17. II. The good success of the experiment; he found them all heartily concerned, and Judah particularly, both for the safety of Benjamin and for the comfort of their aged father, v. 18.

1. AND he commanded the steward of his house, saying, Fill the men's sacks with food, as much as they can carry, and put every man's money in his sack's mouth. 2. And put my cup, the silver cup, in the sack's mouth of the youngest, and his corn money. And he did according to the word that Joseph had spoken. 3. As soon as the morning was light, the men were sent away, they and their asses. 4. And when they were gone out of the city, and not yet far off, Joseph said unto his steward, Up, follow after the men; and when thou dost overtake them, say unto them, Wherefore have ye rewarded evil for good? 5. Is not this it in which my lord dranketh, and whereby indeed he divineth? Ye have done evil in so doing. 6. And he overtook them, and he spake unto them these same words. 7. And they said unto him, Wherefore saith my lord these words? God forbid that thy servants should do according to this thing: 8. Behold, the money which we found in our sacks' mouths we brought again unto thee out of the land of Canaan: how then should we steal out of thy lord's house silver or gold? 9. With whomsoever of thy servants it be found, both let him die, and we also will be my lord's bondmen. 10. And he said, Now also let it be according unto your words: he with whom it is found shall be my servant; and ye shall be blameless. 11. Then they speedily took down every man his sack to the ground, and opened every man his sack. 12. And he searched, and began at the eldest, and left at the youngest: and the cup was found in Benjamin's sack. 13. Then they rent their clothes, and laded every man his ass, and returned to the city. 14. And Judah and his brethren came to Joseph's house; for he was yet there: and they fell before him on the ground. 15. And Joseph said unto them, what deed is this that ye have done? Wot ye not that such a man as I can certainly divine? 16. And Judah said, What shall we say unto our lord? What shall we speak? Or how shall we clear ourselves? God hath found out the iniquity of thy servants: behold, we are my lord's servants, both we, and he also with whom the cup is found. 17. And he said, God forbid that I should do so: but the man in whose hand the cup is found, he shall be my servant; and as for you, get you up in peace unto your father.

Here, I. Joseph heaps further kindnesses upon his brethren, fills their sacks, returns their money, and sends them away full of grace. But, II. He exercises them with further trials. Our God thus humbles those whom he loves, and loads with benefits. Joseph ordered his steward to put a fine silver cup which he had, (and which it is likely, was used at his table when they dined with him,) into Benjamin's sack's mouth, that it might seem as if he had stolen it from the table, and put it there himself, after his corn was delivered him. If Benjamin had stolen it, it had been the basest piece of dishonesty and ingratitude that could be; and if Joseph, by ordering it to be put there, had designed really to take advantage against him, it had been in him most horrid cruelty and oppression; but it proved in the issue, that there was no harm done, nor any designed on either side. Observe, 1. How the pretended criminals were pursued and arrested, on suspicion of having stolen a silver cup. The steward charged them with ingratITUDE, rewarding evil for good; with folly, in taking away a cup of daily use, and which therefore would soon be missed, and diligent search made for it; for so it may be read, (v. 5.) Is not this it in which my lord drinketh, (as having a particular fondness for it,) and for which he would search thoroughly? Or, "by which, leaving it carelessly at your table, he would make trial whether you were honest men or no?" 2. How they pleaded for themselves; they solemnly protested their innocence, and detestation of so base a thing; (v. 7.) urged it as an instance of their honesty, that they had brought their money back; (v. 8.) and offered to submit to the severest punishment, if they should be found guilty, v. 9, 10. 3. How the theft was fastened upon Benjamin; in his sack the cup was found, to whom Joseph had been particularly kind. Benjamin, no doubt, was ready to deny upon oath, the taking of the cup, and we may suppose him as little liable to suspicion as any of them; but it is in vain to confront such notations with force, the cup is found in his cup, and they dare not arraign Joseph's justice, nor so much as suggest that perhaps he that had put their money in their sacks' mouths, had put the cup there; but they throw themselves upon Joseph's mercy. And, 4. Here is their humble submission, v. 16. (1.) They acknowledge the righteousness of God, God hath found out the iniquity of thy servants; perhaps referring to the injury they had formerly done to Joseph, for which they thought God was now reckoning with them. Note, Even in those afflictions wherein we apprehend ourselves wronged by men, yet we must own that God is righteous, and finds out our iniquity. (2) They surrender themselves prisoners to Joseph, We are my lord's servants. Now Joseph's dreams were accomplished to the utmost; their bowing so often, and doing obeisance, might be looked upon as a compliment, and no more than what other strangers did; but the construction they themselves, in their prison, laid upon his dreams, was, Shall thou have dominion over us? ch. 37. 8. And in that sense it is now at length fulfilled, they own themselves his vassals; since they did invidiously so understand it, so it shall be fulfilled in them.

5. Joseph with an air of justice, gives sentence, that Benjamin only should be kept in bondage, and the rest should be dismissed; for why should any suffer but the guilty? Perhaps Joseph intended hereby to try Benjamin's temper, whether he could bear such a hardship as this, with the calmness and composure of mind that became a wise and good man; in short, whether he was indeed his own brother, in spirit, as well as blood; for Joseph himself had been falsely accused, and had suffered hard things in consequence, and yet kept possession of his own soul: however, it is plain, he intended hereby to try the affection of his brethren to him, and to their father. If they had gone away contentedly, and Benjamin in bondage, no doubt Joseph would soon have released and promoted him, and sent notice to Jacob, and would have left the rest of his brethren justly to suffer for their hard-heartedness; but they proved to be better affected to Benjamin than he feared. Note, We cannot judge what men are, by what they have been formerly; nor what they will do, by what they have done. Experience may make us wiser and better. They that had sold Joseph, yet would not now abandon Benjamin: the worst may mend in time.

18. Then Judah came near unto him, and said, Oh my lord, let thy servant, I pray thee, speak a word in my lord's ears, and let not thine anger burn against thy servant: for thou art even as Pharaoh. 19. My lord asked his servants, saying, Have ye a father, or a brother? 20. And we said unto our lord, We have a father, an old man, and a child of his old age, a little one; and his brother is dead, and he alone is left of his mother, and his father loveth him. 21. And thou saidst unto thy servants, Bring him down unto me, that I may set mine eyes upon him. 22. And we said unto our lord, The lad cannot leave his father; for if he should leave his father, his father would die. 23. And thou saidst unto thy servants, Except your youngest brother come down with you, ye shall see my face no more. 24. And it came to pass when we came up unto thy servant my father, we told him the words of my lord. 25. And our father said, Go again, and buy us a little food. 26. And we said, We cannot go down: if our youngest brother be with us, then will we go down: for we may not see the man's face, except our youngest brother be with us. 27. And thy servant my father said unto us, Ye know that my wife bare me two sons: 28. And the one went out from me, and I said, Surely he is torn in pieces; and I saw him not since: 29. And if ye take this also from me, and mischief befall him, ye shall bring down my gray hairs with sorrow to the grave. 30. Now therefore when I come to thy servant my father, and the lad be not with us; seeing that his life is bound up in the lad's life: 31. It shall come to pass, when he seeth that the lad is not with us, that he will die: and thy servants shall bring down the gray hairs of thy servant our father with sorrow to the grave. 32. For thy servant became surety for the lad unto my father, saying, If I bring him not unto thee, then I shall bear the blame to my father for ever. 33. Now therefore, I pray thee, let thy servant abide instead of the lad a bondman to my lord; and let the lad go up with his brethren. 34. For how shall I go up to my father, and the lad be not with me? Lest peradventure I see the evil that shall come on my father.

We have here a most ingenious and pathetic speech, which Judah made to Joseph on Benjamin's behalf, to obtain his discharge from the sentence passed upon him: either Judah was a better friend to Benjamin than the rest were, and more solicitous to bring him off; or, he thought himself under greater obligations to endeavour it than the rest, because he had passed his word to his father for his safe return; or, the rest chose him for their spokesman, because he was a man of better sense, and better spirit, and had a greater command of language than any of them. His address, as it is here reported, is so very natural, and so expressive of his present feelings, that we cannot but suppose Moses, who wrote it so long after, to have written it under the special direction of him that made man's mouth. A great deal of unaffected art, and unstudied unforced rhetoric, there is in this speech.

1. He addresses himself to Joseph with a great deal of respect and deference; calls him his lord, himself and his brethren his servants, begs his patient hearing, and ascribes sovereign authority to him, "Thou art even as Pharaoh; whose favour we desire, and whose wrath we dread, as we do Pharaoh's." Religion does not destroy good manners, and it is prudence to speak obligingly to those at whose mercy we lie: titles of honour to those that are entitled to them, are not flattering titles.

2. He represented Benjamin as one well worthy of his compassionate consideration: (v. 20.) he was a little one, compared with the rest of them; the youngest, not acquainted with the world, nor ever mured to hardship, having always been brought up tenderly with his father, it made the case more pitiable, that he alone was left of his mother, and his brother was dead, namely, Joseph: little did Judah think, what a tender point he touched on now. Judah knew that Joseph was sold, and therefore he had reason enough to think that he was alive; however, he could not be sure that he was dead, but they had made their father believe he was dead; and now they had told that lie so long, that they had forgotten the truth, and began to believe the lie themselves.

III. He urged it very closely, that Joseph had himself constrained them to bring Benjamin with them, had expressed a desire to see him, (v. 21.) and had forbidden them his present, unless they brought Benjamin with them, (v. 23, 26.) all which intimated that he designed him some kindness, and must he be brought with so much difficulty to the prefaces of a perpetual slavery? Was he not brought to Egypt, in obedience, purely in obedience, to the command of Joseph; and could he not show some evidence? Some observe, that Jacob's sons, in reasoning with their father, had said, We will not go down, unless Benjamin go with us, (ch. 43. 5.) but that when Judah comes here to relate the story, he expresses it more decently, This we cannot go down, with any expectation to speed well. Indecent words spoken in haste to our superiors, shall be recalled and amended.

IV. The great argument he insists upon, was, the insupportable grief it would be to his aged father, if Benjamin should be left behind in servitude; His father loveth him, v. 20. This they had pleaded against Joseph's insisting on his coming down, (v. 22.) If he should leave his father, his father would die; much more if now he be left behind, never more to return to him. This the old man, of whom they spake, had declared in his former journey, he should bring down my gray hairs, that crown of glory, with sorrow to the grave. This therefore Judah presses with a great deal of earnestness, His life is bound up in the lad's life; (v. 30.) when he sees that the lad is not with us, he will faint away, and die immediately, (v. 31.) or will abandon himself to such a degree of sorrow, as will, in a few days, make an end of him. And truly, Joseph's sentence, and to show his sincerity in this plea, offers himself to become a bondman instead of Benjamin, v. 33. Thus the law would be satisfied; Joseph would be no loser; (for we may suppose Judah a more able-bodied man than Benjamin, and fitter for service;) and Jacob would better bear the loss of him than of Benjamin. Now, so far was he from grieving at his father's particular fondness for Benjamin, that he is himself willing to be a bondman, to indulge it.

Now, had Joseph been as Judah supposed him, an utter stranger to the family, yet even common humanity could not but be wrought upon by such powerful reasonings as these; for nothing could be said more moving, more tender; it was enough to make a heart as Joseph's melt at the thought of a sorrower akin to Benjamin than Judah himself was, and who, at this time, felt a greater affection both for him and his aged father, than Judah did, nothing could be more pleasingly or more happily said. Neither Jacob nor Benjamin needed an intercessor with Joseph; for he himself loved them.

Upon the whole matter, let us take notice, 1. His prayerfully Dudley, all mention of the crime that was charged upon Benjamin. Had he said anything by way of acknowledgment of it, he had reflected on Benjamin's honesty, and seemed too forward to suspect that; had he said anything by way of denial of it, he had reflected on Joseph's justice, and the sentence he had passed: therefore he wholly waves that head, and appeals to Joseph's pity.

Compare with this that of J. c. in humblest himself before God, (Job 9. 15.) Though I were a sinner, would you say so? I, there is no arguing, but petition, I would make supplication to my judge. 2. What good reason dying J. c. had to say, Judah, thou art he whom thy brethren shall praise, (ch. 49. 8.) for he excelled them all in boldness, wisdom, eloquence, and especially tenderness for their father and family. 3. Judah's faithful adherence to Benjamin, now in his distress, was reason of the special commendation of the tribe of Benjamin to the tribe of Judah, when all the other ten tribes had deserted it. 4. How fitly does the apostle, when he is discussing the mediation of Christ, observe, that our Lord sprang out of Judah; (Heb. 7. 14.) for, like his father Judah, he not only made intercession for the transgressors, but he became a surety for them, as it follows there, (v. 22.) testifying therein a very tender concern, both for his father and for his brethren.

CHAP. XLV.

It is a pity that this chapter and that foregoing should be parted, and read asunder. There we had Judah's intercession for Benjamin, with which, we may suppose, the rest of his brethren signified their concurrence; Joseph let him go on without interruption, heard all he had to say, and granted his request. When, in the next chapter, Joseph, now, he found his brethren humbled for their sins, mindful of himself, (for Judah had mentioned him twice in his speech,) respectful to their father, and very tender of their brother, he gave way, they would not comfort he designed them, by making himself known to them, which we have the story of in this chapter: it was to Joseph's brethren as clear shining after rain, it was to them as life from the dead. Here is, I. Joseph's discovery of himself to his brethren, and his discourse with them upon that occasion, v. 1. 15. I. The orders Pharaoh, hereupon, gave to fetch Jacob and his family down to Egypt, and Joseph's despatch of his brethren, according, back to his father with those orders, v. 16. 24. III. The joyful tidings of this brought to Jacob, v. 25. 28.

1. THEN Joseph could not refrain himself before all them that stood by him; and he cried, Cause every man to go out from me. And there stood no man with him, while Joseph made himself known unto his brethren. 2. And he wept aloud; and the Egyptians and the house of Pharaoh heard. 3. And Joseph said unto his brethren, I am Joseph; Dost my father yet live? And his brethren could not answer him; for they were troubled at his presence. 4. And Joseph said unto his brethren, Come near to me, I pray you. And they came near. And he said, I am Joseph your brother, whom ye sold into Egypt. 5. Now therefore be not grieved, nor angry with yourselves, that ye sold me hither: for God did send me before you to preserve life. 6. For these two years hath the famine been in the land: and yet there are five years, in the which shall neither be eating nor harvest. 7. And God sent me before you to preserve you a posterity in the earth, and to save your lives by a great deliverance. 8. So now it was not you that sent me hither, but God; and he hath made me a father to Pharaoh, and lord of all his house.
and a ruler throughout all the land of Egypt. 9. Haste ye, and go up to my father, and say unto him, Thus saith thy son Joseph, God hath made me lord of all Egypt; come down unto me, tarry not: 10. And thou shalt dwell in the land of Goshen, and thou shalt be near unto me, thou, and thy children, and thy children's children, and thy flocks, and thy herds, and all that thou hast: 11. And there will I nourish thee; for yet there are five years of famine; lest thou, and thy household, and all that thou hast, come to poverty. 12. And, behold, your eyes see, and the eyes of my brother Benjamin, that it is my mouth that speaketh unto you. 13. And ye shall tell my father of all my glory in Egypt, and of all that ye have seen; and ye shall haste and bring down my father hither. 14. And he fell upon his brother Benjamin's neck, and wept; and Benjamin wept upon his neck. 15. Moreover he kissed all his brethren, and wept upon them: and after that his brethren talked with him.

Judah and his brethren were waiting for an answer, and could not but be amazed to discover instead of the gravity of a judge, the natural affection of a father or brother. I. Joseph ordered all his attendants to withdraw, v. 1. The private conversations of friends are the most free: when Joseph would put on love, he puts off state; which it was not fit his servants should be witnesses of. Thus Christ graciously manifests himself and his loving kindness to his people, out of the sight and hearing of the world.

II. Tears were the preface or introduction to his discourse, v. 2. He had dammed up this stream a great while, and with much ado; but now it swelled so high, that this tear could not be constrained but to break out aloud, so that those whom he had forbidden to see him, could not but hear him. These were tears of tenderness and strong affection, and with these he threw off that austerity with which he had hitherto carried himself toward his brethren; for he could bear it no longer. This represents the divine compassion toward returning penitents, as much as that of the father of the prodigal, Luke 15. 20. Hos. 11. 8. 9.

III. He very abruptly (as one uneasy till it was out) tells them who he was, I am Joseph. They knew him only by his Egyptian name, Zaphnath-paneah, his Hebrew name being lost and forgotten in Egypt; but now he teaches them to call him by that, I am Joseph: nay, that they might not suspect it was another of the same name, he explains himself; (v. 4. ) I am Joseph, your brother. This would both humble them yet more for their sin in selling him, and would encourage them to hope for kind treatment. Thus when Christ would convince Paul, he said, I am Jesus; and when he would comfort his disciples, he said, It is I, be not afraid. This word, at first, startled Joseph's brethren; they started back through fear, or, at least, stood still astonished; but Joseph called kindly and familiarly to them, Come near, I pray you. Thus when Christ manifests himself to his people, he encourages them to draw near to him with a true heart. Perhaps being about to speak of their selling of him, he would not speak aloud, lest the Egyptians should overhear, and it should make the Hebrews to be yet more an abomination to them; therefore he would have them come near, that he might whisper with them, which, now that the tide of his passion was a little over, he was able to do; whereas, at first, he could not but cry out.

IV. He endeavours to soften their grief for the injuries they had done him, by showing them, that whatever they designed, God meant it for good, and had brought much good out of it, (v. 5. ) Be not grieved, nor angry with yourselves. Sinners must grieve and be angry with themselves, for their sins; Joseph, though his heart was grieved, yet he often prays for them, for that is no thanks to the sinner, but true penitents should be greatly affected with it, when they see God bringing good out of evil, meat out of theater. Though we must not with this consideration extenuate our own sins, and so take off the edge of our repentance; yet it may do well thus to extenuate the sins of others, and so take off the edge of our angry resentments. Thus Joseph does here; his brethren needed not to fear that he would avenge upon them an injury which God's providence had made to turn so much to his advantage, and that of his family. Now he tells them how long the famine was likely to last, five years; yet, (v. 6. ) what a capacity he was in of being kind to his relations and friends, which is the greatest satisfaction that wealth and power can give to a good man. Jacob, v. 8. And thus he used a favourable colour he puts upon the injury they had done him, God sent me before you, v. 5. 7. Note, 1. God's Israel is the particular care of God's providence. Joseph reckoned that his advancement was designed, not so much to save a whole kingdom of Egyptians, as to preserve a small family of Israelites; for the Lord's portion is his people; whatever goes with others, they shall be secured. 2. Providence looks a great way forward, and has a long reach; even long before the years of plenty, Providence was preparing for the supply of Jacob's house in the years of famine. The Psalmist praiseth God for this, (Ps. 103. 17. ) He sent a man before them, even Joseph. God sees his work from the beginning to the end, but we do not, Ex. 3. 11. How admirable are the projects of Providence! How far beyond the knowledge of the children of men! What whisjier they are there within wheels, and yet all directed by the eyes in the wheels, and the spirit of the living creature! Let us therefore judge nothing before the time.

3. God often works by contraries; the envy and contention of brethren threaten the ruin of families, yet, in this instance they prove the occasion of preserving Jacob's family. Joseph had never been the shepherd and stone of Israel, if his brethren had not shot at him, and hated him; even those that had wickedly sold Joseph into Egypt, yet themselves reaped the benefit of the good God brought out of it; as those that put Christ to death, were many of them saved by his death.

4. God must have all the glory of the reasonable preservation of families and nations, without which, by what soever they are effected, (v. 8. ) It was not you that sent me hither, but God. As, on the one hand, they must not fret at it, because it ended so well; so, on the other hand, they must not be proud of it, because it was God's doing, and not their. They designed, by selling him into Egypt, to defeat his dreams, but God thereby designed to accomplish them. Isa. 46. 9. 10. Yet shall he see his seed, and spread abroad his children.
Egypt; (v. 9.) they must tell him of all his glory there, v. 13. He knew it would be a refreshing oil to his hoary head, and a sovereign cordial to his spirits. If any thing would make him young again, this would. He desires them to give themselves, and take with them to their father, all possible satisfaction of the truth of these surprising tidings, (v. 12.) You now see it is my mouth. If the thing is too well recollected, they might remember something of his features, speech, &c. and be satisfied.

2. He is very earnest that his father and all his family should come to him to Egypt; Come down unto me, tarry not, v. 9. He allots his dwelling in Goshen, that part of Egypt which lay toward Canaan, that they might be mindful of the country from which they were to come out, v. 10. He promises to provide for him, (v. 11.) I will nourish thee. Note, It is the duty of children, if the necessity of their parents do at any time require it, to support and supply them to the utmost of their ability; and Corban will never excuse them, Mark 7. 11. This is showing piety at home, 1 Tim. 5. 4. Our Lord Jesus being, like Joseph, exalted to the highest honours and powers of the upper world, it is his will that all that are his, should be with him where he is, John 14. 3. This is his commandment, that we be with him now in faith and hope, and a heavenly conversation; and this is his promise, that we shall be for ever with him.

VI. Endearments were interchanged between him and his brethren. He began with the youngest, his own brother Benjamin, who was but about a year old when he was separated from his brethren; they went on each other's neck, (v. 14.) perhaps to think of their mother Rachel, who died in travail of Benjamin. Rachel, in her husband Jacob, had been lately weeping for her children, because, in his apprehension, they were not, Joseph gone, and Benjamin going; and now they are weeping for her, because she was not. After he had embraced Benjamin, he, in like manner, caressed them all; (v. 15.) and then, his brethren talked with him freely and familiarly of all the affairs of their father's house. After the tokens of true reconciliation, follow the instances of a sweet communion.

16. And the fame thereof was heard in Pharaoh's house, saying, Joseph's brethren are come: and it pleased Pharaoh well, and his servants. 17. And Pharaoh said unto Joseph, Say unto thy brethren, This do ye; lade your beasts, and go, get you unto the land of Canaan; 18. And take your father and your households, and come unto me: and I will give you the good of the land of Egypt, and ye shall eat the fat of the land. 19. Now thou art commanded this do ye; take you wagons out of the land of Egypt for your little ones, and for your wives, and bring your father, and come. 20. Also regard not your stuff; for the good of all the land of Egypt is yours. 21. And the children of Israel did so; and Joseph gave them wagons, according to the commandment of Pharaoh, and gave them provision for the way. 22. To all of them he gave each man changes of raiment; but to Benjamin he gave three hundred pieces of silver, and five changes of raiment. 23. And to his father he sent after this manner; ten asses laden with the good things of Egypt, and ten she-asses laden with corn and bread and meat for his father by the way. 24. So he sent his brethren away, and they departed: and he said unto them, See that ye fall not out by the way.

I. The kindness of Pharaoh to Joseph, and to his relations, for his sake; he bade his brethren welcome, (v. 16.) though it was a time of scarcity, and they were likely to be a charge to him. Nay, because it pleased Pharaoh well, he gave them too, at least they pretended to be pleased, because Pharaoh was. He engaged Joseph to send for his father down to Egypt, and promised to furnish them with all conveniences both for his removal thither, and his settlement there. If the good of all the land of Egypt (as it was now better stocked than any other land, thanks to Joseph, under God,) would suffice him, he was welcome to it all, it was all his own, even the fat of the land, (v. 18.) so that they need not regard their stuff, v. 20. What they had in Canaan he reckoned but stuff, in comparison with what he had for them in Egypt; and therefore if they should leave some of that behind them, let them not be discontented; Egypt would afford them enough to make up the losses of their removal. Thus those for whom Christ intends to provide, he will provide; but the style of his providing is different, and the manner of his using of his provision is different from what we are to expect. It is not to be supposed that he should be generous, liberal, and lavish; but what he has and gives is in strict conformity with the spirit of his command, looking to the end, and making the people to find the mind of God in this as well as in all his providence; that is, he willed they should study to provide it, not only to them, but to their relations. And Joseph likewise was respectful to his father and brethren in duty, because they were his near relations, though his brethren had been his enemies, and his father long a stranger.

1. He furnished them for necessity, v. 21. He gave them wagons and provisions for the way, both going and returning, and for what was necessary. 2. He furnished them with provision for the way. To his brethren he gave two suits of a piece of good clothes, to Benjamin five suits, and money besides in his pocket, v. 22. To his father he gave a very handsome present of the varieties of Egypt, v. 23. Note, Those that are wealthy, should be generous and devise liberal things; what is an abundance good for but to do good with it?

3. He dismissed them with a seasonable caution, (v. 24.) See that you fall not out by the way. He knew they were but too apt to be quarrelsome; and what had lately passed, which revived the remembrance of what they had done formerly against their brother, might give them occasion to quarrel. Joseph had observed them contend about it, ch. 42. 22.
To one they would say, "It was you that first uprighted him with his dreams," to another, "It was you that said, Let us kill him," to another, "It was you that strewed him of his fine coat," to another, "It was you that threw him into the pit."

Now Joseph having forgiven them all, lays this obligation upon them, not to upright one another. This charge our Lord Jesus has given us, that we love one another, that we live in peace, that, whatever occurs, or whatever former occurrences are remembered, we will not out for. (1.) We are brethren, we have all one father. (2.) We are his brethren, and we shame our relation to him who is our Peace, if we fall out. (3.) We are guilty, verily guilty, and, instead of quarrelling with one another, let us give a great deal of reason to fall out with ourselves. (4.) We are, or hope to be, forgiven of God whom we have all offended, and therefore should be ready to forswear all cause, which should arise from our mutual quarrelling. (5.) We are by the way, a way that lies through the land of Egypt, where we have many eyes upon us, that seek occasion and advantage against us; a way that leads to Canaan, where we hope to be for ever in perfect peace.

25. And they went up out of Egypt, and came into the land of Canaan unto Jacob their father, 26. And told him, saying, Joseph is yet alive, and he is governor over all the land of Egypt. And Jacob's heart fell, for he believed them not. 27. And they told him all the words of Joseph, which he had said unto them: and when he saw the wagons which Joseph had sent to carry him, the spirit of Jacob their father revived: 28. And Israel said, It is enough; Joseph my son is yet alive: I will go and see him before I die.

We have here the good news brought to Jacob.

1. The relation of it, at first, sunk his spirits: when, without any preamble, his sons came in, crying, Joseph is yet alive, each striving which should first proclaim it, perhaps he thought they bantered him, and the affrighted him; or, the very mention of Joseph's name revived his sorrow, so that his heart fell; (v. 26) it was a good while before he came to himself. He was in such care and fear about the rest of them, that, at this time, it would have been joy enough to him to hear that Simeon is released, and Benjamin is come safe home; (for he had been ready to despair concerning both these) but to hear that Joseph is yet alive, is too good news to be true; he faints, for he believes it not. Note, We faint, because we do not believe; David himself had faint ed, if he had not believed, Ps. 27. 13.

2. The confirmation of it, by degrees, revived his spirit; Jacob had easily believed his sons formerly, when they told him, Joseph is dead; but he can hardly believe them now that they tell him, Joseph is alive. Weak and tender spirits are influenced more by fear than hope, and are more apt to receive impressions that are discouraging than those that are encouraging. But, at length, Jacob is convinced of the truth of the story, especially when he sees the wagons which were sent to carry him; for seeing is believing; then his spirit revived. Death is as the wagons that are sent to fetch us to Christ: the very sight of it approaching should revive us. Now Jacob is called Israel, (v. 28) for he begins to recover his wonted vigour. (1.) It pleases him to think that Joseph is alive. He says nothing of Joseph's glory, which they told him of; it was enough to him that Joseph was alive. Note, Those that would be content with lesser degrees of comfort, are best prepared for greater. (2.) It pleases him to think of going to see him. Though he was old, and the journey long, yet he would go to see Joseph, because Joseph's business would not permit him to come to see him. Observe, He says, "I will go and see him," not, "I will go and live with him." Jacob was old, and did not expect to live long: "But I will go and see him before I die, and then let me depart in peace; let my eyes be refreshed with this sight before I die." Jacob is open; I need no more to make me happy in this world." Note, It is good for us all to make death familiar to us, and to speak of it as near, that we may think how little we have to do before we die, that we may do it with all our might, and may enjoy our comforts as those that must quickly die, and leave them.

CHAP. XLVI.

Jacob is here removing to Egypt in his old age, forced thither by a famine, and invited thither by a son. Here, 1. God sends him thither, v. 1. 2. All his family goes with him thither, v. 3. 27. III. Joseph bids him welcome thither, v. 28. 34.

1. AND Israel took his journey with all that he had, and came to Beer-sheba, and offered sacrifices unto the God of his father Isaac. 2. And God spake unto Israel in the visions of the night, and said, Jacob, Jacob. And he said, Here am I. 3. And he said, I am God, the God of thy father: fear not to go down into Egypt; for I will there make of thee a great nation: 4. I will go down with thee into Egypt; and I will also surely bring thee up again: and Joseph shall put his hand upon thine eyes.

The divine precept is, In all thy ways acknowledge God; and the promise annexed to it is, He shall direct thy paths. Jacob has here a very great concern before him, not only a journey, but a removal, a new place, to see his sons again; a change which was very surprising to him, (for he had not been in Egypt since any other thoughts than to live and die in Canaan,) and which would be of great consequence to his family for a long time to come; now here we are told, I. How he acknowledged God in this way. He came to Beer-sheba, from Hebron, where he now dwelt, and there he offered sacrifices to the God of his father Isaac, v. 1. 2. He chose that place, in remembrance of the communion which his father and grandfather had with God in that place. Abraham called on God there, (ch. 21. 33.) so did Isaac; (ch. 26. 25.) and therefore Jacob made it the place of his devotion, the rather because it lay in his way. In his devotion, 1. He had an eye to God as the God of his father Isaac, that is, a God in covenant with him; for by Isaac the covenant was entailed upon him. God, the covenant God, was to go down to Egypt, when there was a famine in Canaan, (ch. 26. 2.) which perhaps Jacob calls to mind, when he consults God as the God of his father Isaac, with this thought, "Lord, though I am very desirous to see Joseph, yet if thou forbid me to go down to Egypt, as thou didst my father Isaac, I will submit, and very contentedly stay where I am." 2. He offered sacrifices, extraordinary sacrifices, beside those at his stated times; these sacrifices were offered, (1.) By way of thanksgiving for the late blessed change of the face of his family, for the good news he had received concerning Joseph, and for the hopes he had of seeing him. Note, We should give God thanks for the beginnings of mercy, though they are not yet perfected; and this is a decent way of begging further mercy. (2.) By way of petition for the presence of God with him in his intended journey; he desired by these sacrifices to make his peace with God, to obtain the forgiveness of sin, that he might take no guilt along with him in this business. (3.) By way of public intercesson. By Christ, the great Sacrifice, we must reconcile ourselves to God, and offer up our requests to him.
(5.) By way of consultation: the Heathen consulted their oracles by sacrifice. Jacob would not go till he had asked God's leave; “Shall I go down to Egypt, or back to Hebron?” Such must be our inquiries in doubtful cases; and though we cannot expect immediate answers from Heaven, yet if we faithfully attend to the direct word of the text, conscience, and providence, we shall find it is not in vain to ask counsel of God.

II. How God did direct his paths. In the visions of the night, (probably, the very next night after he had offered his sacrifices, as 2 Chron. 1. 7.) God spake unto him, v. 2. Note, Those who desire to keep up communion with God, shall find that it never fails on his side. If we speak to him as we ought, he will answer us. God called him by name, by his old name, Jacob, Jacob, to remind him of his low estate; his present fears did scarcely become an Israel. Jacob, like one well acquainted with the visions of the Almighty, and ready to obey them, answers, “Here am I, ready to receive orders:” and what has God to say to him?

1. He renews the covenant with him; I am God, the God of thy father, (v. 3.) that is, “I am what thou ownest me to be: thou shalt find me a God, a divine wisdom and power engaged for thee; and thou shalt find me the God of thy father, true to the covenant made with him.”

2. He encourages him to make this remove of his family; Fear not to go down into Egypt. It seems, though Jacob, upon the first intelligence of Joseph's life and glory in Egypt, reasoned, without any hesitation, I will go and see him; yet, upon second thoughts, he saw some difficulties in it, which he knew not well how to get over. Note, Even those changes which seem to have in them the greatest joys and hopes, yet have an allay of cares and fears, Nulla est sincera voluptas—There is no unmingled pleasure. We must always rejoice with trembling.
Jacob had many careful thoughts about this journey, which God took notice of. (1.) He was old, 130 years; yet he was not emptied of his desires. He inquired of God about the posterity of old people, that they are afraid of that which is high, and fears are in the way, Eccl. 12. 5. It was a long journey, and Jacob was unfit for travel, and perhaps remembered that his beloved Rachel died in a journey. (2.) He feared lest his sons should be tainted with the idolatry of Egypt, and forget the God of their fathers, or enamoured with the pleasures of Egypt, and forget the land of promise.
(3.) He knew how false of what God had said to Abraham concerning the bondage and affliction of his seed, (ch. 15. 13.) and was apprehensive that his remove to Egypt would issue in that. Present satisfactions should not take us off from the conser-dation and prospect of future inconveniences, which possibly may arise from that which now appears most promising. (4.) He could not think of laying his bones in Egypt. But whatever his discomfort, there was one comfort which he was ready to answer them all, Fear not to go down into Egypt.

3. He promises him comfort in the rem
ve. (1.) That he should multiply in Egypt; “I will there, where thou fearest that thy family will sink, and be lost, make it a great nation.” That is the place Infinit Wisdom has chosen for the accomplishment of that promise.” (2.) That he should have God's presence with him; I will go down with thee into Egypt. Note, Those that go whither God sends them, shall certainly have God with them; and that is enough to secure them wherever they are, and to secure their fears; we may safely venture into Egypt, if God go down with us. (3.) That neither he nor his should be lost in Egypt; I will surely bring thee up again. Though Jacob died in Egypt, yet this promise was fulfilled. [1.] In the bringing up his body, to be buried in Canaan, about which it appears he was very solicitous, ch. 49. 29. 32. [2.] In the bringing up of his seed to be settled in Canaan.
Whatever low or darksome valley we are called into at any time, we may be confident, if God go down with us into it, that he will surely bring us up again. If he go with us down to the lowest place, he will surely bring us back to glory. (4.) That, living and dying, his beloved Joseph should be a comfort to him; Joseph shall put his hand upon thine eyes.
This is a promise that Joseph should live as long as he lived, that he should be with him at his death, close his eyes with all possible tenderness and respect, as the dearest relations used to do. Problably Jacob, in the multitude of his thoughts within him, had been wishing that Joseph might see this last office of love for him; Ille meos oculos comfirmat—Let him close my eyes; and God thus answered him in the letter of his desire. Thus God sometimes gratifies the innocent wishes of his people, and makes not only their death happy, but the very circumstances of it agreeable.

5. And Jacob rose up from Beer-sheba: and the sons of Israel carried Jacob their father, and their little ones, and their wives, in the wagons which Pharaoh had sent to carry him. 6. And they took their cattle, and their goods, which they had gotten in the land of Canaan, and came into Egypt.
Jacob, and all his seed with him. 7. His sons, and his sons' sons with him, his daughters and his sons' daughters, and all his seed brought he with him into Egypt. 8. And these are the names of the children of Israel, which came into Egypt, Jacob and his sons: Reuben, Jacob's first-born. 9. And the sons of Reuben; Hanoch, and Phallu and Hezron, and Carmi. 10. And the sons of Simeon; Jemuel, and Jamin, and Ohad, and Jachin, and Zohar, and Shaul the son of a Canaanitish woman. 11. And the sons of Levi; Gershon, Kohath, and Merari. 12.
And the sons of Judah; Er, and Onan, and Shelah, and Pharez, and Zarah: but Er and Onan died in the land of Canaan. And the sons of Pharez were Hezron and Hamul.
13. And the sons of Issachar; Tola, and Phuvah, and Job, and Shimron. 14. And the sons of Zebulun; Sered, and Elon, and Jahleel. 15. These be the sons of Leah, which she bare unto Jacob in Padan-aram, with his daughter Dinah: all the sons of him and his sons' daughters, were thirty and three. 16. And the sons of Gad; Ziphion, and Haggai, and Shuni, and Ezbon, and Eri, and Arodi, and Areli. 17. And the sons of Asher; Jimnah, and Ishuah, and Isui, and Beriah, and Serah their sister: and the sons of Beriah; Heber, and Malchiel. 18. These are the sons of Zilpah, whom Laban gave to Leah his daughter; and these she bare unto Jacob, even sixteen souls. 19. The sons of Rachel Jacob's wife; Joseph, and Benjamin. 20. And unto Joseph in the land of Egypt were born Manasseh and Ephraim, which Asenath the daughter of Poti-phera, priest of On bare unto him. 21. And the sons of Benjamin were Belah, and Becher, and Ashbel, Gera, and Naaman, Eli, and Rosh, Muppim, and Huppim, and Ard. 22. These are the sons of Rachel, which were born to Jacob; all the souls were fourteen. 23. And the sons of Dan; Hushim. 24. And the sons of Naphtali; Jahzeel, and Guni, and Jezer, and Shillem. 25. These are the sons of Bilhah, which Laban gave unto Rachel his daughter, and she bare these unto Jacob; all the souls were seven. 26. All the souls that came with Jacob into Egypt, which came out of his loins, besides Jacob's sons' wives, all the souls were three-score and six; 27. And the sons of Joseph, which were born him in Egypt, were two souls; all the souls of the house of Jacob, which came into Egypt, were three-score and ten.

Old Jacob is here fitting; little did he think of ever leaving Canaan; he expected, no doubt, to die in his next, and to leave his seed in actual possession of the promised land: but Providence orders it otherwise. Note, Those that think themselves well-settled, may yet be unsettled in a little time; even old people, who think of no other remove than that to the grave, (which Jacob had much upon his heart, ch. 37. 35.-41. 38.) sometimes live to see great changes in their family. It is good to be ready, not only for the grave, but for whatever may happen betwixt us and the grave.

Observe,

I. How Jacob was conveyed; not in a chariot, though chariots were then used, but in a wagon, v. 5. Jacob had the character of a plain man, who did not affect any thing stately or magnificent; his son rode in a chariot, (ch. 41. 43.) but a wagon would serve him.

II. The removal of what he had with him; 1. His effects, (v. 6.) cattle and goods; these he took with him, that he might not wholly be beholden to Pharaoh for a livelihood, and that it might not afterwards be said of them, "that they came beggars to Egypt.

2. His family, all his seed, v. 7. It is probable that they had continued to live together in common with their father; and therefore when he went, they all went; which perhaps they were the more willing to do, because, though they had heard that the land of Canaan was promised them, yet, to this day, they had none of it in possession. We have here a particular account of the names of Jacob's family; his sons' sons, most of which are afterward mentioned as heads of houses in the several tribes. See Numb. 26. 5, 6. Bishop Patrick observes, that Isaacah called his eldest son Tola, which signifies a worm, probably, because, when he was born, he was a very little weak child, a worm, and no man, not likely to live; and yet there sprang from him a very numerous offspring, 1 Chron. 7. 2. Note, Living and dying do not go by probability.

The whole number that went down into Egypt were sixty-six, (v. 26.) to which add Joseph and his two sons, who were there before, and Jacob himself, the head of the family, and you have the number of seventy, v. 27. The LXX. makes them seventy-five, and Stephen follows it, Acts 7. 14. The reason of which we leave to the conjecture of the critics;* but let us observe, (1.) That masters of families ought to take care of all under their charge, and provide for these things for them. The Israelites, yet in the wilderness, are not only convenient both for body and soul; when Jacob himself removed to a land of plenty, he would not leave any of his children behind him to starve in a barren land. 2. Though the accomplishment of promises is always sure, yet it is often slow. It was now 215 years since God had promised Abraham to make of him a great nation; (ch. 12. 2.) and yet that branch of his seed on which the promise was entailed, was as yet increased but to seventy, of which this particular account is kept, that the power of God in multiplying these seventy so vast a multitude, even in Egypt, may appear the more illustrious, when he pleases, a little one shall become a thousand, Isa. 60. 22.

28. And he sent Judah before him unto Joseph, to direct his face unto Goshen; and they came into the land of Goshen. 29. And Joseph made ready his chariot, and went up to meet Israel his father, to Goshen, and presented himself unto him; and he fell on his neck, and wept on his neck a good while. 30. And Israel said unto Joseph, Now let me die, since I have seen thy face, because thou art yet alive. 31. And Joseph said unto his brethren, and unto his father's house, I will go up, and show Pharaoh, and say unto him, My brethren, and my father's house, which were in the land of Canaan, are come unto me; 32. And the men are shepherds, for their trade hath been to feed cattle; and they have brought their flocks, and their herds, and all that they have. 33. And it shall come to pass, when Pharaoh shall call you, and shall say, What is your occupation? 34. That ye shall say, Thy servant's trade hath been about cattle from our youth even until now, both we, and also our fathers: that ye may dwell in the land of Goshen; for every shepherd is an abomination unto the Egyptians.

I. We have here the joyful meeting between Jacob and his son Joseph; in which observe,

1. Jacob's prudence in sending Judah before him to Joseph, to give him notice of his arrival in Goshen. This was a piece of respect owing to the government, under the protection of which these strangers were come to purchase themselves. v. 28. We should be very careful not to give offence to any, especially not to the higher powers.

2. Joseph's filial respect to him. He went in his chariot to meet him, and, in the interview showed,
1. When Joseph came and told Pharaoh, and said, My father and my brethren, and their flocks, and their herds, and all that they have, are come out of the land of Canaan; and, behold, they are in the land of Goshen. 2. And he took some of his brethren, even five men, and presented them unto Pharaoh. 3. And Pharaoh said unto his brethren, What is your occupation? And they said unto Pharaoh, Thy servants are shepherds, both we, and also our fathers. 4. They said moreover unto Pharaoh, For to sojourn in the land are we come; for thy servants have no pasture for their flocks, for the famine is sore in the land of Canaan: now therefore, we pray thee, let thy servants dwell in the land of Goshen. 5. And Pharaoh spake unto Joseph, saying, Thy father and thy brethren are come unto thee; 6. The land of Egypt is before thee; in the best of the land make thy father and brethren to dwell; in the land of Goshen let them dwell; and if thou knowest any men of activity among them, then make them rulers over my cattle. 7. And Joseph brought in Jacob his father, and set him before Pharaoh: and Jacob blessed Pharaoh. 8. And Pharaoh said unto Jacob, How old art thou? 9. And Jacob said unto Pharaoh, I am an hundred and thirty years: few and evil have the days of the years of my life been, and have not attained unto the days of the years of the life of my fathers in the days of their pilgrimage. 10. And Jacob blessed Pharaoh, and went out from before Pharaoh. 11. And Joseph placed his father and his brethren, and gave them a possession in the land of Egypt, in the best of the land, in the land of Rameses, as Pharaoh had commanded. 12. And Joseph... nourished his father, and his brethren, and all his father's household, with bread, according to their families.

Here is,

I. The respect Joseph, as a subject, showed to his prince. Though he was his favourite, and prime-minister of state, and had had particular orders from him to send for his father down to Egypt, yet he would not suffer him to settle, till he had given notice of it to Pharaoh, v. 1. Christ, or Joseph, disposes of his followers in his kingdom as it is pleased of his father; saying, It is not mine to give, Matt. 20. 23.

II. The respect Joseph, as a brother, showed to his brethren, notwithstanding all the unkindness he had formerly received from them.

1. Though he was a great man, and they were comparatively mean and despicable, especially in Egypt, yet he owned them. Let those that are rich and great in the world, learn hence not to overlook or despise their poor relations. Every branch of the tree is not a top branch; but, because it is a lower branch, is it therefore not a tree? Our Lord Jesus, like Joseph here, is not ashamed to call us brethren.

2. They being strangers and no courtiers, he introduced some of them to Pharaoh, to kiss his hand, as we say, intending thereby to put an honour upon them, as among the Egyptians. Though Christ presents his brethren in the court of heaven, and improves his interest for them, though in themselves unworthy, and an abomination to the Egyptians. Being presented to Pharaoh, according to the instructions which Joseph had given them, they tell him, (1.) What was their business, that they were shepherds, v. 3. Pharaoh asked them, and (Joseph knew it would be one of his first questions, ch. 46. 33.) What is your occupation? He takes it for granted they had something to do; else Egypt should be no place for them, no harbour for idle vagrants. If they would not work, they should not eat of his bread in this time of scarcity. Note, [1.] All that have a place in the world, should have an employment in it according to their capacity, some occupation or other, mental or manual. Those that need not work for their bread, yet must have something to do, to keep them from idleness. [2.] Magistrates should inquire into the occupation of their subjects, as those that have the care of the public welfare; for idle people are as drones in the hive, unprofitable burthen of the commonwealth. [3.] What was their business in Egypt? to sojourn in the land, (v. 4.) not to settle there for ever, only to sojourn there for a time, while the famine prevailed in Canaan, which lay high, so that it was not habitable for shepherds, the grass being burnt up much more than in Egypt, which lay low, and where the corn chiefly failed, while there was tolerable good pasture.

3. He obtained for them a grant of a settlement in the land of Goshen, v. 5, 6. This was an instance of Pharaoh's gratitude to Joseph; because he had been his friend, and had his kingdom, he would be kind to his relations, purely for kindness sake. He offered them preferment as shepherds over his cattle, provided they were men of activity; for it is the man who is diligent in his business, that shall stand before kings. And whatever our profession or employment is, we should aim to be excellent in it, and to prove ourselves ingenious and industrious.

The respect Joseph, as a son, showed to his father.

1. He presented him to Pharaoh, v. 7. And here,

(1.) Pharaoh asks Jacob a common question; How old art thou? v. 8. A question usually put to old men, for it is natural to us to admire old age, and to reverence it, (Lev. 19. 32.) as it is very unnatural, and unbecoming to despise it, Isa. 3. 5. Jacob's countenance, no doubt, showed him to be very old; for he had been a man of labour and sorrow: in Egypt, people were not so long-lived as in Canaan, and therefore Pharaoh looks upon Jacob with wonder; he was a show in his court. When we are reflecting upon ourselves, this should come into the account; "How old are we?"

(2.) Jacob gives Pharaoh an uncommon answer, v. 9. He speaks as became a patriarch, with an air of seriousness, for the instruction of Pharaoh. Though our speech be not always of grace, yet it should be as serious as possible, when we speak here, [1.] He calls his life a pilgrimage, looking upon himself as a stranger in this world, and a traveller towards another world: this earth his inn, not his home. To this the apostle refers: (Heb. 11. 13.) They confessed that they were strangers and pilgrims. He not only reckoned himself a pilgrim, now that he was in Egypt, a strange country in which he never was before; but his life, even in the land of his nativity, was a pilgrimage, and thus reckoned it, "for he so reckons it, can the better bear the inconvenience of banishment from their native soil; they are but pilgrims still, and so they were always." [2.] He reckons his life by days; for even so, it is soon reckoned, and we are not sure of the continuance of it for a day to an end, but may be turned out of this tabernacle at less than an hour's warning. Let us therefore make use of them, (Ps. 90. 12.) and sure they are few; Jacob's life, particularly, had been made up of evil days; and the pleasantest days of his life were yet before him.

Thirdly, That they were short of the days of his fathers; not so many, not so pleasant, as their days. Old age came sooner upon him than it had done upon some of his ancestors. Though the youthful vigor should be in the strength or beauty, so the old man should not be proud of his age, and the crown of his hoary hairs, though others justly reverence it; for those who are accounted very old, atta'n not to the years of the patriarchs. The hoary head is then only a crown of glory, when it is found in the way of righteousness.

(3.) Jacob both addresses himself to Pharaoh, and takes leave of him with a blessing, v. 7. Jacob blessed Pharaoh, and again, v. 10. 11. He was not only an act of civility, (he paid him respect, and returned him thanks for his kindness,) but an act of piety, he prayed for him, as one having the authority of a prophet and a patriarch. Though in worldly wealth, Pharaoh was the greater, yet in interest with God, Jacob was the greater; he was God's anointed, Ps. 105. 15. And a patriarch's blessing is not a thing to be despised. Darius valued the prayers of the church for himself and for his sons, Ezra 6. 10. Pharaoh kindly received Jacob, and, whether in the name of a prophet or no, thus he had a prophet's reward, which sufficiently recompensed him, not only for his courteous converse with him, but for all the other kindnesses Jacob had showed to him and his family.

2. He provided for him and his family, v. 11. He caused him to live in Goshen, (v. 11.) nourished him and all his with food convenient for them, v. 12. This bespeaks, not only Joseph a good man, who took this tender care of his poor relations, but God a good God, who... raised him up for this purpose, and put him into a capacity of doing it, as Esther came to the kingdom for such a time as this. What God here did for Jacob, he has, in effect, promised to do for all his, that serve him and trust in him, Ps. 37. 19. In the days of famine they shall be satisfied.

13. And there was no bread in all the land; for the famine was very sore, so that the land of Egypt and all the land of Canaan fainted by reason of the famine. 14. And Joseph gathered up all the money that was found in the land of Egypt, and in the land of Canaan, for the corn which they bought: and Joseph brought the money into Pharaoh's house. 15. And when money failed in the land of Egypt, and in the land of Canaan, all the Egyptians came unto Joseph, and said, Give us bread: for why should we die in thy presence? For the money faileth. 16. And Joseph said, Give your cattle; and I will give you for your cattle, if money fail. 17. And they brought their cattle unto Joseph: and Joseph gave them bread in exchange for horses, and for the flocks, and for the cattle of the herds, and for the asses: and he fed them with bread, for all their cattle for that year. 18. When that year was ended, they came unto him the second year, and said unto him, We will not hide it from our lord, how that our money is spent; my lord also hath our herds of cattle; there is not aught left in the sight of my lord, but our bodies, and our lands: 19. Wherefore shall we die before thine eyes, both we and our land? Buy us and our land for bread, and we and our land will be servants unto Pharaoh: and give us seed, that we may live, and not die, that the land be not desolate. 20. And Joseph bought all the land of Egypt for Pharaoh; for the Egyptians sold every man his field, because the famine prevailed over them; so the land became Pharaoh's. 21. And as for the people, he removed them to cities from one end of the borders of Egypt even to the other end thereof. 22. Only the land of the priests bought he not; for the priests had a portion assigned them of Pharaoh, and did eat their portion which Pharaoh gave them: wherefore they sold not their lands. 23. Then Joseph said unto the people, Behold, I have bought you this day, and your land, for Pharaoh: lo, here is seed for you, and ye shall sow the land. 24. And it shall come to pass in the increase, that ye shall give the fifth part unto Pharaoh, and four parts shall be your own, for seed of the field, and for your food, and for them of your households, and for food for your little ones. 25. And they said, Thou hast saved our lives: let us find grace in the sight of our lord, and we will be Pharaoh's servants. 26. And Joseph made it a law over the land of Egypt unto this day, that Pharaoh should have the fifth part; except the land of the priests only, which became not Pharaoh's.

Care being taken of Jacob and his family, the preservation of which was especially designed by Providence, in Joseph's advancement, an account is now given of the saving of the kingdom of Egypt, too soon for ruin; for God is King of nations, as well as King of saints, and provideth food for all flesh. Joseph now returns to the management of that great trust which Pharaoh had lodged in his hand. It would have been pleasing enough to him to have gone and lived with his father and brethren in Canaan; but his employment would not permit it. When he had seen his father, and seen him well-settled, he applied himself as closely as ever to the execution of his office. Note, Even natural affection must give way to necessary business. Parents and children must be content to be absent one from another, when it is necessary, on either side, for the service of God, or their generation. In Joseph's transactions with the Egyptians, observe, 1. The great extremity that Egypt, and the parts adjacent, were reduced to by the famine. There was no bread, and they fainted, (v. 13.) they were ready to die, v. 15, 19. 1. See here what a dependence we have upon God's providence; if that suspend its usual favours but for a while, we die, we perish, we all perish. All our wealth would not keep us from starving, if the rain of heaven were withheld for two or three years. See how much we lie at God's mercy, and let us keep ourselves always in his love. 2. See how much we smart by our own improvidence; if all the Egyptians had done for themselves in the seven years of plenty, as Joseph did for Pharaoh, they had not been now in these straits; but they regarded not the warning they had of the years of famine, concluding that tomorrow shall be as this day, next year as this, and much more abundant. Note, Because man knows not his time, (his time of gathering when he has it,) therefore his misery is great upon him, when the spending time comes, Excl. 8. 6, 7. 3. See how early God put a difference between the Egyptians and the Israelites, as afterwards in the plagues, Exod. 8. 22.—9. 4, 26.—10. 23. Jacob and his family, though strangers, were plentifully fed on free corn, while the Egyptians starved. See Ps. 105. 15. Isa. 63. 13. My servants shall eat, but ye shall be hungry. Happy art thou, O Israel. Whoever wants, God's children shall not, Ps. 34. 10.

II. The price they were come up to, for their supply, in this exigence. 1. They parted with all their money, which they had hoarded up, v. 14. Silver and gold would not feed them, they must have corn. It was not the money they parted with, but the means brought into the exchanger. 2. When the money failed, they parted with all their cattle, those for labour, as the horses and asses; and those for food, as the flocks and the herds, v. 17. By this it should seem, that we may better live upon bread without flesh, than upon flesh without bread. We may suppose they parted the more easily with their cattle, because they had little affection to them, and now Pharaoh saw in reality what he had before seen in vision, nothing but lean kine. 3. When they had sold their stocks off their land, it was easy to persuade themselves (rather than starve) to sell their land too; for what good would that do them, when they had neither corn to sow it, nor cattle to eat it? They therefore sold that next, for a further supply of corn. 4. When the land was sold, so that they had nothing to live on, they must of course sell themselves, that they might live purely upon their labour; and hold their lands by the base tenure of villanage, and the curse of the crown.

Note, Skin for skin, and all that a man hath, even liberty and property, (those darling twins,) will he give for his life; for that is sweet. There are few, (though perhaps there are some,) who would even dare to die, rather than live in slavery and dependence on an arbitrary power. And perhaps there are those who, in that case, were able by their own strength, and might not deliberately die by famine, which is much worse, Lam. 4. 9. Now it was a great mercy to the Egyptians, that, in this distress, they could have corn at any rate; if they had all died for hunger, their lands perhaps would have escheated to the crown of course, for want of heirs; they therefore resolved to make the best of bad.

III. The method which Joseph took to accommodate the matter between prince and people, so that the prince might have his just advantage, and yet the people not be quite ruined.

1. For their lands, he needed not come to any bargain with them, while the years of famine lasted; but when these were over, (for God will not contend for ever, nor will he be always wroth,) he came to an agreement, which it seems, both sides were pleased with, that the people should be allowed to enjoy the lands, as he thought fit to assign them, and should have seed to sow them with out of the king's stores, for their own proper use and behoof, yielding and paying only a fifth part of the yearly profits as a chief rent to the crown. This became a standing law, v. 26. And it was a very good bargain to have food for their lands, when otherwise they and their must have starved, and then have lands again upon such easy terms. Note, Those ministers of state are worthy of double honour both for wisdom and integrity, that keep the balance even between prince and people, so that liberty and property may not intrench upon prerogative, nor the prerogative bear hard upon liberty and property: in the multitude of such counsellors there is safety. If afterward the Egyptians thought it hard to pay so great a duty to the king out of their lands, they must remember, not only how just, but how kind, the first imposing of it was. They might thankfully pay a fifth when all was due. It is observable, how faithfully Joseph was to him that appointed him; he did not put the money into his own pocket, nor entail the lands upon his own family; but converted both entirely to Pharaoh's use; and therefore we do not find that his posterity were reproached with any riches of his. But the rest of their poor brethren. Those in public trusts, if they raise great estates, must take heed that it be not at the expense of a good conscience, which is much more valuable.

2. For their persons, he removed them to cities, v. 21. He transplanted them, to show Pharaoh's sovereign power over them, and that they might, in time, forget that they were ever sojourning in a strange land; and the more fully accoided to their new condition of servitude. The Jewish writers say, "He removed them thus from their former habitations, because they reproached his brethren as strangers; to silence which reproach, they were all made, in effect, strangers." See what changes a little time may make with a people, and how soon God can empty that which he would fill, and fill that which he emptied, very little concerning the rest of their posterity. For his kindness to their posterity. The rest of their poor brethren. Those in public trusts, if they raise great estates, must take heed that it be not at the expense of a good conscience, which is much more valuable.

IV. The reservation: he made in favour of the priests. They were maintained on free rent, so that they needed not to sell their lands, v. 22. And more, we may observe, that Joseph was much solicitous that the priests should be maintained, and they were kind to those that attended the public service of their God, and that minister to them in holy things; and we should, in like manner, honour our God, by esteeming his ministers highly in love for their work's sake.

27. And Israel dwelt in the land of Egypt, in the country of Goshen; and they had possessions therein, and grew, and multiplied exceedingly. 28. And Jacob lived in the land of Egypt seventeen years: so the whole age of Jacob was an hundred forty and seven years. 29. And the time drew nigh that Israel must die: and he called his son Joseph, and said unto him, If now I have found grace in thy sight, put, I pray thee, thy hand under my thigh, and deal kindly and truly with me; bury me not, I pray thee, in Egypt: 30. But I will lie with my fathers, and thou shalt carry me out of Egypt, and bury me in their burying-place. And he said, I will do as thou hast said. 31. And he said, Swear unto me. And he sware unto him. And Israel bowed himself upon the bed's head.

Observe, 1. The comfort Jacob lived in, (v. 27, 28.) while the Egyptians were impoverished in their own land, Jacob was replenished in a strange land. He lived seventeen years after he came into Egypt, far beyond his own expectation; seventeen years he had nourished Joseph, (for so old he was when he was sold from him, ch. 37. 2.) and now, by way of requital, seventeen years Joseph nourished him. Observe how kindly Providence ordered Jacob's affairs; that when he was old, and least able to bear care and fatigue, he had least occasion for it, being well-provided for by his son without his own forecast. Thus God considers the frame of his people.

2. The care Jacob died in. At last, (v. 29.) The time drew nigh that Israel must die. Israel, a prince with God, that had power over the angel, and prevailed, yet must yield to death. There is no remedy, he said, for any of us; it is appointed for all men, and the earthly part of us must die. There is no discharge in that war. Joseph supplied him with bread, that he might not die by famine; but that did not secure him from dying by age or sickness. He died by degrees; his candle was not blown out, but gradually burnt down to the socket, so that he saw, at some distance, the time drawing nigh. Note, It is an inexpressible mercy, to see the approach of death, before we feel its presence, that we may be enabled to do what our hand finds to do, with all our might; however, it is not far from any of us. Now Jacob's care, as he saw the day approaching, was about his burial, not the pomp of it, (he was no way solicitous about that,) but the place of it.

1. He would be buried in Canaan; this he resolved on, not from mere humour, because Canaan was the land of his nativity, but in faith, because it was the land of promise, (which he desired thus, as it were, to keep possession of, till the time should come when his posterity should be masters of it,) and because it was a type of heaven, that better country which he that said these things, declared plainly that he was in expectation of, Heb. 11. 14. He aimed at a good land, which would be his rest and bliss on the other side death.
(2.) He would have Joseph sworn to bring him thither to be buried, (v. 29, 31.) that Joseph being under such a solemn obligation to do it, might have that to answer to the objections which otherwise might have been made against it, and for the greater satisfaction of Jacob now in his dying minutes. Nothing will better help to make a death-bed easy, than the certain prospect of a rest in Canaan after death.

(3.) When this was done, Israel bowed himself upon the bed's-head, yielding himself, as it were, to the stroke of death; ("Now let it come, and it shall be welcome;" or worshipping God, as it is explained, Heb. 11. 21, giving God thanks for all his favours, and particularly for this, that Joseph was ready, not only to put his hands upon his eyes to close them, but under his thigh to give him the satisfaction he desired concerning his burial. Thus they that go down to the dust, shall with humble thankfulness, bow before God, the God of their mercies, Ps. 22. 29.

CHAP. XLVIII.

The time drawing nigh that Israel must die, having in the former chapter given order about his burial, in this, he takes leave of his grand-children by Joseph, and in the next chapter of his children. Thus Jacob's dying words are recorded, because he then spake by a spirit of prophecy; Abraham's and Isaac's are not. God's gifts and graces shine forth much more in some saints than in others, even until their death-beds. The Spirit, like the wind, blows where it listeth. In this chapter, I. Joseph, having his father's sickness, goes to visit him, and takes his two sons with him, v. 1. 2. II. Jacob solemnly adopts his two sons, and takes them for his sons, v. 3-7. III. He blesses them, v. 8-16. IV. He explains and justifies the crossing of his hands in blessing them, v. 17-20. V. He leaves a particular legacy to Joseph, v. 21, 22.

I. AND it came to pass after these things, that one told Joseph, Behold, thy father is sick: and he took with him his two sons, Manasseh and Ephraim. 2. And one told Jacob, and said, Behold, thy son Joseph cometh unto thee: and Israel strengthened himself, and sat upon the bed. 3. And Jacob said unto Joseph, God Almighty appeared unto me at Luz in the land of Canaan, and blessed me, 4. And said unto me, Behold, I will make thee fruitful, and multiply thee, and I will make of thee a multitude of people, and will give this land to thy seed after thee for an everlasting possession. 5. And now thy two sons, Ephraim and Manasseh, which were born unto thee in the land of Egypt, before I came unto thee into Egypt, are mine; as Reuben and Simeon, they shall be mine. 6. And thy issue, which thou begetteth after them, shall be thine, and shall be called after the name of their brethren in their inheritance. 7. And as for me, when I came from Padan, Rachel died by me in the land of Canaan in the way, when yet there was but a little way to come into Ephrath: and I buried her there in the way of Ephrath: the same is Beth-lebo.

Here, I. Joseph, upon notice of his father's illness, goes to see him; though a man of honour and business, yet he will not fail to show this due respect to his aged father, v. 1. Visiting the sick, to whom we lie under obligations, or may have opportunity of doing good, either for body or soul, is our duty. The sick bed is a proper place both for giving comfort and counsel to others, and receiving instruction ourselves. Joseph took his two sons with him, that they might receive their dying grandfather's blessing, and that what they might see in him, and hear from him, might make an abiding impression upon them. Note, 1. It is good to acquaint young people that are coming into the world, with the aged servants of God that are going out of it, whose dying testimony to the goodness of God, and the pleasantness of wisdom's ways, may be a great encouragement to the rising generation. Manasseh and Ephraim would have received no such benefit, if they had passed at this time. 2. Pious parents are desirous of a blessing, not only for themselves, but for their children. "O that they may live before God!" Joseph had been, above all his brethren, kind to his father, and therefore had reason to expect particular favour from him.

II. Jacob, upon notice of his son's visit, prepared himself as well as he could to entertain him, v. 2. He did what he could to stir up the gift that was in him; what little was left of bodily strength, he put forth to the utmost, and sat upon the bed. Note, It is very good for sick and aged people to be as lively and cheerful as they can, that they may not faint in the day of adversity. Strengthen thyself, as Jacob here, and God will strengthen thee; hearten thyself and help thyself, as God will help and hearten thee. Let the Spirit sustain the infirmities of age.

III. In recompense to Joseph for all his attentions to him, he adopted his two sons. In this charter of adoption, there is, 1. A particular recital of God's promise to him, to which this had reference. "God blessed me; (v. 3.) and let that blessing be entailed upon them." God had promised him two things, a numerous issue, and Canaan for an inheritance; (v. 4.) and Joseph's sons, pursuant hereunto, should each of them multiply into a tribe, and each of them have a distinct lot in Canaan, equal with Jacob's own sons. See how he blessed them by faith in that which God had said to him, Heb. 11. 21. Note, In all our prayers, both for ourselves and for our children, we ought to have a particular eye to, and remembrance of, God's promises to us.

2. An allusion to the reception of Joseph's sons into his family, "Thy sons are mine, (v. 5.) not only my grand-children, but as my own children." Though they were born in Egypt, and their father was then separated from his brethren, which might seem to have cut them off from the heritage of the Lord, yet Jacob takes them in, and owns them as his child and church-members. He explains it; (v. 16.) Let my name be named upon them, and not the name of my fathers; as if he had said, "Let them not succeed their father in his power and grandeur here in Egypt; but let them succeed me in the inheritance of the promise made to Abraham," which Jacob looked upon as much more valuable and honourable, and would have them to prize and covet accordingly. Thus the aged dying patriarch teaches these young patriarchs, that it was not to be expected that they, or any others (being about twenty-one years old,) not to look upon Egypt as their own, nor to incorporate themselves with the Egyptians, but to take their lot with the people of God, as Moses afterward in the like temptation, Heb. 11. 24., 26. And because it would be a piece of self-denial in them, who stood so fair for preferment in Egypt, to adhere to the despised Hebrews; to encourage them, he conversed each of them the head of a tribe. Note, Those are worthy of double honour, who, through God's grace, break through the temptations of worldly wealth and preferment, to embrace religion in distress and poverty. Jacob will have Ephraim and Manasseh to believe, that it is better to be low, and in the church, than high, and out of it, that to be called by the name of poor Jacob, is better than to be called by the name of rich Joseph.

3. A proviso inserted concerning the children he might afterward have; they should not be accounted heads of tribes, as Ephraim and Manasseh were, but should be called in with the one or the other of their brethren, v. 6. It does not appear that Joseph had any more children; however, it was Jacob's prudence to give this direction, for the preventing of contest and mismanagement. Note, In making settlements, it is good to take advice, and to provide for what may happen, while we cannot foresee what will happen. Our prudence must attend God's providence.

4. Mention is made of the death and burial of Rachel, Joseph's mother, and Jacob's best-beloved wife, (v. 7.) referring to that story, ch. 35. 19. Note, (1.) When we come to die ourselves, it is good to call to mind the death of our dear relations and friends, that are gone before us, to make death and the grave the more familiar to us. See Numb. 27. 13. Those that were to us our own souls, are dead and buried; and shall we think much more, to follow them in the same path? (2.) The removal of dear relations from us, is an affliction the remembrance of which cannot but abide with us a great while. Strong afflictions in the enjoyment, cause long afflictions in the loss.

8. And Israel beheld Joseph's sons, and said, Who are these? 9. And Joseph said unto his father, They are my sons, whom God hath given me in this place. And he said, Bring them, I pray thee, unto me, and I will bless them. 10. Now the eyes of Israel were dim for age, so that he could not see. And he brought them near unto him; and he kissed them, and embraced them. 11. And Israel said unto Joseph, I had not thought to see thy face: and, lo, God hath showed me also thy seed. 12. And Joseph brought them out from between his knees, and he bowed himself with his face to the earth. 13. And Joseph took them both, Ephraim in his right hand toward Israel's left hand, and Manasseh in his left hand toward Israel's right hand, and brought them near unto him. 14. And Israel stretched out his right hand, and laid it upon Ephraim's head, who was the younger, and his left hand upon Manasseh's head, guiding his hands unwittingly; for Manasseh was the first-born. 15. And he blessed Joseph, and said, God, before whom my fathers Abraham and Isaac did walk, the God which fed me all my life long until this day, 16. The angel which redeemed me from all evil, bless the lads; and let my name be named on them, and the name of my fathers Abraham and Isaac; and let them grow into a multitude in the midst of the earth. 17. And when Joseph saw that his father laid his right hand upon the head of Ephraim, it displeased him: and he hid up his father's hand, to remove it from Ephraim's head unto Manasseh's head. 18. And Joseph said unto his father, Not so, my father: for this is the first-born; put thy right hand upon his head. 19. And his father refused, and said, I know it, my son, I know it: he also shall become a people, and he also shall be great: but truly his younger brother shall be greater than he, and his seed shall become a multitude of nations. 20. And he blessed them that day, saying, In thee shall Israel bless, saying, God make thee as Ephraim, and as Manasseh: and he set Ephraim before Manasseh. 21. And Israel said unto Joseph, Behold, I die; but God shall be with you, and bring you again unto the land of your fathers. 22. Moreover I have given to thee one portion above thy brethren, which I took out of the hand of the Amorite with my sword and with my bow.

I. The blessing with which Jacob blessed the two sons of Joseph, which is the more remarkable, because the apostle makes such particular mention of it, (Heb. 11. 21.) when he says nothing of the blessing which Jacob pronounced on the rest of his sons, though that also was done in faith. Observe here,

1. That Jacob was blind for age, v. 10. It is one of the common infirmities of old age; They that look out of the windows are darkened, Ecc. 12. 3. It is folly to walk in the sight of our eyes, and to suffer our hearts to go after them, while we know death will shortly close them, and we do not know but some accident between us and death may darken them. Jacob, like his father before him, when he was old and went on-sighted. Note, (1.) That have the honour of age, must therewith be content to take the burthen of it. (2.) The eye of faith may be very clear, even then when the eye of the body is very much clouded.

2. That Jacob was very fond of Joseph's sons. He kissed them, and embraced them, v. 10. It is common for old people to have a very particular affection for their grand-children, perhaps more than they had for their own when they were little; which Solomon gives a reason for, (Prov. 17. 6.) Children's children are the crown of old men. With what satisfaction does Jacob say here, (v. 11.) I had not thought to see thy face, (having many years, given him up for lost,) and, lo, God hath showed me also thy seed! See here, (1.) How these two good men own God in their children, Joseph, v. 9. They were my sons from God hath given me, and, to magnify the favour, he adds, "In this place of my banishment, slavery, and imprisonment." Jacob says here, God hath showed me thy seed. Our comforts are then doubly sweet to us, when we see them coming from God's hand. (2.) How often God, in his merciful providences, outdoes our expectations, and thus greatly magnifies his favours. He not only prevents our fears, but exceeds our hopes. We may apply this to the promise which is made to us and to our children. We could not have thought that we should have been taken into covenant with God ourselves, considering how guilty and corrupt we are; and yet, lo, he has showed us our seed also in covenant with him.
3. That before he entails his blessing, he recounts his experiences of God's goodness to him. He has spoken (v. 3.) of God's appearing to him. The particular visits of his grace, and the special communion of which he has sometimes had with him, ought never to be forgotten. But (v. 15, 16.) he mentions the constant care which the Divine Providence had taken of him all his days. (1.) He had fed him all his life long until this day, v. 15. Note, As long as we have lived in this world, we have had continual experience of God's goodness to us, in providing for the support of our natural life, and in guiding us in all the ways of our souls. He had given him a long life, but he had little has gone to feed us, yet we have never wanted food convenient. He that has fed us all our lifelong, surely will not fail us at last. (2.) He had by his angel redeemed him from all evil, v. 16. A great deal of hardship he had known in his time, but God had graciously kept him from the evil of his troubles. Now that he was dying, he looked upon himself as redeemed from all evil, and bidding an everlasting farewell: to sin and sorrow. Christ, the Angel of the covenant, is he that redeems us from all evil, 2 Tim. 4. 18. Note, [1.] It becomes the servants of God, when they are old and dying, to witness for our God that they have found him gracious. [2.] Our experiences of God's goodness to us are improbable, both for the encouragement of others to serve God, and for encouragement to us in blessing him, who has redeemed us from all evil.

4. That when he confers the blessing and name of Abraham and Isaac upon them, he recommends the pattern and example of Abraham and Isaac to them, v. 15. He calls God, the God before whom my fathers Abraham and Isaac walked, that is, in whom they believed, whom they observed and obeyed, and with whom they kept up communion in the ordinances, according to the condition of the covenant. Walk before me, ch. 17. 1. Note, (1.) Those that would inherit the blessing of their godly ancestors, and have the benefit of God's covenant with them, must tread in the steps of their piety. (2.) It should recommend religion and the service of God to us, that God was the God of our fathers, and that they had satisfaction in walking before him.

5. That in blessing them, he crossed hands. Joseph placed them so as that Jacob's right hand should be put on the head of Manasseh the eldest, v. 12, 13. But Jacob would put it on the head of Ephraim the youngest, v. 14. This displeased Joseph, who was willing to support the reputation of his first-born, and would therefore have removed his father's hands, v. 17, 18. But Jacob gave him to understand that he knew what he did, and that he did it neither by mistake, nor in a humour, nor from a partial affection to one more than the other, but from a spirit of prophecy, and in compliance with the divine counsels. Manasseh should be great, but truly Ephraim should be greater. When the tribes were mustered in the wilderness, Ephraim was more numerous than Manasseh, the former contained the greater part of the squarer, (Num. 1. 32, 33, 35—2. 18, 20.) and is named first, Ps. 80. 2. Joshua was of that tribe, so was Jeroboam. The tribe of Manasseh was divided, one half on one side Jordan, the other half on the other side, which made it the less powerful and considerable. In the foresight of this, Jacob crossed hands. Note, (1.) God, in bestowing his blessings upon his people, gives more to some than to others, not mere gifts, graces, and comforts, and more of the good things of this life. (2.) He often gives most to those that are least likely. He chooses the weak things of the world; raises the poor out of the dust. Grace observes not the order of nature, nor does God prefer those whom we think fittest to be preferred, but as it pleases him. It is observable, how often God, by the distinguishing favours of his covenant, advanced the younger above the elder; Abel above Cain, Shem above Japheth, Abraham above Nahor and Haran; Isaac above Ishmael, Jacob above Esau. Judah and Joseph were preferred before Reuben; Moses before Aaron; David and Solomon before their elder brethren. See 1 Sam. 16. 7. He tied the Jews to observe the birth-right, (Deut. 21. 17.) but he never tied himself to observe it. Some make this typical of the preference given to the Gentiles above the Jews; the Gentile converts were much more numerous than those of the Jews. See Gal. 4. 27. Thus free grace becomes more illustrious.

II. The particular tokens of his favour to Joseph.

1. He left with him the promise of their return out of Egypt, as a sacred trust; (v. 21.) I die, but God shall be with you, and bring you again. Accordingly, Joseph, when he died, left it with his brethren, ch. 30. 24. This assurance was given them, and carefully preserved among them, that they might neither love Egypt too much when it favoured them, nor fear it too much when it frowned upon them. These words of Jacob furnish us with comfort in reference to the death of our friends; they die. But, (1.) God shall be with us, and his gracious presence is sufficient to make up for the loss. They leave us, but he will never fail us. (2.) He has prepared a way for us to the heavenly Canaan, whither our godly fathers are gone before us. If God be with us while we stay behind in this world, and will receive us shortly to be with them that are gone before into a better world, we ought not to sorrow as those that have no hope.

2. He bestowed one portion upon him above his brethren, v. 22. The lands bequeathed are described to be the chief and choice, Josh. 16. 10. Caleb's lot, Amorite, with his sword, and with his bow. He purchased them first, (Josh. 24. 32.) and it seems, was afterward dispossessed of them by the Amorites, but retook them by the sword, repelling force by force, and recovering his right by violence, when he could not otherwise recover it. These lands he settled upon Joseph; mention is made of this grant, Josh. 17. 17. This parcel of ground was given to the tribe of Ephraim in the days of Joshua, and the lot was never cast upon it; and in it Joseph's bones were buried, which perhaps Jacob had an eye to, as much as to any thing, in this settlement. Note, It may sometimes be both just and prudent to give some children portions above the rest; but a grace is that which we can most count upon as our own in this earth.

CHAP. XLIX.

This chapter is a prophecy: the likeliest to it we have yet met with, was that of Noah, ch. 9. 25, &c. Jacob is here upon his death-bed, making his will: he put it off till now, and was loath to reveal it, while he was in the deep impressions, and to be remembered long: what he said here, he could not say when he would, but as the Spirit gave him utterance, who chose this time, that divine strength might be most apparent in him.

The twelve sons of Jacob were, in their day, men of renown, but the twelve tribes of Israel, which descended and were denominates from them, were much more renowned; we find their names upon the gates of the new Jerusalem, Rev. 21. 12, in the prospect of which, their dying father says something remarkable of each son, or of the tribe that bore his name.

And Jacob called unto his sons, and said, Gather yourselves together, that I may tell you that which shall befall you in the last days.

2. Gather yourselves together, and hear, ye sons of Jacob; and hearken unto Israel your father. 3. Reuben, thou art my first-born, my might, and the beginning of my strength, the excellency of dignity, and the excellency of power. 4. Unstable as water, thou shalt not excell; because thou wentest up to thy father's bed; then defiledst thou it: he went up to my couch.

Here is,

I. The preface to the prophecy, in which,

1. The congregation is called together; (v. 2.) "Gather yourselves together, let them all be sent for from their several employments, to see their father die, and to hear his dying words. It was a comfort to Jacob, now that he was dying, to see all his children about him, and none missing, though he had sometimes thought himself bereaved. It was of use to them, to attend him in his last moments, that they might learn of him how to die, as well as how to live: what he said to each, he said in the hearing of all the rest: for we may profit by the reproofs, counsels, and comforts, that are principally intended for others. His calling upon them once and again, to gather together, intimated both a precept to them to unite in love, to keep together in peace and harmony; and that the assembling of themselves together, and a prediction that they should not be separated from each other, as Abraham's sons and Isaac's were, but should be incorporated, and all make one people.

2. A general idea is given of the intended discourse, (v. 1.) "That I may tell you that which shall befall you, (not your persons, but your posterity,) in the last days; this prediction would be of use to those that came after them, for the confirming of their faith, and the guiding of their way, on their return to Canaan, and their settlement there. We cannot tell our children what shall befall them, or their families in this world; but we can tell them, from the word of God, what will befall them in the last day of all, according as they conduct themselves in this world."

3. Attention is demanded; (v. 2.) "Hearken to Israel your father; let Israel, that has prevailed with God, prevail with you." Note, Children must diligently hearken to what their godly parents say, particularly when they are dying; "Hear ye children, the instruction of a father, which carries with it both authority and affection." Prov. 4. 1.

II. The prophecy concerning Reuben; he begins with him, (v. 3, 4.) he was the first-born; but by committing uncleanness with his father's wife, to the great reproach of the family which he ought to have been an ornament to, he forfeited the prerogatives of the birth-right; and his dying father here solemnly degrades him, though he does not disown or disinherit him: he shall have all the privileges of a son, but not of a first-born. We have reason to think Reuben had retired of his sin, for he was pardoned; yet it was a necessary piece of justice, in detestation of the villany, and for warning to others, to put the mark of disgrace upon him. Now according to the method of degrading, 1. Jacob here puts upon him the ornaments of the birth-right, (v. 3.) that he and all his brethren might see what he had forfeited, and, in that, might see the evil of the sin: as the joy of his father's heart, it was almost his pride, being the beginning of his strength. How well he was to his parents, his name bespeaks, Reuben, See a son. To him belonged the excellency of his dignity, above his brethren, and some power over them. Christ Jesus is the First-born among many brethren, and to him, of right, belong the most excellent power and dignity: his church also, through him, is a church of the first-born. 2. He then strips him of these ornaments; (v. 4.) lifts him up, that he may cast him down, by that one word, "Thou shalt not excell: a being thou shalt have as a tribe, but not an excellency; it judge, prince, or priest, is found of that tribe, nor any person of renown, only Dathan and Abiram, who were noted for their impious rebellion against Moses. That tribe, as not aiming to excel, meanly chose a settlement on the other side Jordan. Reuben himself seems to have lost all that influence upon his brethren, which his birth-right entitled him to. When he spake unto them, they should not hear, ch. 42. 22. Those that have been more understanding and spirit to support the honours and privileges of their birth, will soon lose them, and retain only the name of them. The character fastened upon Reuben, for which he is laid under this mark of infamy, is, that he was unstable as water. (1.) His virtue was unstable; he had not the government of himself and his own appetites: sometimes he would be very regular and orderly, but at other times he deviated into the wildest courses. Note, Instability is the ruin of men's excellency. Men do not thrive, because they do not fix. (2.) His honour consequently was unstable; it departed from him, vanished into smoke, and became as water split upon the ground. Note, Those that throw away their virtue, in not expecting to save their reputation. Jacob charges him particularly with the sin for which he was thus disgraced; "Thou wastent up to thy father's bed. It was forty years ago that he had been guilty of this sin, yet now it is remembered against him. Note, As time will not of itself wear off the guilt of any sin from the conscience, so there are some sins whose stains it will not wipe off from the good name, especially seventh-commandments-sins. Reuben's sin left an indelible mark of infamy upon his family; a dishonour that was a wound not to be healed without a scar, Prov. 6. 32, 33. Let us never do evil, and then we need not fear being told of it.

5. Simeon and Levi are brethren; instruments of cruelty are in their habitations. 6. My soul, come not thou into their secret unto their assembly, mine honour, be not thou united: for in their anger they slew a man, and in their self-will they digged down a wall. 7. Cursed be their anger, for it was fierce; and their wrath, for it was cruel: I will divide them in Jacob, and scatter them in Israel.

These were next in age to Reuben, and they also had been a grief and shame to Jacob, when they treacherously and barbarously destroyed the Shechemites, which he here remembers against them. Children should be afraid of incurring their parents' just displeasure, lest they fare the worse for it long afterward, and, when they would inherit the blessing, be rejected. Observe,

I. The character of Simeon and Levi; they were brethren in disposition; but, unlike their father, they were passionate and revengeful, fierce and uncontrolable; their swords, which should have been only weapons of defence, were (as the margin reads it, v. 5.) weapons of violence, to do wrong to others, not to save themselves from wrong. Note. It is no new thing for the temper of children to differ very much from that of their parents; we need not think it strange, it was so in Jacob's family. It is not in the power of parents, no, not by education, to form the dispositions of their children; Jacob bred his sons to every thing that was mild and quiet, and yet they proved to be thus furious.

II. A proof of this is the murder of the Shechemites, which Jacob deeply resented at the time, (ch. 34. 30.) and still continued to resent. They slew a man, Shechem himself, and many others; and, to effect that, they digged down a wall, broke the houses, to plunder them, and murder the inhabitants. Note, The best governors cannot always prevent their subjects from committing the worst villanies. And when two in a family are mischievous, they commonly make one another so much the worse, and it were wisdom to part them. Simeon and Levi, it is probable, were most active in the wrong done to Joseph, which some think Jacob has here some reference to; for in their anger they would have slain that man. Observe what a mischievous thing it is, that many of the tribe: Simeon and Levi would not be advised by their aged and experienced father; no, they would be governed by their own passion, rather than by his prudence. Young people would better consult their own interest, if they would less indulge their own will.

III. Jacob's protestation against this barbarous act of their's, O my soul, come not thou into their secret. Hereby he professes not only his abhorrence of such practices in general, but his intolerance particularly in that matter. Perhaps he had been suspected as, under-hand, aiding and abetting; he therefore thus solemnly expresses his detestation of the fact, that he might not die under that suspicion. Note, 1. Our soul is our honour; by its powers and faculties we are distinguished from, and dignified above, the beasts that perish. 2. We ought, from our hearts, to detest and abhor all society and confederacy with bloody and mischievous men. We must not be ambitious of coming into their secret, or knowing the depths of Satan.

IV. His abhorrence of these brutish lusts that led them to this wickedness; Curse be their anger. He does not curse their persons, but their lusts. Note, 1. Anger is the cause and original of a great deal of sin, and exposes us to the curse of God, and his judgment, Matt. 5. 22. 2. We ought always, in the exercise of our zeal, carefully to distinguish between the sinner and the sin, so as not to love or bless the sin for the sake of the person, nor to hate or curse the person for the sake of the sin.

V. A token of displeasure which he foretells their posterity should lie under for this; I will divide them: The Levites were scattered throughout all the tribes, and Simeon's lot lay not together; and was so strait, that many of the tribe were forced to disperse themselves in quest of settlements and subsistence. This curse was afterwards turned into a blessing to the Levites; but the Simeonites, for Zimri's sin, (Num. 25. 14.) had it bound on. Note, Shameful dispersions are the just punishment of sinful unions and confederacies.

8. Judah, thou art he whom thy brethren shall praise: thy hand shall be in the neck of thine enemies: thy father's children shall bow down before thee. 9. Judah is a lion's whelp: from the prey, my son, thou art gone up; he stooped down, he couched as a lion, and as an old lion; who shall rouse him up? 10. The sceptre shall not depart from Judah, nor a law-giver from between his feet, until Shiloh come; and unto him shall the gathering of the people be. 11. Binding his sole unto the vine, and his ass's colt unto the choice vine; he washed his garments in wine, and his clothes in the blood of grapes. 12. His eyes shall be red with wine, and his teeth white with milk.

Glorious things are here said of Judah. The mention of the crimes of the three eldest of his sons, had not so much the dying patriarch out of humours, but that he had a blessing ready for Judah, to whom blessings belonged. Judah's name signifies praise, in allusion to which he says, Thou art he whom thy brethren shall praise, v. 8. God was praised for him, (ch. 29. 35.) praised by him, and praised in him; and therefore his brethren shall praise him. Note, Those that are to God for a praise, shall be the praise of their brethren.

It is prophesied,

1. That the tribe of Judah should be victorious and successful in war! Thy hand shall be in the neck of thine enemies. This was fulfilled in David, Ps. 18. 40.

2. That it should be superior to the rest of the tribes; not only in itself more numerous and illustrious, but having a dominion over them; Thy father's children shall be rulers over them: Judah was the lawgiver, Ps. 60. 7. That tribe led the van through the wilderness, and in the conquest of Canaan, Judg. 1.

2. The prerogatives of the birth-right which Reuben had forfeited, the excellency of dignity and power, were thus conferred upon Judah. Observe, 1. Thy brethren shall bow down before thee, and yet shall praise thee, reckoning themselves happy in having so wise and bold a commander. Note, We mean not always, but a blessing to those that have them, when they are not grudged and envied, but praised and applauded, and cheerfully submitted to.

3. That it should be a strong and courageous tribe, and so qualified for command and conquest; (v. 9.) Judah is a lion's whelp. The lion is the king of beasts, the terror of the forest when he roars; when he seizes his prey, none can resist him; when he goes up from the prey, none dares pursue him to revenge it. By this it is foretold that the tribe of Judah should become very formidable, and should not only obtain great victories, but should peaceably and quietly enjoy what was got by those victories; that they should make war, not for the sake of war, but for the sake of peace. Judah is compared, not to a lion rampant, always teeming, always raging, always rangeing; but to a lion, the satisfaction of his power and success, without creating vexation to others: this is to be truly great.

4. That it should be the royal tribe, and the tribe from which Messiah the Prince should come; (v. 10.) The sceptre shall not depart from Judah, till Shiloh come. Jacob here foresees and foretells, (1.) That the sceptre should come out of the tribe of Judah, which was fulfilled in David, on whose, family, the crown was established. (2.) That Shiloh should be of this tribe; his Seed, that promised Seed, in whom the earth should be blessed; that peaceable and prosperous one, or the Saviour, so others translate it, he shall come of Judah. Thus dying Jacob, at a great distance, saw Christ's day, and it was his comfort and support on his death-bed. (3.) That after the coming of the sceptre into the tribe of Judah, Messiah should come in that tribe, at the time, at the commandment of their own, till the coming of the Messiah, in whom, as the King of the church, and the great High-Priest, it was fit that both the priesthood and the royalty should determine. Till the captivity, all along from David's time, the sceptre was in Judah, and from thence governors of that tribe, or of the Levites that adhered to it, (which was equivalent,) all Judæa became a province of the Roman empire, just at the time of our Saviour's birth, and was at that time taxed as one of the provinces, Luke 2. 4. And at the time of his death the Jews expressively owned, "We have no king but Caesar." Hence it is undeniably inferred against the Jews, that our Lord Jesus is he that should come, and that we are to look for no other; for he came exactly at the time appointed. Many excellent pens have been admirably well employed in explaining and illustrating this famous prophecy of Christ.

5. That it should be a very fruitful tribe, especially that it should abound with milk for babes, and wine to make glad the heart of strong men, v. 11, 12.

6. Vines, so common in the hedge-rows, and so strong, that they should tie their asses to them, and so fruitful, that they should load their asses from them. Wine, as plentiful as water, so that the men of that tribe should be very healthful and lively, their eyes brisk and sparkling, their teeth white. Much of that which is here said concerning Judah, is to be applied to our Lord Jesus. (1.) He is the Ruler of all his father's children, and the conqueror of all his father's enemies; and he it is, that is the praise of all the saints. (2.) He is the Lion of the tribe of Judah, as he is called with reference to this here. (Rev. 5. 5.) who, having spoiled principalities and powers, went up a Conqueror, and crouched so as none can stir him up, when he sat down on the right hand of the Father. (3.) To him belongs the sceptre; he is the Law-giver, and to him shall the gathering of the people be, as the Desire of all nations, ( Hag. 2. 7.) who, being lifted up from the earth, should draw all men unto him, (John 12. 32.) and in whom the children of God, that are scattered abroad, should meet, as the centre of their unity, John 11. 32. (4.) In him there is plenty of all that which is nourishing and refreshing to the soul, and which maintains and cheeers the divine life in it; in him we may have wine and milk, the riches of Judah's tribe, without money, and without price, Isa. 55. 1.

13. Zebulun shall dwell at the haven of the sea; and he shall be for an haven of ships; and his border shall be unto Zidon. 14. Issachar is a strong ass couching down between two burdens: 15. And he saw that rest was good, and the land that it was pleasant; and bowed his shoulder to bear, and became a servant unto tribute. 16. Dan shall judge his people, as one of the tribes of Israel. 17. Dan shall be a serpent by the way, an adder in the path, that biteth the horse-heels, so that his rider shall fall backward. 18. I have waited for thy salvation, O Lord. 19. Gad, a troop shall overcome him: but he shall overcome at the last. 20. Out of Asher his bread shall be fat, and he shall yield royal dainties. 21. Naphthali is a hind let loose: he giveth goodly words.

Here we have Jacob's prophecy concerning six of his sons.

1. Concerning Zebulun, (v. 13.) that his posterity shall have their lot upon the sea-coast, and should be merchants and mariners, and trade by the sea. This was fulfilled, when two or three hundred years after, the land of Canaan was divided by lot, and the border of Zebulun went up towards the sea, Josh. 19. 11. Had they chosen their lot themselves, or Joshua appointed it, we might have supposed it done with design to make Jacob's words good; but, being done by lot, it appears that that was divinely disposed, and Jacob divinely inspired Note, The lot of God's people is often in the hands of others, with the plan of God's counsel, like a true copy with the original. If prophecy says, Zebulun shall be a haven of ships, Providence will so plant him. Note, 1. God appoints the bounds of our habitation. 2. It is our wisdom and duty to accommodate ourselves to our lot, and to improve it. If Zebulun dwell at the haven of the sea, let him be for a haven of ships. 11. Concerning Issachar, v. 14, 15. 1. That the men of that tribe should be those that understand industrious, fit for labour, and inclined to labour, particularly the title of husbandry, like the ass, that patiently carries his burden, and, by using himself to it, makes it the easier. Issachar submitted to two burdens, tillage and tribute. It was a tribe that took pains, and, thriving thereby, was called upon for rent and taxes. 2. That they should be encouraged in their labour by the goodness of the land that should fall to their lot. (1.) He saw that rest at home was good. Note, The Labour of the husbandman is really rest, in comparison with that of soldiers and seamen, whose hurries and perils are such, that those who tarry at home in the most constant service, have no reason to envy them. (2.) He saw that the land was pleasant, yielding not only pleasant prospects, but charm the eye of the curious, but pleasant fruits to compensate the toil. Many are the pleasures of a country life, abundantly qualified to balance the inconveniences of it, if we can but persuade ourselves to think so. Issachar, in prospect of advantage, bowed his shoulder to bear: let us, with an eye of faith, see the heavenly rest to be good, and that land of promise to be pleasant; and that will make our present services easy, and encourage us to bow our shoulder to them.

2. Concerning Zebulun, v. 13, 17. What is said concerning Dan, has reference either, 1. To that tribe in general; that though Dan was one of the sons of the concubines, yet he should be a tribe go verned by judges of his own as well as other tribes; and should, by art, and policy, and surprise, gain advantages against his enemies, like a serpent suddenly biting the heel of the traveller. Note, (1.) In God's spiritual kingdom, there is no distinction made of bond or free, Col. 3. 11. Dan shall be incorporated by as good a charter as any of the other tribes. (2.) Some, like Dan, may excel in the subtlety of the serpent, as others, like Judah, in the courage of the lion; and both may do good service to the cause of God against the Canaanites. Or, it may refer, 2. To Samson, who was of that tribe, and judged Israel, that is, delivered them out of the hands of the Philistines, not the other judges, by fighting them in the field, but by the vexations and annoyances he gave them underhand; when he pulled the house down under the Philistines that were upon the roof of it, he made the horse throw his rider.

Thus was Jacob going on with his discourse; but now, being almost spent with speaking, and ready to faint and die away, he relieves himself with those words which come in as a parenthesis, (v. 18.) I have waited for this salvation, O Lord; as those that are fainting, are helped by being filled with a cordial, or smelling at a bottle of spirits; or, if it must break off here, and his breath will not serve him to finish what he intended, with these words he pours out his soul into the bosom of his God, and even breathes it out. Note, The pious ejaculations of a warm and lively devotion, though sometimes they may be incoherent, yet they are not therefore to be censured as extravagant, that may be uttered affectionately, which does not come in methodically. It is no absurdity, when we are speaking to men, to lift up our hearts to God. The salvation we wait for, was, [1.] Christ, the promised Seed, whom
He had spoken of, v. 10. Now that he was going to go to the Egyptians, he breathes after him who the gathering of the people shall be. [2.]
Heard the better country, which he declared plainly that he sought, (Heb. 11. 13, 14.) and continued seeking, now that he was in Egypt. Now that he is going to enjoy the salvation, he comforts himself with this, that he had waited for the salvation. Note, First, It is the character of a living saint, that he waits for the salvation of the Lord. Christ, as our Way to heaven, is continually waiting on, and Hearest of, such, as is Christ, is to be waited for. Secondly, It is the comfort of a dying saint thus to have waited for the salvation of the Lord; for then he shall have what he has been waiting for; long looked for will come.

IV. Concerning God, v. 19. He alludes to his name, which signifies a troth, foresees the character of that tribe, that it should be a chaste tribe, and so we find, 1 Chron. 12. 8, the Gentlemen of war fit for the battle. He foresees that the situation of that tribe on the other side of Jordan, would expose it to the incursions of its neighbours, the Moabites and Ammonites; and that they might not be proud of their strength and valour, he foretells that the troops of their enemies should in many skirmishes, overcome them; yet, that they might not be discouraged by their defeats, he assures them that God would set the battle at their head, when they fulfilled when, in Saul's time and David's, the Moabites and Ammonites where wholly subdued; see 1 Chron. 5. 18, &c. Note, The cause of God and his people, though it may seem for a time to be baffled and run down, yet it will be victorious at last, Vincimus in praelio, sed non in bello—We are foiled in battle, but not in a campaign. Grace in the souls of men often in its conflicts, troops of corruption overcome it, but the cause is God's, and grace will in the issue come off conqueror, yea, more than conqueror, Rom. 8. 37.

V. Concerning Asher, v. 20. That it should be a very rich tribe, replenished not only with bread for necessitv, but with fatness, with dainties, royal dainties, (for the king himself is served of the field, Eeccl. 5. 9.) and these exported out of Asher, to other tribes, perhaps to other countries. Note, God of nature has provided for us, not only necessaries but dainties, that we might call him a bountiful Benefactor; yet, whereas all places are competently furnished with necessaries, only some places afford dainties. Corn is more common than spices. Were the supports of luxury so universal as the supports of life, the world would be worse than it is, and that it needs not be.

VI. Concerning Naphtali, v. 21. A tribe that carries struggles in its name; it signifies wresting, and the blessing entailed upon it signifies prevailing; it is a hind let loose. Though we find not this prediction so fully answered in the event as some of the rest, yet, no doubt, it proved true, that those of this tribe were, 1. As the loving hind, (for that is her epithet, Prov. 5. 19.) friendly and obliging to one and courteous to their intercourse with others. 2. As the good-natured hind, zealous for their liberty. 3. As the swift hind, (Ps. 18. 33.) quick in despatch of business; and perhaps, 4. As the trembling hind, timorous in times of public danger. It is rare that those that are most amiable to their friends, are most formidable to their enemies. 5. That they should be obfus, and courted, and their name more refined, and they complaisant, giving kindly words. Note, Among God's Israel there is to be found a great variety of dispositions, contrary to each other, yet all contributing to the beauty and strength of the body; Joshua like a lion, Issachar like an ass, Dan like a serpent, Naphtali like a hind. Let not those of different tempers and gifts censure one another, or envy one another, any more than those of different structures and complexion.

22. Joseph is a fruitful bough, even a fruitful bough by a well; whose branches run over the wall. 23. The archers have sorely grieved him, and shot at him, and hated him: 24. But his bow abode in strength, and the arms of his hands were made strong by the hands of the mighty God of Jacob; (from thence is the shepherd, the stone of Israel:) 25. Even by the God of thy father, who shall help thee; and by the Almighty, who shall bless thee with blessings of heaven above, blessings of the deep that lieth under, blessings of the breasts, and of the womb: 26. The blessings of thy father have prevailed above the blessings of thy progenitors, unto the utmost bound of the everlasting hills: they shall be on the head of Joseph, and on the crown of the head of him that was separate from his brethren. 27. Benjamin shall raven as a wolf; in the morning he shall devour the prey, and at night he shall divide the spoil.

He closes with the blessings of his best beloved sons, Joseph and Benjamin; with these he will breathe his last.

1. The blessing of Joseph, which is very large and full. He is compared (v. 22.) to a fruitful bough, or young tree; for God had made him fruitful in the land of his affliction; he owned it, ch. 41. 52. His two sons were as branches of a vine, or other spreading plant, running over the wall. Note, God can make those fruitful, great comforts to themselves and others, who have been looked upon as dry and withered. More is recorded in the history of blessing Joseph than concerning any other of Jacob's sons; and therefore what Jacob says of him, is historical as well as prophetic. Observe,

1. The providences of God concerning Joseph, v. 23, 24. These are mentioned to the glory of God, and for the encouragement of Jacob's faith and hope, that God had blessings in store for his seed. Here observe, (1.) Joseph's straits and troubles, v. 23. Though he now lived at ease, and in honour, Jacob reminds him of the difficulties he had formerly waded through. He had had many enemies here called archers, being skilful to do mischief, masters of their art of persecution: they hated him, there persecution begins; they shot their poisonous darts at him, and thus they sorely grieved him. His brethren, in his father's house, were very spiteful toward him, mocked him, stripped him, threatened him, sold him, thought they had been the death of him. His mistress in the house of Potiphar, sorely grieved him, and shot at him, when she imputingly assaulted his chastity; (temptations are fiery darts, thorns in the flesh, sorely grievous to gracious souls;) when she prevailed not in this, she hated him and shot at him, by her false accusations, arrows which there is little fence against, but the hold God has in the consciences of the worst of men. Doubtless he had enemies in the court of Pharaoh, that envied his preferment, and sought to undermine him. (2.) Joseph's strength and support under all these troubles; (v. 24.) His bow abode in strength, that is, his faith did not fail, but he kept his ground, an1 came off a conqueror. The arm of his hands were made strong that is his other graces did their part, his wisdom, courage, and patience, which are better than weapons of war. In short, he maintained both his integrity and his comfort through all his trials; he bore all his burdens with an invincible resolution, and did not sink under them nor do any thing unbecoming him. (3.) The spring and fountain of this strength; it was by the hands of the mighty God, who was therefor. and wherefore the God of Jacob, a God in covenant with him, and therefore engaged to help him. All our strength for the resisting of temptations, and the bearing of afflictions, comes from God: his grace is sufficient, and his strength is perfected in our weakness. (4.) The state of honour and usefulness he was advanced to after this; from thence, from this strange method of providen e, he became the shepherd and stone, the feeder and supporter, of God’s Israel, Jacob and his family. Herein Joseph was a type, [1.] Of Christ; he was shut at and hated, and borne up under his sufferings, (Is. 50. 7, 9.) and was afterward advanced to be the shepherd and stone. [2.]
Of the church in general, and particular believers; hell shoots its arrows against the saints, but Heaven protects and strengthens them, and will crown them as kings.

2. The promises of God to Joseph. See how these are connected with the former! (v. 23.) Even by the God of thy father Jacob, who shall help thee. Note, Our experiences of God’s power and goodness in strengthening us hitherto, are our encour-gagements still to hope for help from him; he that has helped us will: we may build much upon our
Blessings of heaven above; rain in its season, and fair weather in its season, and the benign influences of the heavenly bodies; blessings of the deep that lieth under this earth, which, compared with the upper world, is but a great deep, with subterraneous mines and springs. Spiritual blessings are blessings of heaven above, which we ought to desire and seek for, in the first place, and to which we must give the preference. And spiritual blessings, possessed of this earth, must lie under in our account and esteem.
Blessings of the womb and the breasts are given,
when children are safely born; and comfortably nursed. In the word of God, by which we are born again, and nourished up, (1 Pet. 1. 23.) there are to the new man blessings both of the womb and the breasts. [2.] Eminent and transcendent blessings. Eusebias, in his history of the progenitors, v. 26. His father Isaac had but one blessing, and when he had given that to Jacob, he was at a loss for a blessing to bestow upon Esau;
but Jacob had a blessing for each of his twelve sons, and now, at the latter end, a copious one for Joseph.
The great blessing entailed upon that family was increase, which did not so immediately and so significantly follow the blessing of Isaac as it did of Joseph, who gave to their sons, as it followed the blessing which Jacob gave to his; for, soon after his death, they multiplied exceedingly. [3.] Durable and extensive blessings; unto the utmost bound of the everlasting hills, including all the productions of the most fruitful hills, and lasting as long as they last,
Is. 54. 10. Note, The blessings of the everlasting

God include the riches of the everlasting hills, and much more. Well, of these blessings it is here said, They shall be so it is a promise, Let them be, so it is a prayer, on the head of Joseph, to which let them be as a crown to adorn it, and a helmet to protect it. Joseph was separated from his brethren,(so we read it,) for a time; yet, as others read it, he was a Nazarite among his brethren, better and more excellent than they. Note, It is no new thing for the best men to meet with the worst assurance; for Noe he was a Nazarite among their brethren to be cast out and separated from their brethren; but the blessing of God will make it up to them.

II. The blessing of Benjamin; (v. 27.) He shall beaven as a wolf; it is plain by this, that Jacob was guided in what he said, by a spirit of prophecy, and not by natural affection; else he would have spoken with more tenderness of his beloved son Benjamin, concerning whom he only foresees and foretells this,
that his posterity should be a warlike tribe, strong and daring, and that they should enrich themselves with the spoils of their enemies: that they should be active and busy in the world, and a tribe as much feared by their neighbours as any other; in the morning he shall devour the prey, which he seized and divided over-night. Or, in the first times of Israel, they shall be noted for activity, though many of them left-handed, Judg. 19. 25. 16. Elud, the second judge, and Sull, the first king, were of this tribe, and so also in the last times Esther and Mordecai were of this tribe, by whom the enemies of the Jews were destroyed. The Benjamites ravened like wolves, when they desperately espoused the cause of the men of Gibeah, those men of Belial, Judg. 20. 14. Blessed Paul was of this tribe, (Rom.
11. 1. Phil. 3. 5.) and he did in the morning of that day, devour the prey as a preyman, but in the evening, divide the spoil as a preacher. Note, God can serve his own purposes by the different temper of men; the deceived and the deceived are his.

23. All these are the twelve tribes of Israel: and this is it that their father spoke unto them, and blessed them; every one according to his blessing he blessed them. 29. And he charged them, and said unto them, I am to be gathered unto my people: bury me with my fathers in the cave that is in the field of Ephron the Hitite, 30. In the cave that is in the field of Machpelah, which is before Mamre, in the land of Canaan, which Abraham bought with the field of Ephron the Hitite for a possession of a buruing-place. 31. There they buried Abraham and Sarah his wife; there they buried Isaac and Rebekah his wife; and there I buried Leah. 32. The purchase of the field and of the cave that is therein, was from the children of Heth. 33. And when Jacob had made an end of commanding his sons, he gathered up his feet into the bed, and yielded up the ghost, and was gathered unto his people.

Here is
1. The summing up of the blessings of Jacob’s sons, v. 28. Though Reuben, Simeon, and Levi, were put under the marks of their father’s displease-sure, yet he is said to bless them every one according to his blessing; for none of them were rejected as Esaue was. Note, Whatever rebukes of God’s word or providence we are under at any time, yet, as long as we have an interest in God's covenant, a place and a name among his people, and good hopes of a share in the heavenly Canaan, we must account ourselves blessed.

2. The solemn charge Jacob gave them concerning his burial, which is a repetition of what he had before given to Joseph. See how he speaks of death, now that he was dying; (v. 29.) I am to be gathered unto my people. Note, It is good to represent death to ourselves under the most desirable images, that the terror of it may be taken off. Though it separate us from our children and our people in this world, it gathers us to our fathers and to our people in the other world. Perhaps Jacob uses this expression concerning death, as a reason why his sons should bury him in Canaan; for says he, I am gathered unto my people, my soul must be gone to the spirits of just men made perfect: and therefore bury me with my fathers, Abraham and Isaac, and their wives," v. 31.

Observe,

(1.) His heart was very much upon it, not so much from a natural affection to his native soil, as from a principle of faith in the promise of God, that Canaan should be the inheritance of his sons. This command he could keep up in his sons a remembrance of the promised land, and not only would have their acquaintance with it renewed by a journey thither on that occasion, but their desire towards it, and their expectation of it preserved.

(2.) He is very particular in describing the place, both by the situation of it, and by the purchase Abraham had made of it, for a burying-place, v. 30, 32. He was afraid lest his sons after seventeen years' sojourning in Egypt, had forgotten Canaan, and even the burying-place of their ancestors there, or lest the Canaanites should dispute his title to it; and therefore he specifies it thus largely, and the purchase of it, even when he lies a-dying, not only to prevent mistakes, but to show how mindful he was of that country. Note, It is, and should be, a great pleasure to dying saints, to fix their thoughts upon the heavenly Canaan, and the rest they hope for there after death.

3. The death of Jacob, v. 33. When he had finished both his blessing and his charge, (both which are included in the commanding of his sons,) and so had finished his testimony, he addressed himself to his dying work. (1.) He put himself into a posture for dying; having, before, seated himself upon the bed-side, to the spirit he now, by his expired lamp, Dan. 10. 19.) when that work was done, he gathered up his feet into the bed, that he might lie along, not only as one patiently submitting to the stroke, but as one cheerfully composing himself to rest, now that he was weary. I will lay me down, and sleep. (2.) He freely resigned his spirit into the hand of God, the Father of spirits; he yielded up his body to the doom of death; the spiritual part into his hands, (the spirit itself to God,) the body to the earth. And Joseph, v. 22. Thus the book of Genesis, which began with the originals of life and light, ends with nothing but death and darkness; so sad a change has sin made.

1. With tears and kisses, and all the tender expresssions of a filial affection, he takes leave of the deserted body, v. 1. Though Jacob was old and decrepit, and must needs die, in the course of nature; though he was poor comparatively, and a constant charge to his son Joseph, yet such an affection he had for a loving father, and so sensible was he of the loss of a prudent, pious, praying father, that he could not part with him without floods of tears. Note, As it is an honour to die lamented, so it is the duty of survivors to lament the death of those who have been useful in their day, though for some time they may have survived their usefulness. The departed soul is out of the reach of our tears and kisses, but with them it is proper to show our respect to the poor body, of which we look for a glorious and joyful resurrection. Thus Joseph showed his faith in God, and love to his father, by kissing his pale and cold lips, and so giving an affectionate farewell. Probably, the rest of Jacob's sons did the same, much moved, no doubt, with his dying words.

2. He ordered the body to be embalmed, (v. 2.) not only because he died in Egypt, and that was the manner of the Egyptians, but because he was to be carried to Canaan, which would be in a great part of time, and therefore it was necessary the body should be preserved as well as it might be from putrefaction. See how vile our bodies are, when the soul has forsaken them; without a great deal of art, and pains, and care, they will, in a very little time, become noisome. If the body have been dead four days, by that time it is offensive.

He ordered the ceremony of solemn mourning for him, v. 3. Forty days were taken up in embalming the body, which the Egyptians (they say) had an art of doing so curiously, as to preserve the very features of the face unchanged; all this time, and thirty days more, seventy in all, they either confined themselves and sat solitary, or when they went out, appeared in the habit of close mourners, according to the decent custom of the country. For the Egyptians, many of them, out of the great respect they had for Joseph, (whose good offices done for the king and country were now fresh in remembrance,) put themselves into mourning for his father. As with us, when the court goes into mourning, those of the best quality do so too. About ten weeks was the court of Egypt in mourning for Jacob. Note, What they did in state, we should do in sincerity, weep with them.
that weep, and mourn with them that mourn, as being ourselves also in the body.

4. He asked and obtained leave of Pharaoh to go to Canaan, thither to attend the funeral of his father, v. 4. 6. (1.) It was a piece of necessary respect to Pharaoh, that he would not go without his leave: but we may suppose, that though his charge about the corn was long since over, yet he continued a prime-minister of state, and therefore would not be so long absent from his business without licence. (2.) He observed decorum, in employing some of the royal family, or some of the officers of the household, to intercede for this licence; either because it was not proper for him in the days of mourning to come into the presence-chamber, or because he would not presume too much upon his own interest. Note, Modesty is a great ornament to dignity. (3.) He pleaded the obligation his father had laid upon him, by an oath, to bury him in Canaan, v. 5. It was not from pride or humour, but from his regard to an indispensable duty that he desired it. All nations reckon that oaths must be performed, and the will of the dead must be observed. (4.) He promised to return; I will come again. When we return to our own houses from burying the bodies of our relations, we say, "We have left them behind;" but if their souls be gone to our heavenly Father's house, we may say, with more reason, "They have left us behind." (5.) He obtained leave; (v. 6.) Go, and bury thy father. Pharaoh is willing his business should stand still so long; but the service of Christ is more needful, and therefore he would not allow one that had work to do for him, to go first and bury his father; no, Let the dead bury their dead, Matth. 8. 22.

7. And Joseph went up to bury his father: and with him went up all the servants of Pharaoh, the elders of his house, and all the elders of the land of Egypt. 8. And all the house of Joseph, and his brethren, and his father's house: only their little ones, and their flocks, and their herds, they left in the land of Goshen. 9. And there went up with him both chariots and horsemen: and it was a very great company.

10. And they came to the threshing floor of Atad, which is beyond Jordan, and there they mourned with a great and very sore lamentation: and he made a mourning for his father seven days. 11. And when the inhabitants of the land, the Canaanites, saw the mourning in the floor of Atad, they said, This is a grievous mourning to the Egyptians: wherefore the name of it was called Abel-mizraim, which is beyond Jordan. 12. And his sons did unto him according as he commanded them: 13. For his sons carried him into the land of Canaan, and buried him in the cave of the field of Machpelah, which Abraham bought with the field for a possession of a burying-place, of Ephron the Hittite, before Mamre. 14. And Joseph returned into Egypt, he, and his brethren, and all that went up with him to bury his father, after he had buried his father.

We have here an account of Jacob's funeral.

Of the funerals of the kings of Judah, usually, no more is said than this, They were buried with their fathers in the city of David; but the funeral of the patriarch Jacob is more largely and fully described.

1. To show how much better God was to him than he expected; he had spoken more than once of dying for grief, and going to the grave bereaved of his children, but, behold, he dies in honour, and is followed to the grave by all his children. 2. Because his orders concerning his burial were given and observed in faith, and in expectation both of the earthly and of the heavenly Canaan.

Now it was a stately funeral: he was attended to the grave, not only by his own family, but by the courtiers, and all the great men of the kingdom, who, in token of their gratitude to Joseph, showed this respect to his father for his sake, and did him honour at his death. Though the Egyptians had had an antipathy to the Hebrews, and had looked upon them with disdain, (ch. 43. 32.) yet now that they were better acquainted with them, they began to have a respect for them. Good old Jacob had conducted himself so well among them, as to gain universal esteem. Note, Professors of religion should endeavour, by wisdom and love, to remove the prejudices which many may have conceived against them, because they do not know them. There went abundance of chariots and horsemen, not only to attend them a little way, but to go through with them. Note, The decent solemnities of funerals, according to a man's situation, are very commendable; and we must not say of them, To what purpose is this waste? See Acts 8. 2. Luke 7. 12.

2. It was a sorrowful funeral; (v. 10, 11.) standers-by took notice of it as a grievous mourning. Note, The death of good men is a great loss to any place, and ought to be greatly lamented. Stephen dies a martyr, and yet devout men make great lamentations for him. The solemn mourning for his space, was an ornament to the nation, and a solemn testimony against the next generation of the Egyptians, who oppressed the posterity of this Jacob, to whom their ancestors showed such respect.

15. And when Joseph's brethren saw that their father was dead, they said, Joseph will peradventure hate us, and will certainly requite us all the evil which we did unto him. 16. And they sent a messenger unto Joseph, saying, Thy father did command before he died, saying, 17. So shall ye say unto Joseph, Forgive, I pray thee now, the trespass of thy brethren, and their sin; for they did unto thee evil: and now, we pray thee, forgive the trespass of the servants of the God of thy father. And Joseph wept when they spake unto him. 18. And his brethren also went and fell down before his face; and they said, Behold, we be thy servants. 19. And Joseph said unto them, Fear not: for am I in the place of God? 20. But as for you, ye thought evil against me; but God meant it unto good, to bring to pass, as it is this day, to save much people alive. 21. Now therefore fear ye not: I will nourish you, and your little ones. And he comforted them, and spake kindly unto them.
We have here the settling of a good correspondence between Joseph and his brethren; now that their father was dead. Joseph was at court, in the royal city; his brethren were in Goshen, remote in the country; yet the keeping up of a good understanding, and a good affection, between them, would be both his honour and their interest. Note, When Providence has removed the parents by death, the best methods ought not to be set aside for the averting of quarrels among the children, (which often happen about the dividing of the estate,) but for the preserving of acquaintance and love, that unity may continue, even when that centre of unity is taken away.

I. Joseph's brethren humbly make their court to him for his favour. 1. They began to be jealous of Joseph; not that he had given them any cause to be so, but such sentiments and suspicions would be naturally induced in such a case to forgive and forget, made them suspicious of the sincerity and constancy of Joseph's favour; (v. 15.) Joseph will peradventure hate us; while their father lived, they thought themselves safe under his shadow; but now that he was dead, they feared the worst from Joseph. Note, A guilty conscience exposes men to continual frights, even where no fear is, and makes them suspicious of those who have no reason to suspect them. Those that would be fearless, must keep themselves guiltless.

If our heart reproach us not, then have we confidence both toward God and man. 2. They humbled themselves before him, confessed their fault, and begged his pardon. They did it by proxy; (v. 17.) they did it in person, v. 18. Now that the sun and moon were set, the eleven stars did obeisance to Joseph, for the further accomplishment of his dream. They sought to hide their former offence with fresh regret; Forgive the trespass; they throw themselves at Joseph's feet, and refer themselves to his mercy; We be thy servants. Thus we must bewail the sins we committed long ago, even those which we hope through grace are forgiven; and when we pray for God's pardon, we must promise to be his servants. 3. They pleaded their relation to Jacob, and to Jacob's God. (1.) To Jacob, urging that he directed them to make this admission, rather because he questioned whether they would do their duty in humbling themselves, than because he questioned whether Joseph would do his duty in forgiving them: nor could he reasonably expect Joseph's kindness to them, unless they thus qualified themselves for it; (v. 16.) Thy father did command. Thus, in humbling ourselves to Christ by a sense of our duty, we bring in the authority of our Master, and make it a proof of our sincerity, to the present, of his former command of his Father, and our Father, that we do so. (2.) To Jacob's God. They plead, (v. 17.) We are the servants of the God of thy father; not only children of the same Jacob, but worshippers of the same Jehovah. Note, Though we must be ready to forgive all that are any way injurious to us, yet we must especially take heed of bearing malice towards any that are the servants of the God of our father, in whose name, and for whose sake, we have a peculiar tenderness; for we and they have the same master.

II. Joseph, with a great deal of compassion, confirms his reconciliation and affection to them; his compassion appears, v. 17. He wept when they spoke to him. These were tears of sorrow for their suspicion of him, and tears of tenderness upon their submission. In his reply, he directs them to look up to God in their repentance; (v. 19.) Am I the place of God? He, in his great humility, thought they showed him too much respect, as if all their happiness were bound up in his favour; and said to them, in effect, as Peter to Cornelius, "Stand up, I myself also am a man. Make your peace with God, and then you will find it easy to make your peace with me." Note, When we ask forgiveness of those whom we have offended, we must take heed of putting them in the place of God, by dreading their wrath, and soliciting their favour more than God's. "Am I in the place of God, to whom alone vengeance belongs? No, I will leave you to his mercy." Those that aver their own selves, step into the place of God, Rom. 12. 19.

He obviates their fault, from the consideration of the great good which God wonderfully brought out of it, which, though it should not make them the less sorry for their sin, yet it might make him the more willing to forgive it; (v. 20.) Ye thought evil, to disappoint the dreams, but God meant it unto good, in order to the fulfilling of the dreams, and the making of Joseph a greater blessing to his family than otherwise he could have been. Note, (1.) When God makes use of men's agency for the performance of his counsels, it is common for him to mean one thing, and them another, even the quite contrary; but God's counsels shall stand. See Isa. 10. 7. (2.) God often brings good out of evil, and serves the designs of his providence, even by the sins of men; not that he is the Author of sin, far be it from us to think so; but his infinite wisdom so overrules events, and directs the chain of them, that, in some instances, he seems to applaud evil, and, though it be in nature had a direct tendency to his dishonour; as the putting of Christ to death, Acts 2. 23. This does not make sin the less sinful, nor sinners the less punishable, but it redounds greatly to the glory of God's wisdom.

3. He assures them of the continuance of his kindness to them; Fear not, I will nourish you, v. 21. See what an excellent spirit Joseph was of; and how he knew how to render good for evil. He did not tell them, they were upon their good behaviour, and he would be kind to them, if he saw they conducted themselves well; no, he would not thus hold them in suspense, nor seem jealous of them, though they had been suspicious of him; he comforted them, and to banish all their fears, he spake kindly to them. Note, Broken spirits must be bound up and encouraged. These we love and forgive, we must not only do well for, but speak kindly to.

22. And Joseph dwelt in Egypt, he, and his father's house: and Joseph lived an hundred and ten years. 23. And Joseph saw Ephraim's children of the third generation: the children also of Machir, the son of Manasseh, were brought up upon Joseph's knees. 24. And Joseph said unto his brethren, I die: and God will surely visit you, and bring you out of this land unto the land which he sware to Abraham, to Isaac, and to Jacob. 25. And Joseph took an oath of the children of Israel, saying, God will surely visit you, and ye shall carry up my bones from hence. 26. So Joseph died, being an hundred and ten years old: and they embalmed him, and he was put in a coffin in Egypt.

Here is,

1. The prolonging of Joseph's life in Egypt; he lived to be an hundred and ten years old, v. 22. Having honoured his father, his days were long in the land, which, for the present, God had given him; and it was a very great mercy to his relations, that God continued him so long, a support and comfort to them.

2. The building up of Joseph's family; he lived to see his great-grand-children by both his sons, (v. 23.) and, probably, he saw his two sons solemnly owned as heads of distinct tribes, equal to any of his brethren. It contributes much to the comfort of aged parents, if they see their posterity in a flourishing condition, especially if with it they see peace upon Israel, Ps. 128. 6.

3. The last will and testament of Joseph published in the presence of his brethren, when he saw his death approaching; those that were properly his brethren, perhaps were some of them dead before him, as several of them were elder than he; but to those of them who yet survived, and to the sons of those who were gone, who stood up in their fathers’ stead, he said this.

(1.) He comforted them with the assurance of their return to Canaan in due time; (v. 24.) I die, but God will surely visit you; to this purport Jacob had spoken to him, ch. 48. 21. Thus must we comfort others with the same comforts with which we ourselves have been comforted of God, and encourage them to rest on those promises which have been our support. Joseph was, under God, both the protector and the benefactor of his brethren; and what would become of them, now that he was dying? Why, let this be their comfort, God will surely visit you. Note, God’s gracious visits will serve to make up the loss of our best friends. They die; but we may live, and live comfortably, if we have the favour and presence of God with us. He bids them be confident; God will bring you out of this land, and therefore, [1.] They must not hope to settle there, nor look upon it as their rest for ever; they must set their hearts upon the land of promise, and call that their home. [2.] They must not fear sinking, and being ruined there; probably he foresaw the ill usage they would meet with there after his death, and therefore gives them this word of encouragement; “God will bring you in triumph out of this land at last.” Herein he has an eye to the promise, ch. 13. 13, 14. and, in God’s name, assures them of the performance of it.

(2.) For a confession of his own faith, and a confirmation of theirs, he charges them to keep him unburied till that day, that glorious day should come, when they should be settled in the land of promise, v. 25. He makes them promise him with an oath, that they would bury him in Canaan. In Egypt they buried their great men very honorably, and with abundance of pomp; but Joseph prefers a significant burial in Canaan, and that deferred to almost two hundred years, before a magnificent one in Egypt. Thus Joseph, by faith in the doctrine of the resurrection, and the promise of Canaan, gave commandment concerning his bones, Heb. 11. 22. He died in Egypt; but lays his bones at stake, that God will surely visit Israel, and bring them to Canaan.

4. The death of Joseph, and the reservation of his body for a burial in Canaan; v. 26. He was put in a coffin in Egypt, but not buried till his children had received their inheritance in Canaan, Josh. 24. 32. Note, (1.) If the separate soul, at death, do but return to its rest with God, the matter is not great, though the deserted body find not all, or not quickly, its rest in the grave. (2.) Yet care ought to be taken of the dead bodies of the saints, in the belief of their resurrection; for there is a covenant with the dust, which shall be remembered, and a commandment is given concerning the bones.

AN
WITH PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS, OF THE SECOND BOOK OF MOSES, CALLED EXODUS.

Moses, (the Servant of the Lord in writing for him, as well as in acting for him— with the pen of God, as well as with the rod of God, in his hand,) having, in the first book of his history, preserved and transmitted the records of the church, while it existed in private families, comes, in this second book, to give us an account of its growth into a great nation; and as the former furnishes us with the best chronology, so this with the best Politics. The beginning of the former book shows us how God formed the world for himself; the beginning of this shows us how he formed Israel for himself, and both to show forth his praise, Isa. 43. 21. There we have the creation of the world in history, here the redemption of the world in type. The Greek translators called this book Exodus, (which signifies a departure, or going out,) because it begins with the story of the going out of the children of Israel from Egypt. Some allude to the names of this and the foregoing book, and observe, that immediately after Genesis, which signifies the beginning, or original, follows Exodus, which signifies a departure, for a time to be born is immediately succeeded by a time to die. No sooner a nation emerge into the world, than we must think of marking our exit, and going out of the world. When we begin to live, we begin to die. The forming of Israel into a people, was a new creation. As the earth was in the beginning, first fetched from under water, and then beautified and replenished; so Israel was first, by an Almighty power, made to emerge out of Egyptian slavery, and then enriched with God's law and tabernacle. This book gives us,

I. The accomplishment of the promises made before to Abraham; ch. 1. to 19. And then,

II. The establishment of the ordinances which were afterward observed by Israel; ch. 20. to 40. Moses, in this book, begins, like Caesar, to write his own Commentaries; nay a greater, a far greater, than Caesar is here. But henceforward the penman is himself the hero, and gives us the history of those things of which he was himself an eye and an ear witness, etc. quorum pars magna sit—and in which he bore a conscious part. There are more types of Christ in this book, than perhaps in any other book of the Old Testament; for Moses wrote of him, John 5. 46. The way of man's reconciliation to God, and coming into covenant and communion with him by a Mediator, is here variously represented; and it is of great use to us for the illustration of the New Testament, now that we have that to assist us in the explication of the Old.

EXODUS, I.

CHAP. I.

We have here, I. God's kindness to Israel, in multiplying them exceedingly, v. 1. to 7. II. The Egyptians' wickedness to them, v. 1. Oppressing and enslaving them, v. 8. to 14. 2. Murdering their children, v. 15. to 22. Thus whom the court of heaven blessed, the country of Egypt cursed, and for that reason.

1. NOW these are the names of the children of Israel, which came into Egypt; every man and his household came with Jacob. 2. Reuben, Simeon, Levi, and Judah, 3. Issachar, Zebulun, and Benjamin, 4. Dan, and Naphtali, Gad, and Asher. 5. And all the souls that came out of the loins of Jacob, were seventy souls: for Joseph was in Egypt already. 6. And Joseph died, and all his brethren, and all that generation. 7. And the children of Israel were fruitful, and increased abundantly, and multiplied, and waxed exceeding mighty; and the land was filled with them.

In these verses we have,

1. A recital of the names of the twelve patriarchs, as they are called, Acts 7. 8. Their names are often repeated in scripture; that they may not sound uncouth to us, as other hard names, but that, by their occurring so frequently, they may become familiar to us; and to show how precious God's spiritual Israel are to him, and how much he delights in them.

2. The account which was kept of the number of Jacob's family, when they went down into Egypt; they were in all seventy souls, (v. 5.) according to the computation we had, ch. 46. 27. This was just the number of the nations by which the earth was peopled, according to the account given, ch. 10. For when the Most High separated the sons of Adam, he set the bounds of the people according to the number of the children of Israel, as Moses observes, Deut. 32. 8. Notice is taken of this, here, that their increase in Egypt might appear the more wonderful. Note, It is good for those whose latter end greatly increases, often to remember how small their beginning was, Job 8. 7.

3. The death of Joseph, v. 6. All that generation by degrees wore off; perhaps all Jacob's sons died much about the same time; for there was not more than seven years difference in age between the eldest and the youngest of them, except Benjamin; and when death comes into a family, sometimes it makes a full end in a little time; when Joseph, the stay of the family, died, the rest went off apace. Note, We must look upon ourselves and our brethren, and all we converse with, as dying, and hastening out of the world. This generation passeth away, as that did which went before.

4. The strange increase of Israel in Egypt, v. 7. Here are four words used to express it; they were fruitful, and increased abundantly, like fishes or insects, so that they multiplied; and, being generally healthful and strong, they waxed exceeding mighty, so that they began almost to outnumber the natives, for the land was in all places filled with them, at least, Goshen, their own allotment. Observe, (1.) Though, no doubt, they increased considerably before, yet, it should seem, it was not till after the death of Joseph, that it began to be taken notice of as extraordinary. Thus, when they lost the benefit of his protection, God made their numbers their defence, and they became better than they had been, to shift for themselves. If God can unite our friends and relations to us while we most need them, and remove them when they can be better spared, let us own that he is wise, and not complain that he is hard upon us. After the death of Joseph, his Gospel-Israel began most remarkably to increase; his death had an influence upon it; it was like the sowing of a corn of wheat, which, if it die, brings forth much fruit, John 12. 24. (2.) This wonderful increase was the fulfilment of the promise long before made unto the fathers from the call of Abraham, when God first told him he would make of him a great nation, to the deliverance of his seed out of Egypt, it was 450 years, during the first 213 of which, they were increased but to 70, but, in the latter half, those 70 multiplied to 600,000 fighting-men. Note, [1.] Sometimes God's providences may seem for a great while to thwart his promises, and to go counter to them, that his people's faith may be tried, and his own power the more magnified. [2.] Though the performance of God's promises is sometimes slow, yet it is always sure; at the end it shall speak, and shall not be, Hab. 2. 3.

8. Now there arose up a new king over Egypt, which knew not Joseph. 9. And he said unto his people, Behold, the people of the children of Israel are more and mightier than we: 10. Come on, let us deal wisely with them; lest they multiply, and it come to pass, that, when there falleth out any war, they join also unto our enemies, and fight against us, and so get them up out of the land. 11. Therefore they did set over them task-masters to afflict them with their burdens. And they built for Pharaoh treasure-cities, Pithom and Raamses. 12. But the more they afflicted them, the more multiplied and grew. And they were grieved because of the children of Israel. 13. And the Egyptians made the children of Israel to serve with rigour: 14. And they made their lives bitter with hard bondage, in mortar, and in brick, and in all manner of service in the field: all their service, wherein they made them serve, was with rigour.

The land of Egypt here, at length, becomes to Israel a house of bondage, though, hitherto, it had been a happy shelter and settlement for them. Note, The place of our satisfaction may soon become the place of our affliction, and that may prove the greatest cross to us, of which we said, This same shall comfort us. Those may prove our sworn enemies, whose parents were our faithful friends; nay, the same persons that loved us, may possibly turn to hate us: therefore, Caesar from man, and say not concerning any place on this side heaven, This is my rest for ever. Observe here,

I. The obligations they lay under to Israel upon Joseph's account were forgotten; (v. 8.) There arose a new king, after several successions in Joseph's time, which knew not Joseph. All that knew him, loved him, and were kind to his relations for his sake; but, when he was dead, he was soon forgotten, and the Egyptians, who had the most to do, was done, was either not retained, or not regarded, nor had it any influence upon their councils. Note, The best, and the most useful and acceptable services done to men, are seldom remembered, so as to be recompensed to those that did them, in the notice taken either of their memory, or of their posterity, after their death. Ex. 9. 5. 15. And therefore our great care should be to serve God, and please him, who is not unrighteous, whatever men are, to forget our work and labour of love. Heb. 6. 10. If we work for men only, our works, at furtthest, will die with us; if for God, they will follow us, Rev. 14. 15. 13. This king of Egypt knew not Joseph; and after him are so one that had the impudence to say, I know not the Lord, ch. 5. 2. Note, Those that are unmindful of their other beneficiaries, it is to be feared, will forget the supreme Benefactor, 1 John 4. 21.

II. Reasons of state were suggested for their dealing hardely with Israel, v. 9. 10. 1. They are represented as more and mightier than the Egyptians; certainly they were not so; but the King of Egypt, when he resolved to oppress them, would have them thought so, and looked on as a formidable body. 2. Hence it is inferred, that if care were not taken to keep them under, they would become dangerous to the government, and in time of war would side with their enemies, and revolt from their allegiance to the crown of Egypt. Note, It has been the policy of persecutors to represent God's Israel as a dangerous people, hurtful unto kings and provinces, not fit to be trusted, nay, not fit to be tolerated, that they may have some pretence for the barbarous treatment that they design them, Ex. 12. 14, &c. Esth. 3. 8. Observe, Too thing they feared, was, lest they should get them upp out of the land; probably, having heard them speak of the promise made to their fathers, that they should settle in Canaan. Note, The policies of the church's enemies aim to defeat the promises of the church's God, but in vain; God's counsels shall stand. 3. It is therefore proposed that a course be taken to check this increase, one way deal wisely with them, lest they multiply. Note, (1.) The growth of Israel is the grief of Egypt, and that against which the powers and policies of hell are levelled. (2.) When new deal wickedly, it is common for them to imitate that they deal wisely; but the folly of sin will, at last, be manifested before all men.

III. The method they took to suppress them, and check their growth, v. 11, 13, 14. The Israelites behaved themselves so peaceably and industriously, that they could not find any occasion of making war upon them, and weakening them by that means: and therefore, 1. They took care to keep them poor, by charging them with heavy taxes, which, some think, is included in the burdens with which they afflicted them. 2. By this means they took an effectual course to make them slaves; the Israelites, it should seem, were much more industrious laborious people than the Egyptians, and therefore Pharaoh took care to find them work, both in his building, (they made him treasure-cities,) and in his husbandry, even all manner of service in the field; and this was exacted from them with the utmost rigour and severity. Here are many expressions used, to affect us with the condition of God's people. They had task-masters set over them, who were directed, not only to burden them, but, as much as might be, to afflict them with their burdens, and contrive how to make them grievous. They not only made them serve, which was sufficient for Pharaoh's profit, but they made them serve with rigour, so that their lives became bitter to them; intending thereby, (1.) To break their spirits, and rob them of every thing in them, that was manageable, and might be useful. (2.) To hurt their health, and shorten their days, and so diminish their numbers. (3.) To discourage them from marrying, since their children would be born to slavery. (4.) To oblige them to desert the Hebrews, and incorporate themselves with the Egyptians. Thus he hoped to cut off the name of Israel, that it might be no more in remembrance. And it is to be feared that the oppression they were under, had this bad effect upon them, that it brought over many of them to join with the Egyptians in their idolatrous worship: for we read, (Josh. 24. 14.) that they served other gods in Egypt; and though it is not mentioned here in this history, yet we find, (Ezek. 20. 8.) that God had threatened to destroy them for it, even while they were in the land of Egypt: however, they were kept a distinct body, unmingled with the Egyptians, and by their other customs separated from them, which was the Lord's doing, and marvellous.

IV. The wonderful increase of the Israelites, notwithstanding the oppression they groaned under; (v. 12.) The more they afflicted them, the more they multiplied, sorely to the grief and vexation of the Egyptians. Note, 1. Times of affliction have often been the church's growing times, Sub pondere creavit—Being pressed, it grows. Christianity spread most when it was persecuted: the blood of the martyrs was the seed of the church. 2. They that take counsel against the Lord and his Israel, do but imagine a vain thing, (Ps. 2. 1.) and create so much the greater vexation to themselves: hell and earth cannot diminish those whom Heaven will increase.

15. And the king of Egypt spake to the Hebrew midwives, of which the name of the one was Shiphrah, and the name of the other Puah: 16. And he said, When ye do the office of a midwife to the Hebrew women, and see them upon the storks; if it be a son, then ye shall kill him; but if it be a daughter, then she shall live. 17. But the midwives feared God, and did not as the king of Egypt commanded them, but saved the men-children alive. 18. And the king of Egypt called for the midwives, and said unto them, Why have ye done this thing, and have saved the men-children alive? 19. And the midwives said unto Pharaoh, Because the Hebrew women are not as the Egyptian women; for they are lively, and are delivered ere the midwives come in unto them. 20. Therefore God dealt well with the midwives: and the people multiplied, and waxed very mighty. 21. And it came to pass, because the midwives feared God, that he made them houses. 22. And Pharaoh charged all his people, saying, Every son that is born ye shall cast into the river, and every daughter ye shall save alive.

The Egyptians' indignation at Israel's increase, notwithstanding the many hardships they put upon them, drove them, at length, to the most barbarous and inhuman methods of suppressing them, by the murder of their children. It was strange that they did not rather pick quarrels with the grown men, against whom they might find some occasion perhaps; to be thus bloody toward the infants, whom all must own to be innocent, was a sin which they had no excuse for. For in the corrupt heart of man there would imagine, Rom. 3. 15, 16. The enmity that is in the seed of the serpent against the seed of the woman, divests men of humanity itself, and makes them forget all pity. One would not think it possible that ever man should be so barbarous and blood-thirsty as the persecutors of God's people have been, Rev. 17. 5. 2. Every confessed innocencel is no defence against the old enmity; what blood so guiltless as that of a child new-born? Yet that is prodigiously shed like water, and sucked with delight like milk or honey. Pharaoh and Hered sufficiently proved themselves agents for that great red dragon, who vood to devour the man-child as soon as it was born, Rev. 12. 3, 4. Pilate delib ered Christ to be crucified, after he had confessed that he found no fault in him. It is well for us, though man can kill the body, that is all he can do.

Two bloody edicts are here signed for the destruction of all the male-children that were born to the Hebrews. 1. The midwives were commanded to murder them. Observe, 1. The orders given them, v. 15, 16. It added much to the barbarity of the intended executioners, that the midwives were appointed to be the executioners; for it was to make them, not only bloody, but perfidious, and to oblige them to betray a trust, and to destroy those whom they undertook to save and help. Could he think that their sex would admit such cruelty, and their employment such base treachery? Note, Those who are themselves barbarous, think to find, or make, others as barbarous. Pharaoh's project was, secretly to engage the midwives to stifle the men-children as soon as they were born, and then to lay it upon the difficulty of the birth, or some miscarriage common in that case, Job 3. 11. The two midwives he tempered with in order hereunto, are here named; and perhaps, at this time, which was above eighty years before their going out of Egypt, these two might suffice for all the Hebrew women, at least so many of them as lay near the court, as is plain, by ch. 2. 5, 6, many of them did, and of them he was most jealous. They are called Hebrew midwives, probably, not because they were themselves Hebrews, (for surely Pharaoh could never expect they should be so barbarous to those of their own nation,) but because they were generally made use of by the Hebrews; and being Egyptians, he hoped to prevail with them.

2. Their pious disobedience to this impious command, v. 17. They feared God, regarded his law, and dreaded his wrath more than Pharaoh's, and therefore saved the men-children alive. Note, (1.) If men's commands be any way contrary to the commands of God, we must obey God and not man, Acts 4. 19.—5. 29. No power on earth can warrant such less oblige us, to sin against God, his Son, and chief Lord. (2.) Where the fear of God rules in the heart, it will preserve it from that snare which the inordinate fear of man brings.

3. Their justifying of themselves in this disobedience, when they were charged with it as a crime, v. 18. They gave a reason for it, which, it seems, God's gracious providence had furnished them with—that they came too late to do it, for, generally, the children were born before they came, v. 19. I see no reason we have to doubt of the truth of this; it is plain that the Hebrews were now under an extraordinary blessing of increase, which may well be supposed to have this effect, that the women had very quick and easy labour, and the mothers and children being both lively, they seldom needed the help of midwives: this, these midwives took notice of, and concluding it to be the finger of God, they hid their children, and preserved them safe and sound, in the favour of whose Lord they lived, in favour of those whom Heaven thus favour ed, and with this justified themselves before Pharaoh, when he called them to an account for it. Some of the ancient Jews expound it thus, Ere the midwife comes to them, they pray to their Father in heaven, and he answers them, and they do bring forth. Note, God is a readier help to his people in distress than any other helpers are, and often prevents them with the blessings of his goodness; such deliverances lay them under peculiarly strong obligations.

4. The recompense God gave them for their tenderness toward his people; he dealt well with them. v. 20. Note, God will be behind-hand with none for any kindness done to his people, taking it home again, and giving it back with interest. In patriarch's houses, (v. 21.) built themselves up into families, blessed their children, and prospered them in all they did. Note, The services done for God's Israel are often repaid in kind. The midwives kept up the Israelites' houses, and, in recompense for it, God made them houses. Observe, The recompense has relation to the principle upon which they went; because they feared God, he made them houses. Note, Religion and piety are good friends to outward prosperity; the fear of God in a house will help to build it up and establish it. Dr. Lightfoot's notion of it, is, That, for their piety, they were married to Israelites, and Hebrew families were built up by them.

II. When this project did not take effect, Pharaoh gave public orders to all his people to drown all the male-children of the Hebrews, v. 22. We may suppose it was made by the penal law, to know of the birth of a son to an Israelite, and not to give information to those who were appointed to throw him into the river. Note, The enemies of the church have been restless in their endeavours to wear out the saints of the Most High, Dan. 7. 25. But he that sits in heaven shall laugh at them. See Ps. 2. 4.

CHAP. II.

This Chapter begins the story of Moses, that man of renown, famed for his intimate acquaintance with Heaven, and his eminent usefulness on earth; and the most remarkable Type of Christ, as Prophet, Saviour, Lawgiv
AND there went a man of the house of Levi, and took to wife a daughter of Levi. 2. And the woman conceived, and bare a son; and when she saw him that he was a goodly child, she hid him three months. 3. And when she could not longer hide him, she took for him an ark of bulrushes, and daubed it with slime and with pitch, and put the child therein; and she laid it in the flags by the river's brink. 4. And his sister stood afar off, to wit what would be done to him.

Moses was a Levite, both by father and mother. Jacob left Levi under marks of disgrace; (Gen. 49. 5.) and yet, soon after, Moses appears a deacon, an attendant from him, that he might typify Christ, who came in the likeness of sinful flesh, and was made a curse for us. This tribe began to be distinguished from the rest by the birth of Moses, as afterward it became remarkable in many other instances. Observe concerning this new-born infant.

I. How he was hidden. It seems to have been at the time of his birth, that the cruel law was made for the murder of all the male-children of the Hebrews; and many, no doubt, perished by the execution of it. The parents of Moses had Miriam and Aaron, both elder than he, born to them before that edict came out, and had nursed them, without that peril; but those that begin the world in peace, know not how it may end. They have got them through it. Probably, the mother of Moses was full of anxiety in the expectation of his birth, now that this edict was in force, and was ready to say, Blessed are the barren that never bare, Luke 23. 29. Better so, than bring forth children to the murderer, Hos. 9. 13. Yet this child proves the glory of his father's house. Thus that which is most our fear, often proves, in the issue, most our joy. God's ways; one would say, are such as we know not; but that is the case. Just at the time when Pharaoh's cruelty rose to this height, the deliverer was born, though he did not appear for many years after. Note, When men are projecting the church's ruin, God is preparing for its salvation. And Moses, who was afterward to bring Israel out of this house of bondage, had himself like to have fallen a sacrifice to the fury of the oppressor. God so ordering all things, that being afterward told of this, he might be the more enanimated with a holy zeal for the deliverance of his brethren out of the hands of such bloody men.

1. His parents observed him to be a goodly child, more than ordinarily beautiful; he was fair to God, Acts 7. 20. They fancied he had a lustre in his countenance that was something more than human, and was a specimen of the shining of his face afterward, ch. 34. 29. Note, God sometimes gives early earnest of his gifts, and manifests himself betimes in those for whom, and by whom, he designs to do great things. Thus he put an early strength into Samson, (Judg. 13. 24, 25.) an early forwardness into Samuel, (1 Sam. 2. 18.) wrought an early deliverance for David, (1 Sam. 17. 37.) and began being with Timothy, 2 Tim. 3. 15. Therefore they were the more solicitous for his preservation, because they looked upon this as an indication of some kind purpose of God concerning him, and a happy omen of something great. Note, A lively active faith can take encouragement from the least intimation of the divine favour; a merciful hint of Providence will encourage those whose spirits do diligent search. Three months they hid him; in the same private apartment of their own house, though, probably, in fear of their lives, that is, of their own lives, had he been discovered. Herein Moses was a type of Christ, who, in his infancy, was forced to absent, and in Egypt too, (Matt. 2. 13.) and was wonderfully preserved, when many innocents were butchered. It is said, (Heb. 11. 23.) that the parents of Moses hid him by faith; some think they had a special revelation to them that the Deliverer should spring from their loins; however, they had the general promise of Israel's preservation, which they acted faith upon, and in that faith hid their child, not being afraid of the penalty annexed to the king's commandment. Note, (1) Faith in God's promise is so far from superseding, that it rather excites and quickens to the use of lawful means for obtaining mercy. Dury is our, and God's. (2) Faith in God will set us above the insomning fear of man. 11. How he was exposed. At three months' end, probably, when the searchers came about to look for circumscribed children, so that they could not hide him any longer, (their faith perhaps beginning now to fail,) they put him in an ark of bulrushes by the river's brink, (v. 5.) and set his little sister at some distance to watch what would become of him, and into whose hands he would fall, v. 4. God put it into their hearts to do this, to bring about his own purposes; that Moses might by this means be brought into the hands of Pharaoh's daughter, and that by his deliverance from this imminent danger, a specimen might be given of the deliverance of God's church, which now lay thus exposed. Note, God takes special care of the outcasts of Israel, Ps. 147. 2. They are not only kept, but they are used. Moses seemed quite abandoned by his friends, his own mother durst not own him, but now the Lord took him up and protected him, Ps. 27. 10. 2. In times of extreme difficulty, it is good to venture upon the providence of God. Thus to have exposed their child while they might have preserved it, had been to tempt Providence; but when they could not, it was bravely to trust to Providence. "Nothing venture, nothing win," If I perish, I perish. 5. And the daughter of Pharaoh came down to wash herself at the river; and her maidens walked along by the river's side; and when she saw the ark among the flags, she sent her maid to fetch it. 6. And when she had opened it, she saw the child: and, behold, the babe wept. And she had compassion on him, and said, This is one of the Hebrews' children. 7. Then said his sister to Pharaoh's daughter, Shall I go and call to thee a nurse of the Hebrew women, that she may nurse the child for thee? 8. And Pharaoh's daughter said unto her, Go. And the maid went and called the child's mother
9. And Pharaoh's daughter said unto her, Take this child away, and nurse it for me, and I will give thee thy wages. And the woman took the child, and nursed it. 10. And the child grew, and she brought him unto Pharaoh's daughter, and he became her son. And she called his name Moses; and she said, Because I drew him out of the water.

Here is,

1. Moses saved from perishing. Come, see the place where that great man lay, when he was a little child; he lay in a bulrush basket by the river's side. Had he been left to lie there, he must have perished in a little while. It was he had not been sooner washed into the river, or devoured by a crocodile. Had he fallen into any other hands than those he did fall into, either they would not, or durst not have done otherwise, than have thrown him straightway into the river; but Providence brings no less a person thither than Pharaoh's daughter, just at that juncture, guides her to the place where this poor forlorn infant lay, and inclines her heart to pity it, which was the other else durst. Never did poor child cry so seasonably, so happily as this did; the babe wept, which moved the compassion of the princess, as, no doubt, his beauty did, v. 5. 6. Note, (1.) Those are hard-hearted indeed, that have not tender compassion for helpless infancy. How pathetically does God represent his compassion for the Israelites in general, considered in this pitiful state! Exek. 16. 5, 6. (2.) It is very commendable in persons of quality, to take cognizance of the distresses of the meanest, and to be helpful and charitable to them. (3.) God's care of us in our infancy ought to be often made mention of by us to his praise. Though we were not thus exposed, (that we were not, was God's mercy,) yet many were the perils we were surrounded with in our infancy, out of which the Lord delivered us, Ps. 22. 9, 10. (4.) God often raised up friends for his people even among their enemies. Pharaoh cruelly seeks Israel's destruction, but his own daughter charitably compassionates a Hebrew child, and not only so, but, beyond her intention, preserves Israel's deliverer. O Lord, how wonderful are thy counsels.

2. Moses well provided with a good nurse, no worse than his own dear mother, v. 7. 9. Pharaoh's daughter thinks it commendable that he should have a Hebrew nurse, (pity that so fair a child should be suckled by a sable Moor,) and the sister of Moses, with art and good management, introduces the mother into the place of a nurse, to the great advantage of the child; for mothers are the best nurses, and those who receive the blessings of the breasts with those of the womb, are not unjustly pronounced by these Pharaoh to give them up to these for which sake they received them: it was also an unspeakable satisfaction to the mother, who received her son as life from the dead, and now could enjoy him without fear. The transport of her joy, upon this happy turn, we may suppose sufficient to betray her to be the true mother (had there been any suspicion of it) to a less discerning eye than that of Solomon, 1 Kings 5. 3.

3. Moses preferred to be the son of Pharaoh's daughter, v. 10. His parents herein perhaps not only yielding to necessity, having nursed him for her, but too much pleased with the honour thereby done to their son; for the smiles of the world are stronger temptations than its frowns, and more hardly resisted. The tradition of the Jews is, That Pharaoh's daughter had no child of her own, and that she was the only child of her father, so that when he was adopted for her son, he stood fair for the crown; however, it is certain he stood fair for the best preferments of the court in due time, and in the mean time had the advantage of the best education and improvements of the court, with the help of which, having a great genius, he became master of all the lawful learning of the Egyptians, Acts 7. 22. Note, (1.) Providence pleases itself sometimes in raising the poor out of the dust, to set them among princes, Ps. 113. 7, 8. Many who by their birth, seem marked for obscurity and poverty, by surprising events of Providence are brought to sit at the upper end of the world, to make men know that the Heavens do rule, (2.) Those whom God designs for great services, he finds out ways to qualify and prepare beforehand, Moses, by having his education in a court, is the fitter to be a prince among men, and king in Jeshurun; by having his education in a learned court, (for such the Egyptian then was,) is the fitter to be a historian; and by having his education in the court of Egypt, is the fitter to be employed, in the name of God, as an ambassador to that court.

4. Moses named. The Jews tell us that his father, at his circumcision, called him Joachim, but Pharaoh's daughter called him Moses, Drawn out of the water, so it signifies in the Egyptian language. The calling of a Jewish lawyer by an Egyptian name, is a happyomen to the Gentile world, and gives hopes of that day when it shall be said, Blessed be Egypt my people, Isa. 19. 25. And his titution at court was an earnest of the performance of that promise, (Isa. 49. 23.) Kings shall be thy nursing fathers, and queens thy nursing-mothers.

11. And it came to pass in those days, when Moses was grown, that he went out unto his brethren, and looked on their burdens: and he spied an Egyptian smiting an Hebrew, one of his brethren. 12. And he looked this way and that way, and when he saw that there was no man, he slew the Egyptian, and hid him in the sand. 13. And when he went out the second day, behold, two men of the Hebrews strove together; and he said to him that did the wrong, Wherefore smitest thou thy fellow? 14. And he said, Who made thee a prince and a judge over us? Intendest thou to kill me, as thou killedst the Egyptian? And Moses feared, and said, Surely this thing is known. 15. Now when Pharaoh heard this thing, he sought to slay Moses. But Moses fled from the face of Pharaoh, and dwelt in the land of Midian: and he sat down by a well.

Moses had now passed the first forty years of his life in the court of Pharaoh, preparing himself for business; and now it was time for him to enter upon action, and, He boldly owns and exposes the cause of God's people; when Moses was grown, he went out unto his brethren, and looked on their burdens, v. 11. The best exposition of these words we have from an inspired pen, Heb. 11. 24. 26. where we are told that this bespeaks, 1. His holy contempt of the honours and pleasures of the Egyptian court; he refused to be called the son of Pharaoh's daughter, for he went out. The temptation was indeed very strong; he had a fair opportunity (as we say) to make his fortune, and to have been serviceable to Israel too, with his interest at court: he was obliged, in gratitude as well as interest, to Pharaoh's daughter, and yet he obtained a glorious victory by faith over his temptation. He reckoned it much more his honour and advantage to be a son of Abraham, than to be the son of Pharaoh's daughter. 2. His turn, then, of concern for his poor brethren, in whom with whom (though he might easily have avoided it) he chose to suffer affliction; he looked on their burdens, as one that not only pitied them, but was resolved to venture with them, and, if occasion were, to venture for them.

II. He gives a specimen of the great things he was afterward to do for God and his Israel, in two little instances, related particularly by Stephen, (Acts x. 23, &c.) with design to shew how their fathers had always resisted the Holy Ghost, (v. 51.) even in Moses himself, when he first appeared as their deliverer, wilfully shutting their eyes against this day-break of their enlargement. He found himself, no doubt, under a divine direction and impulse in what he did, and that he was in an extraordinary manner called of God to it. Now, observe,

1. Moses was afterward to be employed in plaguing the Egyptians for the wrongs they had done to God's Israel; and, as a specimen of that, he killed the Egyptian who smote the Hebrew; (v. 11, 12.) probably, it was one of the Egyptian task-masters, whom he found abusing his Hebrew slave, a relation (as some think) of Moses, as man of the same tribe. It was by special warrant from Heaven, (which makes not a precedent in ordinary cases,) that Moses slew the Egyptian, and rescued his oppressed brother. The Jews' tradition is, that he did not slay him with any weapon, but, as Peter slew Ananias and Sapphira, with the word of his mouth. His hiding him in the sand signified, that hereafter Pharaoh and all his Egyptians should, under the control of the rod of Moses, be buried in the sand of the Red-sea. His taking care to execute this justice privately, when no man saw, was a piece of needful prudence and caution, it being but an assay, and perhaps his faith was yet weak, and what he did, was with some hesitation. Those who come to be of great faith, yet began with a little, and at first spake trembling.

2. Moses was afterward to be employed in governing Israel, and, as a specimen of that, we have his quarrel with his Hebrew brethren, and with Pharaoh, the Hebrews, in which he is forced (as he did afterward for forty years) to suffer their manners. Observe here,

(1.) The unhappy quarrel which Moses observed between two Hebrews, v. 13. It does not appear what was the occasion; but, whatever it was, it was certainly very unseasonable for Hebrews to strive with one another, when they were all oppressed and ruled with rigour by the Egyptians. Had they not beating enough from the Egyptians, but they must beat one another? Note, [1.] Even sufferings in common do not always unite God's professing people to one another, so much as one might reasonably expect. [2.] When God raises up instruments of salvation for the church, they will find enough to do, not only with oppressing Egyptians, but with quarrelling Israelites, to reconcile them.

(2.) The way he took of dealing with them: he marked him that caused the division, that did the wrong, and mildly reason with him, Wherefore smitest thou thy fellow? The injurious Egyptian was killed, the injurious Hebrew was only reprimanded; for what the former did, was from a root of malice; what the latter did, we may suppose, was only upon a sudden provocation. The wise God makes, and according to his example, all wise governors make, a difference between one offender and another, according to the several qualities of the same offence. Moses endeavoured to make them friends; a good office; thus we find Christ often reproving his disciples' strife; (Luke 9. 46, &c. 22. 24, &c.) for he was a Prophet like unto Moses. He, a Peace-Maker, who visited his brethren with the design to speak well of them; the reproof Moses gave on this occasion, may still be of use, Wherefore smitest thou thy fellow? Note, Smiting our fellows is bad in any, especially in Hebrews; smiting with tongue or hand, either in a way of persecution, or in a way of strife and contention. Consider the person thou smitest; it is thy fellow, thy fellow-creature, thy fellow-christian; it is the more to be considered. Consider the cause, Wherefore smitest thou? Perhaps it was for no cause at all, or no just cause, or none worth speaking of.

(3.) The ill success of his attempt; (v. 14.) He said, Who made thee a prince? He that did the wrong, thus quarrelled with Moses; the injured party, it should seem, was inclineable enough to peace, but was not willing for the prince thereby to be touched. Note, It is a sign of guilt to be impatient of reproof, and it is often easier to persuade the injured to bear the trouble of taking wrong, than the injurious to bear the conviction of having done wrong, 1 Cor. 6. 6.

8. It was a very wise and mild reproof which Moses gave to this quarrelsome Hebrew, but he cannot bear it, he kicks against the pricks, (Acts 9. 5.) and crosses questions with his reprover. [1.] He challenges his authority: Who made thee a prince? A man needs no great authority for the giving of a friendly reproof, it is an act of kindness; yet this man needs will interpret it an act of dominion, and represents his reprover as imperious and assuming. Thus when people dislike good discourse or a seasonable admonition, they will call it preaching, as if a man could not speak a word for God, and against sin, but he took too much upon him. Yet Moses was indeed a prince and a judge, and knew it, and thought the Hebrews would have understood it, and struck in with him, but they stood in their own light, and thrust him away, Acts 7. 25, 27. [2.] He upbraids him with what he had done in killing the Egyptian; Intendest thou to kill me? See what base constructions malice puts upon the best words and actions. Moses, for reproving him, is immediately charged with a design to kill him. An attempt to follow was, they fed an affternoon upon his life; and his having killed the Egyptian was thought sufficient to justify the suspicion; as if Moses made no difference between an Egyptian and a Hebrew. If Moses, to right an injured Hebrew, had put his life in his hand, and slain an Egyptian, he ought therefore to have submitted to him, not only as a friend to the Hebrews, but as a friend to the Egyptian; and he thus throws that in his teeth as a crime, which was bravely done, and was intended as a specimen of the promised deliverance; if the Hebrews had taken the hint, and come in to Moses as their head and captain, it is probable that they would have been delivered now; but, despising their deliverer, their deliverance was justly deferred, and their bondage prolonged forty years; as, afterward, their despising of reproof, and the keeping of a keep a little longer, would make it worse. I would, and ye would not. Note, Men know not what they do, nor what enemies they are to their own interests, when they resist and despise faithfull reproofs and reprovers. When the Hebrews strove with Moses, God sent him away into Midian, and they never heard of him for forty years; thus the things that belonged to their peace, were hidden from their eyes, because they knew not the day of their visitation. As to Moses, we may look on it as a great dump and discouragement to him. He was now choosing to suffer affliction with the people of God, and embracing the reproach of Christ; and now, at his first setting out, to meet with this affliction and reproach from them, was a very sore trial of his resolution. He might have said, if this be the spirit of the Hebrews, I will go out, and be the son of Pharaoh's daughter." Note, First, We must take heed of being prejudiced against the ways and people of God, by the follies and perverseness of some particular persons that profess religion. Secondly, It is no new thing for the church. It's best friends to meet with a great deal of opposition and discouragement in their healing saving attempts, even from their own mother's children; Christ himself was set at nought by the builders, and is still rejected by those who would save.

(4.) The flight of Moses to Midian, in consequence. The affront given him thus far proved a kindness to him; it gave him to understand that his killing of the Egyptian was discovered, and so he had time to make his escape; otherwise the wrath of Pharaoh might have surprised him and taken him off. N. B. God can never be so weak, nor so divided as the strongest nations, so as, one way or other, to bring good to his people out of it. Information was brought to Pharaoh and (it is well if it were not brought by the Hebrew himself whom Moses reproved) of his killing the Egyptian; warrants are presently out for the apprehending of Moses; which obliged him to shift for his own safety, by flying into the land of Midian, v. 15. [1.] Moses did this out of a prudent care of his own life. If this be his forsaking of Egypt, which the apostle refers to, as done by faith, (Heb. 11. 27.) it teaches us, that when we are at any time in trouble and danger for doing our duty, the grace of faith will be of good use to us in taking proper methods for our own preservation. Yet there, it is said, He feared not the wrath of the king; here it is said he feared, v. 14. He did not fear with a fear of difference and annihilation, which weakens, and has torment, but with a fear of diligence, which quickened him to take that way which providence opened to him for his own preservation. [2.] God ordered it for wise and holy ends. Things were not yet ripe for Israel's deliverance. The measure of Egypt's iniquity was not yet full; the Hebrews were not sufficiently humbled, nor were they yet increased to such a multitude as were designed; but as it was reasonable, it was also fit, that Moses should be in Midian, while his name was changed, that he might do it the better; he now had opportunity of making himself acquainted. Hither he came, and sat down by a well, tired and thoughtful, at a loss, and waiting to see which way providence would direct him. It was a great change with him, since he was but the other day at ease in Pharaoh's court: thus God tried his faith, and it was found to praise and honour.

16. Now the priest of Midian had seven daughters; and they came and drew water, and filled the troughs to water their father's flock. 17. And the shepherds came and drove them away: but Moses stood up and helped them, and watered their flock. 18. And when they came to Reuel their father, he said, How is it that ye are come so soon to-day? 19. And they said, An Egyptian delivered us out of the hand of the shepherds, and also drew water enough for us, and watered the flock. 20. And he said unto his daughters, And where is he? Why is it that ye have left the man? Call him, that he may eat bread, 21. And Moses was content to dwell with the man: and he gave Moses Zipporah his daughter. 22. And she bare him a son, and he called his name Gershom; for he said, I have been a stranger in a strange land.

Moses here gains a settlement in Midian, just as his father Jacob had gained one in Syria, Gen. 29. 2, &c. And both these instances should encourage us to trust Providence, and to follow it. Events that seem inconceivable and purely accidental, after-ward appear to have been designed by the wisdom of God for very good purposes, and of great consequence to his people. A casual transient occurrence has sometimes occasioned the greatest and happiest turns of a man's life.

Observe,

I. Concerning the seven daughters of Reuel the priest or prince of Midian; 1. They were humble and very industrious, according as the employment of the country was; they drew water for their father's flock, v. 16. If their father was a prince, it teaches us that even those who are honourably born, and are of quality and distinction in their country, yet should apply themselves to some useful business, and what their hand finds to do, do it with all their might. Idleness can be no one's honour. If their father was a priest, it teaches us that ministers' children should, in a special manner, be examples of humility and industry. 2. They were modest, and would not ask this strange Egyptian to come home with them, (though handsome and a great courtier,) till they had heard something sent for him. Modesty is the ornament of that sex.

II. Concerning Moses; he was taken for an Egyptian; (v. 19.) and strangers must be content to be mistaken; but it is observable,

1. How ready he was to help Reuel's daughters to water their flocks. Though bred in learning and at court, yet he knew how to turn his hand to such an office as this, when there was occasion; nor had he learned of the Egyptians to despise shepherds. Note, Those that have had a liberal education, yet should not be strangers to servile work, because they know not what necessity Providence may put them in of working for themselves, or what opportunity Providence may give them of being serviceable to others. These young women, it seems, were not only rich, but also in some degree employed, more than they and their servants could conquer; the shepherds of some neighbouring prince, as some think, or some idle fellows that called themselves shepherds, drove away their flocks; but Moses, though melancholy and in distress, stood up and helped them, not only to get clear of the shepherds, but when that was done, to water the flocks. This he did, not only in complaisance for the daughters of Reuel, (though that also did very well become him,) but because, wherever he was, as occasion offered itself, (1.) He loved to be doing justice, and appearing in the defence of such as he saw injured, which every man ought to do, as far as it is in the power of his hand to do it. (2.) He loved to be doing good; wherever the providence of God casts us, we should desire and endeavour to be useful; and when we cannot do the good we would, we must be ready to do the good we can. And he that is faithful in a little, shall be entrusted with more.

2. How well he was paid for his servaiability. When the young woman acquainted their father with the kindesses they had received from this stranger, he sent to invite him to his house, and made much of him, v. 20. Thus God will compensate the kindesses which are at any time shown to his children; they shall in no wise lose their reward. Moses soon recommended himself to the esteem and good affie. tion of this prince of Midian, who took him into his house, and in process of time, married one of his daughters to him, (v. 21.) by which means he furthered his own, and was of great service to his master. But, (22.) It was also designed to prepare him for the great services he was further designed for. His manner of life in Midian, where he kept the flock of his father-in-law, (having none of his own to keep,) would be of use to him, [1.] To inure him to hardship and poverty, that he might learn how to want as well as how to abound. God humbles those first, whom he is pleased to exalt last, and in this he would be greatly furthered by the solitude and retirement of a shepherds life in Midian. By the former he was prepared to rule in Jeshurun, but by the latter he was prepared to converse with God in Mount Horeb, near which mount he had spent much of his time. Those that know what it is to be alone with God in holy exercises, are acquainted with better delights than ever Moses tasted in the court of Pharaoh.

23. And it came to pass in process of time, that the king of Egypt died: and the children of Israel sighed by reason of the bondage, and they cried, and their cry came up unto God by reason of the bondage. 24. And God heard their groaning, and God remembered his covenant with Abraham, with Isaac, and with Jacob. 25. And God looked upon the children of Israel, and God had respect unto them.

Here is,

1. The continuance of the Israelites bondage in Egypt, v. 23. Probably, the murdering of their infants did not continue; this part of their affliction attended only the period immediately connected with the birth of Moses, and served to signalize it. The Egyptians were content with their increase, finding that Egypt was encreased by their labour; so that they might have them for slaves, they cared not how many they were. On this therefore they went on in their work, and made the best hand they could of their labour. When one Pharaoh died, another rose up in his place, that was governed by the same maxims, and was as cruel to Israel as his predecessors. If there was sometimes a little relaxation, yet it presently revived again with as much rigour as ever; and probably, as the more Israel were oppressed, the more they multiplied, so the more they multiplied, the more they were oppressed. Note, Sometimes God suffers the rod of the wicked to lie very long, and very heavy on the lot of the righteous. If Moses, in Midian, at any time began to think how much better his condition might have been, had he staid among the courtiers; he must of himself think this also, how much worse it would have been, if he had had his lot with his brethren; it was a great degradation to him to be keeping sheep in Midian, when he might have been the prince brak in Egypt. The care of our brethrens affliction shall help to reconcile us to our own.

2. The proofe to their deliverance at last. (1.) They cried, v. 23. Now, at last, they began to think of God under their troubles, and to return to him from the idols they had served, Ezek. 20. 8. Hither they had frettet at the instruments of their trouble, but God was not in all their thoughts. This lyטיב.58 in break heart, v. 24. They do not cry not when he binds them, Job 56. 13. But before God unbound them, he put it into their hearts to cry unto him, n. 25 explained, Num. 20. 16. Note, It is a good sign that God is coming to us with deliverance, when he inclines and enables us to cry to him for it.

(2.) God heard, v. 24, 25. The name of God is here empliatom.78 prefixed to four different expressions of a kind intention toward them. [1.] God heard their groanings: that is, he made it to appear that he took notice of their complaints. The groans of the oppressed cry loud in the ears of the righteous God, to whom vengeance belongs; especially the groans of God's spiritual Israel; he knows the burdens they groan under, and the blessings they groan after, and that the blessed Spirit, by these groanings, makes intercession for them. [2.] God remembered his covenant, which he seemed to have forgotten, but of which he is ever mindful. This, God had an eye to, and not to any merit of theirs, in what he did for them. See Lev. 26. 42. [3.] God looked upon the children of Israel; Moses looked upon them and pitied them; (v. 11.) but now God looked upon them and helped them. [4.] God had respect unto them, a favour wherewith he pleased unto them as his own.

The frequent repetition of the name of God here, intimates that now we are to expect something great. Opus Dei dignum—A work worthy of God. His eyes which run to and fro through the earth, are now fixed upon Israel, to show himself strong, to show himself a God in their behalf.

CHAP. III.

As prophecy had ceased for many ages before the coming of Christ, that the revival and perfection of it in that great Prophet might be the more remarkable; so vision had ceased (for aught that appears) among the patriarchs for some ages before the coming of Moses. But the appearances of God in answer to the prayers of his people in Egypt was the subject of these visions. It was a preparation for the work of his power among them. Now, in this chapter, we have God's first appearance to him in the bush, and the conference between God and Moses in that vision. Here is, 1. The discovery God was pleased to make of his glory to Moses at the bush, which Moses was forbidden to approach too near to, v. 1. 5. II. A general declaration of Gods grace and mercy, and his help to his people, and for their fathers sakes, v. 6. III. A particular notice of God's purpose concerning the deliverance of Israel out of Egypt. 1. He assures Moses it should now be done, v. 7, 8. Here, he gives him a commission to act in it, as his ambassador both to Pharaoh and to Israel, v. 10. 16. 3. He answers the objection Moses made of his own unworthiness, v. 11, 12. 4. He gives him full instructions what to say, both to Pharaoh and to Israel, v. 13. 18. 5. He tells him beforehand what the issue would be, v. 19, 22.
NOW Moses kept the flock of Jethro, his father-in-law, the priest of Midian: and he led the flock to the back side of the desert, and came to the mountain of God, even to Horeb. 2. And the angel of the LORD appeared unto him in a flame of fire, out of the midst of a bush: and he looked, and, behold, the bush burned with fire, and the bush was not consumed. 3. And Moses said, I will now turn aside, and see this great sight, why the bush is not burnt. 4. And when the Lord saw that he turned aside, God called unto him out of the midst of the bush, and said, Moses, Moses. And he said, Here am I. 5. And he said, Draw not nigh hither: put off thy shoes from off thy feet, for the place whereon thou standest is holy ground. 6. Moreover he said, I am the God of thy father, the God of Abraham, the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob. And Moses hid his face; for he was afraid to look upon God.

The years of the life of Moses are remarkably divided into three forties; the first forty he spent as a prince in Pharaoh's court, the second a sheepherder in Midian, the third a king in Jeshurun; so changeable is the life of men, especially the life of good men. He had now finished the second forty, when he received his commission to bring Israel out of Egypt. Note, Sometimes it is long before God calls his servants out to that work which of old he designed them for, and has been graciously preparing them for. Moses was born to be Israel's deliverer, and yet not a word is said of it to him, till he is eighty years of age. Now observe,

I. How this appearance of God to him found him employed. He was keeping the flock, that is, tending sheep, near mount Horeb, v. 1. This was a poor employment for a man of his parts and education, yet he rested satisfied with it, and thus learns meekness and contentment to a high degree, for which he is more celebrated in sacred writ than for all his other learning. Note, 1. In the calling to which we are called, we should abide, and not be given to change. 2. Even those that are qualified for great employments and services, must not think it strange if they be confined to obscurity; it was the lot of Moses before them, who foresaw nothing to the contrary but that he should die, as he had lived a great while, a poor despised shepherd. Let those that think themselves buried alive, be content to shine in the dark; let them find their light in their sepulchres, and wait till God's time come for setting them in a candlestick. Thus employed Moses was, when he was honoured with this vision. Note, (1.) God will encourage industry. The shepherds were keeping their flocks, when they received the tidings of our Saviour's birth, Luke 2. 8. Satan loves to find us idle; God is well pleased when we find ourselves employed. (2.) Retiring to a good friend to our communion with God. When we are alone, the Father is with us. Moses saw more of God in a desert, than ever he had seen in Pharaoh's court. II. What the appearance was. To his great surprise, he saw a bush burning, when he perceived no fire either from earth or heaven to kindle it; and, which was more strange, it did not consume, v. 2. It was an angel of the Lord that appeared to him; some think, a created angel, who speaks in the language of him that sent him; others, the second person, the Angel of the covenant, who is himself Jehovah. It was an extraordinary manifestation of the divine presence and glory; what was visible, was produced by the ministry of an angel, but he heard God in it speaking to him. 1. He saw a flame of fire; the angel, in a certain manner ofspeaking, Israel's deliverance out of Egypt was promised to Abraham, he saw a burning lamp, which signified the light of joy which that deliverance should cause; (Gen. 15. 17.) but now it shines brighter as a flame of fire, for God in that deliverance brought terror and destruction to his enemies, light and heat to his people, and displayed his glory before all. See 16. 10. Note, This fire was not a burning flame, but a burning lamp, or in a bush, a thorny bush, so the world signifies; for God chooses the weak and despised things of the world, such as Moses, now a poor shepherd, with them to confound the wise; he delights to beautify and crown the humble. 2. The bush burned, and yet was not consumed; an emblem of the church now in bondage in Egypt, burning in the brick-kilns, yet not consumed; perplexed, but not destroyed; humbled, but not demolished. III. The curiosity Moses had to inquire into this extraordinary sight; (v. 3.) I will turn aside and see. He speaks as one inquisitive and bold in his inquiry; whatever it was, he would, if possible, know the meaning of it. Note, Things revealed belong to us, and we ought diligently to inquire into them.

IV. The invitation he had to draw near, yet with a caution not to come too near, nor rashly. 1. God gave him a gracious call, to which he returned a ready answer, v. 4. When God saw that he took notice of the burning bush; and turned aside to see it, and left his business to attend it, then God called to him. If he had carelessly neglected it as an ignis fatuus—a deceiving meteor, a thing not worth taking notice of, it is probable that God would have departed, and said nothing to him; but when he turned aside, God called to him. Note, Those that would have communion with God, must attend upon him, and approach to him, in those ordinances wherein he is pleased to manifest himself, and his power and glory, though it be in a bush; they must come to the treasure, though in an earthen vessel. Those that seek God diligently shall find him, and find him, as Moses, in the burning bush, and not in the censers of Pharaoh. IV. The meaning of this appearance, (1.) The Spirit of God is a quickening spirit, and calls us by name, Moses, Moses. This which he heard, could not but surprise him much more than what he saw. The word of the Lord always went along with the glory of the Lord, for every divine vision was designed for divine revelation, Job 4. 16. &c.—33. 14—16. Divine calls are then effectual, (1.) When the Spirit of God makes them particular, and calls us by name. The word calls, Ho every one! The Spirit, by the application of that, calls, Ho such a one! I know thee by name; (Exod. 33. 12.) and, (2.) They are then effectual, when we return an obedient answer to them, as Moses here, "Here am I, what saith my Lord unto his servant? Here am I, not only to hear what is said, but to do what I am bidden." 2. God gave him a needful caution against rashness and irreverence in his approach. (1.) He must keep his distance; draw near, but not too near; so near as to hear, but not so near as to pry; his conscience must be satisfied, but not his curiosity; and care must be taken that familiarity do not breed contempt. Note. In all our approaches to God, we ought to be deeply affected with that infinite distance that is between us and God. Or, we may be taken as proper to the Old Testament dispensation, which was a dispensation of darkness, bondage, and terror, which the gospel happily frees us from, giving us boldness to enter into the holiest, and inviting us to draw near. (2.) He must express his reverence, and his readiness to obey; Put off thy shoes from off thy feet, as a servant; the putting off the shoe was then what the putting off the hat is now, a token of respect and submission. The ground was holy, because God made it so by this special manifestation of the divine presence there, and during the continuance of that; therefore tread not on that ground with soiled shoes. Keep thy foot, Eccl. 5. 1. Note, We ought to approach to God with a solemn pause and preparation; and, though bodily exercise alone profits little, yet we ought to glorify God with our bodies, and to express our inward reverence by a grave and reverent behavior. This is the way God, carefully avoiding every thing that looks light and rude, and unbecoming the awfulness of the service.

V. The solemn declaration God made of his name, by which he would be known to Moses; (v. 6.) I am the God of thy father. 1. He lets him know it is God that speaks to him, to engage his reverence and attention, his faith and obedience; for this was the first thing he commanded all these, I am the Lord. Let us always hear the word, as the word of God, 1 Thess. 2. 13.

2. He will be known as the God of his father, his pious father Amram, and the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, his ancestors, and the ancestors of all Israel, for whom God was now about to appear. By this, God designed, (1.) To instruct Moses in the knowledge of another world, and strengthen his belief of a future state. Thus it is interpreted by our Lord Jesus, the best expounder of scripture, who from hence proves that the dead are raised, against the Sadducees; Moses, says he, showed it at the bush; (Luke 20. 37.) that is, "God there showed it to him, and in him to us," Matt. 22. 31, &c. Abraham was dead, and yet God is the God of Abraham; therefore Abraham's soul lives, to which God stands in relation; and, to make his soul completely happy, his body must live again in due time. This promise, made unto the fathers, that God would be their God, must include a future happiness; for he never did any thing for them in this world sufficient to answer to the vast extent and compass of that great world, but having prepared for them a city, he is not ashamed to be called their God; (Heb. 11. 16.) and see Acts 26. 6, 7.—24. 15. (2.) To assure Moses of the performance of all these particular promises made unto the fathers; he may confidently expect that, for by these words it appears God remembered his covenant, ch. 2. 24. Note, [1.] God's covenant-relationship to us as God's, is the best support in the worst of times, and a great encouragement to our faith in particular promises. [2.] When we are conscious to ourselves of our own great unworthiness, we may take comfort from God's relating unto our fathers, 2 Cor. 1. 26, 10, to command all these, I am the Lord. Let us always hear the word, as the word of God, 1 Thess. 2. 13.

VI. The solemn impression this made upon Moses; he hid his face, as one both ashamed and afraid to look upon God. Now that he knew it was a divine light, his eyes were dazzled with it; he was not afraid of a burning bush, till he perceived that God was in it. Yea, though God called himself the God of his father, and a God in covenant with him, yet he was afraid. Note, 1. The more we see of God, the more cause we shall see to, worship him with reverence and godly fear. 2. Even the manifestations of God's grace and covenant-love, should increase our humble reverence of him.

7. And the Lord said, I have surely seen the affliction of my people which are in Egypt, and have heard their cry by reason of their task-masters; for I know their sorrows; 8. And I am come down to deliver them out of the hand of the Egyptians, and to bring them up out of that land unto a good land and a large, unto a land flowing with milk and honey; unto the place of the Cannanites, and the Hittites, and the Amorites, and the Perizzites, and the Havites, and the Jebusites. 9. Now therefore, behold, the cry of the children of Israel is come unto me, and I have also seen the oppression wherewith the Egyptians oppress them. 10. Come now therefore, and I will send thee unto Pharaoh, that thou mayest bring forth my people the children of Israel out of Egypt.

Now that Moses had put off his shoes, (for, no doubt, he observed the orders given him, v. 5.) and covered his face, God enters upon the particular business that was now to be concerted, which was the bringing of Israel out of Egypt. Now, after forty years of Israel's bondage, and Moses' banishment, when we may suppose that he began to despair, they of being delivered, and he of delivering them; at length the time is come, even the year of the redeemed. Note, God often comes for the salvation of his people then when they have done looking for him; Shall he find faith? Luke 18. 8.

Here is, 1. The notice God takes of the afflictions of Israel; (v. 7, 8.) Seeing, I have seen, not only, I have surely seen, but I have strictly observed and considered the matter. Three things God took cognizance of. 1. Their sorrows; (v. 7.) it is likely they were not permitted to make a remonstrance of their grivances to Pharaoh, nor to seek relief against their task-masters in any of his courts, nor scarcely durst complain to one another; but God observed their tears. Note, Even the secret sorrows of God's people are known to him. 2. Their cry; I have heard their cry, (v. 7.) it is come unto me. (3.) Note, God is not deaf to the cries of his afflicted people. 3. The tyranny of their persecutors; I have seen the oppression, v. 9. Note, As the poorest of the oppressed are not below God's cognizance, so the highest and greatest of their oppressors are not above his check, but he will surely visit all these things.

2. The promise God makes of their speedy deliverance and enlargement; (v. 8.) I am come down to deliver them. (1.) It denotes his resolution to deliver them, and that his heart was upon it, so that it should be done speedily and effectually, and by methods out of the common road of providence: when God does something very extraordinary, he is said to come down to do it, as Isa. 64. 1. (2.) This deliverance was typical of our redemption by Christ, and in that the eternal Word did indeed come down from heaven to deliver us. It was his errand into the world. He promises also their happy settlement in the land of Canaan, that they should exchange bondage for liberty, poverty for plenty, labour for rest, and the precarious condition of tenants at will, for the case and honour of lords proprietors. Note, Whom God by his grace delivers out of a spiritual Egypt, he will bring to a heavenly Canaan.

3. The commission he gives to Moses in this concern, v. 10. He is not only sent as a prophet to Israel, to assure them that they should speedily be delivered, (even that had been a great favour,) but he is sent as an ambassador to Pharaoh, to treat with him, or rather asan herald at arms, to demand... their discharge, and to denounce war in case of refusal; and he is sent as a prince to Israel, to conduct and command them; thus he is taken from following the ewes great with young, to a pastoral office much more noble, as David, Ps. 78. 71. Note, God is the Fountain of power; and the powers that be, are ordained of him as he pleaseth. The same hand that now fetched a shepherd out of a desert, to be the planter of a Jewish church, afterwards fetched fishermen from their ships, to be the planters of the Christian Church, That the excellency of the power might be of God.

11. And Moses said unto God, Who am I, that I should go unto Pharaoh, and that I should bring forth the children of Israel out of Egypt? 12. And he said, Certainly I will be with thee; and this shall be a token unto thee, that I have sent thee: When thou hast brought forth the people out of Egypt, ye shall serve God upon this mountain. 13. And Moses said unto God, Behold, when I come unto the children of Israel, and shall say unto them, The God of your fathers hath sent me unto you; and they shall say unto me, What is his name? What shall I say unto them? 14. And God said unto Moses, I AM THAT I AM: And he said, Thus shalt thou say unto the children of Israel, I AM hath sent me unto you. 15. And God said moreover unto Moses, Thus shalt thou say unto the children of Israel, The Lord God of your fathers, the God of Abraham, the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob, hath sent me unto you: this is my name for ever, and this is my memorial unto all generations.

God, having spoken to Moses, allows him also a liberty of speech, which he here improves: and

1. He objects his own insufficiency for the service he was called to; (v. 11.) Who am I? He thinks himself unworthy of the honour, and not par negotio—equal to the task. He thinks he wants courage, and therefore cannot go to Pharaoh, to make a demand which might cost the demandant his head: he thinks he wants conduct, and therefore cannot bring forth the children of Israel out of Egypt; they are unarmed, undisciplined, quite dispirited, utterly unable to help themselves, it is morally impossible to bring them out. 1. Moses was incomparably the fittest of any man living for this work, eminent for learning, wisdom, experience, valour, faith, holiness; and yet, he says, Who am I? Note, The more fit any person is for service, commonly the less opinion he has of himself; see Judg. 9. 8. &c. 2. The difficulties of the work were indeed very great, enough to startle the courage, and stagger the faith, of Moses himself. Note, Even wise and faithful instruments may be much discouraged at the difficulties that lie in the way of the church's salvation. 3. Moses had formerly been very courageous when he slew the Egyptian, but now his heart failed him; for good men are not always alike bold and zealous. 4. Yet Moses is the man that does it at last; for God gives grace to the lowly. Modest beginnings are very good presages.

II. God answers this objection, v. 12. 1. He promises him his presence, Certainly I will be with thee, and that is enough. Note, Those that are weak in themselves, yet may do wonders, being strong in the Lord and in the power of his might; and those that are most diffident in themselves, may be most confident in God. God's presence puts an honour upon the worthless, wisdom and strength. Note, He briefly foils, makes the greatest difficulties dwindle to nothing; and is enough to answer all objections. 2. He assures him of success, and particularly that the Israelites should serve God upon this mountain. Note, (1.) Those deliverances are most valuable, which open to us a door of liberty to serve God. (2.) If God give us opportunity and a heart to serve him, it is a happy and encouraging earnest of further favours.

III. He begs instructions for the executing of his commission, and has them, thoroughly to furnish him. He desires to know by what name God would at this time make himself known, v. 13.

1. He supposes the children of Israel would ask him, What is his name? This they would ask either, (1.) To perplex Moses: he foresaw difficulty, not only in dealing with Pharaoh, to make him withdraw a thousand times; but also, with the people, to make them willing to move. They would be scrupulous and apt to cavil, would bid him produce his commission, and, probably, this would be the trial; "Does he know the name of God? Has he the watch-word?" Once he was asked, Who made thee a judge? Then he had not his answer ready, and he would not be nonplusse so again, but would be able to tell a white name. (2.) They would ask this question, for their own information. It is to be feared that they were grown very ignorant in Egypt, by reason of their hard bondage, want of teachers, and loss of the Sabbath, so that they needed to be told the first principles of the oracles of God. Or, this question, What is his name? amounted to an inquiry into the nature of the dispensation they were now to expect. How will God in it be known to us, and what may we depend upon from him?

2. He desires instructions what answer to give them; What shall I say to them? What name shall I vouch to them for the proof of my authority? I must have something great and extraordinary to say to them; what must it be? If I must go, let me have full instructions, that I may not run in vain. (1.) It is necessary that we should speak to people in the name of God, to be well prepared beforehand. (2.) Those who would know what to say, must go to God, to the word of his grace, and to the throne of his grace, for instructions, Ezek. 2. 7—3. 4, 10, 17. (3.) Whenever we have anything to do with God, it is desirable to know, and our duty to consider, what is his name.

IV. God readily gives him full instructions in this matter: two names God would now be known by.

1. A name that denotes what he is in himself; (v. 14.) I am that I am: this explains his name Jehovah; and signifies, (1.) That he is self-existent; he has his being of himself, and has no dependence upon any other; the greatest and best man in the world must say, By the grace of God, I am what I am; but God says it absolutely, and it is more than any creature, man or angel, can say, I am that I am. Being self-existent, he cannot but be self-sufficient, and therefore all-sufficient, and the inexhaustible Fountain of being and bliss. (2.) That he is eternal and unchangeable; and always the same, yesterday, to-day, and for ever; he will be what he will be, and what he is: see Rev. 1. 8. 16. 14. (3.) He can be called Jehovah; this is such a name as checks all bold and curious inquiries concerning God, and, in effect, says, Ask not after my name, seeing it is secret, Judg. 13. 18.
EXODUS, IV.

that sojourneth in her house, jewels of silver, and jewels of gold, and raiment: and ye shall put them upon your sons, and upon your daughters; and ye shall spoil the Egyptians.

Moses is here more particularly instructed in his work, and informed beforehand of his success.

1. He must deal with the elders of Israel, and raise their expectations of a speedy deliverance from Egypt; and they must be faithful ambassadors. Note, That which ministers have received of the Lord, they must deliver to his people, and keep back nothing that is profitable. Lay an emphasis on that, (v. 17.) I have said, I will bring you up; that is enough to satisfy them, I have said it; and hath he spoken, and will he not make it good? With us saying and doing are two things, but they are not so with God, for he is in one mind, and who can turn him? “I have said it, and all the world cannot gainsay it,” his counsel shall stand.

His success with the elders of Israel would be good, so he is told, (v. 18.) They shall hearken to thy voice, and not thrust thee away, as they did forty years ago: he only, by his grace, inclines the heart, and opens the ear, could say belied, They shall hearken to thy voice, having determined to make them willing in this day of power.

2. He must deal with the king of Egypt, v. 18. (1.) They must not begin with a demand, but with a humble petition; that gentle and submissive method must be first tried, even with one who, it was certain, would not be wrought upon by it; We beseech thee, let us go. (2.) They must only beg leave of Pharaoh to go, for God has sent him to worship God, and say nothing to him of going quite away to Canaan; that would have been immediately rejected, but this was a very modest and reasonable request, and his denying of it was utterly inexorable, and justified them in the total deserting of his kingdom. If he would not give them leave to go in safety, justly did they go without leave to settle in Canaan. Note, The calls and commands which God sends to sinners, are so highly reasonable in themselves, and delivered to them in such a gentle winning way, that the mouth of the disobedient must needs be for ever stopped.

As to his success with Pharaoh, he is here told,

[1.] That petitions, and persuasions, and humble remonstrances, would not prevail with him, no, nor a mighty hand stretched out in signs and wonders; (v. 19.) I am sure he will not let you go. Note, God sends his messengers to those whose hardness and obstinacy he certainly knows and foresees, that it may appear he would have them turn and live.

[2.] That plagues should compel him to it; (v. 20.) I will smite Egypt, and then he will let you go. Note, These will certainly be broken by the power of God’s hand, that will get the power of his word; we may be sure that when God judges, he will overcome. [3.] That his people should be more kind to them, and furnish them at their departure with abundance of plate and jewels, to their great enriching; (v. 21, 22.) I will give this people favour in the sight of the Egyptians. Note, First, God sometimes makes the enemies of his people, not only to hate them, but to be kind to them. Secondly, God has many ways of balancing accounts between the injured and the injurious, of righting the oppressed, and compelling those that have done wrong, to make restitution: for he sits in the throne judging right.

CHAP. IV.

This chapter, I, Continues and concludes God's discourse with Moses at the bush concerning this great affair of
EXODUS, IV

1. And Moses answered and said, But, behold, they will not believe me, nor hearken unto my voice: for they will say, The Lord hath not appeared unto thee. 2. And the Lord said unto him, What is that in thine hand? And he said, A rod. 3. And He said, Cast it on the ground. And he cast it on the ground, and it became a serpent; and Moses fled from before it. 4. And the Lord said unto Moses, Put forth thine hand, and take it by the tail. And he put forth his hand, and caught it, and it became a rod in his hand. 5. That they may believe that the Lord God of their fathers, the God of Abraham, the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob, hath appeared unto thee. 6. And the Lord said furthermore unto him, Put now thine hand into thy bosom; and when he took it out, behold, his hand was leprous as snow. 7. And he said, Put thine hand into thy bosom again. And he put his hand into his bosom again, and plucked it out of his bosom; and, behold, it was turned again as his other flesh. 8. And it shall come to pass, if they will not believe thee, neither hearken to the voice of the first sign, that they will believe the voice of the latter sign. 9. And it shall come to pass, if they will not believe also these two signs, neither hearken unto thy voice, that thou shalt take of the water of the river, and pour it upon the dry land: and the water, which thou takest out of the river, shall become blood upon the dry land.

It was a very great honour that Moses was called so, when God commissioned him to bring Israel out of Egypt; yet he is hardly persuaded to accept the commission, and does it at last with great reluctance, which we should rather impute to a humble diffidence of himself and his own sufficiency, than to any unbelieving distrust of God and his word and power. Note, Those whom God designs for preachers, he clothes with humility. The most fit for service are the least forward.

1. Moses objects, that, in all probability, the people would not hearken to his voice, (v. 1.) that is, they would not take his bare word, unless he showed them some sign, which he had not been yet instructed to do. This objection cannot be justified, because it coptradicts what God had said, (ch. 3. 18.) They shall hearken to thy voice. If God says, They will, does it become Moses to say, They will not? Surely, no; "Perhaps, they will not at first," or, "Some of them will not." If there should be some gainsayers among them who would question his commission, how should he deal with them? And what course shuld he take to convince them? He remembered how they had once rejected him, and feared it would be so again. Note, 1. Present discouragements often arise from former disappointments, and greater difficulties, and greater opposite opinion of men than they deserve; Moses said, (v. 1.) They will not believe me; and yet he was happily mistaken, for it is said, (v. 31.) The people believed: but then the signs which God appointed in answer to this objection, were first wrought in their sight. 2. God empowers him to work miracles, directs him to three particularly, two of which were now immediately brought to pass. Note, True miracles are the most convincing external proofs of a divine mission attested by them. Therefore our Saviour often appealed to his works, as John 5. 36. and Nicodemus owns himself convinced by them, John 3. 2. And here Moses, having a special commission given him as a judge and lawgiver to Israel, has this seal affixed to his commission, and comes supported by these credentials. 1. The rod in his hand is the subject of a miracle, a double miracle: it is but thrown out of his hand and it becomes a serpent, he resumes it and it becomes a rod again, v. 2. 4. Now, (1.) Here was a divine power manifested in the change itself, that a dry stick should be turned into a living serpent, a lively one, so formidable a one, that Moses himself, upon whom, it should seem, it turned in some threatening manner, fled from before it, though we may suppose, in that desert, serpents were no strange things to him; but what was produced miraculously, was always the best and strongest of the kind, as the water turned to wine: and then, that this living serpent should be turned into a dry stick again, this was the Lord's doing. (2.) Here was an honour put upon Moses, that this change was wrought, upon him and to him, that Moses was chosen and anointed with a spell, or charm, or incantation: his being empowered thus to act under God, out of the common course of nature and providence, was a demonstration of his authority, under God, to settle a new dispensation of the kingdom of grace. We cannot imagine that the God of truth would delegate such a power as this to an impostor. (3.) There was a significancy in the miracle itself; Pharaoh had turned the rod of Israel into a serpent, representing them as dangerous, (ch. 1. 10.) causing their belly to cleave to the dust, and seeking their ruin; but now they should be turned into a rod again: or thus, Pharaoh had turned the rod of government into the serpent of oppression, from which Moses had himself fled into Midian; but by the agency of Moses the scene was altered again. (4.) There was a direct tendency in it to convert their children, representing them as dangerous indeed sent of God to do what he did, v. 5. Miracles were for signs to them that believed not, 1 Cor. 14. 22.

2. His hand itself is next made the subject of a miracle; he puts it once into his bosom, and takes it out leprous; he puts it again into the same place, and takes it out well, v. 6. 7. This signified, (1.) That Moses, by the power of God, should discharge sore diseases upon Egypt, and that, at his prayers, they should be removed. (2.) That whereas the Israelites in Egypt were become leprous, polluted by sin, and almost consumed by oppression, (a leper is as one dead, Numb. 12. 12.) by being taken into the bosom of Moses, they should be cleansed and cured, and all their grievances redressed. (3.) That Moses was not to work miracles by his own power, nor for his own praise, but by the power of God, and for his glory; the leprous hand of Moses does for ever exclude boasting. Now it was supposed that if the former sign did not convince, this latter would. Note, God is willing more abundantly to show the truth of his word, and is not sparing in his proofs; the multitude and variety of the miracles corroborate the evidence. 3. He is directed, when he should come to Egypt, to turn some of the water of the river into blood, v. 9. This was done, at first, as a sign, but not gaining due credit with Pharaoh, the whole river was afterward turned into blood, and then it became a plague. He is ordered to work this miracle, in case they would not be convinced by the other two. Note, Unbelief shall be left inexcusable, and convicted of a wilful obstinacy. As to the people of Israel, God had said, (ch. 3. 18.) They shall hearken; yet he appoints these miracles to be wrought for their conviction, for he that has ordained the end, has ordained the means. 10. And Moses said unto the Lord, O my Lord, I am not eloquent, neither heretofore, nor since thou hast spoken unto thy servant: but I am slow of speech, and of a slow tongue. 11. And the Lord said unto him, Who hath made man's mouth? Or who maketh the dumb, or deaf, or the seeing, or the blind? Have not I the Lord? 12. Now therefore go, and I will be with thy mouth, and teach thee what thou shalt say. 13. And he said, O my Lord, send, I pray thee, by the hand of him whom thou wilt send. 14. And the anger of the Lord was kindled against Moses; and he said, Is not Aaron the Levite thy brother? I know that he can speak well. And also, behold, he cometh forth to meet thee; and when he seeth thee, he will be glad in his heart. 15. And thou shalt speak unto him, and put words in his mouth: and I will be with thy mouth, and with his mouth, and will teach you what ye shall do. 16. And he shall be thy spokesman unto the people; and he shall be, even he shall be to thee instead of a mouth, and thou shalt be to him instead of God. 17. And thou shalt take this rod in thine hand, wherewith thou shalt do signs. Moses still continues backward to the service God had designed him for, even to a fault; for now we can no longer impute it to his humility and modesty, but must own that there was too much of cowardice, slothfulness, and unbelief, in it. Observe here, Moses endeavours to excuse himself from the work. 1. He pleads that he was no good spokesman; (v. 10.) O my lord! I am not eloquent; he was a great philosopher, statesman, and divine, and yet no orator; a man of a clear head, great thought, and solid judgment, but had not a voluble tongue, or ready utterance, and therefore he thought himself unfit to speak before great men about great affairs, and in danger of being run down by the Egyptians. Observe, (1.) We must not judge of men by the readiness and fluency of their discourses; men, what mighty in word, (Acts 7. 22.) and yet not eloquent; what he said, was strong and nervous, and to the purpose, and distilled as the dew, (Deut. 32. 2.) though he did not deliver himself with that readiness, ease, and elegance, that some do, who have not the tenth part of his sense; St. Paul's speech was contemptible, 2 Cor. 10. 10. A great deal of wisdom and truth, and oratory too, he was very short in; yet he could not reason with Pharaoh, till he had overcome him. Note, 1. Even self-diffidence, when it grows into an extreme, when it either hinders us from duty, or clogs us in duty, or discourages our dependence upon the grace of God, is very displeasing to him. God justly renews our backwardness to serve him, and has reason to take it ill; for he is such a benefactor as is beforehand with us, and such a Rewarder as will not be outdone in kindness; and those who are associated with those whom yet he does not reject: he vouchsafes to reason the case even with his forward children, and overcomes them, as he did Moses here, with grace and kindness. (1.) To balance the weakness of Moses, he here reminds him of his own power, v. 11. [1.] His power in that, concerning which Moses made the objection, Num. 12. 7. 8. Have not I the Lord? Moses knew that God made him a God, but he must be reminded now, that God made man's mouth. An eye to God as Creator would help us over a great many of the difficulties which lie in the way of our duty, Ps. 124. 8. God, as the Author of nature, has given us the power and faculty of speaking; and from him as the fountain of gifts and graces, comes the faculty of speaking well, the mouth and wisdom, (Luke 21. 15.) the tongue of the learned: (Isa. 50. 4.) he pours grace into the lips, Ps. 45. 2. [2.] His power in general over all the faculties. Who but God makes the dumb and the deaf, the seeing and the blind? First, The perfections of our faculties are his work, he makes the seeing: he formed the eye, (Ps. 94. 9.) he opens the understanding, the eye of the mind, Luke 24. 45. Secondly, Their imperfections are from him too: he makes the dumb, and deaf, and blind. Is there any evil of this kind, and the Lord has not done it? No doubt, he has, and always in wisdom and righteousness, and for his own glory, John 9. 3. Pharaoh and the Egyptians were made deaf and blind spiritually, as Isa. 6. 9, 10. But God knew how to manage them, and get him himself honour upon them. (2.) To encourage him in this great undertaking, he repeats the promise of his presence, not only in general, I will be with thee, (ch. 3. 12.) but in particular, "I will be with thy mouth; so that the imperfectness in thy speech shall be no prejudice to thy message." It does not appear that God did immediately remove the infirmity, whatever it was; but he did that which was equivalent, he taught him what to say, and then let the matter recommend itself; if others spake more gracefully, none spake more powerfully. Note, Those whom God employs to seek for him, ought to depend upon him for instructions, and it shall be given them what they shall speak, Matt. 10. 19.

(3.) He joins Aaron in commission with him; he prospect that Aaron should meet them opportune-ly, and that he would be glad to see him, they having not seen one another, (it is likely,) for many years, v. 14. He directs him to make use of Aaron as his spokesman, v. 16. God might have laid Moses wholly aside, for his backwarkness to be employed; but he considered his frame, and ordered him an assistant. Observe, [1.] That two are better than one, Eccl. 4. 9. God will have his two witnesses, (Rev. 11. 3.) that out of their mouths every word may be established. [2.] Aaron was the brother of Moses, divine wisdom so ordering it, that their natural affection one to another might strengthen their union in the joint execution of their commission. Christ sent his disciples two and two, and some of the couples were brothers. [3.] Aaron was the elder brother of Moses, and much wiser in his commandings than Moses in this affair, because God would have it so. [4.] Aaron could speak well, and yet was far inferior to Moses in wisdom. God dispenses his gifts variously to the children of men, that we may see our need one of another, and each may contribute something to the good of the body, 1 Cor. 12. 21. The tongue of Aaron, with the head and heart of Moses, would make one completely fit for his embassy. [5.] God promises, I will be with thy mouth, and with his mouth. Even Aaron that could speak well, yet could not speak to purpose, unless God was with his mouth; without the constant aids of divine grace, the best gifts will fail. (4.) He bids him take the rod with him in his hand, (v. 17.) to intimate that he must bring about his undertaking, rather by acting than by speaking; the signs he should work with this rod, might abundantly supply the want of eloquence; one miracle would do him better service than all the rhetoric in the world. Take this rod; the rod he carried as a shepherd, that he might not be ashamed of that mean condition out of which God called him. This rod must be his staff of authority, and must be to him instead both of sword and sceptre.

18. And Moses went, and returned to Jethro his father-in-law, and said unto him, Let me go, I pray thee, and return unto my brethren which are in Egypt, and see whether they be yet alive. And Jethro said to Moses, Go in peace. 19. And the Lord said unto Moses in Median, Go, return into Egypt: for all the men are dead which sought thy life. 20. And Moses took his wife and his sons, and set them upon an ass, and he returned to the land of Egypt. And Moses took the rod of God in his hand. 21. And the Lord said unto Moses, When thou goest to return into Egypt, see that thou do all those wonders before Pharaoh which I have put in thine hand: but I will harden his heart, that he shall not let the people go. 22. And thou shalt say unto Pharaoh, Thus saith the Lord, Israel is my son, even my first-born: 23. And I say unto thee, Let my son go, that he may serve me: and if thou refuse to let him go, behold I will slay thy son, even thy first-born.

Here,

1. Moses obtains leave of his father-in-law to return into Egypt, v. 18. His father-in-law had been kind to him when he was a stranger, and therefore he would not be so unci vil as to leave his family, nor so unjust as to leave his service, without giving him notice. Note, The honour of being admitted into communion with God, and of being employed for him, does not discharge us from the duties of our relations and callings in this world. Moses said nothing to his father-in-law (for ought that appears) of the glorious manifestation of God to him; such favours we are to be thankful for to God, but not to boast of before men.

II. He receives from God further encouragement and directions in his work. After God had spoken to him in the bush to settle a correspondence, it should seem, he often spake to him, as there was occasion, with less overwhelming solemnity: and,

1. He assures Moses that the coasts were clear: whatever new enemies he might make by his undertaking, his old enemies were all dead, all that sought his life, v. 19. Perhaps some secret fear of falling into their hands, was at the bottom of Moses's backwardness to go; Egypt was not was not willing to own it, but pleaded unworthiness, insufficiency, want of elocution, &c. Note, God knows all the temptations his people lie under, and how to arm them against their secret fears, Ps. 142. 3.

2. He orders him to do the miracles, not only before the elders of Israel, but before Pharaoh, v. 21. There was some alive perhaps in the court of Pharaoh, who remembered Moses when he was the son of Pharaoh's daughter, and had many a time called him a fool for deserting the honours of that relation; but he is now sent back to court, clad with greater powers than Pharaoh's daughter could have advanced him to, so that it might appear he was no loser by his choice: this wonder-working rod did more adorn the hand of Moses, than the sceptre of Egypt could have done. Note, Those that look with contempt upon worldly honours, shall be compensated with the honours that come from God, which is the true honour.

3. That Pharaoh's obstinacy might be no surprise or discouragement to him, God tells him before, that he would harden his heart. Pharaoh had hardened his own heart against the groans and cries of the oppressed Israelites, and shut up the bowels of his compassion from them; and now God, in a way of righteous judgment, hardens his heart against the conviction of the miracles, and the terror of the plagues. Note, Ministers must expect with many to labour in vain: we must not think it strange, if we meet with these who will not be wrought upon by the strongest arguments and last not by our judgments. Ps. 106. 17. 26. And the Lord said, I will harden Pharaoh's heart, and multiply my works upon this people. 4. Words are put into his mouth with which to address Pharaoh, v. 22, 23. God had promised him, (v. 12.) I will teach thee what thou shalt say; and here he does teach him. (1.) He must deliver his message in the name of the great Jehovah, Thus saith the Lord; this is the first time that prefase is used by any man, which after this is used so frequently by all ancient prophets: whether Pharaoh will hear, or whether he will forbear, Moses must tell him, Thus saith the Lord. (2.) He must let Pharaoh know Israel's relation to God, and God's concern for Israel. Is Israel a servant, is he a home-born slave? (Jer. 2. 14.) No, Israel is my son, my first-born; precious in my sight, honourable, and dear to me, not to be thus insulted and abused.
(3.) He must demand a discharge for them. "Let my son go; not only my servant whom thou hast no right to detain, but my son whose liberty and honour I am very jealous for. It is my son, my son that serves me, and therefore must be spared, must be pleaded for," Mal. 3. 17. (4.) He must threaten Pharaoh with the death of the first-born of Egypt, in case of a refusal, I will slay thy son, even thy first born. As men deal with God's people, let them expect so to be themselves dealt with; with the froward he will wrestle.

III. Moses addresses himself to this expedition, with God and his rod, (v. 19.) that the men were dead who sought his life, immediately it follows, (v. 20.) he took his wife and his sons, and set out for Egypt. Note, Though corruption may object much against the services God calls us to, yet grace will give the upper hand, and will be obedient to the heavenly vision.

24. And it came to pass, by the way in the inn, that the Lord met him, and sought to kill him. 25. Then Zipporah took a sharp stone, and cut off the foreskin of her son, and cast it at his feet, and said, Surely a bloody husband art thou to me. 26. So he let him go: then she said, A bloody husband thou art, because of the circumcision.

27. And the Lord said to Aaron, Go into the wilderness to meet Moses. And he went, and met him in the mount of God, and kissed him. 28. And Moses told Aaron all the words of the Lord which he had sent him, and all the signs which he had commanded him. 29. And Moses and Aaron went, and gathered together all the elders of the children of Israel: 30. And Aaron spake all the words which the Lord had spoken unto Moses, and did the signs in the sight of the people. 31. And the people believed: and when they heard that the Lord had visited the children of Israel, and that he had looked upon their affliction, then they bowed their heads and worshipped.

Moses is here going to Egypt, and we are told, 1. How God met him in anger, v. 24., 26. This is a very difficult passage of story; much has been written and excellently well to make it intelligible; we will try to make it improving. Here is, 1. The sin of Moses, which was, neglecting to circumcise his son, which perhaps was the effect of his being unequally yoked with a Midianite, who was too indulgent of her child, while Moses was too indulgent of her. Note, (1.) We have need to watch carefully over our own hearts, lest falsehood for any relations prevail upon our love to God, and take us off from our duty to him. It is charged upon Eli, that he honoured his sons more than God; (1 Sam. 2. 29.) and see Matt. 10. 37. (2.) Even good men are apt to cool in their zeal for God and duty, when they have long been deprived of the society of the faithful; solitude has its advantages, but they seldom balance the loss of christian communion.

2. God's displeasure against him: he met him, and probably, by a sword in an angel's hand, sought to kill him. This was a great change; very lately, God was conversing with him, and lodging a trust in him, as a friend; and now he is coming forth against him as an enemy. Note, (1.) Omissions are sins, and must come into judgment, and particularly the contempt and neglect of the seals of the covenant; for it is a sign that we undervalue the promises of the covenant, and are displeased with the conditions of it. He that has made a bargain, and is not willing to seal and ratify it, one may justly suspect neither likes it, nor designs to stand to it. (2.) God takes notice of, and is much displeased with, the sins of his own people; if they neglect their duty, let them expect to hear of it by their consciences, and perhaps to feel it from it by cross providences; for this cause, many are sick and weak, as some think Moses was here.

3. The speedy performance of the duty, for the neglect of which God had now a controversy with him. His son must be circumcised; he is disabled to do it; therefore, in this case of necessity, Zipporah does it, whether with passionate words, expressing her dislike of the ordinance itself, or, at least, the administration of it to so young a child, and in a journey (as to me it seems;) or, with proper words, solemnly expressing the expulsal of the child to God by the covenant of circumcision, as some read it; or her thankfulness to God for sparing her husband, giving him a new life, and thereby giving her, as it were, a new marriage to him, upon her circumcising her son, as others read it; I cannot determine: but we learn, (1.) That when God discovers to us what is amiss in our lives, we must give all diligence to amend it speedily, and particularly to come to the duties which are neglected. (2.) The putting away of our sins is indispensably necessary to the removal of God's judgments: this is the voice of every rod, it calls us to return to him that smites us.

4. The release of Moses thereupon: so he let him go; the distemper went off, the destroying angel withdrew, and all was well: only Zipporah cannot forget the fright she was in, but will unreasonably call Moses a bloody husband, because he obliged her to circumcise the child; and, upon this occasion, (it is probable,) he sent them back to his father-in-law, that they might not create him any further uneasiness. Note, (1.) When we return to God in a way of duty, he will return to us in a way of mercy; take away the cause, and the effect will cease. (2.) We must resolve to bear it patiently, if our zeal be misinterpreted and discouraged by some that should understand themselves, and us, and their duty better, as David's zeal was misinterpreted by Michal; but if this be to be vile, if this be to be bloody, we must be yet more so. (3.) When we have any special service to do for God, we should remove that as far from us as we can, which is likely to be our hinderance; Let the dead bury their dead, but follow thou me.

II. How Aaron met him in love, v. 27., 28. 1. God sent Aaron to meet him, and directed him where to find him, in the wilderness, that lay toward Midian. Note, The providence of God is to be acknowledged in the comfortable meeting of relations and friends. 2. Aaron made so much haste, in obedience to his God, and in love to his brother, that he met him in the mount of God, the place where God had met with him. 3. They embraced one another with mutual endearments; the more they saw of God's immediate direction in bringing them together, the more pleasant their interview was: they kissed, not only in token of brotherly affection, and in remembrance of ancient acquaintance, but as a pledge of their hearty concurrence in the work of God. 4. When Aaron informed his brother of the commission he had received, with all the instructions and credentials affixed to it, v. 28. Note, What we know of God, we should communicate for the benefit of others; and those that are fellow-servants to God in the same work, should use a mutual freedom, and endearour rightly and fully to understand one another.
ity, of faith and obedience: when Moses and Aaron first opened their commission in Egypt, said what they were ordered to say, and, to confirm that, did what they were ordered to do, they met with a better reception than they promised themselves, v. 29 ... 31. 1.
The Israelites g:ve credit to them; the people believed, as God had foretold, (ch. 3. 18.) knowing that no man could do those works that they did, unless God were with him. They gave glory to God, they bowed their heads and worshipped; therein expressing not only their humble thankfulness to God, who had raised them up and sent them a delivcrer, but also their cheerful readiness to observe orders, and pursue the methods of their delivcrance.

CHAP. V.
Moses and Aaron are here dealing with Pharaoh, to get leave of him to go worship in the wilderness. 1. They demand leave in the name of God, (v. 1.) and he answers their demand with a defiance of God, v. 2. II.
They beg leave; he is master thereof. 3. Then they send with request with further orders to oppress Israel, v. 4. 5. These cruel orders were, 1. Executed by the taskmasters, v. 10. 11. 2. Complained of to Pharaoh, but in vain, v. 15. 16. 3. Complained of by the people to Moses, (v. 20, 21.) and by him to God, v. 22, 23.

A ND afterward Moses and Aaron went in, and told Pharaoh. Thus saith the Lord God of Israel, Let my people go, that they may hold a feast unto me in the wilderness. 2. And Pharaoh said, Who is the Lord, that I should obey his voice to let Israel go? I know not the Lord, neither will I let Israel go.

Moses and Aaron, having delivered their message to the elders of Israel, with whom they found good acceptance, are now to deal with Pharaoh, to whom they come in peril of their lives; Moses par-cipally, who perhaps was outlawed for killing the Egyptian forty years before, so that if any of the old courtiers should happen to remember that against him now, it might have occasioned him a headache; however the message itself was displeasing; and touched Pharaoh, both in his honour and in his profit, two tender points; yet these faithful ambas-dadors boldly deliver their errand, whether he will hear, or whether he will forbear.

1. Their demand is piously bold; (v. 1.) Thus saith the Lord God of Israel, Let my people go.
Moses, in treating with the elders of Israel, is directed to call God the God of their fathers; but, in dealing with Pharaoh, they call him the God of Israel, and it is the first time we find him called so in scripture: he is called the God of Israel, the person, (Gen. 33. 20.) but here it is Israel, the people. They are just beginning to be formed into a people, when God is called their God. Moses, it is likely, was directed to call him so, at least, it might be inferred from ch. 4. 22: Israel is my son.
In the meantime he delivereth their plea to the my people go. (1.) They were God's people, and therefore Pharaoh ought not to detain them in bondage. Note, God will own his people, though ever so poor and despizable, and will find a time to plead their cause. (The Israelites are slaves in Egypt, but they are my people," says God, "and I will not suffer them to be always trampled upon." See Isa.
52. 4, 5. (2.) He expected services and sacrifices from them, and therefore they must have leave to go where they could freely exercise their religion, without giving offence to, or receiving offence from, the Egyptians. Note, God delivers his people out of the hand of their enemies, that they may serve him cheerfully; that they may hold a feast to him; which they may do, while they have his favour and presence, even in a wilderness, a dry and barren land.

2. Pharaoh's answer is impiously bold; (v. 2.)
Who is the Lord, that I should obey his voice? Being summoned to surrender, he thus hangs out the flag of defiance, hectors Moses and the God that sends him, and peremptorily refuses to let Israel go;
he will not treat about it, nor so much as hear the mention of it.

Observe, (1.) How scornfully he speaks of the God of Israel; "Who is Jehovah? I neither knew him, nor care for him; neither value him, nor fear him:" it is a hard name that he never heard before, but he resolves it shall be no bugbear to him. Israel was now a despised oppressed people, looked on as on the tail of the nation, and by the character they bore, Pharaoh makes his estimate of their God, and concludes that he made no better figure among the gods, than his people did among the nations. Note, [1.] Hardened persecutors are more malicious against God himself, than they are against his people. See Isa. 37. 23. [2.] Ignorance and contempt of God are at the bottom of all the wickedness that is in the world. Men knew not the Lord, or have very low and mean thoughts of him, therefore they would not obey his voice, nor will let anything go for him.

(2.) How proudly he speaks of himself; "That I should obey his voice; I, the king of Egypt, a great people, obey the God of Israel, a poor enslaved people? Shall I, that rule the Israel of God, obey the God of Israel? No, it is below me, I scorn to answer his summons." Note, They are the children of pride, that are the children of disobedience, Job 41. 34. Eph. 5. 6. Proud men think themselves too good to stoop even to God himself, and would not be under control, Jer. 43. 2. Here is the core of the controversy, God must rule, but man will not be ruled: "I will have my will done;" says
God; "But I will do my own will," says the sinner.

(3.) How resolutely he denies the demand, Neither will I let Israel go. Note, Of all sinners none are so obstinate, nor so hardly persuaded to leave their sin, as persecutors are.

3. And they said, The God of the Hebrews hath met with us: let us go, we pray thee, three days' journey into the desert, and sacrifice unto the Lord our God; lest he fall upon us with pestilence, or with the sword. 4. And the king of Egypt said unto them, Wherefore do ye, Moses and Aaron, let the people from their works? Get you unto your burdens. 5. And Pharaoh said, Behold, the people of the land now are many, and you make them rest from their burdens. 6. And Pharaoh commanded the same day the task-masters of the people, and their officers, saying, 7. Ye shall no more give the people straw to make brick, as heretofore: let them go and gather straw for themselves. 8. And the tale of the bricks, which they did make heretofore, you shall lay upon them; you shall not diminish knight thereof: for they be idle; therefore they cry, saying, Let us go and sacrifice unto our God. 9. Let there more work be laid upon the men, that they may labour there- in; and let them not regard vain words.

Finding that Pharaoh had no veneration at all for God, Moses and Aaron next try whether he had any compassion for Israel, and become humble suitors to him for leave to go and sacrifice, but in vain.

1. Their request is very humble and modest, v. 3. They make no complaint of the rigour they were ruled with; they plead that the journey they designed, was not a project formed among themselves, but that the Lord had met with them, and called them to it: they beg with all submission, We pray thee; the poor useth entertaines; though God may summon princes that oppress, it becomes us to beseech and make supplication to them. What they ask is very reasonable, only for a short vaca- tion, while they went three days’ journey into the desert, and that on a good errand, and unexcep- tionable; “We will sacrifice unto the Lord our God, as other people do to their’s:” and lastly they give a very good reason, “Lest if we quite cast off his worship, he fall upon us with one judgment or other, and then Pharaoh will lose his vas- sals.”

2. Pharaoh’s denial of their request is very bar- barbarous and unreasonable, v. 4-9. (1. ) His sugges- tions were very unreasonable; [1.] That the people were idle, and that therefore they talked of going to see their gods they built for Pharaoh, and the other fruit of their labours, were wit- nesses for them, that they were not idle; yet he thus basely misrepresents them, that he might have a pretence to increase their burthens. [2.] That Moses and Aaron made them idle with vain words, v. 9. God’s words are here called vain words; and those that called them to the best and most needful being to make them idle. Note, The malice of Satan has often represented the ser- vice and worship of God as fit employment for those only that have nothing else to do, and the business only of the idle, whereas indeed it is the indispen- sable duty of those that are most busy in the world.

(2. ) His resolutions hereupon were most barbarous: [1.] Moses and Aaron themselves must get to their burdens, (v. 4.) they are Israelites, and, however God had distinguished them from the rest, Pharaoh makes no difference, they must share in the common slavery of their nation. Persecutors have always taken a particular pleasure in putting con- tempt and hardship upon the ministers of the churches. [2.] The usual tale of bricks must be exacted, without the usual allowance of straw to mix with the clay, or to burn them with; that this more work might be laid upon the men, which if they performed, they would be broken with la- bour; and if not, they would be exposed to punish- ment.

And the task-masters of the people went out, and their officers, and they spake to the people, saying, Thus saith Pharaoh, I will not give you straw. 11. Go ye, get you straw where you can find it: yet not ought of your work shall be diminished. 12. So the people were scattered abroad throughout all the land of Egypt, to gather stubble instead of straw. 13. And the task- masters hasted them, saying, Fulfil your works, your daily tasks, as when there was straw. 14. And the officers of the children of Israel, which Pharaoh’s task-masters had set over them, were beaten, and demanded, Wherefore have ye not fulfilled your task in making brick, both yesterday and to-day, as heretofore?

Pharaoh’s orders are here put in execution; straw is denied, and yet the work not diminished. 1. The Egyptian task-masters were very severe. Pharaoh having decreed unrighteous degrees, the task- masters were ready to write the grievousness that he had prescribed; Isa. 10. 1. Cruel princes will never want cruel instruments to be employed under them, who will justly them in that which is most unreasonable. These taskmasters insisted upon the daily tasks, as when there was straw, v. 13. See what need we have to pray that we may be delivered from unreasonable and wicked men, 2 Thess. 2. 2. The enmity of the serpent’s seed against the seed of the woman, is such as breaks through all the laws of reason, honour, humanity and common justice. 2. The people hereby were dispersed throughout all the land of Egypt, to gather stub- bles, v. 12. By this means Pharaoh’s unjust and barbarous usage of them came to be known to all the kingdom, and perhaps caused them to be pitied by all their neighbours, and made Pharaoh’s gov- ernment less acceptable even to his own subjects: good-will is never got by persecution. 3. The Is- raelite-officers were used with particular harshness, v. 14. They that were the fathers of the houses of Israel paid dear for their honour; for from them immediately the service was exacted, and they were beaten when it was not performed. See here, (1.) What a miserable thing slavery is, and what reason we have to be thankful to God that we are a free people, and not oppressed. Liberty and property are valuable jewels in the eyes of those whose services and possessions lie at the mercy of an arbitrary power. (2. ) What disappointments we often meet with, after the raising of our expecta- tions. The Israelites were now lateelly encouraged to hope for enlargement; but, behold, greater dis- tresses. This teaches us always to rejoice with trembling. (3.) What strange steps God sometimes takes in delivering his people; he often brings them to the utmost straits, then when he is just ready to appear for them. The lowest ebbs go be-fore the highest tides; and very cloudy mornings commonly introduce the fairest days, Deut. 32. 35. God’s time to help is when things are at the worst; and Providence verifies the paradox, The worse, the better.

15. Then the officers of the children of Israel came and cried unto Pharaoh, saying, Wherefore dealest thou thus with thy serv- ants? 16. There is no straw given unto thy servants, and they say to us, Make brick: and, behold, thy servants are beaten; but the fault is in thine own people. 17. But he said, Ye are idle, ye are idle; therefore ye say, Let us go and do sacrifice to the Lord. 18. Go therefore now and work; for there shall no straw be given you, yet shall ye deliver the tale of bricks. 19. And the officers of the children of Israel did see that they were in evil case, after it was said, Ye shall not minish outh from your bricks of your daily task. 20. And they met Moses and Aaron, who stood in the way, as they came forth from Pharaoh; 21. And they said unto them, The Lord look upon you, and judge; because you have made our 5a V. 1.—2 I vour to be abhorred in the eyes of Pharaoh, and in the eyes of his servants, to put a sword in their hands to slay us. 22. And Moses returned unto the Lord, and said, Lord, wherefore hast thou so evil entreated this people? Why is it that thou hast sent me? 23. For since I came to Pharaoh to speak in thy name, he hath done evil to this people; neither hast thou delivered thy people at all.

It was a great strait that the head workmen were in, when they must either abuse those that were under them, or be abused by those that were over them; yet, it should seem, rather than they would tyrannize, they would be tyrannized over; and they were so. In this evil case, (v. 19.) observe,

1. How justly they complained to Pharaoh; they came and cried unto Pharaoh, v. 15. Whither should they go with a remonstrance of their grievances, but to the supreme power, which is ordained for the good of all? As bad as Pharaoh was, his oppressed subjects had liberty to complain to him; there was no law against petitioning: it was a very modest, but moving, representation that they made of their condition; (v. 16.) Thy servants are beaten, (severely enough, no doubt, when things were in such a ferment,) and yet, the fault is in thine own people, the task-masters, who deny us what is necessary for carrying on our work. Note, It is common for those to be most vigorous in blaming others, who are most blame-worthy themselves.

But what did they get by this complaint? It did but make bad worse: 1. Pharaoh taunted them; (v. 17.) when they were almost killed with working, he told them they were idle: they underwent the fatigue of industry, and yet lay under the imputation of slothfulness, while nothing appeared to ground the charge upon but this, that they said, Let us go and do sacrifice. Note, It is common for the best actions to be mentioned under the worst names; holy diligence in the best business, is censured by many as a culpable carelessness in the business of the world. It is well for us, that men are not to be our judges, but a God who knows the principles on which we act. Those that are diligent in doing sacrifice to the Lord, will, with God, escape the doom of the slothful servant, though with men, they do not. 2. He bound on their burthen; Go now and work, v. 18. Note, Wickedness proceedeth from the wicked: what can be expected from unrighteous men, but more unrighteousness?

II. How justly they complained of Moses and Aaron. (v. 21.) The Lord look upon you, and judge. This was not fair; Moses and Aaron had given sufficient evidence of their hearty goodwill to the liberties of Israel: and yet, because things succeed not immediately so as they hoped, they are reproached as accessories to their slavery. They should have humbled themselves before God, and taken to themselves the shame of their sin, which was a very bad thing from them; but, instead of that, they fly in the face of their best friends, and quarrel with the instruments of their deliverance, because of some little difficulties and obstructions they met with in effecting it. Note, Those that are called out to public service for God and their generation, must expect to be tried, not only by the malicious threats of proud enemies, but by the unjust and uncertain censures of unthinking friends, who judge only by outward appearance, and look but a little way before them.

Now what did Moses do in this strait? It grieved him to the heart, that the event did not answer, but rather contradict, his expectation; and their upbuildings were very cutting, and like a sword in his bones; but,

1. He returned to the Lord, (v. 22.) to acquaint him with it, and to represent the case to him; he knew that what he had said and done, was by divine direction and therefore his labours were upon him for it, he considers as reflecting upon God, and, like Hezekiah, spreads it before him as interested in the cause, and appeals to him. Compare this with Jer. 20. 7-9. Note, When we find ourselves, at any time, perplexed and embarrassed in the way of our duty, we ought to have recourse to God, and lay open our case before him by faithful and fervent prayer. If we retreat, let us retreat to him, and no further.

He expostulated with him, v. 22, 23. He knew not how to reconcile the providence with the promise and the commission which he had received. "Is this God's coming down to deliver Israel? Must I, who hoped to be a blessing to them, become a scourge to them? By this attempt to get them out of the pit, they are but sunk the deeper into it." Note, (1.) Wherefore hast thou so evil entreated this people? Note, [1.] Even then when God is coming toward his people in ways of mercy, yet sometimes he takes such methods as that they may think themselves but ill-treated. The instruments of deliverance, when they aim to help, are found to hinder, and that becomes a trap, which, it was hoped would have been for their welfare; God suffering it to be so, that we may learn to keep from man, and may come off from a dependence upon second causes. [2.] When the people of God think themselves ill-treated, they should go to God by prayer, and plead with him, and that is the way to have better treatment in God's good time. Moses asks further, (2.) Why is it thou hast sent me? Thus, [1.] He complains of his ill-success; Pharaoh has done evil to this people, and not one step seems to be taken toward their deliverance. Note, It cannot but sit very heavy upon the spirits of those whom God employs for him, to see that their labour does no good, and much more, to see that it does hurt, eventually, though not designedly. It is uncomfortable to a good minister, to perceive that his endeavours for men's conviction and conversion, do but exasperate their corruptions, confirm them in their wickedness, and drive them up under unbelief. This makes them go in the bitterness of their souls, as the prophet Ezek. 3. 14. Or, [2.] He inquires what was further to be done; Why hast thou sent me? that is, "What other method shall I take in pursuance of my commission?" Note, Disappointments in our work must not drive us from our God, but still we must consider who we are sent.

CHAP. VI.

Much ado there was to bring Moses to his work, and when the ice was broken, some difficulty having occurred in carrying it on, there was no less ado to put him forward in it the more. We have this change now,imens.

1. It God satisfies Moses himself in an answer to his complaints in the close of the foregoing chapter, v. 1. II. He gives him fuller instructions than had yet been given him, what to say, when and how to speak; v. 3-9. III. He confirms him in his directions, v. 8., but to little purpose, v. 9. III. He sends him again to Pharaoh, v. 10, 11. But Moses objects against that, v. 12.) upon which a very strict charge is given to him and his brother, See v. 13-15. IV. The Lord will give thee power. v. 14-15. Here is an abstract of the genealogy, and the history of Levi, v. 16-20. v. 21. Here is a mention of Aaron of the tribe of Levi. v. 22. Then the tribe of Levi is numbered, v. 23-26. Then the chapter concludes with a repetition of so much of the preceding story, as was necessary to make way for the following chapter.
1. THEN the Lord said unto Moses, Now shalt thou see what I will do to Pharaoh: for with a strong hand shall he let them go, and with a strong hand shall he drive them out of his land. 2. And God spake unto Moses, and said unto him, I am the Lord: 3. And I appeared unto Abraham, unto Isaac, and unto Jacob, by the name of God Almighty; but by my name JEHOVAH was I not known to them. 4. And I have also established my covenant with them, to give them the land of Canaan, the land of their pilgrimage, where-in they were strangers. 5. And I have also heard the groaning of the children of Israel, whom the Egyptians keep in bondage; and I have remembered my covenant. 6. Wherefore say unto the children of Israel, I am the Lord, and I will bring you out from under the burdens of the Egyptians, and I will rid you out of their bondage; and I will redeem you with a stretched-out arm, and with great judgments: 7. And I will take you to me for a people, and I will be to you a God: and ye shall know that I am the Lord your God, which bringeth you out from under the burdens of the Egyptians. 8. And I will bring you in unto the land, concerning the which I did swear to Abraham, to Isaac, and to Jacob; and I will give it you for an heritage: I am the Lord. 9. And Moses spake so unto the children of Israel: but they hearkened not unto Moses, for anguish of spirit, and for cruel bondage.

Here,

I. God silences Moses's complaints with the assurance of success in this negotiation, repeating the promise made him, (ch. 3. 20.) After that, he will let you go. Then when Moses was at his wit's end, wishing he had staid in Midian, rather than have come to Egypt to make bad worse, when he was quite at a loss what to do, Then the Lord said unto Moses, for the quieting of his mind, "Now shalt thou see what I will do to Pharaoh; (v. 1.) now that the affair is come to a crisis, things are as bad as they can be, Pharaoh is in the height of pride, and Israel in the depth of misery; now is my time to appear. See Ps. 12. 5, 12. Now will I arise. Note, Man's extremity is God's opportunity of helping and saving. Moses had been expecting what God would do: but now he shall see what he will do, shall see his day at length, Job 24. 1. Moses had been trying what he could do; and could effect nothing. "Well," says God, now thou shalt see what I will do; let me alone to deal with this proud man," Job 40. 12, 13. Note, Then the deliverance of God's church will be accomplished, when God takes the work into his own hands. With a strong hand, that is, being forced to it by a strong hand, he shall let them go. Note, As some are brought to their duty by the strong hand of God's grace, who are made willing in the day of his power; so others by the strong hand of his justice, breaking those that would not bend.

II. He gives him further instructions, that both he and the people of Israel might be encouraged to hope for a glorious issue of this affair. Take comfort,

1. From God's name Jehovah, v. 2, 3. He begins with this, I am Jehovah, the same with I am that I am, The fountain of being, and blessedness, and infinite perfection. The patriarchs knew his name, but they did not know him in this matter by that which the name signifies. God would now be known by his name Jehovah, but is, (1.) A God performing what he had promised, and so inspiring confidence in his promises. (2.) A God perfecting what he had begun, and finishing his own work. In the history of the creation, God is never called Jehovah, till the heavens and the earth were finished, Gen. 2. 4. When the salvation of the saints is completed in eternall life, then will he be known by his name, Jehovah, v. 2, 3. In the mean time they shall find him for their strength and support, El-shaddai, a God all-sufficient, a God that is enough, and will be, Mic. 7. 20.

2. From his covenant; (v. 4.) I have established my covenant. Note, the covenants God makes, they are made as firm as the power and truth of God can make them. We may venture our all upon this bottom.

3. From his promises; (v. 5.) I have heard the groaning of the children of Israel; he means their groaning on occasion of the late hardships put upon them. Note, God takes notice of the increase of his people's calamities, and observes how their enemies grow upon them.

4. From his present resolutions, v. 6, 8. Here is line upon line to assure them that they shall be brought triumphantly out of Egypt, (v. 6.) and should be put in possession of the land of Canaan; (v. 8.) I will bring you out. I will rid you. I will redeem you. I will bring you into the land of Canaan, and I will give it you. Let man take the shame of his unbelief which needs such repetitions, and let God have the glory of his condescending grace which gives us such repeated assurances for our satisfaction.

5. From his gracious intentions in all these, which were great, and becoming him, v. 7. (1.) He intended their happiness; I will take you to me for a people, a peculiar people, and I will be to you a God; more than this we need not ask, we cannot have, to make us happy. (2.) He intended his own glory; Ye shall know that I am the Lord. God will attain his own ends, nor shall we come short of them, if we make them our chief end too. Now, one would think, these good words and comforts, should have revived the drooping Israelites, and made them to forget their misery; but, on the contrary, their miseries made them regardless of God's promises; (v. 9.) they hearkened not unto Moses for anguish of spirit. That is, [1.] They were so taken up with their troubles, that they did not heed him. [2.] They were so cast down with their miseries, they supposed, that they did not believe him. And, [3.] They had lost all sense of Pharaoh's power and wrath, that they durst not themselves move in the least toward their deliverance. Note, First, Disconsolate spirits often put from them the comforts they are entitled to, and stand in their own light. See Isa. 28. 12. Secondly, Strong passions oppose strong consolations. By indulging ourselves in discontent and fretfulness, we deprive ourselves of the comfort we might have both from God's word and from his providence, and must thank ourselves if we go comfortless.

10. And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying, 11. Go in, speak unto Pharaoh king of Egypt, that he let the children of Israel go out of his land. 12. And Moses spake before the Lord, saying, Behold, the children of Israel have not hearkened unto me; how then shall Pharaoh hear me, who am of uncircumcised lips? 13. And the Lord spake unto Moses and unto Aaron, and gave them a charge unto the children of Israel, and unto Pharaoh king of Egypt, to bring the children of Israel out of the land of Egypt.

Here, 1. God sends Moses the second time to Pharaoh, (v. 11.) upon the same errand as before, to command him at his peril, that he let the children of Israel go. Note, God repeats his precepts, before he begins his punishments. Those that have often been called in vain to leave their sins, yet must be called again. The agents of nature they will harken not to, whether they will forbear, Ezek. 3. 11. God is said to hew sinners by his prophets, (Hos. 6. 5.) which denotes the repetition of the strokes; How often would I have gathered you!

2. Moses makes objections, as one discouraged, and willing to give up the cause; (v. 12.) He pleads, (1.) The unlikelihood of Pharaoh’s hearing; “Behold, the children of Israel have not hearkened unto me, how shall Pharaoh hear me? Note, The frowardness and untractableness of those that are called christians, greatly discourage ministers, and make them ready to despair of success, in dealing with those that are atheistical and profane. We would be instrumental to unite Israelites, to refine and purify them, to comfort and pacify them; but if they hearken not to us, how shall we prevail with those in whom we cannot pretend to succeed in our own interest? But with God all things are possible. (2.) He pleads the unreasonableness and infirmity of his own speaking: I am of uncircumcised lips; it is repeated, v. 30. He was conscious to himself that he had not the gift of utterance, had no command of language; his talent did not lie that way. This objection God had given a sufficient answer to before, and therefore he urged not to have insisted upon it, for the sufficiency of grace can supply the defects of nature at any time. Note, Though our infirmities ought to humble us, yet they ought not to discourage us from doing our best in any service we have to do for God. His strength is made perfect in our weakness.

3. God again joins Aaron in commission with Moses, and puts an end to the dispute, by interposing his own authority, and giving them both a solemn charge, upon their allegiance to their great Lord, to execute it with all possible expedition and fidelity. When Moses repeats his baffled arguments, he shall be argued with no longer, but God gives him a charge, and Aaron with him, both to the children of Israel and to Pharaoh, v. 15. Note, God’s authority is sufficient to answer all objections, and binds us to obedience, without murmuring or disputing. Phil. 2. 14. 15. Moses himself had need to be charged, and so his Timothy, 1 Tim. 6. 12. 2 Tim. 4. 1.

14. These be the heads of their fathers’ houses: The sons of Reuben, the first-born of Israel; Hanoch, and Phallu, Hezron, and Carmi: these be the families of Reuben. 15. And the sons of Simeon; Jemuel, and Jamin, and Ohad, and Jachin, and Zohar, and Shaul, the son of a Canaanitish woman: these are the families of Simeon. 16. And these are the names of the sons of Levi, according to their generations; Gershon, and Kohath, and Merari. And the years of the life of Levi were a hundred thirty and seven years. 17. The sons of Gershon; Lilam, and Shimi, according to their families. 18. And the sons of Kohath; Amram, and Izhar, and Hebron, and Uzziel. And the years of the life of Kohath were a hundred thirty and three years. 19. And the sons of Merari; Mahali, and Musli: these are the families of Levi, according to their generations. 20. And Amram took him Jochebed, his father’s sister, to wife; and she bare him Aaron and Moses. And the years of the life of Amram were a hundred and thirty and seven years. 21. And the sons of Izhar; Korah, and Nepheg, and Zichri. 22. And the sons of Uzziel; Mishael, and Elzaphan, and Zitli. 23. And Aaron took him Elisheba, daughter of Amminadab, sister of Naasahn, to wife; and she bare him Nadab and Abihu, Eleazar and Ithamar. 24. And the sons of Korah; Assir, and Elkanah, and Abiasaph: these are the families of the Korhites. 25. And Eleazar, Aaron’s son, took him one of the daughters of Putiel to wife; and she bare him Phinehas: these are the heads of the fathers of the Levites, according to their families. 26. These are that Aaron and Moses, to whom the Lord said, Bring out the children of Israel from the land of Egypt, according to their armies. 27. These are they which spake to Pharaoh king of Egypt, to bring out the children of Israel from Egypt: these are that Moses and Aaron. 28. And it came to pass, on the day when the Lord spake unto Moses in the land of Egypt, 29. That the Lord spake unto Moses, saying, I am the Lord: speak thou unto Pharaoh king of Egypt all that I say unto thee. 30. And Moses said before the Lord, Behold, I am of uncircumcised lips, and how shall Pharaoh hearken unto me?

We have here a genealogy, not an endless one, such as the apostles commend, (1 Tim. 1. 4.) for it ends in those two great patriarchs, Moses and Aaron, and comes in here to show that they were Israelites, bone of their bone, and flesh of their flesh, whom they were sent to deliver, raised up unto them of their brethren, as Christ also should be, who was to be the Prophet and Priest, the Redeemer and Lawgiver, of the people of Israel, and whose genealogy also, like this, was to be carefully preserved.
The beds of the houses of three of the tribes are here named, agreeing with the accounts we had, Gen. 46. Dr. Lightfoot thinks that Reuben, Simeon, and Levi, are thus dignified here by themselves for this reason; because they three were left under marks of infamy by their dying father, Reuben for his incest, and Simeon and Levi for their murder of the Shechemites; and therefore Moses would put this particular honour upon them, to magnify God's mercy in their repentance and remission, as a pattern to them that should afterward believe: the two first, rather, seem to be mentioned only for the sake of a third, which was Levi, from whom Moses and Aaron descended, and all the priests of the Jewish church. Thus was the tribe of Levi distinguished betimes. Observe here,—

1. That Kohath, from whom Moses and Aaron, and all the priests, derived their pedigree, was a younger son of Levi, v. 16. Note, The grants of God's favours do not go by seniority of age, and priority of birth, but the divine sovereignty often prefers the younger before the elder, so crossing hands.

2. That the ages of Levi, Kohath, and Amram, the father, grandfather, and great-grandfather of Moses, are specified: and thereby it is understood, they all lived to a great age, Levi to 137, Kohath to 133, and Amram to 137; Moses himself came much short of them, and fixed 80 or 80 for the ordinary stretch of human life: (Ps. 90. 10.) for now that God's Israel was multiplied, and become a great nation, and divine revelation was by the hand of Moses committed to writing, and no longer trusted to tradition, the two great reasons for the long lives of the patriarchs ceased, and therefore from hence forward fewer years must serve men.

3. That Aaron married Elisheba, (the same name with that of the wife of Zecharias, Elizabeth, as Miriam the same with Mary,) daughter of Amminadab, one of the chief of the fathers of the tribe of Judah; for the tribes of Levi and Judah often intermarried, v. 23.

4. It must not be omitted that Moses has recorded the marriage of his father Amram with Jochebed his own aunt; (v. 20.) and it appears by Numb. 26. 59, that it must be taken strictly for his father's own sister, at least by the half blood; this marriage was afterward forbidden, as incestuous, (Lev. 18. 12.) which might be looked upon as a blot upon his family, though before that law; yet Moses does not complain for himself, nor of his own praise, but wrote with a sincere regard to truth, whether it smiled or frowned upon him.

5. He concludes it with a particular mark of honour on the persons he was writing of, though himself was one of them, v. 26. 27. These are that Moses and Aaron, whom God pitched upon to be his pleni-potentaries in this treaty. These were they whom God spake to, (v. 26.) who spake to them, (v. 27.) with whom the covenant in that chapter, v. 27. Note, Communion with God and serviceableness to his church, are things that, above any other, put true honour upon men. Those are great indeed whom God converses with, and whom he employs in his service. Such were that Moses and Aaron; and something of this honour have all his saints, who are made to our God kings and priests.

And now, last, he returns to his narrative, which he had broken off from somewhat abruptly, (v. 13.) and repeats (1.) The charge God had given him to deliver his message to Pharaoh; (v. 29.) Speak all that I say unto thee, as a faithful ambassador. Note, Those that go on God's errand, must not shun to declare the whole counsel of God: (2.) His objection against it, v. 30. Note, Those that have at any time spoken unadvisedly with their lips, ought often to reflect upon it with regret, as Moses seems to do here.

CHAP. VII.

In this chapter, I. The dispute between God and Moses finishes, and Moses applies himself to the execution of his commission, in obedience to God's command, v. 1. - 7. II. The dispute between Moses and Pharaoh begins, and a famous trait of skill it was; Moses, in God's name, demands Israel's release; Pharaoh denies it. The contest is between the power of the great God, and the power of a proud prince; and it will be found, in the issue, that when God judgeth, he will overcome. 1. Moses confirms the demand he had made to Pharaoh, by a miracle, turning his rod into a serpent; but Pharaoh hardens his heart against this conviction, v. 8. - 13. 2. He charges his disobedience by a plague, the first, of the ten, turning the waters into blood; but Pharaoh hardens his heart against this correction, v. 14. - 25.

1. And the Lord said unto Moses, See, I have made thee a god to Pharaoh; and Aaron thy brother shall be thy prophet. 2. Thou shalt speak all that I command thee; and Aaron thy brother shall speak unto Pharaoh, that he send the children of Israel out of his land. 3. And I will harden Pharaoh's heart, and multiply my signs and my wonders in the land of Egypt. 4. But Pharaoh shall not hearken unto you, that I may lay my hand upon Egypt, and bring forth mine armies, and my people the children of Israel, out of the land of Egypt by great judgments. 5. And the Egyptians shall know that I am the Lord, when I stretch forth mine hand upon Egypt, and bring out the children of Israel from among them. 6. And Moses and Aaron did as the Lord commanded them, so did they. 7. And Moses was fourscore years old, and Aaron fourscore and three years old, when they spake unto Pharaoh.

Here, I. God encourages Moses to go to Pharaoh, and, at last, silences all his discouragements. (1.) He offers him with great power and authority; (v. 1.) I have made thee a god to Pharaoh, that is, a representative in this affair, as magistrates are called gods, because they are God's vicereges. He was authorized to speak and act in God's name and stead, and, under the divine direction, was endowed with a divine power, to do that which is above the ordinary power of nature, and invested with a divine authority to demand obedience from a sovereign prince, and punish disobedience. Moses was a god, but he was only a made god, not essentially one by nature; he was no god but by commission. He was a god, but he was only a god to Pharaoh; the living and true God is God to all the world. It is an instance of God's condescension, and an evidence that his thoughts towards us are thoughts of peace, that when he treats with men, he treats by measure, lot wills are afraid. (2.) He again nominates him an assistant, his brother Aaron, who was not a man of uncircumcised lips, but a notable spokesman; "He shall be thy prophet," that is, "he shall speak from thee to Pharaoh, as prophets do from God to the children of men. Thou shalt, as a god, infect and remove the plagues, and Aaron as a prophet, shall denounce them, and threaten Pharaoh with them." (3.) He tells him the worst of it, that Pharaoh would not hearken to him; and yet the work should be done at last, and should be delivered, that God therein should be glorified, v. 4. 5. The Egyptians who would not know the Lord, should be made to know him. Note, It is, and ought to be, satisfaction enough to God's messenger, that whatever contradiction and opposition may be given them, thus far they shall gain their point, that God will be glorified in the success of their embassy, and all his chosen Israel will be saved, and then they have no reason to say that they have laboured in vain. See here, [1.] How God glorifies himself; he makes people know that he is Jehovah; Israel is made to know it by the performance of his promises to them, (ch. 6. 3.) and the Egyptians are made to know it by the pouring out of his wrath upon them; thus God's name is exalted both in them that are saved and in them that perish. [2.] What method he takes to do this: he humbles the proud, and exalts the poor, Luke 1. 51, 52. If God stretch out his hand to sinners in vain, he will at last stretch out his hand upon them; and who can bear the weight of it?

If. Moses and Aaron apply themselves to their work without further objection; They did as the Lord commanded them, v. 6. Their obedience, all things considered, was well worthy to be celebrated, as it is by the Psalmist; (Ps. 105. 28.) They rebuked not against his word, namely, Moses and Aaron, whom he mentions, v. 26. Thus Jonah, though, at first, he was very averse, at length went to Nineveh. Notice is taken of the age of Moses and Aaron, when they undertook this glorious service. Aaron, the elder, (and yet in the inferior office,) was eighty-three, Moses was eighty; both of them men of great gravity and experience, whose age was venerable, and whose years might teach wisdom, v. 7. Joseph, who was to be only a servant to Pharaoh, was preferred at thirty years old: but Moses, who was to be a god to Pharaoh, was not so dignified until he was eighty years old. It was fit that he should long wait for such an honour, and be long in preparing for such a service.

8. And the Lord spake unto Moses and unto Aaron, saying, 9. When Pharaoh shall speak unto you, saying, Show a miracle for you: then shall you say unto Aaron, Take thy rod, and cast it before Pharaoh, and it shall become a serpent. 10. And Moses and Aaron went in unto Pharaoh, and they did so as the Lord had commanded: and Aaron cast down his rod before Pharaoh, and before his servants, and it became a serpent. 11. Then Pharaoh also called the wise men and the sorcerers: now the magicians of Egypt, they also did in like manner with their enchantments: 12. For they cast down every man his rod, and they became serpents: but Aaron's rod swallowed up their rods. 13. And he hardened Pharaoh's heart, that he hearkened not unto them; as the Lord had said.

The first time that Moses made his application to Pharaoh, he produced his instructions only; now he is directed to produce his credentials, and does accordingly.

1. It is taken for granted, that Pharaoh would challenge these demandants to work a miracle, that, by a performance evidently above the power of nature, they might prove their commission from the God of nature. Pharaoh will say, Show a miracle; not with any desire to be convinced, but with the hope that he will be wroth, and then he would have some colour for his infidelity.

2. Orders are therefore given to turn the rod into a serpent, according to the instructions, ch. 4. 3. 4. The same rod that was to give the signal of the miracle was to go, and confirm the miracle, to put a reputation upon it. Aaron cast his rod to the ground, and instantly it became a serpent, v. 10. This was proper, not only to affect Pharaoh with wonder, but to strike a terror upon him; serpents are hurtful, dreadful animals; the very sight of one, thus miraculously produced, might have softened his heart into a fear of that God by whose power it was produced. This first miracle, though it was not a plague, yet amounted to the threatening of a plague. If it made not Pharaoh feel, it made him fear; and this is God's method of dealing with sinners—he comes upon them gradually.

3. This miracle, though too plain to be denied, is encraved, and the conviction of it taken off, by the magicians' imitation of it, v. 11, 12. Moses had been originally instructed in the learning of the Egyptians, and had probably, in his youth, improved himself in magical arts, in his long retirement; the magicians are therefore sent for, to vie with him. And some think these of that profession had a particular spite against the Hebrews, ever since Joseph put them all to shame, by interpreting a dream which they could make nothing of, in remembrance of which slurr put upon their predecessors, these magicians withstood Moses, as it is explained, 2 Tim. 3. 8. Their rods became serpents, real serpents; some think, by the power of God, beyond their intention or expectation, for the hardening of Pharaoh's heart. Others think by the power of evil angels, artfully substituting serpents in the room of the rods; God permitting the delusion to be wrought, for wise and holy ends, that they might believe a lie, who received not the truth, and here-in the Lord was righteous. Yet this might have helped to frighten Pharaoh into a compliance with the demands of Moses, that he might be freed from these dreadful, unaccountable phenomena, with which he saw himself on all sides surrounded. But to the seed of the serpent these serpents were no amazement. Note, God suffers the lying spirit to do strange things, that the faith of some may be tried, 2 Tim. 3. 13; that of others may be confirmed, and that the infidelity of others may be confirmed, and that he who is filthy, may be filthy still, 2 Cor. 4. 4. Yet, in this contest, Moses plainly gains the victory; the serpent which Aaron's rod was turned into, swallowed up the others, which was sufficient to have convinced Pharaoh on which side the right lay. Note, Great is the truth, and will prevail. The cause of God will undoubtedly triumph at last over all opposition, confusion, and confusion, and will reign alone, Dan. 2. 44. But Pharaoh was not wrought upon by this; the magicians having produced serpents, he had this to say, that the case between them and Moses was disputable; and the very appearance of an opposition to truth, and the least head made against it, serve these for a justification of their infidelity, who are prejudiced against the light and love of it.

14. And the Lord said unto Moses, Pharaoh's heart is hardened, he refuseth to let the people go. 15. Get thee unto Pharaoh in the morning; lo, he goeth out unto the water; and thou shalt stand by the river's brink against him; and the rod which was turned to a serpent shalt thou take in thine hand. 16. And thou shalt say unto him, the Lord God of the Hebrews hath sent me unto thee, saying, Let my people go, that they may serve me in the wilderness: and, behold, thereof thou wouldest not hear. 17. Thus saith the Lord, In this thou shalt know that I am the Lord: behold, I will smite with the rod that is in my hand upon the waters which are in the river, and they shall be turned to blood. 18. And the fish that is in the river shall die, and the river shall stink; and the Egyptians shall loathe to drink of the water of the river. 19. And the Lord spake unto Moses, Say unto Aaron, Take thy rod, and stretch out thine hand upon the waters of Egypt, upon their streams, upon their rivers, and upon their ponds, and upon all their pools of water, that they may become blood; and that there may be blood throughout all the land of Egypt, both in vessels of wood, and in vessels of stone. 20. And Moses and Aaron did so, as the Lord commanded; and he lift up the rod, and smote the waters that were in the river, in the sight of Pharaoh, and in the sight of his servants; and all the waters that were in the river were turned to blood. 21. And the fish that was in the river died; and the river stank; and the Egyptians could not drink of the water of the river: and there was blood throughout all the land of Egypt. 22. And the magicians of Egypt did so with their enchantments: and Pharaoh's heart was hardened, neither did he hearken unto them; as the Lord had said. 23. And Pharaoh turned, and went into his house, neither did he set his heart to this also. 24. And all the Egyptians digged round about the river, the water of which they might drink: for they could not drink of the water of the river. 25. And seven days were fulfilled, after that the Lord had smitten the river.

Here is the first of the ten plagues, the turning of the water into blood, which was, 1. A dreadful plague, and very grievous; the very sight of such vast rolling streams of blood, pure blood, with no doubt florid and high-coloured, could not but strike a horror upon people: much more afflictive were the consequences of it. Nothing more common than water; so wisely has Providence ordered it, and so kindly, that that which is so needful and so serviceable to the comfort of human life, should be cheap, and almost everywhere where to be had: but now the Egyptians must either drink blood, or die for thirst. Fish was much of their food, (Numb. 11. 5.) but the changing of the waters was the death of the fish, it was a pestilence in that element; (v. 21.) The fish died. In the general deluge, they escaped, because perhaps they had not then contributed so much to the luxury of man as they have since: but, in this particular judgment, they perished; (Ps. 105. 29.) He slew their fish; and when another destruction of Egypt, long afterward, is threatened, the disappointment of those that make sluices and ponds for fish is particularly noticed, Isa. 19. 10. Egypt was a pleasant land, but the noisome stench of dead fish and blood, which by degrees would grow putrid, would render it very unpleasant. 2. It was a righteous plague, and justly inflicted on the Egyptians. For, (1.) Nilus, the river of Egypt, was their idol; they and their land derived so much benefit from it, that they served and worshipped it more than the Creator. The true Fountain of Nile being unknown to them, they paid all their devotions to its streams: here therefore God punished them, and turned that into blood, which they had turned into idol. Note, God will, when he pleaseth, make evil to do good. (2.) Pharaoh, who had hardened his heart against them, was smitten, and could not drink of the water of the river, of which he was so fond; and thus God justly removes from us, or imbitters to us. He makes that a scourge to us, which we make a competitor with him. (2.) They had stained the river with the blood of the Hebrews' children, and now God made that river all bloody; thus he gave them blood to drink, for they were worthy, Rev. 16. 6. Note, Never any thirsted after blood, but, sooner or later, they had enough of it. 3. It was a significant plague; Egypt had a great dependence upon their river, (Zech. 14. 18.) so that, in smiting the river, they were warned of the destruction of all the productions of their country, till it came, at last, to their first-born, and this red river proved a direful censure of the ruin of Pharaoh and all his forces in the Red-sea. This plague of Egypt is alluded to in the prediction of the ruin of the enemies of the New Testament church, Rev. 16. 3, 4. But there, the sea, as well as the rivers and fountains of water, is turned into blood; for spiritual judgments reach further, and strike deeper, than temporal judgments do. And lastly, let me observe in general concerning this plague, that one of the first miracles Moses wrought, was, turning water into blood, but that one of the first miracles our Lord Jesus wrought, was, turning water into wine; for the law was given by Moses, and it was a dispensation of death and terror; but grace and truth, which, like wine, makes glad the heart, came by Jesus Christ.

Now, 1. Moses is directed to give Pharaoh warning of this plague. Pharaoh's heart is hardened, (v. 14.) therefore he will not listen to it. v. 15. Moses perhaps may not be admitted into Pharaoh's presence-chamber, or the room of state, where he used to give audience to ambassadors; and therefore he is directed to meet him by the river's brink, whither God foresaw he would come in the morning, either for the pleasure of a morning's walk, or to pay his morning devotions to the river; for thus all people will walk, every one in the name of his god, they will not fail to worship their god every morning; there Moses must be ready to give him a new summons to surrender, and, in case of a refusal, to tell him of the judgment that was coming upon that very river, on the banks of which they were now standing. Notice is thus given him of it beforehand, that they might have no colour to say it was a chance, or to attribute it to any other cause, but that it might appear to be done by the power of the God of the Hebrews, and as a punishment upon him for his obstinacy. Moses is expressly ordered to take the rod with him, that Pharaoh might be alarmed at the sight of that rod which had so lately triumphed over the rods of the magicians. Now learn hence, 1. That the judgments of God are known to himself beforehand. He knows what will be done in wrath as well as mercy. Every consumption is a consumption determined, Isa. 10. 23. 2. That men cannot escape the alarms of God's wrath, because they cannot go out of the hearing of their own consciences: he that made their hearts, can make his sword to approach them. 3. That God warns, before he wounds; for he is long-suffering, not willing that any should perish, but that all should come to repentance.

II. Aaron (who carried the mace) is directed to summon the plague by smiting the river with his rod; v. 19, 20. It was done in the sight of Pharaoh and his attendants, for God's true miracles were not performed, as S. tan's lying wonders were, by them that peeped and muttered; truth seeks no corners. An amazing change was immediately wrought; all the waters, not only in the river, but in all the ponds, were turned into blood. 1. See here the almighty power of God. Every creature is that to us, which he makes it to be, water or blood. 2. See the mutability of all things under the sun, and what changes we may meet with in them. That which is water to-day, may be blood to-morrow; what is always vain may soon become vexatious. A river, at the best, is transient; but divine justice can quickly make it malignant. 3. See what mischief work sin makes. If the things that have been our comforts, prove our crosses, we must think ourselves: it is sin that turns our waters into blood.

III. Pharaoh endeavours to confront the miracle, because he resolves not to humble himself under the plague. He sends for the magicians, and, by God's permission, they ape the miracle with their enchantments, (v. 23.) and Pharaoh seconded them, and Pharaoh for an excuse to test his heart to this also; (v. 23.) a pitiful excuse it was. Could they have turned the river of blood into water again, it had been a miracle indeed, then they had proved their power, and Pharaoh had been obliged to them as his benefactors. But for them, when there was such scarcity of water, to turn more of it into blood, only to show their art, plainly intimates that the design of the devil is only to deicide his devotees and amuse them; not to do them any real kindness, but to keep them from doing real kindness to themselves by repenting, and returning to their God.

IV. The Egyptians, in the mean time, are seeking for relief against the plague, digging round about the river, for water to drink; v. 24. Probably, they found some, with much ado, God remembering mercy in the midst of wrath, for he is full of compassion. But such would not let the Egyptians smart too much for the obstinacy of their prince.

V. The plague continued seven days, v. 25. In all that time, Pharaoh's proud heart would not let him so much as desire Moses to intercede for the removal of it. Thus the hypocrites in heart heap up wrath, they cry not when he binds them; (Job 36. 13.) and then no wonder that his anger is not turned away, but his hand is stretched out still.

CHAP. VIII.

Three more of the plagues of Egypt are related in this chapter. 1. That of the frogs, which is, 1. Threatened, v. 1-4. 2. Inflated, v. 5, 6. 3. Mimicked by the magicians, v. 7. 4. Removed, at the humble request of Pharaoh, v. 8, 10) who yet hardens his hand, notwithstanding his promise while the plague was upon him, (v. 8.) refuses to let Israel go, v. 15. II. The plague of flies, v. 16, 17. By which, 1. The magicians were baffled, v. 19. Pharaoh was hardened, v. 19. III. That of flies. 1. Pharaoh is warned of it before, (v. 20, 21) and told that the land of Goshen should be exempt from this plague, v. 22, 23. 2. The plague is brought, v. 24-30. Pharaoh treats with Moses about the release of Israel, and humbles himself, v. 25-29. 4. The plague is thereupon, removed, (v. 31.) and Pharaoh's heart hardened, v. 32. 1. And the Lord spake unto Moses, v. 1. And Pharaoh, and say unto him, thus saith the Lord, let my people go, that they may serve me. 2. And if thou refuse to let them go, behold, I will smite all thy borders with frogs: 3. And the river shall be full of frogs, which shall go up and come into thine house, and into thine bed-chamber, and upon thy bed, and into the house of thy servants, and upon thy people, and into thine ovens, and into thy kneading-troughs: 4. And the frogs shall come up, both on thee, and upon thy people, and upon all thy servants. 5. And the Lord spake unto Moses, Say unto Aaron, Stretch forth thine hand with thy rod over the streams, over the rivers, and over the ponds, and cause frogs to come up upon the land of Egypt. 6. And Aaron stretched out his hand over the waters of Egypt; and the frogs came up, and covered the land of Egypt. 7. And the magicians did so with their enchantments, and brought up frogs upon the land of Egypt. 8. Then Pharaoh called for Moses and Aaron, and said, Entreat the Lord, that he may take away the frogs from me, and from my people; and I will let the people go, that they may do sacrifice unto the Lord. 9. And Moses said unto Pharaoh, Glory over me: when shall I entreat for thee, and for thy servants, and for thy people, to destroy the frogs from thee and thy houses, that they may remain in the river only? 10. And he said, Tomorrow. And he said, Be it according to thy word; that thou mayest know that there is none like unto the Lord our God. 11. And the frogs shall depart from thee, and from thy houses, and from thy servants, and from thy people; they shall remain in the river only. 12. And Moses and Aaron went out from Pharaoh: and Moses cried unto the Lord, because of the frogs which he had brought against Pharaoh. 13. And the Lord did according to the word of Moses; and the frogs died out of the houses, out of the villages, and out of the fields. 14. And they gathered them together upon heaps; and the land stank. 15. But when Pharaoh saw that there was respite, he hardened his heart, and hearkened not unto them; as the Lord had said. Pharaoh is here threatened first, and then plagued, with frogs, as afterward, in this chapter, with lice and flies, little despicable inconsiderable animals, and yet their vast numbers made sore plagues to the Egyptians. God could have plagued them with lions, or bears, or wolves, or with vultures, or other birds of prey, but he chose to do it by these contemptible instruments; 1. That he might magnify his own power; 2. He is Lord of the hosts of the whole creation, has them all at his beck, and makes what use he pleases of them. Some have thought the power of God is showed as much in the making of an ant, as in the making of an elephant; so is his providence in serving his own purposes by the least creatures as effectually as by the strongest, that the excellency of the power, in judgment as well as mercy, may be of God, and not of the creature. See what reason we have to stand in awe of this God, who, when he pleases, can arm the smallest parts of the creation against us. If God be our enemy, all the creatures are at war with us; they will then humble Pharaoh's pride, and chastise his insolence. What a mortification must it needs be to this haughty monarch, to see himself brought to his knees, and forced to submit, by such despicable means! Every child is, ordinarily, able to deal with those invaders, and can triumph over them; yet now so numerous are their troops, and so vigorous their assaults, that Pharaoh, with all his chariots and horsemen, could make no head against them. Thus he heaved contempt upon princes that offer contempt to him and his sovereignty, and makes those who will not own him above them, to know that when he pleases, he can make the meanest creature to insult them and trample upon them.

As to the plague of frogs, we may observe,

I. How it was threatened. Moses, no doubt, attended to the mighty instructions, and (perhaps while the river was yet blood) he is here directed to give notice to Pharaoh of another judgment coming upon him, in case he continue obstinate: If thou refuse to let them go, it is at thy peril, v. 1, 2. Note, God does not punish men for sin, unless they persist in it. If he turn not, he will whet his sword; (Ps. 7.12,) which implies favour, if he turn. So here, If thou refuse, I will smite thy borders. 3. 4. Note, 1. God's curse upon a man will pursue him wherever he goes, and lie heavy upon him whatever he does. See Deut. 28. 16, &c. 2. There is no avoiding divine judgments, when they invade with commission.

II. How it was inflicted. Pharaoh not regarding the alarm, nor being at all inclined to yield to the summons, Aaron is ordered to draw out the forces, and with his out-stretched arm and rod to give the plague its rise. The next verse, Pharaoh shall say, was then done; the host is mustered, and, under the conduct and command of an invisible power, shools of frogs invade the land, and the Egyptians with all their art, and all their might, cannot check their progress, or so much as give them a diversion. Compare this with that prophecy of an army of locusts and caterpillars, Joel 2. 2, &c. and see Isa. 11. 16, 17. Frogs are put up, at the divine call, and covered the land. Note, God has many ways of disquieting those that live at ease.

III. How the magicians were permitted to imitate it, v. 7. They also brought up frogs, but could not remove those that God sent. The unclean spirit which came out of the mouth of the dragon, are said to be like frogs, which go forth to the kings of the earth, to deceive them, (Rev. 16. 13.) and yet, however they might be pleased with the frogs, it follows the account of the turning of the waters into blood. The dragon, like the magicians, intended by them to deceive, but God intended by them to destroy those that would be deceived.

IV. How Pharaoh relented under this plague; it was the first time he did so, v. 8. He begs of Moses to intercede for the removal of the frogs and promises fair that he will let the people go. He that a while ago had spoken with the utmost disdain both of God and Moses, now is glad to be beholden to the mercy of God and the prayers of Moses. Note, Those that bid defiance to God and prayer, in a day of extremity, first or last, will be made to see their need of both, and will cry, Lord, Lord, Matt. 7. 22. Those that had bantered prayer, have been brought to yield: had they known the value of it, they would have courted it, and it would then have been in its true price. And this kind of repentance, he came to for a drop of water.

V. How Moses fixes the time with Pharaoh, and then prevails with God by prayer for the removal of the frogs. Moses, to show that his performances had no dependence upon the conjunctons or oppositions of the planets, or the luckiness of any one hour more than another, bids Pharaoh name his time. Notice, 1. God is independent of the events of time: everything that he did was sovereign. 2. A fixed time was to be observed by the king, the fixed time by the king. 3. There is this honour over me, te 1 me, against when I shall entreat for thee. This was designed for Pharaoh's conviction, that if his eyes were not opened by the plague, they might by the removal of it. So various are the methods God takes to bring men to repentance.

Pharaoh sets the time for to-morrow, v. 10. And why not immediately? Was he so fond of his goodness that he would have them stay another night with him? No, but probably he hoped that these would go away themselves, and then he should get clear of the plague without being obliged either to God or Moses. However, Moses joins issue with him upon it, Be it according to thy word, it shall be done just when thou wouldest have it done, that thou mayest know that, whatessoever the magicians pretend to, there is none like unto the Lord our God. None has such a command as he has over all the creatures, nor is any one so ready to forgive these that humble themselves before him. Note, The great design, both of judgments and mercies, is to convince us, that there is none like unto the Lord our God, none so wise, so mighty, so good, no enemy so formidable, no friend so desirable, so valuable.

Moses, hereupon, applies himself to God, prays earnestly to him, to remove the frogs, v. 12. Note, We must pray for our enemies and persecutors, even the worst, as Christ did. In consequence of the application of Moses, the frogs that came up one day, perished the next, or the next one. They all died; (v. 13.) and that it might appear that they were real frogs, their dead bodies were left to be raked together in heaps, so that the smell of them became an aversion to the Egyptians.

The great Sovereign of the world makes what use he pleases of the lives and deaths of his creatures; and he that gives a being, to serve one purpose, may without wrong to his justice, call for it again immediately, to serve another purpose.

VI. What was the issue of this plague, v. 15. When Pharaoh saw there was a respite, without considering either what he had lately felt, or what he had required, he hardened his heart. Note, 1. Till the heart is renewed by the grace of God, the impressions, made by the force of affliction, do not abide; the convictions wear off, and the promises that were extorted, are forgotten. To the disposition of the air is changed, what thaws in the sun, will freeze again in the shade. 2. God's patience is shamefully abused by impotent sinners. If the respect he gives them, to lead them to repentance, they are hardened by; and while he graciously allows them a truce, in order to the making of their peace, they take that opportunity to rally again the baffled forces of an obstinate infidelity. See Excl. 8. 11. Ps. 78. 34, &c.

16. And the Lord said unto Moses, Say unto Aaron, Stretch out thy rod, and smite the dust of the land, that it may become lice throughout all the land of Egypt. 17. And they did so; for Aaron stretched out his hand with his rod, and smote the dust of the earth, and it became lice in man and in beast; all the dust of the land became lice throughout all the land of Egypt. 18. And the magicians did so with their enchantments to bring forth lice, but they could not: so there were lice upon man and upon beast. 19. Then the magicians said unto Pharaoh, This is the finger of God: and Pharaoh's heart was hardened, and he hearkened not unto them, as the Lord had said.

Here is a short account of the plague of lice. It does not appear that any warning was given of it before. Pharaoh's abuse of the respite granted to him, might have been a sufficient warning to him to hearken unto the voice of the Lord, and to correct his afflicting state of lice, or whatever else was an affliction harden us, and so deprive us of the benefit of it, we may conclude it goes away with a purpose to return, or to make room for a worse.

Observe, 1. How this plague of lice was inflicted on the Egyptians, v. 16, 17. The frogs were produced out of the waters, but these lice out of the dust of the earth; for out of any part of the creation God can fetch a scourge by which to correct man's rebellion against him. He has many arrows in his quiver. Even the dust of the earth ob compromised him. "Fear not thou, worm Jacob, for God can use thee as a threshing instrument, if he pleases." Isa. 41. 14, 15. These lice, no doubt, were extremely vexatious, as well as scandalous, to the Egyptians. Though they had respite, they had respite but a while, Rev. 11. 14. The second woe was past, but

II. How the magicians were baffled by it, v. 18. They attempted to imitate it, but they could not: when they failed in that, it should seem they attempted to remove it; for it follows, So there were lice upon man and beast; in spite of them. This forced them to confess themselves overpowered; This is the finger of God, v. 19. that is, This check and restraint put upon them, must needs be from a divine power. Notice, (1.) God has the devil in a chain, and limits him, both as a deceiver and as a destroyer; hitherto he shall come, but no further. The devil's agents, when God permitted them, could do great things; but when he laid an embargo upon them, though but with his finger, they could do nothing. The magicians' inability, in this lesser instance, showed whence they had their inability in the former instances, which seemed greater; and that they had no power against Moses but what was given them from above. (2.) Sooner or later, God will extort, even from his enemies, an acknowledgment of his own sovereignty and over-ruling power. It is certain they must all (as we say) knock under at last, as Julian the apostate did, when his dying lips confessed, Thou hast overcome me, O the Galler. Note, Not only will not only see too hard for all opposers, but will force them to own it.

III. How Pharaoh, notwithstanding this, was made more and more obstinate; (v. 19.) even those that had deceived him, now said enough to undeceive him, and yet he grew more and more obstinate. Even the miracles and the judgments were to him a savour of death unto death. Note, Those that are not made better by God's word and providences, are commonly made worse by them.

20. And the Lord said unto Moses, Rise up early in the morning, and stand before Pharaoh; lo, he cometh forth to the water; and say unto him, Thus saith the Lord, Let my people go, that they may serve me: 21. Else, if thou wilt not let my people go, behold, I will send swarms of flies upon thee, and upon thy servants, and upon thy people, and into thy houses; and the houses of the Egyptians shall be full of swarms of flies, and also the ground whereupon they are. 22. And I will sever in that day the land of Goshen, in which my people dwell, that no swarms of flies shall be there; to the end thou mayest know that I am the Lord in the midst of the earth. 23. And I will put a division between my people and thy people: to-morrow shall this sign be. 24. And the Lord did so: and there came a grievous swarm of flies into the house of Pharaoh, and into his servants' houses, and into all the land of Egypt; the land was corrupted by reason of the swarms of flies. 25. And Pharaoh called for Moses and for Aaron, and said, Go ye, sacrifice to your God in the land. 26. And Moses said, It is not meet so to do; for we shall sacrifice the abomination of the Egyptians to the Lord our God: lo, shall we sacrifice the abomination of the Egyptians before their eyes, and will they not stone us? 27. We will go three days' journey into the wilderness, and sacrifice to the Lord our God, as he shall command us. 28. And Pharaoh said, I will let you go, that ye may sacrifice to the Lord your God in the wilderness; only ye shall not go very far away: entreat for me. 29. And Moses said, Behold, I go out from thee, and I will entreat the Lord that the swarms of flies may depart from Pharaoh, from his servants, and from his people, to-morrow: but let not Pharaoh deal deceitfully any more in not letting the people go to sacrifice to the Lord. 30. And Moses went out from Pharaoh, and entreated the Lord. 31. And the Lord did according to the word of Moses; and he removed the swarms of flies from Pharaoh, from his servants, and from his people: there remained not one. 32. And Pharaoh hardened his heart at this time also, neither would he let the people go.

Here is the story of the plague of flies, in which we are told,

I. How it was threatened; like that of frogs, before it was inflicted. Moses is directed (v. 20.) to rise early in the morning, to meet Pharaoh when he came forth to the water, and there to repeat his demands. Note, 1. Those that would bring great things to pass for God and their generation must rise early, and redeem time in the morning. Pharaoh was early up at his superstitious devotions to the river; and shall we be for more sleep and more slumber, when any service is to be done, which would pass well in our account in the great day? 2. Those that would approve themselves God's faithful servants must not be afraid of the face of man. Many have stood before Pharaoh, proud as he was, and told him that which was in the highest degree humiliating, must challenge him (if he refused to release his captives) to engage with an army of flies, which would obey God's orders if Pharaoh would not. See a like threatening, Is. 7. 18, "The Lord will fill (or wh. sit.) for the fly and the bee, to come and serve his purposes." 2. Swarms of flies, which seem to us to fly at random, shall be manifestly under the conduct of an intelligent mind, while they are above the direction of any man. "Hisither they shill go," says Moses, "and thither they shall not come;" not the performance is punctually according to this appointment, and both, compared, amount to a demonstration that he saw it, and he that did that was the same, even a Being of infinite power and wisdom. 2. The servants and worshippers of the great Jehovah shall be preserved from sharing in the common calamities of the place they live in; so that the plague which annoys all their neighbours, shall not approach them, and this shall be an incontestable proof, that God is the Lord in the midst of the earth. Put both the Lord in the midst of the earth, the burden of the Lord run on and fro through the earth, and through the air too, to direct them which to us seems most casual, to serve some great and designed end, that he may show himself strong on the behalf of those whose hearts are upright with him. 2 Chron. 16. 9.

Observe how it is repeated, (v. 23.) I will put a divination between thy people and thy profile. Note, The Lord's ways are not as our ways, and we may then say, it appear, perhaps in this world, certainly in the other, that he has set them apart for himself. A day will come, when ye shall return and discern between the righteous and the wicked, (Mal. 3. 18.) the sheph and the goats, (Matt. 25. 32. Ezek. 34. 17.) though now internecine.

III. How it was inflicted, the day after it was threatened; there came a grievous swarm of flies, (v. 24.) flies of divers sorts, and such as decoyed them, Ps. 78. 45. The prince of the power of the air has gloried in being Beel-zebub, the god of flies; but here it is proved that even in that, he is a pretender, and an usurper, for even with swarms of flies God fights against his kingdom, and prevails.

IV. How Pharaoh upon this attack, sounded a parley, and entered into a treaty with Moses and Aaron concerning Egypt's Israel, even in his own land: but observe with what reluctance he yields. 1. He is content they should sacrifice to their God, provided they would do it in the land of Egypt, v. 25. Note, God can extort a toleration of his worship, even from those that are really enemies to it. Pharaoh, under the smart of the rod, is content they should do sacrifice, and will allow liberty of conscience, even in his own land. But Moses will not accept his concession, he cannot do it, v. 26. It would be an abomination to God, should they offer the Egyptians sacrifices, and it would be an abomination to the Egyptians, should they offer to God their own sacrifices, as they ought; so that they could not sacrifice in the land, without incurring the displeasure, either of their God or of their task-masters; therefore he insists upon it, (v. 27.) He will go three days' journey into the desert. Note, Those that would offer acceptable sacrifice to God, must, (1.) Separate themselves from the wicked and profane, for we cannot have fellowship both with the Father of lights, and with the works of darkness, both with Christ and with Belial, 2 Cor. 6. 14, &c. Ps. 26. 4. 6. (2.) They must retire from the distractions of the world, and get as far as they can from the mistakes of it. Israel cannot keep the feast of the Lord, either among the Egyptians or among the flesh-pots of Egypt; no, We will go into the wilderness, Hrs. 2. 14. Cant. 7. 11. (3.) They must observe the divine appointment: "We will sacrifice as God shall command us, and not otherwise." Though they were in the utmost degree of slavery to Pharaoh, yet, in the worship of God, they must observe his commands, and not Pharaoh's.

2. When this proposal is rejected, he consents for them to go into the wilderness, provided they do not go very far away, not so far but that he might fetch them back again, v. 28. It is probable that he had heard of the r design upon Canaan, and suspected that if once they left Egypt, they would never come back again; and therefore he was forced to consent that they should go, (the swarms of flies buzzing the necessity in his ears,) yet he is not willing that they should go out of his reach. Thus some sinners, who, in a pang of conviction, part with their sins, yet are loath they should go very far away, for when the fright is over, they will return to them again. We observe here a struggle between Pharaoh's convictions and his corruptions; his convictions said, "Let them go!" his corruptions said, "Yet not very far away," but he sided with his corruptions against his convictions, and it was his ruin.

This proposal Moses so far accepted, as that he promised the removal of this plague upon it, v. 29. See here,

(1.) How ready God is to accept sinners' submissions. Pharaoh does but say, "Entreat for me, (though it is with regret that he humbles so far,) and Moses promises immediately, I will entreat the Lord of hosts, and I will speak to Pharaoh," (v. 30.) and the plague was removed, that is, it was made no more; the plague was not, to bring him to ruin, but to bring him to repentance. With what pleasure did God say, (1 Kings 21. 29.) "See thou how Abah humbles himself?"

(2.) What need we have to be admonished that we be sincere in our submission; But let not Pharaoh deal deceitfully any more. Those that deal deceitfully are justly suspected, and must be cautioned not, to return again to folly, after God has once more spoken peace. Be not deceived, God is not mocked; if we think to put a cheat upon God by a counterfeit repentance, and a fraudulent surrender of ourselves to him, we shall prove, in the end, to have put a fatal cheat upon our own souls. Lastly, The issue of all, was, that God graciously removed the plague, (v. 30. 31.) but Pharaoh persisted in returning to his hardness, and would not let the people go, v. 32. His pride would not let him part with such a flower of his crown as his dominion over Israel was, nor his covetousness, with such a branch of his revenue as their labours were. Note, Reigning lusts break through the strongest bonds, and make men impudently presumptuous and scandalously perfidious. Let not sin therefore reign, for if it do, it will betray and hurry us to the grossest abominations.

CHAP. IX.

In this chapter we have an account of three more of the plagues of Egypt. 1. Murmrrn among the cattle, which was fatal to them, v. 1. 7. II. Boils upon man and beast, v. 8. 12. III. Hail with thunder and lightning. I. Warning is given of this plague, v. 13. 21. 2. It is inflicted on their greatest terror, v. 22. 26. 3. Pharaoh in a fright reneges upon his treaty with Moses, but instantly breaks his word, v. 27. 35.

I. THEN the Lord said unto Moses, Go in unto Pharaoh, and tell him, Thus saith the Lord God of the Hebrews, Let my people go, that they may serve me. 2. For if thou refuse to let them go, and wilt hold them still, 3. Behold, the hand of the Lord is upon thy cattle which is in the field, upon the horses, upon the asses, upon the camels, upon the oxen, and upon the sheep: there shall be a very grievous murrain. 4. And the Lord shall sever between the cattle of Israel and the cattle of Egypt: and there shall nothing die of all that is the children's of Israel. 5. And the Lord appointed a set time, saying, To-morrow doth the Lord do this thing in the land. 6. And the Lord did that thing on the morrow, and all the cattle of Egypt died: but of the cattle of the children of Israel died not one. 7. And Pharaoh sent, and, behold, there was not one of the cattle of the Israelites dead. And the heart of Pharaoh was hardened, and he did not let the people go.

Here is,
1. Warning given of another plague, namely, The murrain of beasts. When Pharaoh's heart was hardened, after he had seemed to relent under the former plague, then Moses is sent to tell him there is another coming, to try what that would do toward reviving the impressions of the former plagues. Thus is the wrath of God revealed from heaven, both in his works, and in his works, against all ungodliness and unrighteousness of men. 1. Moses puts Pharaoh in a very fair way to prevent it; Let my people go, v. 1. This was still the demand, God will have Israel released; Pharaoh opposes it, and the trial is, whose word shall stand. See how jealous God is for his people; when the year of his redeemed is come, he will give Egypt for their ransom; that kingdom shall be ruined, rather than Israel shall not be delivered. See how reasonable God's demands are; whatever he calls for, it is but his own. They are my people, therefore let them go. 2. He describes the plague that should come, if he refused, v. 2. 3. The hand of the Lord immediately, without the stretching out of Aaron's hand, is upon the cattle, many of which, some of all kinds, should die by a sort of pestilence. This was greatly to the loss of the Egyptians: they had made Israel poor, and now God would make them poor. Note, The hand of God is to be acknowledged even in the sickness and death of cattle or other damage sustained in them, for a sparrow falls not to the ground without our Father. 5. As an evidence of the special hand of God in it, and of his particular favour to his own people, he foretells that none of their cattle should die, though they breathed in the same air, and drank of the same water, with the Egyptians' cattle; (v. 4.) The Lord shall save. Note, When God's judgments are abroad, though they may fall both on the righteous and the wicked, yet God makes such a distinction, that they are not the same to the one that they are to the other. See Isa. 27.

7. The providence of God is to be acknowledged with thankfulness in the life of the cattle, for he preserveth man and beast, Ps. 36. 6. 4. To make the warning the more remarkable, the time is fixed; (v. 5.) To-morrow it shall be done; we know not what any day will bring forth, and therefore cannot say, what we will do to-morrow, but God can.

II. The plague itself inflicted. The cattle died, v. 6. Note, The creature is made subject to vanity by the sin of man, being liable, according to its capacity, both to serve his wickedness, and to share in his punishment, as in the universal deluge, Rom. 8. 20, 22. Pharaoh and the Egyptians sinned; but the sheep, what had they done? Yet they are plagued. See Jer. 12. 4. For the wickedness of the land, the beasts are consumed. The Egyptians, afterward, and, some think, now, worshiped their cattle; it was among them that the Israelites learned to make a god of a calf, in this animal therefore the plague, here spoken of, meets with them. Note, What we make an idol of, it is just with God to remove from us, or imbitter to us. See Isa. 19. 1.

III. The distinction put between the cattle of the Egyptians and the Israelites' cattle, according to the favor God shows them in the plague of the cattle of the Israelites, died, v. 6. 7. Does God take care for oxen? Yes, he does; his providence extends itself to the meanest of his creatures. But it is written also for our sakes, that, trusting in God, and making him our refuge, we may not be afraid of the persecution that walketh in darkness, no though thousands fall at our side, Ps. 91. 6. 7. Pharaoh sent to see if the cattle of the Israelites were infected, not to satisfy his conscience, but only to gratify his curiosity, or with design, by way of reprisal, to repair his own losses out of their stocks. And having no good design in the inquiry, the report brought him made an impression upon him, but, on the contrary, his heart was hardened. Note, To those that are wilfully blind, even those methods of conviction which are ordained to life, prove a savour of death unto death.

8. And the Lord said unto Moses and unto Aaron, Take you handfuls of ashes of the furnace, and let Moses sprinkle it toward the heaven in the sight of Pharaoh. 9. And it shall become small dust in all the land of Egypt, and shall be a boil breaking forth with boils upon man and upon beast, throughout all the land of Egypt. 10. And they took ashes of the furnace, and stood before Pharaoh; and Moses sprinkled it up toward heaven: and it became a boil breaking forth with boils upon man and upon beast. 11. And the magicians could not stand before Moses, because of the boils; for the boil was upon the magicians, and upon all the Egyptians. 12. And the Lord hardened the heart of Pharaoh, and he heartened not unto them; as the Lord had spoken unto Moses.

Observe here, concerning the plague of boils and blains,
1. That when they were not wrought upon by the depth of their cattle, God sent a plague that seized their own bodies, and touched them to the quick. If lesser judgments do not do their work, God will send greater. Let us therefore humble ourselves under the mighty hand of God, and go forth to meet him in the way of his judgments, that his anger may be turned away from us.
2. The signal given by which this plague was summoned, was the sprinkling of warm ashes, from the furnace, toward heaven, (v. 8, 10,) which was to signify the heating of the air with such an infection, as should produce in the bodies of the Egyptians sore boils, which would be both noisome and painful. Immediately upon the scattering of the ashes, a scalding dew came down out of the air, which blistered wherever it fell. Note, Such an appearance of God shows men their sin in their punishment; they had oppressed Israel in the furnaces, and now the ashes of the furnace are made, as much a terror to them, as ever their task-masters had been to the Israelites.

3. The plague itself was very grievous; a common eruption would be so, especially to the nice and delicate, but these eruptions were inflammations, permitting Satan to blind and harden him, and ordering every thing, from henceforward, so as to make him more and more obstinate. Note, Wilful hardness is commonly punished with judicial hardness. If men shut their eyes against the light, it is just with God to close their eyes. Let us dread this as the sorest judgment a man can be under, on this side hell.

13. And the Lord said unto Moses, Rise up early in the morning, and stand before Pharaoh, and say unto him, Thus saith the Lord God of the Hebrews, Let my people go, that they may serve me. 14. For I will at this time send all my plagues upon thine heart, and upon thy servants, and upon thy people; that thou mayest know that there is none like me in all the earth. 15. For now I will stretch out my hand, that I may smite thee and thy people with pestilence; and thou shalt be cut off from the earth. 16. And in very deed for this cause have I raised thee up, for to show in thee my power; and that my name may be declared throughout all the earth.

17. As yet exaltest thou thyself against my people, that thou wilt not let them go? 18. Behold, to-morrow about this time, I will cause it to rain a very grievous hail, such as hath not been in Egypt since the foundation thereof even until now. 19. Send therefore now, and gather thy cattle, and all that thou hast in the field; for upon every man and beast which shall be found in the field, and shall not be brought home, the hail shall come down upon them, and they shall die. 20. He that feared the word of the Lord among the servants of Pharaoh made his servants and his cattle flee into the houses:

And he that regarded not the word of the Lord left his servants and his cattle in the field.

Here is, I. A general declaration of the wrath of God against Pharaoh for his obstinacy. Though God has hardened his heart, (v. 12,) yet Moses must repeat his applications to him; God suspends his grace, and yet demands obedience, to punish him for requiring bricks of the children of Israel, when he denied them straw. God would likewise show forth a pattern of long-suffering, and how he waits to be gracious to a rebellious and grasping people. Six times the demand had been made in vain, yet Moses must make it the seventh time, Let my people go, v. 13.

A most dreadful message Moses is here ordered to deliver to him, whether he will hear, or whether he will forbear. 1. He must tell him that he is marked for ruin; that he now stands as the butt at which God would shoot all the arrows of his wrath; (v. 14, 15.) Now I will send all my plagues. 2. That no place is found for repentance in Pharaoh, nothing can prevent his utter destruction, for that only would have prevented it. Now that God begins to harden his heart, his case is desperate. I will send my plagues upon thy heart, not only temporal plagues upon thy body, but spiritual plagues upon thy soul. Note, God can send plagues upon the heart, either by making it senseless, or by making it hopeless—and those are the worst plagues. Pharaoh must now expect no respite, no cessation of arms, but to be followed with plague upon plague, till he is utterly consumed. Note, When God judges, he will overcome; none ever hardened his heart against him, and prospered. 2. He must tell him, that he is to remain in history, a standing monument of the justice and power of God’s wrath; (v. 16.) This is the case, I raised thee up, to the throne at this time, and made thee to stand the shock of the plagues hitherto, to show in thee my power. Providence ordered it so, that Moses should have a man of such a fierce and stubborn spirit as he was, to deal with; and every thing was so managed in this transaction, as to make it a most signal and memorable instance of the power God has, to humble and bring down the pride of his enemies. Every thing concurred to signalize this, that God’s name, that is, his incontestable sovereignty, his irresistible power, and his inflexible justice, might be declared throughout all the earth, not only to all places, but through all ages while the earth remains. Note, God sometimes raises up very bad men to honour and power.
spares them long, and suffers them to grow insufferably insolent, he may be so much the more glorified in their destruction at last. See how the neighbouring nations, at that time, improved the ruin of Pharaoh to the glory of God; (ch. 18.
11.) Jethro said upon it, Now know I that the Lord is greater than all gods. The apostle illustrates the doctrine of God's sovereignty with this instance, Rom. 9. 17. To justify God in these resolutions, Moses had just asked him, (v. 17.) As yet exalted thou thyself against Pharaoh? why have I not sent him? God's people were poor shepherds at the best, and now poor slaves, and yet Pharaoh shall be ruined, if he exalt himself against them, for it is considered as exalting himself against God.
This was not the first time he reprieved kings for their sakes, and let them know that he would not suffer his people to be tramelled upon and insulted, no, not by the most powerful of them.

II. Here is a particular prediction of the plaque, of hail, (v. 18.) and a gracious advice to Pharaoh and his people to send for their servants and cattle out of the field, that they might be sheltered from the hail, v. 19. Note, When God's justice threatens ruin, his mercy, at the same time, shows us a way of escape from it, so unwilling is he that any should perish. See here what care God took, not to destroy the servants between Egypt and Israel-itcs, but between some Egyptians and others. If Pharaoh will not yield, and so prevent the judgment itself, yet an opportunity is given to those that had any dread of God and his word, to save themselves from sharing in the judgment. Note, Those that will take warning, may take shelter; and those that will not, may thank themselves if they fall by the overthrow of the storm, and the hail which will smite away the refuge of lies, Isa. 28. 17. See the different effect of this warning. 1. Some believed the things which were spoken, and they feared, and housed their servants and cattle, v. 20. like Noah; (Heb. 11. 7.) and it was their wisdom. Even among the servants of Pharaoh there were some that troubled at God's word; and shall the sons of Israel dread it? But, 2. Others believed not; though hail and blowing thunderings are the punishments of Pharaoh foretold, the event exactly answered to the prediction: and though, if they had had any reason to question this, it would have been no great damage to them to have kept their cattle in the house for one day, and so, supposing it a doubtful case, to have chosen the surer side; yet they were so fool-hardy as in defiance to the truth of Moses, and the power of God, (of both which they had already had experience enough to their cost,) to leave their cattle in the field. Pharaoh himself, it is probable, giving them an example of the presumption, v. 21.
Note, Obstinate infidelity is deaf to the fairest warnings and the wisest counsels, which leaves the blood of them that perish upon their own heads.

22. And the Lord said unto Moses, Stretch forth thine hand toward heaven, that there may be hail in all the land of Egypt, upon man, and upon beast, and upon every herb of the field, throughout the land of Egypt. 23. And Moses stretched forth his rod toward heaven; and the Lord sent thunder and hail; and the fire ran along upon the ground: and the Lord rained hail upon the land of Egypt. 24. So there was hail, and fire mingled with the hail, very grievous, such as there was none like it in all the land of Egypt since it became a nation. 25. And the hail smote throughout all the land of Egypt all that was in the field, both man and beast; and the hail smote every herb of the field, and brake every tree of the field. 26. Only in the land of Goshen, where the children of Israel were, was there no hail. 27. And Pharaoh sent, and called for Moses and Aaron, and said unto them, I have sinned this time: the Lord is righteous, and I and my people are wicked. 28. Entreat the Lord (for it is enough) that there be no more mighty thunderings and hail; and I will let you go, and ye shall stay no longer.
29. And Moses said unto him, As soon as I am gone out of the city I will spread abroad my hands unto the Lord; and the thunder shall cease, neither shall there be any more hail; that thou mayest know how that the earth is the Lord's. 30. But as for thee and thy servants, I know that ye will not yet fear the Lord God. 31. And the flax and the barley was smitten; for the barley was in the ear, and the flax was bold.* 32. But the wheat and the rye were not smitten; for they were not grown up.
33. And Moses went out of the city from Pharaoh, and spread abroad his hands unto the Lord; and the thunders and hail cease-ed, and the rain was not poured upon the earth. 34. And when Pharaoh saw that the rain and the hail and the thunders were ceased, he sinned yet more, and hardened his heart, he and his servants. 35. And the heart of Pharaoh was hardened, neither would he let the children of Israel go; as the Lord had spoken by Moses.

The threatened plague of hail is here summed by the powerful hand and rod of Moses, (v. 22, 23.) and it obeys the summons, or rather the divine command; for fire and hail fulfill God's word, Ps. 148. 8. And here we are told,
1. What desolations it made upon the earth; the thunder and fire from heaven (or lightning,) made it both the more dreadful, and the more destroying,
v. 23, 24. Note, God makes the clouds not only his storhouses where he drops fatness on his people, but his magazens whereas, when he ple ses, he can draw out a most formidable train of artillery, with which to destroy his enemies. He him-selves spread out the treasure of hail which he hath reserved against the day of battle and war. Job 38.
22, 23. Woe! woe! this hail made in the land of Egypt. It killed both men and cattle, and battered down, not only the herbs, but the trees, v. 25. The corn that was above ground, was destroyed, and that only preserved, which as yet was not come up,
v. 31, 32. Note, God has many ways of taking away the corn in the season thereof, (Hos. 2, 29,) either by a sudden blasting, or a noisy hail. In this plague, the hot thunderbolts, as well as the hail, are said to destroy their flocks, Ps. 78. 47, 48, and see Ps. 105.
32, 33. Perhaps David alludes to this, when elluding to God's glorious appearances for the dis-

* Risen in stalk. —Bo.
II. What a consternation it put Pharaoh in; see what effect it had upon him; 1. He humbled himself, (v. 32.) to humble himself (v. 26.) of the land of God's enemies being preserved from receiving any damage by this plague. God has the directing of the pregnant clouds, and causes it to rain or hail on one city and not on another, either in mercy or in judgment.

1. A ND the Lord said unto Moses, Go in unto Pharaoh: for I have hardened his heart, and the heart of his servants, that I might show these my signs before him: 2. And that thou mayest tell in the ears of thy son, and of thy son's son, what things I have wrought in Egypt, and in my signs which I have done among them; that ye may know how that I am the Lord. 3. And Moses and Aaron came in unto Pharaoh, and said unto him, Thus saith the Lord God of the Hebrews, How long wilt thou refuse to humble thyself before me? Let my people go, that they may serve me. 4. Else, if thou refuse to let my people go, behold, to-morrow will I bring the locusts into thy coast: 5. And they shall cover the face of the earth, that one cannot be able to see the earth: and they shall eat the residue of that which is escaped, which remaineth unto you from the hail, and shall eat every tree which groweth for you out of the field: 6. And they shall fill thy houses, and the houses of all thy servants, and the houses of all the Egyptians; which neither thy fathers, nor thy fathers' fathers have seen, since the day that they were upon the earth unto this day. And he turned himself, and went out from Pharaoh. 7. And Pharaoh's servants said unto him, How long shall this man be a snare unto us? Let the men go, that they may serve the Lord their God: Knowest thou not yet that Egypt is destroyed? 8. And Moses and Aaron were brought again unto Pharaoh: and he said unto them, Go, serve the Lord your God: but who are they that shall go? 9. And Moses said, We will go with our young and with our old, with our sons and with our daughters, with our flocks and with our herds will we go: for we must hold a feast unto the Lord. 10. And he said unto them, Let the Lord be so with you, as I will let you go, and your little ones: look to it; for evil is before you. 11. Not so: go now ye that are men, and serve the Lord; for that thou didst desire.
And they were driven out from Pharaoh's servitude.

I. Moses is instructed; we may well suppose that he, for his part, was much astonished both at Pharaoh's obstinacy and at God's severity, and could not but be compassionately concerned for the destruction of Egypt, and at a loss to conceive what this contest would come to at last. Now here God tells him what he designed; not only Behold, sayeth he, but meaning of his own name, That thou mayest tell in thy writings, which shall continue to the world's end, what I have wrought in Egypt, v. 1.

The ten plagues of Egypt must be inflicted, that they may be recorded for the generations to come, as undeniable proofs, 1. Of God's overruling power in the kingdom of nature, his dominion over all the creatures, and his authority to use them either as servants to his justice, or sufferers by it, according to the council of his will. 2. Of God's victorious power over the kingdom of Satan, to restrain the malice, and chastise the insolence, of his and his church's enemies. These plagues are standing monuments of the greatness of God, the happiness of the church, and the sinfulness of sin; and standing monitors to the children of men in all ages, not to provoke the Lord to jealousy, nor to strive with his Maker. The benefit of these instructions to the world sufficiently balances the evil of the destructions which were to be inflicted.

II. Pharaoh is reprieved, (v. 5.) Thus saith the Lord God of the poor despised persecutor Hebrews, How long wilt thou refuse to humble thyself before me? Note, It is justly expected from the greatest of men, that they humble themselves before the great God, as it is at their peril if they refuse to do it. This has more than once been God's will, and provided with princes;Behold, saith he, let him humble his heart, Dan. 5. 22. Zedekiah humbled not himself before Jeremiah, 2 Chron. 36. 12. These that will not humble themselves, God will humble. Pharaoh had sometimes pretended to humble himself, but no account was made of it, because he was neither sincere nor constant in it.

III. The plague of lice is threatened, v. 4. 6. The hail had broken down the fruits of the earth, but these locusts should come and devour them: and this is no less, says he, than they should fill their houses, whereas the former inroads of these insects had been confined to their lands. This should be much worse than all the calamities of that kind which had ever been known. Moses, when he had delivered his message, not expecting any better answer than he had formerly, turned himself and went out from Pharaoh, v. 6. Thus Christ appointed his disciples to depart from them who would not receive them, and to shake off the dust of their feet for a testimony against them; and ruin is not far off from those who are thus justly abandoned by the Lord's messengers, 1 Sam. 27. 86.

IV. Pharaoh's attendants, his ministers of state, or privy counsellors, intercessed, to persuade him to come to some terms with Moses, v. 7. They were in the utmost anxiety to prevent him from the deplorable condition of the kingdom, (Egypt is destroyed,) and advise him by all means to release his prisoners; (Let the men go,) for Moses, they found, would be a snare to them till it was done, and it were better to consent at first than to be compelled at last; the Israelites were become a burthensome stone to the Egyptians, and now, at length, the princes of Egypt were willing to be rid of them, Zech. 12. 3. Note, It is a thing to be regretted, (and prevented, if possible,) that a whole nation should be ruined for the pride and obstinacy of its princes, Salus populi in præmio lex—to consult the welfare of the people is the first of laws.

A new treaty is hereupon, set on foot between Pharaoh and Moses, in which Pharaoh agrees for the Israelites to go into the wilderness to do sacrifice; but the matter in dispute was, who should go, v. 8. 1. Moses insists upon it, that they should take their whole families, and all their effects, along with them, v. 9. Note, Those that serve God, must serve him with all they have. Moses pleads, We must hold a feast, therefore we must have our families to feast with, and our flocks and herds to feast upon, to the honour of God.” 2. Pharaoh will by no means grant this; he will allow the men to go, pretending that this was all they desired, though this matter was never yet mentioned in any of the former treaties; but, for the little ones, he resolves to keep them as hostages, to oblige them to return, v. 10, 11. More than this, he grows wrath, and swears that they shall not remove the little ones, assuring them it was at their peril, if they did. Note, Satan does all he can, to hinder those that serve God themselves, from bringing their children in to serve him. He is a sworn enemy to early piety, knowing how destructive it is to the interests of his kingdom: whatever would put us from engaging our children to the utmost in God's service, we have reason to suspect the hand of Satan in it. 3. The treaty, hereupon, breaks off abruptly; they that went out from Pharaoh's presence, (v. 6,) were now driven out. Those will never hear their doom, that cannot hear the voice of duty. See 2 Chron. 25. 16. Quous Deae destruct, eos dementes—Whom God intends to destroy, he delivers up to infatuation. Never was man so infatuated to his own ruin as Pharaoh was.

12. And the Lord said unto Moses, Stretch out thine hand over the land of Egypt for the locusts, that they may come up upon the land of Egypt, and eat every herb of the land, even all that the hail hath left. 13. And Moses stretched forth his rod over the land of Egypt, and the Lord brought an east wind upon the land all that day, and all that night; and when it was morning, the east wind brought the locusts. 14. And the locusts went up over all the land of Egypt, and rested in all the coasts of Egypt; very grievous were they; because there were no such locusts as they, neither after them shall be such. 15. For they covered the face of the whole earth, so that the land was darkened; and they did eat every herb of the land, and all the fruit of the trees which the hail had left: and there remained not any green thing in the trees, or in the herbs of the field, through all the land of Egypt. 16. Then Pharaoh called for Moses and Aaron in haste; and he said, I have sinned against the Lord your God, and against you. 17. Now, therefore, forgive, I pray thee, my sin only this once, and entreat the Lord your God, that he may take away from me this death only. 18. And he went out from Pharaoh, and entreated the Lord. 19. And the Lord turned a mighty strong wind, which took away the locusts, and cast them into the Red Sea; there remained not one locust in all the coasts of Egypt. 20. But the Lord hardened Pharaoh's heart, so that he would not let the children of Israel go.

Here is,

1. The locusts' invasion of the land; God's great army, Joel 2. 11. God bids Moses stretch out his hand, (v. 12.) to beckon them, as it were, for they came at a call, and he stretched forth his rod, v. 13. Compare ch. 9. 22, 23. Moses ascribes it to the stretching out, not of his own hand, but of the rod of God, the instituted sign of God's presence with him. The locusts obey the summons, and fly upon the wings of the wind, the east wind, and caterpillars, without number, as we are told, Ps. 105. 34, 35. A formidable army of horse and foot might more easily have been resisted than this host of insects; who then is able to stand before the great God?

II. The desolations they made in it; (v. 15.) They covered the face of the earth, and ate up the fruit of the land. 17. God has given to the children of men; yet, when God pleases, he can disturb their possession, and send locusts and caterpillars to force them out. Herbs grow for the service of many; yet, when God pleases, those contemptible insects shall not only be fellow-commoners with him, but shall plunder him, and eat the bread out of his mouth. Let our labour be, not for the habitation and meat which thus lie exposed, but for those which endure to eternal life, which cannot be thus invaded, nor thus corrupted.

III. Pharaoh's submission hereupon, v. 16, 17. He had driven Moses and Aaron from him, (v. 11.) telling them (it is likely) he would have no more to do with them. But now he calls for them again in all haste, and makes court to them with as much respect as before he had dismissed them with disdain. Note, The day will come, when those who set at nought their counsellors, and despise all their reproofs, will be glad to make an interest in them, and engage their intercessions for them. The foolish virgins court the wise to give them of their oil; and see Ps. 141. 6.

1. Pharaoh confesses his fault; I have sinned against the Lord your God, and against you. He now sees his own folly in the slights and affronts he had put upon God and his ambassadors, and seems, at least, to repent of it. When God convinces men of sin, and humbles them for it, their contempt of God's ministers, and the word of the Lord in their mouths, will certainly come into the account, and lie heavy upon their consciences. Some think that when Pharaoh said, "The Lord your God," he did, in effect, say, "The Lord shall not be my God, I will trust in my god, the god of Egypt, whom they are willing not to be at war with, but care not, for treating with him as their rightful Prince, whom they are willing with loyal affection to submit to." True penitents lament sin as committed against God, even their own God, to whom they stand obliged.

2. He begs pardon, not of God, as penitents ought, but of Moses, which was more excusable in his case, his personal commission, Moses was made a god to Pharaoh, and whosoever sins he remitted, they were forgiven; when he prays, Forgive this once, he, in effect, promises not to offend in like manner any more, yet seems loath to express that promise, nor does he say any thing particularly of letting the people go. Note, Counterfeit repentance commonly cheats men with general promises, and is loath to covenant against particular sins.

3. He employs Moses and Aaron to pray for him. There are those, who, in distress, implore the help of other persons' prayers, but have no mind to pray for themselves, showing thereby that they have no true love to God, nor any delight in communion with him. Pharaoh desires their prayers, that this death only might be taken away, not this sin: he deprecates the plague of locusts, not the plague of a hard heart, which yet was much the more dangerous.

IV. The removal of the judgment, upon the prayer of Moses, v. 18, 19. This was, 1. As great an instance of the power of God as the judgment itself. An east wind brought the locusts, and now a west wind carried them off. Note, Whatever point of the compass the wind is in, it is fulfilling God's word, and turns about by his counsel. The wind bloweth where it listeth, as it pleaseth the Lord of our salvation; not as we, or the control of ours; not so as it respects the control of God; he directeth it under the whole heaven. 2. It was as great a proof of the authority of Moses, and as firm a ratification of his commission and his interest in that God who both makes heaven and creates evil, Isa. 45. 7. Nay, hereby he not only commanded the respect, but recommended himself to the esteem of Egypt, as he recommended himself to the respect of the Lord God so often before, as, while the judgment came, in obedience to his summons, the removal of it was an answer to his prayers; he never desired the woful day, though he threatened it; his commission indeed run against Egypt, but his intercession was for it, which was a good reason why they should love him, though they feared him. 3. It was also as strong an argument for their repentance as the judgment itself; for by this it appeared that God is ready to forgive, and swift to show mercy. If he turn away a particular judgment, as he did often from Pharaoh, or defer it, as in Ahab's case, upon the profession of repentance, and the outward tokens of humiliation; what will he do, if we be sincere, and how welcome will true penitents be to him! O that this goodness of God might lead us to repentance!

V. Pharaoh's return to his impious resolution again not to let the people go, (v. 20.) through the righteous hand of God upon him, hardening his heart, and confirming him in his obstinacy. Note, Those that have often baffled their convictions, and stood it out against them, forfeit the benefit of them, and are justly given up to those lusts of their own hearts, which (how strong see or their convictions) prove too strong for them.

21. And the Lord said unto Moses, Stretch out thine hand toward heaven, that there may be darkness over the land of Egypt, even darkness which may be felt. 22. And Moses stretched forth his hand toward heaven; and there was a thick darkness in all the land of Egypt three days. 23. They saw not one another, neither rose any from his place for three days; but all the children of Israel had light in their dwellings. 24. And Pharaoh called unto Moses, and said, Go ye, serve the Lord; only let your flocks and your herds be stayed; let your little ones also go with you. 25. And Moses said, Thou must give us also sacrifices and burnt-offerings, that we may sacrifice unto the Lord our God. 26. Our cattle also shall go with us; there shall not a hoof be left behind: for thereof must we take to serve the Lord our God; and we know not with what we must serve the Lord until we come thither. 27. But the Lord hardened Pharaoh's heart, and he would not let them go. 28. And Pharaoh said unto him, Get thee from me, take heed to thyself, see my face no more; for in that day thou seest my face thou shalt die. 29. And Moses said, Thou hast spoken well; I will see thy face again no more.

1. The plague of darkness brought upon Egypt, and a most dreadful plague it was, and therefore is put first of the ten, (Ps. 105. 28.) though it was one of the last; in the destruction of the spiritual Egypt it is produced by the fifth vial, which is poured out upon the seat of the beast, Rev. 16. 10. His kingdom was filled of darkness. Observe particularly concerning this plague,
2. That it was a total darkness; we have reason to think, not only that the lights of heaven were clouded, but all their fires and candles were put out by the damps or clammy vapours which were the cause of this darkness; for it is said, (v. 21.) it was in his houses, there of all, or it is said, (v. 23.) it was not only in their houses, but in the chambers where they were, in their beds, or from the bed to the chair. This was they silent in darkness, 1 Sam. 2. 9. Now Pharaoh had time to consider, if he would have improved it. Spiritual darkness is spiritual bondage; while Satan blinds men's eyes that they see not, he binds their hands and feet, that they work not for God, nor move toward heaven. They sit in darkness.

It was a righteous thing with God thus to punish them: Pharaoh, and his people had rebelled against the light of God's word, which Moses spake to them; justly therefore are they punished with darkness, for they loved it, and chose it rather. The blindness of their minds brings upon them this darkness of the air; never was mind so blinded as Pharaoh's, never was air so darkened as Egypt's. The Egyptians by their cruelty would have extinguished the lamp of Israel, and quenched their coal; justly therefore does God put out their lights; compare it with the punishment of the Sodomites, Gen. 19. 11. Let us dread the consequences of sin; if three days' darkness was so dreadful, what will everlasting darkness be?

6. The children of Israel, at the same time, had light in their dwellings, (v. 23.) not only in the land of Goshen, where most of them dwelt, but in the habitations of those who were dispersed among the Egyptians. That some of the wicked, not for deserving appears from the distinction afterward appointed to be put on their door-posts, ch. 12. 7. This is an instance, (1.) Of the power of God above the ordinary power of nature; we must not think that we share in common merities, as a matter of course, and therefore that we owe no thanks to God for them; he could distinguish, and withhold that from us, which he grants to others. He does indirectly make his sun to shine on the just and the unjust, but he could make a difference, and we must own ourselves indebted to his mercy that he does not. (2.) Of the particular favour he bears to his people; they walk in the light, when others wander endlessly in thick darkness; wherever there is an Israelite indeed, though in this dark world, there is light, there is a child of light, one for whom light is shown, and they walk in light, Ps. 94. 6. When God made this difference between the Israelites and the Egyptians, who would not have preferred the poorest cottage of an Israelite to the finest palace of an Egyptian? There is still a real difference, though not so discernible a one, between the house of the wicked, which is under a curse, and the habitation of the just, which is blessed, Prov. 3. 33. We should believe in that difference, and govern ourselves accordingly. Upon Ps. 105. 28. He sent darkness and made it dark, and they rebelled not against his word, some ground a conjecture, that during these three days of darkness the Israelites were circumcised, in order to their celebrating of the passover which was now approaching; and that that was the word against which they rebelled not, for their circumcision, when they entered Canaan, was spoken of as a second general circumcision, Josh. 5. 2. However, during these three days of darkness to the Egyptians, if God had so pleased, the Israelites, by the light which they had, might have made their escape, and without asking leave of Pharaoh; but God would bring them out with a high hand, and not by stealth, or in haste, Isa. 52. 12. 11. Here is the impression made upon Pharaoh by this plague, much like that of the foregoing plagues.

1. It awakened him so far, that he renewed the treaty with Moses and Aaron, and now, at length, consented that they should take their little ones with them, only he would have their cattle left in pawn, v. 24. It is common for sinners thus to bargain with God Almighty; some sinners will leave, but not their lusts; facts will be left, but not the chair of them; some sinners will leave their bed, or from the bed to the chair. Thus were they silent in darkness, 1 Sam. 2. 9. Now Pharaoh had time to consider, if he would have improved it. Spiritual darkness is spiritual bondage; while Satan blinds men's eyes that they see not, he binds their hands and feet, that they work not for God, nor move toward heaven. They sit in darkness.

It was a righteous thing with God thus to punish them: Pharaoh, and his people had rebelled against the light of God's word, which Moses spake to them; justly therefore are they punished with darkness, for they loved it, and chose it rather. The blindness of their minds brings upon them this darkness of the air; never was mind so blinded as Pharaoh's, never was air so darkened as Egypt's. The Egyptians by their cruelty would have extinguished the lamp of Israel, and quenched their coal; justly therefore does God put out their lights; compare it with the punishment of the Sodomites, Gen. 19. 11. Let us dread the consequences of sin; if three days' darkness was so dreadful, what will everlasting darkness be?
withal. What numbers and kinds of sacrifices would be required, they did not yet know, and therefore they must take all they had. Note, With ourselves, and our children, we must devote all our worldly possessions to the service of God, because we know not what use God will make of what we have, nor in what way we may be called upon to honour God with it.

2. Yet it exasperated him so far, that, when he might not make his own terms, he broke off the conversation abruptly, and took up a resolution to treat no more; wrath now came upon him to the utmost, and he became outrageous beyond all bounds, v. 28. Moses is dismissed in anger, forbidden the court upon pain of death, forbidden so much as to meet Pharaoh any more, as he had been used to do by the river's side: In that day thou seest my face, thou shalt die. Prodigious madness! Had not he found that Moses could plague him without seeing his face? Or, had he forgotten how often he had sent for him as his physician to heal him, and ease him of his plagues; and must he now be bid to come near him no more? Impotent malice! To threaten him with death, who was armed with such a power, and at whose mercy he had so often lusted himself. What will not hardness of heart, and contempt of God's word and commandments, bring men to?

Moses takes him at his word, (v. 29.) I will see thy face no more, that is, after this time; for this conference did not break off till ch. 11. 8. when Moses went out in a great anger, and told Pharaoh how soon he would change his mind, and his proud spirit would come down; which was fulfilled, (ch. 12. 31.) when Pharaoh became an humble suppliant to Moses to depart. So that, after this interview, Moses came no more, till he was sent for. Nor did men drive God's word from them, he justly permitted their delusions, and answered them according to the multitude of their idols. When the Gudarenes desired Christ to depart, he left them presently.

CHAP. XI.

Pharaoh had bid Moses to get out of his presence, (ch. 10. 28.) and Moses had promised this should be the last time he would trouble him, yet he resolves to say out what he had to say, before he left him; accordingly, we have, in this chapter, I. The instructions God had given to Moses, which he was now to pursue, (v. 1. 2.) together with the interest Israel and Moses had in the esteem of the Egyptians, v. 3. II. The last message Moses delivered to Pharaoh, concerning the death of the first-born, v. 4. 8. III. A repetition of the prediction of Pharaoh's hardening his heart, (v. 9.) and the event answering to it, v. 10.

1. AND the Lord said unto Moses, Yet will I bring one plague more upon Pharaoh, and upon Egypt; afterwards he will let you go hence: when he shall let you go, he shall surely thrust you out hence altogether. 2. Speak now in the ears of the people, and let every man borrow of his neighbour, and every woman of her neighbour, jewels of silver, and jewels of gold. 3. And the Lord gave the people favour in the sight of the Egyptians. Moreover, the man Moses was very great in the land of Egypt, in the sight of Pharaoh's servants, and in the sight of the people.

Here is,

1. The high favour Moses and Israel were in, with God; (1.) Moses was a favourite of Heaven; for God will not hide from him the thing he will do. God not only makes him his messenger to deliver his errands, but communicates to him, as the man of his council, his purpose, that he would bring one plague more, and bid one, upon Pharaoh, by which he would complete the deliverance of Israel, v. 1. Moses longed to see an end of this dreadful work, to see Egypt no more plagued, and Israel no more oppressed; Well, says God, now it is near an end, warfare shall shortly be accomplished, the point gained; Pharaoh shall be forced to own himself conquered, and to give up the cause. After all the rest of the plagues, God says, I will bring one more. Thus, after all the judgments executed upon sinners in this world, still there is one more reserved to be brought on them in the other world, which will completely humble those whom nothing else would humble. (2.) The Israelites were favourites of Heaven, for God himself espoused their injured cause, and takes care to show the Egyptians their pains in serving the Egyptians. This was the last day of their servitude, they were about to go away, and their masters, who had abused them in their work, would now have defrauded them of their wages, and have sent them away empty; while the poor Israelites were so far from liberty, that they would be satisfied with that, without pay, and would receive to get rid of being oppressed; but he that *executeth righteousness and judgeth for the oppres sed, pro idem that the labourers should not lose their hire, and ordered them to demand it now at their departure, (v. 2.) in jewels of silver and jewels of gold; to prepare for which, God, by the plagues, had now made the Egyptians as willing to part with them upon any terms as, before, the Egyptians, by their severities, had made them willing to go upon any terms. Though the patient Israelites were content to lose their wages, yet God would not let them go without them. Note, One way or other, God will right the injured, who in humble silence commit their cause to him; and he will see to it, that none be losers at last by their patient sufferings, any more than by their services.

The high favour Moses and Israel were in, with the Egyptians, v. 3. (1.) Even the people that had been despised and despised came to be respected; the wonders wrought on their behalf put an honour upon them, and made them considerable. How great do they become for whom God thus fights! Thus the Lord gave them favour in the sight of the Egyptians, by making it appear how much he favoured them: he also changed the spirit of the Egyptians toward them, and made them to be pitied for their oppressors, Ps. 106. 46. (2.) The man Moses was very great. He would hide of all these, when they saw what power he was clothed with, and what wonders were wrought by his hand? Thus the apostles, though otherwise despis able men, came to be magnified, Acts. 5. 13. Those that honour God, he will honour; and with respect to those that approve themselves faithful to him, how meanly soever they may pass through this world, that one day coming when they will look great, very great, in the eyes of all the world, even their's who now look upon them with the utmost contempt. Observe, Though Pharaoh hated Moses, there were those of Pharaoh's servants that respected him. Thus, in Cesar's household, even Nero's, there were some that had an esteem for blessed Paul, Phil. 1. 13.

4. And Moses said, Thus saith the Lord, About midnight will I go out into the midst of Egypt: 5. And all the first-born in the land of Egypt shall die, from the first-born of Pharaoh that sitteth upon his throne even unto the first-born of the maid-servant that is behind the mill; and all the first-born of beasts. 6. And there shall be a great cry throughout all the land of Egypt, such as there was none like it, nor shall be like it any more. 7. But against any of the children of Israel shall not a dog move his tongue, against man or beast; that ye may know how that the Lord doth put a difference between the Egyptians and Israel. 8. And all these thy servants shall come down unto me, and bow down themselves unto me, saving, Get thee out, and all the people that follow thee: and after that I will go out. And he went out from Pharaoh in a great anger. 9. And the Lord said unto Moses, Pharaoh shall not hearken unto you; that my wonders may be multiplied in the land of Egypt. 10. And Moses and Aaron did all these wonders before Pharaoh: and the Lord hardened Pharaoh's heart, so that he would not let the children of Israel go out of his land.

Warning is here given to Pharaoh of the last and conquering plague which was now to be inflicted, which was the death of all the first-born in Egypt at once. This had been first threatened, (ch. 4. 23. I will slay thy son, thy first-born,) but is last executed; lesser judgments were tried, which, if they had done the work, would have prevented this. See how slow God is to wrath; and how willing to be met with in the way of his judgments, and to have his anger turned away, and particularly how precious the lives of men are in his eyes: if the death of their cattle would have humbled and reformed them, their children had been spared; but if men will not improve the gradual advances of divine judgments, they must think themselves, if they find, in the issue, that the worst was reserved for the last.

1. The plague itself is here particularly foretold, v. 4. 6. The time is fixed, about midnight; the very next midnight, the dead time of the night, when they were all asleep, all their first-born should sleep the sleep of death, not silently and insensibly, as to be not to be discovered till morning, but so as to rouse the families at midnight to stand by and see them die. The extent of this plague is described, v. 5. The prince that was to succeed in the throne was not too high to be reached by it, nor the slaves at the mill too low to be taken notice of. Moses and Aaron were not ordered to summon this plague, no. I will go out, saith the Lord, v. 4. It is a love here expressed of the face of the living God; what is he but that? 2. The special protection which the children of Israel should be under, and the manifest difference that should be put between them and the Egyptians; which needs drew their swords against the Egyptians, there should not so much as a dog bark at any of the children of Israel, v. 7. An earnest was here given of the difference which shall be put in the great day between God's people and his enemies; did men know what a difference God puts, and will put eternally, between those that serve him and those that serve him not, religion would not seem to them such an indifferent thing as they make it, nor would they act in it with so much indifference as they do.

3. The humble submission which Pharaoh's serv vances should make to Moses, and how submissively they should receive him to them, (v. 8. They shall come down, and bow themselves. Note, The provident enemies of God and his Israel shall be made to fall under at last, (Rev. 3. 9.) and shall be found liars to them, Deut. 33. 29. When Moses had thus delivered his message, it is said, He went out from Pharaoh in a great anger, though he was the meekest of all the men of the earth. Probably he expected that the very threatening of the death of the first-born of the land would have induced Pharaoh to comply, especially as Pharaoh had complied so far already, and had seen how exactly all Moses's predictions hitherto were fulfilled. But it had not that effect; his proud heart would not yield, no, not to save all the first-born of his kingdom: no marvel that men are not deterred from vicious courses by the prospects given them of eternal misery in the other world, when they impenitent peril they run of the loss of all that is dear to them in this world will not frighten them. Moses, hereupon, was provoked to a holy indignation, being grieved, as our Saviour afterward, for the hardness of his heart, Mark, 3. 5. Note, It is a great vexation to the spirits of good ministers, to see people deaf to all the fair warnings given them, and running headlong upon ruin, notwithstanding all the kind methods taken to prevent it. (Vers. 17, 18.) The word of the Lord is a fire, (Isa. 48.) because God had told him that the house of Israel would not hearken unto him, v. 7. To be angry at nothing but sin, is the way not to sin in anger. Moses, having thus adverted to the disturbance which Pharaoh's obstinacy gave him, (1.) Reflects upon the previous notice God had given him of this; (v. 9.) The Lord said to Moses, if Pharaoh will not hearken unto you. The scripture has foreseen the incredulity of these who should hear the gospel, that it might not be a surprise or stumbling-block to such, John 12. 37, 38. Rom. 10. 16. Let us think never the worse of the gospel of Christ, for the sights men generally put upon it, for we were told what cold entertainment it would meet with, (2.) He recapitulates all he had said before to this purpose, (v. 10.) that Moses might not be mistaken, because as they are here related, before Pharaoh, (he himself was an eye-witness of them,) yet he could not prevail, which was a certain sign that God himself had, in a way of righteousness, hardened his heart. Thus the Jews' rejection of the gospel of Christ was so gross an absurdity, that it might easily be inferred from it, that God had given them the spirit of slumber, Rom. 11. 8.

CHAP. XII.

This chapter gives an account of one of the most memorable ordinances, and one of the most memorable provisions, of all that are recorded in the Old Testament. 1. Not one of all the ordinances of the Jewish church was more than this, than that of the Passover, which is one more frequently mentioned in the New Testament: and we have here an account of the institution of it. The ordinance consisted of three parts. 1. The killing and eating of the passover lamb, v. 11. 2. The sprinkling of the blood upon the door-posts, spoken of as a distinct thing, (Heb. 11. 28.) and peculiar to this first passover, (v. 2.) with the reason for it, v. 13. 3. The leavened bread of the passover, v. 15. These three points rather at what was to be done afterward, in the observance of this ordinance, v. 14. 20. This institution is communicated to the people, and they are instructed of the passover lamb, v. 11. 2. Of the unleavened bread, v. 21. 23. (2.) Of the after passovers, v. 24. 27. And the Israelites' obedience to these orders, v. 28, 29. Not one of all the provisions of God concerning the Jewish church was more illustrous, or is more frequently mentioned, than the deliverance of the children of Israel out of Egypt. 1. The first-born of the Egyptians are slain, v. 29, 30. 2. Orders are given immediately for their discharge, v. 31. 33. 3. They begin their march, (1.)
And the Lord spake unto Moses and Aaron in the land of Egypt, saying,

1. This month shall be unto you the beginning of months: it shall be the first month of the year to you. 2. Speak ye unto all the congregation of Israel, saying, In the tenth day of this month they shall take to them every man a lamb, according to the house of their fathers, a lamb for a house:

3. And if the household be too little for the lamb, let him and his neighbour which are next unto his house take it, according to the number of the souls: every man, according to his eating, shall make your count for the lamb.

5. Your lamb shall be without blemish, a male of the first year; ye shall take it out from the sheep, or from the goats: 6. And ye shall keep it up until the fourteenth day of the same month: and the whole assembly of the congregation of Israel shall kill it in the evening. 7. And they shall take of the blood, and strike it on the two side-posts and on the upper door-post of the houses wherein they shall eat it. 8. And they shall eat the flesh in that night, roast with fire, and unleavened bread; and with bitter herbs they shall eat it. 9. Eat not of it raw, nor sodden at all with water, but roast with fire; his head with his legs, and with the purtenance thereof. 10. And ye shall let nothing of it remain until the morning; and that which remaineth of it until the morning ye shall burn with fire. 11. And thus shall ye eat it; with your loins girded, your shoes on your feet, and your staff in your hand: and ye shall eat it in haste; it is the Lord’s passover. 12. For I will pass through the land of Egypt this night, and will smite all the first-born in the land of Egypt, both man and beast; and against all the gods of Egypt I will execute judgment: I am the Lord. 13. And the blood shall be to you for a token upon the houses where you are: and when I see the blood, I will pass over you, and the plague shall not be upon you to destroy you, when I smite the land of Egypt. 14. And this day shall be unto you for a memorial; and you shall keep it a feast to the Lord throughout your generations; you shall keep it a feast by an ordinance for ever. 15. Seven days shall ye eat unleavened bread, even the first day ye shall put away leaven out of your houses: for whosoever eateth bread leavened from the first day until the seventh day, that soul shall be cut off from Israel. 16. And in the first day there shall be a holy convocation, and in the seventh day there shall be a holy convocation to you; no manner of work shall be done in them, save that which every man must eat, that only may be done of you. 17. And ye shall observe the feast of unleavened bread; for in this self-same day have I brought your armies out of the land of Egypt: therefore shall ye observe this day in your generations by an ordinance for ever. 18. In the first month, on the fourteenth day of the month at even, ye shall eat unleavened bread, until the one and twentieth day of the month at even. 19. Seven days shall there be no leaven found in your houses: for whosoever eateth that which is leavened, even that soul shall be cut off from the congregation of Israel, whether he be a stranger, or born in the land. 20. Ye shall eat nothing leavened; in all your habitations shall ye eat unleavened bread.

Moses and Aaron here receive of the Lord what they were afterward to deliver to the people, concerning the ordinance of the passover, to which is prefixed an order for a new style to be observed in their months; (v. 1, 2.) This shall be to you the beginning. They had hitherto begun their year from the middle of September, but henceforward they were to begin it from the middle of March, at least in all their ecclesiastical computations. Note, It is good to begin the day, and begin the year, especially to begin our lives, with God. This new calculation began the year with the spring, which reneweth the face of the earth, and was used as a figure of the coming of Christ, Cant. 2. 11, 12.

We may suppose, that, while Moses was bringing the ten plagues upon the Egyptians, he was directing the Israelites to prepare for their departure at an hour’s warning. Probably, he had by degrees brought them near together from their dispersions, so that they are here called the congregation of Israel; (v. 3.) and to them as a congregation orders are here sent. Their amazement and hurry, it is easy to suppose, were great; yet now they must apply themselves to the observance of a sacred rite, to the honour of God. Note, When our heads are fullest of care, and our hands of business, yet we must not forget our religion, nor suffer ourselves to be indisposed for acts of devotion.

I. God appointed, that, on the night wherein they were to go out of Egypt, they should, in each of their families, kill a lamb, or that two or three families, if they were small, should join for a lamb. The lamb was to be got ready four days before, and that afternoon they were to kill it, (v. 6.) as a sacrifice; not strictly, for it was not offered upon the altar, but as a religious ceremony, acknowledging God’s goodness to them, not only in preserving them from, but in delivering them by, the plagues inflicted on the Egyptians. See the antiquity of family religion; and see the convenience of the jointing of small families together for religious worship, that it may be made the more solemn.

II. The lamb so slain they were to eat, roasted, (we may suppose, in its several quarters,) with unleavened bread and bitter herbs, because they were to eat it in haste, (v. 11.) and to leave none of it until the morning; for God would have them to depend upon him for their daily bread, and not to take thought for the morrow. He that fed them, would feed them.

III. Before they ate the flesh of the lamb, they were to sprinkle the blood upon the door-posts, v. 7. By this their houses were to be distinguished from the houses of the Egyptians, and so their first-born secured from the sword of the destroying angel, v. 12, 13. Dreadful work was to be made this night in Egypt. All the first-born both of the children, were to be slain, and judgment executed upon the gods of Egypt. Moses does not mention the fulfilment, in this chapter, yet he speaks of it, Numb. 5. 4. It is very probable that the idols which the Egyptians worshipped were destroyed, those of metal melted, those of wood consumed, and those of stone broken to pieces; whence Jethro infers, (ch. 18. 11.) The Lord is greater to us than to gods. The same angel that destroyed their first-born, demolished their idols, which were no less dears to them. For the protection of Israel from th' plague, they were ordered to sprinkle the blood of the lamb upon the door-posts, their doing of which would be accepted as an instance of their faith in the divine warnings, and their obedience to the divine precepts. Note. 1. In times of common calamity, God will secure his own people, and set a mark among them. 2. The blood of sprinkling is the saints' security, in times of common calamity; that is it that marks them for God, pacifies conscience, and gives them boldness of access to the throne of grace, and so becomes a wall of protection round them, and a wall of partition between them and the children of this world.

IV. This was to be annually observed as a feast of the Lord in their generations, to which the feast of unleavened bread was annexed, during which, for seven days, they were to eat no bread but what was unleavened, in remembrance of their being confined to such bread, of necessity, for many days after they came out of Egypt, v. 14. 2. The passover was observed with much solemnity and formality, and directed, and that they might not mistake concerning it, and to awaken those, who perhaps in Egypt were grown generally very stupid and careless in the matters of religion, to a diligent observance of the institution.

Now, without doubt, there was much of the gospel in this ordinance, it is often referred to in the New Testament, and, in it is the greater threaded, and not to them only who could not studiously look to the end of these things, Heb. 4. 2. 2 Cor. 3. 13.

1. The paschal lamb was typical; Christ is our Passover, 1 Cor. 5. 7. (1.) It was to be a lamb; and Christ is the Lamb of God, (John, I. 29.) often in the Revelation called the Lamb, meek and innocent as a lamb, dumb before the shearer. But the blood was to be a mark of the first year, (v. 5.) in its prime; Christ offered up himself in the midst of his days, not in infancy with the babes of Bethlehem. It denotes the strength and sufficiency of the Lord Jesus, on whom our help was hid. (3.) It was to be without blemish, (v. 5.) denoting the purity of the Lord Jesus, a Lamb without spot, 1 Pet. 1. 19. The judge that condemned him, (as his trial were only like the scrutiny that was) shall be hid among the sacrifices, whether they were without blemish or no, pronounced him innocent. (4.) It was to be set apart four days before, (v. 3, 6.) denoting the designation of the Lord Jesus to be a Saviour, both in the purpose and in the promise. It is very observable, that, as Christ was crucified at the passover, so he solemnly entered into his work of grace on the first day that the paschal lamb was set apart. (5.) It was slain, and roasted with fire, (v. 6. 9.) denoting the exquisite sufferings of the Lord Jesus, even unto death, the death of the cross. The wrath of God is as fire, and Christ was made a curse for us. (6.) It was to be killed by the whole congregation between the two evenings, that is, between three o'clock and six. Christ suffered at the end of the world, 2 Pet. 3. 3. (7.) It was to be killed in the Jews, the whole multitude of them, (Like, 23. 18.) and for the good of all his spiritual Israel. (7.) Not a bone of it must be broken, (v. 46.) which is expressly said to be fulfilled in Christ, (John, 19. 33, 36.) denoting the unbroken strength of the Lord Jesus.

2. The sprinkling of the blood was typical. (1.) It was not enough that the blood of the lamb was shed, but in many instances denoting the application of the merits of Christ's death to our souls; we must receive the atonement, Rom. 5. 11. (2.) It was to be sprinkled with a bunch of hyssops, (v. 22.) in the basin. The everlasting covenant, like the basin, is the conservatory of this blood, the benefits and privileges purchased by it are laid up for us there; faith is the bunch of hyssop by which we apply the promises to ourselves, and the benefits of the blood of Christ to ourselves. (3.) It was said, (v. 23.) that the blood, as sprinkled upon the door-posts, denoting the open profession we are to make of faith in Christ, and obedience to him, as those that are not ashamed to own our dependence upon him. The mark of the Beast may be received in the forehead, or in the right-hand, but the seal of the Lamb is always in the forehead, Rev. 7. 3. There is a back-way to hell, but no back-way to heaven; no, that is a high way, Is. 33. 8. (4.) It was to be sprinkled upon the lintel and the side-posts, but not upon the thresholds; (v. 7.) which cautions us to take heed of transgressing under foot the blood of the covenant, Heb. 10. 29. It is precious blood, and must be precious to us. (5.) The blood, thus sprinkled, was a means of the preservation of the Israelites from the destroying angel, who had nothing to do there who were sprinkled with the blood of the Lord's lamb; as was sprinkled upon our consciences, it will be our protection from the wrath of God, the curse of the law, and the damnation of hell, Rom. 8. 1.

3. The solemn eating of the lamb was typical of our gospel-duty to Christ. (1.) The paschal lamb was killed, not to be looked upon only, but to be fed upon; so we must by faith make Christ our's, as we do that which we eat, and we must receive spiritual benefits from him, as from our food, and have delight and satisfaction in him, as we have in eating and drinking, when we are hungry or thirsty; see John, 6. 53-55. (2.) It was to be all eaten; those that by faith feed upon Christ, must feed upon a whole Christ; they must take Christ and his yoke, Christ and his cross, as well as Christ and his covenant. Is Christ divided, is Christ divided? If Christ is divided, Christ still have nothing at all. (3.) It was to be eaten immediately, not deferred till morning, v. 10. To-day Christ is offered, and is to be accepted while it is called to-day, before we sleep the sleep of death. (4.) It was to be eaten with bitter herbs, (v. 8.) in remembrance of the bitterness of their bondage in Egypt; we must feed upon Christ with sorrow and brokenness of heart, in all the bitterness of his people, Acts 9. 16. (5.) It was to be a relishable relish to the paschal lamb; Christ will be sweet to us, if sin be bitter. (5.) It was to be eaten in a departing posture; (v. 11.) when we feed upon Christ by faith, we must absolutely forsake the rule and dominion of sin, shake off Pharaoh's yoke; and we must sit loose to the world, and every thing in it, forsake all for Christ, and reckon it no bad bargain. Heb. 13. 13, 14.
4. The feast of unleavened bread was typical of the Christian life, 1 Cor. 5. 7, 8. Having received Christ Jesus the Lord, 1. We must keep a featin, in holy joy, contiuallly delighting ourselves in Christ Jesus; no manner of work must be done, (v. 16.) no care admitted and indulged inconsistent with, or prejudicial to, this holy joy: if true belieers have not a continual feast, it is their own fault.
5. It must be a feast of unleavened bread, kept in charity, without the leaven of malice, and in sincerity, without the leaven of hypocrisy. The law was very strict as to the passover, and the Jews were so in their usages, that no leaven should be found in their houses, v. 19. All the old leaven of sin must be put far from us, with the utmost care and abhorrence, if we would keep the feast of a holy life to the honour of Christ. (3.) It was by an ordination for ever; (v. 17.) as long as we live we must continue feeding upon Christ, and rejoicing in him always, with thankful mention of the great things he has done for us.
21. Then Moses called for all the elders of Israel, and said unto them, Draw out, and take you a lamb, according to your families, and kill the passover. And ye shall take a bunch of hyssop, and dip it in the blood that is in the bason, and strike the lintel and the two side-posts with the blood that is in the bason; and none of you shall go out at the door of his house until the morning. 23. For the Lord will pass through to smite the Egyptians; and when he seeth the blood upon the lintel, and on the two side-posts, the Lord will pass over the door, and will not suffer the destroyer to come in unto your houses to smite you.
24. And ye shall observe this thing for an ordinance to thee and to thy sons for ever. 25. And it shall come to pass, when ye be come to the land which the Lord will give you, according as he hath promised, that ye shall keep this service. 26. And it shall come to pass, when your children shall say unto you, What mean ye by this service? 27. That, ye shall say, It is the sacrifice of the Lord’s passover, who passed over the houses of the children of Israel in Egypt, when he smote the Egyptians, and delivered our houses. And the people bowed the head, and worshipped. 23. And the children of Israel went away, and did as the Lord had commanded Moses and Aaron, so did they.
1. Moses is here, as a faithful steward in God’s house, teaching the children of Israel to observe all things which God had commanded him; and no doubt he gave the instructions as largely as he received them, though they are not so largely recorded. It is here added,
1. That this night, when the first-born were to be destroyed, no Israelite must stir out of doors till morning, that is, till toward morning, when they would be called for to march out of Egypt, v. 22. Not but that the destroying angel could have known an Israelite from an Egyptian in the street, but God would intimate to them that their safety was owing to the blood of sprinkling; if they put themselves from under the protection of that, it was at their peril: also, that those whom God has marked for himself must not mingle themselves with evil-doers: see Isa. 26. 20, 21. They must not go out of the doors, lest they should struggle and be out of the way when they should be summoned to depart; they must stay within, to wait for the salvation of the Lord, and it is good to do so.
2. That hereafter they should carefully teach their children the meaning of this service, v. 26, 27. Observe, (1.) The question which the children would ask concerning this solemnity, (which they would soon take notice of in the family,) What mean ye by this service? What is the meaning of all this care and exactness about eating this lamb, and this unleavened bread, more than common food? Why such a difference between this meal and other meals? Note, [1.] It is a good thing to see children inquisitive about the things of God; it is to be hoped that they who are careful to ask for the way will find it. Christ himself, when a Child, heard and asked questions, Luke, 2. 46. [2.] It concerns us all rightly to understand the meaning of those holy ordinances wherein we worship God; God would have the nations who read of them: what is signified, and what intended; what is the duty expected from us in them, and what the advantages to be expected by us. Every ordina-cel has a meaning; some ordinances, as sacraments, have not their meaning so plain and obvious as others have; therefore we are concerned to search, that we may not offer the blind for sacrifice, but may do a reasonable service. If either we are ignorant of, or mistaken about, the meaning of holy ordinces, we can neither please God nor profit ourselves.
2. The answer which the parents were to return to this question; (v. 27.) Ye shall say, It is the sacrifice of the Lord’s passover, that is, “By the killing and sacrificing of this lamb, we keep in remembrace that work of wonder and grace which God did for our fathers when,” [1.] “To make way for our deliverance out of bondage, he slew the first-born of the Egyptians, so compelling them to sign our discharge;” and, [2.] “Though there were with us, even with us, sins against the Lord our God, for which the destroying angel, when he was abroad doing execution, might justly have destroyed our first-born too, yet God graciously appointed and accepted the family-sacrifice of a lamb instead of the first-born, as, of old, the ram instead of Isaac; and so the whole house of Israel was delivered, when the first-born were saved.” The repetition of this solemnity in the return of every year was designed.
First, To look backward as a memorial, that in it they might remember what great things God had done for them and their fathers. The word pesach signifies a leap or transition: it is a passing over, for the destroying angel passed over the houses of the Israelites; he did not destroy their first-born. When God brings utter ruin upon his people, he says, I will not pass by them any more, (Amos, 7. 8.—9.) intimating how often he had passed by them, as now when the destroying angel passed over their houses. Note, 1. Distinguishing mercies lay under peculiar obligations. When a thousand fall at our side and ten thousand at our right hand, and yet we are preserved, and have our gars to eat for a prey, this should greatly affect us, Ps. 91. 7. In war or pestilence, if the arrow of death has passed by us, passed over us, hit the next to us, and just missed us, we must not say it was by chance that we are preserved, but by the special providence of our God. 2. Old mercies, to ourselves or to our fathers, must not be forgotten, but be had in everlasting remembrance, that God may be praised, our faith in him encouraged, and our hearts enlarged in his service.

Secondly, It was designed to look forward as an earnest of the great sacrifice of the Lamb of God in the fulness of time, instead of us and our first-born; we were obnoxious to the sword of the destroying angel, but Christ our Passover was sacrificed for us, his death was our life, and thus he was the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world, from the foundation of the Jewish church: Moses kept the passover by faith in Christ, for Christ was the lamb of God for righteousness.

The people received these instructions with reverence and ready obedience. 1. They bowed the head and worshipped; (v. 27.) they hereby signified their submission to this institution as a law, and their thankfulness for it as a favour and privilege. Note, When God gives law to us, we must give our hearts to it; when he speaks, we must bow our heads and worship. 2. They went away and did as they were commanded, v. 23. Here was none of that discontent and murmuring among them which we read of, ch. 5. 20, 21. The plagues of Egypt had done them good, and raised their expectations of a glorious deliverance, which before they despaired of; and now they went forth to meet it in the way appointed. Note, The perfecting of God's mercies to us must be waited for in a humble observance of his institutions.

29. And it came to pass, that at midnight, the Lord smote all the first-born in the land of Egypt, from the first-born of Pharaoh that sat on his throne, unto the first-born of the captive that was in the dungeon; and all the first-born of cattle. 30. And Pharaoh rose up in the night, he, and all his servants, and all the Egyptians; and there was a great cry in Egypt; for there was not a house where there was not one dead. 31. And he called for Moses and Aaron by night, and said, Rise up, and get you forth from among my people, both you and the children of Israel; and go, serve the Lord, as ye have said. 32. Also take your flocks and your herds, as ye have said, and be gone; and bless me also. 33. And the Egyptians were urgent upon the people, that they might send them out of the land in haste; for they said, We be all dead men. 34. And the people took their dough before it was leavened, their kneading-troughs being bound up in their clothes upon their shoulders. 35. And the children of Israel did according to the word of Moses; and they borrowed of the Egyptians jewels of silver, and jewels of gold, and raiment. 36. And the Lord gave the people favour in the sight of the Egyptians, so that they lent unto them such things as they required: and they spoiled the Egyptians.

Here is, I. The Egyptians' sons, even their first-born, slain, vs. 29, 30. If Pharaoh would have taken the warning which was given him of this plague, and would thereupon have released Israel, what a great many dear and valuable lives might have been preserved! But see what obstinate infidelity brings up-on men. Observe, 1. The time when this blow was given; it was at midnight, which added to the terror and to the horror of the people; no man made dreadful by the additional plague of darkness, which might be felt, and doubtless disturbed their repose; and now, when they hoped for one quiet night's rest, at midnight was the alarm given: when the destroying angel drew his sword against Jerusalem, it was in the day-time, (2 Sam. 24. 15.) which made it the less frightful; but the destruction of Egypt was by a presidie walking in darkness, Ps. 105. 29. Shortly there will be a general judgement at midnight, Behold, Behold the bridegroom cometh. 2. On whom the plague fastened; on their first-born, the joys and hopes of their respective families. They had slain the Hebrews' children, and now God slew their. Thus he visits the iniquity of the fathers upon the children; and he is not unrighteous who taketh vengeance. 3. How far it reached; from the throne to the dungeon; prince and peasant stand upon the same level before God's judgments, for there is no respect of persons with him; see Job, 34. 19, 20. Now the slain of the Lord were many; multitudes, multitudes fall in this valley of decision, when the controversy between God and Pharaoh was to be determined. 4. What an outcry was made upon it; there was a great cry in Egypt, universal lamentation for their only sons, (with many,) and with all for their first-born. If any be suddenly taken away, all in the midst, up neighbours; but the Egyptians could have no help, no comfort, from their neighbours, all being involved in the same calamity. Let us learn hence, (1.) To tremble before God, and to be afraid of his judgments; Ps. 119. 120. Who is able to stand before him, or dares resist him? (2.) To be thankful to God for the daily preservation of ourselves and our families; lying so much exposed, we have reason to say, It is of the Lord's mercies that we are not consumed.

II. God's sons, even his first-born, released; this judgment conquered Pharaoh, and obliged him to surrender at discretion, without capitalizing. Men had better come up to God's terms at first, for he will never come down to their's, let them object as long as they will. Now Pharaoh's pride is abased, v. 32. He will let all the people go, and serve the Lord as ye have said, (v. 31.) and take your flocks as ye have said, v. 32. Note, God's word will stand, and we shall get nothing by disputing it, or delaying to submit to it. Hitherto the Israelites were not permitted to depart, but now things were come to the last extremity, in consequence of which, 1. They are commanded to depart; (v. 31.) Rise up, and get you forth. Pharaoh had told Moses he should see his face no more, but now he sent for him: those will seek God early in their distress who before had set him at defiance. Such a fright he was now in, that he gave orders by night for their discharge, fearing lest, if he delayed any longer, he himself should fall next; and that he sent them out, not as men hated, (as the pagan historians have represented this matter,) but as men feared, isplainly discovered by this. 2. They were not to ask any request to them; (v. 32.) Bless me also; Let me have your prayers, that I may not be plagued for what is passed, when you are gone. Note, Those that are enemies to God's church are enemies to themselves, and sooner or later they will be made to see it. 2. They are hired to depart by the Egyptians; they cried out, (v. 33.) We be all dead men. Note, When death comes into our houses, it is seasonable for us to take stock of our own and our relations' deaths! It is easy to infer thence that we are dying, and, in effect, already dead, men. Upon this consideration, they were urgent with the Israelites to be gone, which gave great advantage to the Israelites in borrowing their jewels, v. 35, 36. When the Egyptians urged them to be gone, it was easy for them to say that the Egyptians had kept them poor, that they could not undertake such a journey with empty purses, but that, if they would give them wherewithal to bear their charges, they would be gone. And this the Divine Wisdom designed, in suffering things to come to this extremity, that they, becoming formidably to the Egyptians, might have a fair chance for asking of God also, by the influence he has on the minds of people, inclined the hearts of the Egyptians to furnish them with what they desired, they probably intending thereby to make atonement, that the plagues might be staid, as the Philistines, when they returned the ark, sent a present with it for a trespass-offering, having an eye to this precedent.

1. Of their number, about six hundred thousand men, (v. 37.) beside women and children, which I think, we cannot suppose to make less than twelve hundred thousand more. What a vast increase was this, to arise from seventy souls in little more than two hundred years' time! See the power and efficacy of that blessing, when God commands it, Be fruitful and multiply. This was typical of the multitudes that were brought into the gospel-church when it was founded. So mightily grew the word of God, and prevailed.

2. Of their retinue; (v. 38.) a mixed multitude went up with them, hangers on to that great family: some, perhaps, willing to leave their country, because it was laid waste by the plagues, and to seek their fortune, as we say, with the Israelites; others went out of curiosity; to see the solemnities of Israel's sacrifice to their God, which had been so much talked of, and expecting to see some glorious appearances of their God to them in the wilderness, having seen such glorious appearances of their God for them in the field of Zoan, Ps. 78. 12. Probably the greatest part of this mixed multitude were but a rude unthinking mob, that followed the crowd they knew not why; we afterwards find that they proved a snare to them; (Numb. 11. 4.) and it is probable that when they saw the wonderful works which the children of Israel were to continue forty years in the wilderness, they quitted them, and returned to Egypt again. There were always those among the Israelites that were not Israelites; and there are still hypocrites in the church, who make a deal of mischief, but will be shaken off at last.

3. Of their effects. They had with them flocks and herds, even very much cattle. This is taken notice of, because it was long before Pharaoh could give them leave to remove their effects, which were chiefly cattle, Gen. 46. 32.

4. Of the provisions made for the camp, which was very poor and slender. They brought some dough with them out of Egypt in their knapsacks, v. 34. They had prepared to bake the next day, in order to their removal, understanding it was very near; but, being hastened away sooner than they thought of by some hours, they took the dough as it was, unleavened, and when they came to Succoth, their first stage, they baked unleavened cakes, and though they were, of course, insipid, yet the liberty they were bough then into made it the most joyful meal they had ever eaten in their lives. Note, The servants of God must not be slaves to their appetites, for, though they have the solicitation and allure of all the delights of sense to their highest pitch. We should be willing to take up with dry bread, nay, with unleavened bread, rather than neglect or delay any service we have to do for God, as these whose meat and drink it is to do his will.

5. Of the date of this great event; it was just four hundred and thirty years from the promise made to Abraham (as the apostle explains it, Gal. 3. 17.) at the first coming of Christ; and, in which time the children of Israel, that is, the Hebrews, the distinguished chosen seed, were sojourners in a land that was not their's, either Canaan or Egypt. So long the promise made to Abraham of a settlement lay dormant and unfilled, but now at length it revived, and things began to work forward toward the accomplishment of it. The first day of the march of Abraham's camp toward Canaan was just four hundred and thirty years (it should seem the third) from the promise made to Abraham, (Gen. 12. 2.) I will make of thee a great nation. See how punctual God is to his time; though his promises be not performed quickly, they will be accomplished in their season.

6. Of the memorableness of it; (v. 42.) It is a night to be much observed. (1.) The providences of that first night were very observable; memora ble was the destruction of the Egyptians, and the deliverance of the Israelites by it; God herein made himself taken notice of. (2.) The ordinances of that night, in the annual return of it, were to be carefully observed; This is that night of the Lord, that remarkable night, to be celebrated in all generations. Note, the great things God does for his people are not to be only a nine days' wonder, as we say, but the remembrance of them is to be perpetuated throughout all ages; especially the work of our redemption by Christ: this first passover-night was a night of the Lord, much to be observed; but the last passover-night, in which Christ was betrayed, (and in which the first passover, with the rest of the ceremonial institutions, was superseded and abolished,) was a night of the Lord, much more to be observed, when a yoke, heavier than that of Egypt, was broken from off our necks, and a land, better than that of Canaan, set before us. That was a temporal deliverance to be celebrated in their generations; this an eternal redemption to be celebrated in the praises of glorious saints, world without end.

43. And the Lord said unto Moses and Aaron, This is the ordinance of the passover: There shall no stranger eat thereof: 44. But every man's servant that is bought for money, when thou hast circumcised him, then shall he eat thereof. 45. A foreigner and a hired servant shall not eat thereof. 46. In one house shall it be eaten: thou shalt not carry forth aught of the flesh abroad out of the house; neither shall ye break a bone thereof. 47. All the congregation of Israel shall keep it. 48. And when a stranger shall sojourn with thee, and will keep the passover to the Lord, let all his males be circumcised, and then let him come near and keep it; and he shall be as one that is born in the land: for no uncircumcised person shall eat thereof. 49. One law shall be to him that is home-born, and unto the stranger that sojourneth among you. 50. Thus did all the children of Israel: as the Lord commanded Moses and Aaron, so did they. 51. And it came to pass, the self-same day, that the Lord did bring the children of Israel out of the land of Egypt by their armies.

Some further precepts are here given concerning the passover, as it should be observed in times to come. 1. All the congregation of Israel must keep it, v. 47. All that share in God's mercies should join in thankful praises for them. Though it was observed in families apart, yet it is looked upon as the act of the whole congregation; for the lesser communities constituted the greater. The New-Testament passover, the Lord's supper, ought not to be neglected by any who are capable of celebrating it. He is unworthy the name of an Israelite that can contentedly neglect the commemoration of so great a deliverance. 2. No stranger that was uncircumcised might be admitted to eat of it, v. 43, 45, 48. None might sit at the table but those that came in by the door; nor may any now approach to the improving ordinance of the Lord's supper who have not first submitted to the initiating ordinance of baptism. We must be born again by the word, ere we can be nourished by it. Nor shall any partake of the benefit of Christ's sacrifice, or feast upon it, who are not first circumcised in heart, Coloss. 2. 11.

3. Any stranger that was circumcised might be welcomed to eat of the passover, even servants, v. 44. If, by circumcision, they would make themselves debtors to the law in its burdens, they were welcome to share in the joy of its solemn feasts, and not otherwise. Only it is intimated, (v. 48,) that those who were masters of families must not only be circumcised themselves, but have all their males circumcised too. If, in sincerity, and with that zeal which the thing requires and deserves, we give up ourselves to God, we shall, with ourselves, give up all we have to him, and do our utmost that all our may be his too. Here is an early indication of favour to the poor Gentiles, that the stranger, if circumcised, stands upon the same level with the home-born Israelite. One law for both, v. 49. This was a mortification to the Jews, and taught them that it was their dedication to God, not their descent from Abraham, that entitled them to their privileges. A sincere proselyte was as welcome to the passover as a native Israelite, Isa. 56. 6, 7.

4. In one house shall it be eaten, (v. 46,) for good-fellowship-sake, that they might rejoice together, and edify one another in the eating of it. None of it must be carried to another place or to another time; for God would not have them so taken up with care about their departure, as to be indisposed to take the comfort of it, but to leave Egypt, and enter upon a wilderness, with cheerfulness, and, in token of that, to eat a good hearty meal. The Pagists' carrying of their consecrated host from house to house, is not only superstitions in itself, but contrary to this typical law of the passover, which was, that no part of the lamb should be carried abroad.

The chapter concludes with a repetition of the whole matter, that the children of Israel did as they were bidden, and God did for them as he promised; (v. 50, 51,) for he will certainly be the Author of salvation to them that obey him.

CHAP. XIII.

In this chapter we have, I. The commands God gave to Israel, 1. To sanctify all the first born to him, v. 1, 2. To be his and remember their deliverance out of Egypt, (v. 3, 4,) and, in remembrance of it, to keep the feast of unleavened bread, v. 5-7. 3. To transmit the knowledge of it with all possible care to their children, v. 8, 9. To set apart unto God the firstlings of their cattle, (v. 11, 18,) and to explain that also to their children, v. 14-16. II. The care God took of Israel, when he had brought them out of Egypt. 1. Choosing their way for them, v. 17, 18, 2. Guiding them in the way, v. 20, 22. And their care of Joseph's bones, v. 19.

1. And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying, 2. Sanctify unto me all the first born, whatsoever openeth the womb among the children of Israel, both of man and of beast: it is mine. 3. And Moses said unto the people, Remember this day, in which ye came out from Egypt, out of the house of bondage; for by strength of hand the Lord brought you out from this place: there shall no leavened bread be eaten. 4. This day came ye out, in the month Abib. 5. And it shall be, when the Lord shall bring thee into the land of the Canaanites, and the Hittites, and the Amorites, and the Hivites, and the Jebusites, which he sware unto thy fathers to give thee, a land flowing with milk and honey, that thou shalt keep this service in this month. 6. Seven days thou shalt eat unleavened bread, and in the seventh day shall be a feast to the Lord. 7. Unleavened bread shall be eaten seven days: and there shall no leavened bread be seen with thee; neither shall there be leaven seen with thee in all thy quarters. 8. And thou shalt show thy son in that day, saying, This is done because of that which the Lord did unto me when I came forth out of Egypt. 9. And it shall be for a sign unto thee upon thine hand, and for a memorial between thine eyes; that the Lord's law may be in thy mouth: for with a strong hand hath the Lord brought thee out of Egypt. 10. Thou shalt therefore keep this ordinance in his season from year to year.

11. Of the preservation of Israel's first-born, when the first-born of the Egyptians were slain. In memory of that distinguishing favour, and in gratitude for it, the first-born, in all ages, were to be consecrated to God, as his peculiar, (v. 2.) and to be redeemed, (v. 13.) God, who, by the right of creation, is Proprietor and Sovereign of all the creatures, here lays claim in particular to the first-born of the Israelites, by right of protection; Sanctify to me all the first-born. The parents were not to look upon themselves as interested in their first-born, till they had first solemnly presented them to God, recognized his title to them, and received them back, at a certain rate, from him again. Note, 1. That which is, by special distinguishing mercy, spared to us, should be, in a peculiar manner, dedicated to God's honour; at least, some grateful acknowledgment, in works of piety and charity, should be made, when our lives have been given us as a prey, or the lives of our children. 2. God, who is the First and Best, should have the first and best, and to him we should resign that which is most dear to us, and most valuable. The first-born were the joy and hope of their families; Therefore they shall be mine, says God. By this it will appear that we love God best, (as we ought,) if we are willing to part with that to him, which we love best in this world. 3. It is the church of the first-born, that is sanctified to God, Heb. 12. 23. Christ is the First-born among many brethren; (Rom. 8. 29.) and by virtue of their union with him, all that are born again, and born from above, are accounted as first-born. There is an excellency of dignity and power belonging to them; and, if children, then heirs.

12. The remembrance of their coming out of Egypt must also be perpetuated; (v. 3.) Remember this day. Remember it by a good token, as the most remarkable day of your lives, the birth-day of your nation, or the day of its coming of age, to be no longer under the rod. Thus the day of Christ's resurrection is to be remembered, for in it we were raised up with Christ out of death's house of bondage. The scripture tells us not expressly, what day of the year Christ rose, (as Moses told the Israelites what day of the year they were brought out of Egypt, that they might remember it yearly) but very particularly what day of the week it was; plainly intimating, that, as the more valuable deliverance, and of greater importance, it should be remembered weekly. Remember it, for by strength of hand the Lord brought you out. Note, The more of God and his power appears in any deliverance, the more memorable it is. Now, that it might be remembered,

1. They must be sure to keep the feast of unleavened bread, v. 5. 7. It was not enough that they remembered it, but they must celebrate the memorial of it in that way which God had appointed, and use the instituted means of preserving the remembrance of it. So, under the gospel, we must not only remember Christ, but do this in remembrance of him. Observe how strict the prohibition of leaven is; (v. 7.) not only, no leaven must be eaten, but none must be seen, no not in all their quarters. Accordingly, the Jews' usage was, before the feast of the passover, to cast all the leavened bread out of their houses: they either burnt it, or buried it, or broke it small, and scattered it in the wind; they searched diligently with lighted candles in all the corners of their houses, lest any leaven should remain. The care and strictness enjoined in this matter were designed, (1.) To make the feast the more solemn, and consequently the more taken notice of by their children, who would ask, Why is so much ado made? (2.) To teach us how solicitous we should be to put away from us all sin, 1 Cor. 5. 7.

13. They must instruct their children in the meaning of it, and relate to them the story of their deliverance out of Egypt, v. 8. Note, (1.) Care must be taken betimes to instruct children in the knowledge of God. Here is an ancient law for catechising. (2.) It is particularly of great use to acquaint children betimes with the stories of the scripture, and to make them familiar to them. (3.) It is a debt we owe to the honour of God, and to the benefit of our children's souls, to tell them of the great works God has done for his church, both those which we have seen with our eyes done in our day, and which we have heard with our ears, and our fathers have told us: Thou shalt show thy son in that day, the day of the feast, these things. When they were celebrating the ordinance, they must explain it. Every thing is beautiful in its season. The passover is appointed for a sign, and for a memorial, that the Lord's love may be in thy mouth. Note, We must retain the remembrance of God's works, that we may remain under the influence of God's law. And those that have God's law in their heart, should have it in their mouth, and be often speaking of it, the more to affect themselves, and to instruct others.

14. And it shall be, when the Lord shall bring thee into the land of the Caanaanites, as he sware unto thee and to thy fathers, and shall give it thee, 12. That thou shalt set apart unto the Lord all that openeth the matrix, and every firstling that cometh of a beast which thou hast; the males shall be the Lord's. 13. And every firstling of an ass thou shalt redeem with a lamb; and if thou wilt not redeem it, then thou shalt break his neck; and all the first-born of man among thy children shalt thou redeem. 14. And it shall be, when thy son asketh thee in time to come, saying, What is this? that thou shalt say unto him, By strength of hand the Lord brought us out from Egypt, from the house of bondage: 15. And it came to pass, when Pharaoh would hardly let us go, that the Lord slew all the first-born in the land of Egypt, both the first-born of man, and the first-born of beasts: therefore I sacrifice to the Lord all that openeth the matrix, being males; but all the first-born of my children I redeem. 16. And it shall be for a token upon thine hand, and for frontlets between thine eyes: for by strength of hand the Lord brought us forth out of Egypt.

Here we have,

1. Further directions concerning the dedicating of the first-born to God. (1.) The firstlings of their cattle were to be dedicated to God, as part of their possessions. Those of clean beasts, calves, lambs, and kids, if males, were to be sacrificed, Exod. 22. 30. Numb. 18. 17, 18. Those of unclean beasts, as colts, were to be redeemed with a lamb, or knocked on the head. For whatsoever is unclean, (as we all are by nature,) if it be not redeemed, will be destroyed, v. 11. 12. (2.) The first-born of their people were to be redeemed, and by no means sacrificed, as the Gentiles sacrificed their children to Moloch. The price of the redemption of the first-born was fixed by the law, (Numb. 18. 16.) five shekels: we were all obnoxious to the wrath and curse of God; by the blood of Christ we are redeemed, that we may be joined to the church of the first-born. They were to redeem their children, as well as the firstlings of the unclean beasts, for our children are by nature polluted; If he can bring a clean thing out of an unclean?

2. Further directions concerning the catechising of their children, and all those of the rising generation, from time to time in this matter. It is supposed that when they saw all the firstlings thus devoted, they would ask the meaning of it, and their parents and teachers must tell them the meaning of it; (v. 14. 16.) that God's special providence in their first-born, and all their firstlings, was founded in his special preservation of them from the sword of the destroying angel. Being thus delivered, they must serve him. Note, (1.) Children should be directed and encouraged to ask their parents questions concerning the things of God, a practice which would be perhaps of all others the most profitable way of catechising; and parents must furnish themselves with useful and suitable answers, and be ready always to give an answer to their inquiries. If ever the knowledge of God cover the earth, as the waters do the sea, the fountain of family instruction must first be broken up. (2.) We should all be able to show cause for what we do in religion. As sacraments are sanctified by the word, so they must be explained and understood by it. God's service is reasonableness, and it is conceivable when we perform it intelligently, knowing what we do, and why we do it. (3.) It must be observed, how often it is said in this chapter, that by strength of hand, (v. 3, 14. 16.) and with a strong hand, (v. 9.) the Lord brought them out of Egypt. The more opposition is given to the accomplishment of God's purposes, the more is his power magnified therein. Christ's service is reasonableness, and it is conceivable when we perform it intelligently, knowing what we do, and why we do it. (4.) Their posterity that should be born in Canaan, are directed to say, The Lord brought us out of Egypt, v. 14, 16. Mercy to our fathers are mercies to us; we reap the benefit of them, and therefore must keep up a grateful remembrance of them. We stand upon the bottom of former deliverances, and were in the loins of our ancestors when they were delivered. Much more reason have we to say, that in the death and resurrection of Jesus Christ we were redeemed.

17. And it came to pass, when Pharaoh had let the people go, that God led them not through the way of the land of the Philistines, although that was near; for God said, Lest peradventure the people repent when they see war, and they return to Egypt: 18. But God led the people about, through the way of the wilderness of the Red Sea. And the children of Israel went up harnessed out of the land of Egypt. 19. And Moses took the bones of Joseph with him; for he had straitly sworn the children of Israel, saying, God will surely visit you; and ye shall carry up my bones away hence with you. 20. And they took their journey from Succoth, and encamped in Etham, in the edge of the wilderness. 21. And the Lord went before them by day in a pillar of a cloud, to lead them the way; and by night in a pillar of fire, to give them light; to go by day and night. 22. He took not away the pillar of the cloud by day, nor the pillar of fire by night, from before the people.

Here is,

1. The choice God made of their way, v. 17, 18. He was their Guide, Moses gave them direction but as he received it from the Lord. Note, The way of man is not in himself, Jer. 10. 23. He may devise his way, and design it; but, after all, it is God that directs his steps, Prov. 16. 9. Man foresees, but God disposes; and in his disposal we must acquiesce, and set ourselves to follow Providence.

There were two ways from Egypt to Canaan. One was a short cut from the north of Egypt to the south of Canaan, perhaps about four or five days' journey; the other was much further about, through the wilderness, and that was the way which God chose to lead his people thither. It may be said,

1. There were many reasons why God led them through the way of the wilderness of the Red-sea. The Egyptians were to be drowned in the Red-sea, the Israelites were to be humbled and proved in the wilderness, Deut. 8. 2. God had given it to Moses for a sign, (eb. 3. 12.) be shall serve God in this mountain. They had again and again told Pharaoh, that they must go three days' journey into the wilderness to do sacrifice, and therefore it was requisite that they should bend their march that way, else they had justly been exclaimed against as notorious dissemblers. Before they entered the lists with their enemies, matters must be settled between them and their God, laws must be given, ordinances instituted, covenants sealed, the original contract ratified, and, for the doing of this, it was necessary that they should be led into a wilderness, the only closet for such a crowd; the high road would be no proper place for these transactions. It is said, (Deut. 32. 10.) He led them about, some hundreds of miles about, and yet, (Ps. 107. 7.) He led them forth by the right way; God's way is the right way, though it seems about. If we think he leads not his people the nearest way, yet we may be sure he leads them the best way, and so it will appear when we come to our journey's end. Judge nothing before the time.
2. There was one reason why God did not lead them the nearest way, which would have brought them after a few days march to the land of the Philistines; (for it was that part of Canaan that lay next to Egypt;) that reason was, Because they were not as yet fit for war, much less fit for war with the Philistines, v. 17. Their spirits were broken with slavery, it would not be easy for them to turn their hands against their brethren. The Philistines were formidable enemies, too fierce to be encountered by raw recruits; it was more suitable that they should begin with the Amalekites, and be prepared for the wars of Canaan, by experiencing the difficulties of the wilderness. Note, God proportions his people’s trials to their strength, and will not suffer them to be tempted above what they are able to bear. They were well armed with the foregoing verses, will seem to refer to this event, as an instance of. God knows our frame, and considers our weakness and faint-heartedness, and by lesser trials will prepare us for greater. God is said to bring Israel out of Egypt as the eagle brings up her young ones, (Deut. 32. 11.) teaching them by degrees to fly.

Orders being thus given which way they should go, and what they should do; they went up themselves not as a confused rout, but in good order, rank and file, they went up harnessed, v. 18. They went up by five in a rank, so some; in five squadrons, so others. They marched like an army with banners, which added much to their strength and honour. (2.) That they took the bones of Joseph along with them, (v. 19.) and probably, the bones of the rest of Jacob’s sons, unless (as some think) they had been privately carried to Canaan, (Acts 7. 16.) as several as they died. Joseph had particularly appointed that his bones should be carried up, when God should visit them, (Gen. 50. 25, 26.) so that their carrying up of his bones, was not only a performance of the oath their fathers had sworn to Joseph, but an acknowledgment of the performance of God’s promise to them by Joseph, that he would visit them, and bring them out of the land of Egypt; and an encouragement to their faith and hope, that he would fulfil the other part of the promise, which was, to bring them to Canaan, in expectation of which, they carried these bones with them while they wandered in the desert; they might think, “Joseph’s bones must rest at last, and then we shall.” Moses is said to take these bones with him; Moses was now a very great man; so had Joseph been in his day, yet he was now but a box full of dry bones; that was all that remained of him in this world, which might serve for a monitor to Moses, to remember his mortality. I have said, Ye are gods; it was said to Moses expressly, (ch. 7. 1.) but ye shall die like men.

II. Here is the guidance they were blessed with in the way; (v. 21, 22.) The Lord went before them in a pillar. In the two first stages, it was enough that God directed Moses whither to march, he knew the country and the road well enough. But now that they were come to the edge of the wilderness, (v. 20.) they would have occasion for a guide; and a good guide they had, one that was infinitely wise, kind, and faithful; The Lord went before them, the Shechaniah, or appearance of the divine Majesty, which was typical of Christ, or a previous manifestation of the eternal Word, which, in the fullest fullness of time, and for good and for our sakes, was made to dwell among us. Christ was with the church in the wilderness, 1 Cor. 10. 9. Now their king passed before them, even the Lord on the head of them, Mic. 2. 13. Note, Those whom God brings into a wilderness, he will not leave nor lose there, but will take care to lead them through it; we may well think it was a very great satisfaction to Moses and the pious Israelites, to be sure that they were under divine guidance. They needed not to fear missing their way, who were thus led, or being lost, who were thus directed; they needed not to fear being nighted, who were thus illuminated, nor being robbed, who were thus protected. They who make the glory of God their end, and the word of God their rule, the Spirit of God the guide of their affections, and the things of God the objects of their affairs, may be confident that the Lord goes before them, as truly as he went before Israel in the wilderness, though not so sensibly; we must live by faith.

1. They had sensible evidences of God’s going before them. They all saw an appearance from heaven of a pillar, which, in the bright day, appeared cloud, and, in the dark night, appeared fire; and this was the same with the testimony of the Lord’s presence, in the cloud in the wilderness, and in the cloud and fire on Mount Sinai. This was the token of his approbation of their conduct, and of his presence with them in their affairs, and of his protecting them, and of his being with them, as truly as he went before Israel in the wilderness, though not so sensibly; we must live by faith. 2. They had sensible effects of God’s going before them in this pillar. For, (1.) It led them the way in that vast howling wilderness, in which there was no road, no track, no way-mark, of which they had no maps, through which they had no guides. When they marched, this pillar went before them, at the rate that they could follow, and appointed the place of their encampment, as Infinite Wisdom saw fit; which both reassured them from care, and secured them from danger, both of the rocks and of the wild beasts. It sheltered them by day from the heat, which, at some times of the year, was extreme. (2.) It gave them light by night when they had occasion for it, and, at all times, made their camp pleasant, and the wilderness they were in less frightful.

III. These were constant, standing miracles; (v. 22.) He took not away the pillar of cloud; no, not when they seemed to have less occasion for it, travelling through inhabited countries, nor when they murmured and were provoking; it never left them, till it brought them to the borders of Canaan. It was a cloud which the wind could not scatter. This favour is acknowledged with thankfulness long after, Neh. 9. 19. Ps. 78. 14. There was something spiritual in this pillar of cloud and fire. 1. The children of Israel were bap tized unto Moses in this cloud, which, some think, distilled dew upon them, 1 Cor. 10. 2. By coming under this cloud, they signified their putting of themselves under the divine guidance and command by the ministry of Moses. Protection draws allegiance; this cloud was the badge of God’s protection, and so became the bond of their allegiance. Thus they were initiated, and admitted under that government, now when they were entering upon the wilderness; and make that cloud a type of Christ. The cloud of his human nature was a cloud to the light and fire of his divine nature; we find him, (Rev. 10. 1.) clothed with a cloud, and his feet as pillars of fire. Christ is our Way, the Light of our way, and the Guide of it. 3. It signifies the special conduct and protection which the church of Christ is under in this world. God himself is the Keeper of Israel, and he neither slumbers nor sleeps, Ps. 121. 4. Isa. 27. 3. There is a defence created, not only on Zion’s assemblies, but on every dwelling-place in Zion. See Isa. 4. 5, 6. Nay, every Israelite indeed is hidden under the shadow of God’s wings; (Ps. 17. 8.) angels, whose ministry was made use of in this cloud, are employed for their good, and pitch their tents about them. EXODUS, XIV.

CHAP. XIV.

The departure of the children of Israel out of Egypt (which was indeed the birth of the church) is made yet more memorable by further works of wonder, which were wrought immediately upon it. Witness the records of this chapter, the contents whereof, together with a key to it, we have,

1. Moses and the Lord spake unto Moses, saying, 2. Speak unto the children of Israel, that they turn and encamp before Pihahiroth, between Migdol and the sea, over against Baal-zephon; before it shall ye encamp by the sea. 3. For Pharaoh will say of the children of Israel, They are entangled in the land, the wilderness hath shut them in. 4. And I will harden Pharaoh's heart, that he shall follow after them; and I will be honoured upon Pharaoh, and upon all his host; that the Egyptians may know that I am the Lord. And they did so. 5. And it was told the king of Egypt that the people fled: and the heart of Pharaoh and of his servants was turned against the people, and they said, Why have we done this, that we have let Israel go from serving us? 6. And he made ready his chariot, and took his people with him: 7. And he took six hundred chosen chariots, and all the chariots of Egypt, and captains over every one of them. 8. And the Lord hardened the heart of Pharaoh king of Egypt, and he pursued after the children of Israel: and the children of Israel went out with a high hand. 9. But the Egyptians pursued after them, (all the horses and chariots of Pharaoh and his horsemen, and his army,) and overtook them encamping by the sea, beside Pihahiroth, before Baal-zephon.

We have here,

1. Instructions given to Moses concerning Israel's motions and encampments, which were so very surprising, that if Moses had not had express orders about them before, they would scarcely have been persuaded to follow the pillar of cloud and fire. That therefore there might be no scruple or dissatisfaction about it, Moses is told before,

1. Whether they must go, v. 1. 2. They were got to the edge of the wilderness, (ch. 13. 20.) and a stage or two more would have brought them to Horeb, the place appointed for their serving God; but, instead of going forward, they are ordered to turn short off, on the right hand from Canaan, and so march towards the Red-sea. Where the instruction was given, at Etham, there was no sea in their way to obstruct their passage, but God himself orders them into straits, which might give them an assurance, that when his purposes were served, he would without fail bring them out of those straits. Note, God sometimes raises difficulties in the way of the salvation of his people, that he may have the glory of subduing them, and helping his people over them.

2. What God designed in these straits. Moses would have yielded an implicit obedience, though he had given him no reason; but shall he hide from Moses the thing that he does? No, Moses shall know, (1.) That Pharaoh has a design to ruin Israel, v. 3. (2.) That therefore God has a design to ruin Pharaoh, and he takes this way to effect it, v. 4. Pharaoh's sagacity would conclude that some enchantments were at work; and so, would become an easy prey to him; that he might be more apt to think so, God orders them into yet greater entanglements; also by turning them so much out of their road, he amazes him yet more, and gives him further occasion to suppose that they were in a state of embarrassment and danger. And thus (says God) I will be honoured upon Pharaoh. Note, [1.] All men being made for the honour of their Maker, those who are not, is he not honoured by, he will be honoured upon. [2.] What seems to tend to the church's ruin, is often overruled to the ruin of the church's enemies, whose pride and malice are fed by Providence, that they may be ripened for destruction.

11. Pharaoh's pursuit of Israel, in which, while he gratifies his own malice and revenge, he is furthering the accomplishment of God's counsels concerning him. It was told him that the people fled, v. 5. Such a fright was he in, when he gave them leave to go, that when the fright was a little over, he either forgot, or would not own, that they departed with his consent, and therefore was willing that it should be represented to him as a revolt from their allegiance. Thus what may easily be justified, is easily condemned, by putting false colours upon it. Now, how it was,

He reflects upon it with regret, that he had connived at their departure. He and his servants, though it was with the greatest reason in the world that they had let Israel go, yet were now angry with themselves for it; Why have we done thus? (1.) It vexed them that Israel had their liberty, that they had lost the profit of their labours, and the pleasure of chastising them. It is meat and drink to men to be the ministers of their own destruction. Where they themselves are, as they were, entangled upon the wents of the Most High, and say to their souls, How down, that we may go over; and therefore it vexes them to have their hands tied. Note, The liberty of God's people is a heavy grievance to their enemies, Esth. 5. 12, 13. Acts 5. 17, 33. (2.) It aggravated the vexation, that they themselves had consented to it, thinking now, that they might have hindered it, and that they might have, as they did, though they had staid it out to the last extremity. Thus God makes men's envy and rage against his people, a torment to themselves, Ps. 112. 10. It was well-done to let Israel go, and what they would have reflected on with comfort, if they had done it from an honest principle; but, in doing it by constraint, they called themselves a thousand fools for doing it, and basely wished it undone again. Note, It is very common, but very absurd and criminal, for people to repent of their good deeds; their justice and charity, and even their repentance, are repented of. See an instance somewhat like this, Jer. 34, 10, 11.

2. He resolves, if possible, either to reduce them, or to be avenged on them; in order to that, he levies an army, musters all his force of chariots and horsemen, v. 17, 18. (for, it should seem, he took no foot w.th him, because the king's business required haste,) and thus he doubts not but he shall re-enslave them, v. 6, 7. It is easy to imagine what a rage Pharaoh was in, roaring like a lion disappointed of his prey; how his proud heart aggravated the affront, swelled with indignation, scornd to be baffled, longed to be avenged: and now, all the plagues are as if they had never been, he has quite forgotten the sorrowful funerals of his first-born, he can think of nothing but making Israel feel his resentments; now he thinks he can be too hard for God himself; for, otherwise, could he have hoped to conquer a people so dear to him? God gave him up to all these passions of his own heart, and so hardened it. It is said, (v. 8.) The children of Israel went out with a high hand, that is, with a great deal of courage and bravery, triumphing in the enlargement, and resolved to break through the difficulties that lay in their way.

But the Egyptians (v. 9.) pursued after them. Note, Those that in giving up of the world, and forgetting all the difficulties and dangers of the Christian life, godly in Christ Jesus, must expect to be set upon by Satan's temptations and terrors. He will not tamely part with any out of his service, nor go out without raging, Mark 9. 26.

10. And when Pharaoh drew nigh, the children of Israel lift up their eyes, and, behold, the Egyptians marched after them; and they were sore afraid: and the children of Israel cried out unto the Lord. 11. And they said unto Moses, Because there were no graves in Egypt, hast thou taken us away to die in the wilderness? wherefore hast thou dealt thus with us, to carry us forth out of Egypt? 12. Is not this the word that we did tell thee in Egypt, saying, Let us alone, that we may serve the Egyptians? for it had been better for us to serve the Egyptians, than that we should die in the wilderness. 13. And Moses said unto the people, Fear ye not, stand still, and see the salvation of the Lord, which he will show to you to-day: for the Egyptians whom ye have seen to-day, ye shall see them again no more for ever: 14. The Lord shall fight for you, and ye shall hold your peace.

We have here,

I. The fright that the children of Israel were in, when they perceived that Pharaoh pursued them, v. 10. They knew very well the strength and rage of the enemy, and their own weakness; numerous indeed they were, but all foot, unarmed, undis- ciplined, disquieted by long servitude, and (which was worst of all,) now penned up by the situation of their turners, so that they could not make their escape. On one hand was Pi-hahiroth, a range of craggy rocks impassable; on the other hand were Migdol and Baal-zephon, which, some think, were forts and garrisons upon the frontiers of Egypt; before them was the sea, behind them were the Egyptians, so that there was no way open for them but upward, and then their deliverance came. Note, We may be in the way of our duty, following God, and hastening toward heaven, and yet may be in great straits, troubled on every side, 2 Cor. 4, 8.

In this distress, no marvel that they were sore afraid, their father Jacob was so in a like case; (Gen. 32, 7.) when without are fightings, it cannot be otherwise, but that within are fears: what therefore was the fruit of this fear? According as that was, the fear was good or evil. 1. Some of them cried out unto the Lord; their fear set them a praying, and that was a good effect of it. God brings us into straits, that he may bring us to our knees. 2. Others of them cried out against Moses; their fear set them a murmuring, v. 11, 12. They give up themselves for lost, and as if God's arm were shortened all of a sudden, and he were not as able to work miracle for them as before, that despair of deliverance, and can count upon nothing but dying in the wilderness. How inexcusable was their distrust! Did they not see themselves under the guidance and protection of a pillar from heaven? And can athy power fail them, or infinite goodness be false to them? Yet this was not the worst; they quarrel with Moses for bringing them out of Egypt, and, in quarrelling with him, fly in their face to God, as if they were not his people, and harden their hearts. A generous spirit would have said, "If the worst come to the worst," (as we say,) "it is better to die in the field of honour, than to live in the chains of slavery;" nay, under God's conduct, they could not miscarry, and therefore they might say, "Better live God's freemen in the open air of a wilderness, than the Egyptians' bondmen in the smoke of the brick-kilns." But because, for the present, they are in a little fear, they are angry that they were not left buried alive in their house of bondage.

2. Base ingratitude to Moses, who had been the faithful instrument of their deliverance; they con- demn him, as if he had dealt hardly and unkindly with them, whereas it was evident, beyond dispute, that whatever he did, and however it issued, it was by direction from their God, and with design for their good. What they had said in a former instance, (when the day before he was restless for any guish of spirit,) they repeat and justify in this; We said in Egypt, Let us alone; and it was ill-said, yet more excusable, because then they had not had so much experience as they had now of God's wonderful appearances in their favour. But they had as soon forgotten the miracles of mercy, as the Egyptians had forgotten the miracles of wrath; and they, as well as the Egyptians, had hardened their hearts, at last to their own ruin; as Egypt, after ten plagues, was so Israel, after ten provocations, of which this was the first, (Num. 14, 22.) was sentenced to die in the wilderness.

II. The seasonable encouragement that Moses gave them in this distress, v. 13, 14. He answered not these fools according to their folly. God bore with the provocation they gave to him, and did not (as he might justly have done) choose their delu- sions, and bring their fears upon them; and therefore Moses might well afford to pass by the affront they put upon him; instead of chiding them, hecomforts them, and with an admirable presence and composure of mind, not disheartened either by the threatenings of Egypt, or the tremblings of Israel, stills their murmuring, with the assurance of a speedy and complete deliverance; Fear ye not. Note, It is our duty and interest, when we cannot get out of our troubles, yet to get above our fears, so that they may only serve to quicken our prayers and endeavours, but may not prevail to silence our faith and hope.

2. He assures them that God would deliver them; that he would undertake their deliverance; (The Lord shall fight for you,) and that he would effect it in the utter ruin of their pursuers. This, Moses was confident of himself, and would have them to be so, though as yet he knew not how or which way it would be brought to pass. God had assured him that Pharaoh and his host should be ruined, and he comforts them with the same comforts with which he had been comforted.

2. He directs them to leave it to God, in a silent expectation of the event; "Stand still, and think not to save yourselves either by fighting or flying; wait God's orders, and observe them; be not contriving what course to take, but follow your leader; wait God's appearances, and take notice of them, that you may see how foolish you are to distrust them. Compose yourselves, by an entire confidence in God, into a peaceful prospect of the great salvation God is now about to work for you. Hold your peace; you need not so much as give a shout against the enemy, as Josh. 6. 16. The work shall be done without any concurrence of your's." Note, (1.) If God himself bring his people into straits, he will himself discover a way to bring them out again. (2.) In times of great difficulty and great expectation, it is our wisdom to keep our spirits calm, quiet, and sedate; for then we are in the best frame both to do our own work, and to consider the work of God. Your strength is 'to sit still,' (Isa. 30. 7.) for the Egyptians shall help in vain, and threaten to hurt in vain.

15. And the Lord said unto Moses, Wherefore criest thou unto me? speak unto the children of Israel, that they go forward: 16. But lift thou up thy rod, and stretch out thine hand over the sea, and divide it; and the children of Israel shall go on dry ground through the midst of the sea. 17. And I, behold, I will harden the hearts of the Egyptians, and they shall follow them: and I will get me honour upon Pharaoh, and upon all his host, upon his chariots, and upon his horsemen. 18. And the Egyptians shall know that I am the Lord, when I have gotten me honour upon Pharaoh, upon his chariots, and upon his horsemen. 19. And the angel of God, which went before the camp of Israel, removed, and went behind them; and the pillar of the cloud went from before their face, and stood behind them: 20. And it came between the camp of the Egyptians and the camp of Israel; and it was a cloud and darkness to them, but it gave light by night to these: so that the one came not near the other all the night.

We have here,

1. Direction given to Israel's leader.

1. What he must do himself; he must, for the present, leave off praying, and apply himself to his business; (v. 15.) Wherefore criest thou unto me? Moses, though he was assured of a good issue to the present distress, yet did not neglect prayer. We read not of one word he said in prayer, but he lifted up to God his heart, the language of which God well understood, and took notice of. Moses' silent prayers of faith prevailed more with God, than Isaac's loud cries of fear. (Gen. 22.) Praying, of the right kind, is crying to God, which denotes it to be the language, both of a natural and of an important desire. (2.) There may be true crying to God by prayer, where the voice is not heard, as Hannah's, 1 Sam. 1. 13. But is God displeased with Moses for praying? No, he asks this question, Wherefore criest thou unto me? [1.] To satisfy his faith. Wherefore, shouldst thou be displeased with me, when it is already granted; enough is said, speak no more of this matter; I have accepted thy prayer:" so the Chaldee explains it. [2.] To quicken his diligence. Moses had something else to do besides praying, he was to command the hosts of Israel, and it was now requisite that he should be at his post. Everything is beautiful in its season.

2. What he must order Israel to do; Speak to them, that they go forward. Some think that Moses had prayed, not so much for their deliverance, (he was assured of that,) as for the pardon of their murmuring; and that God's ordering them to go forward was an intimation of the pardon. There is no going forward with any comfort, but in the sense of our reconciliation to God. Moses had bidden them stand still, and expect orders from God; and now these orders are given. 'They thought they must have been directed either to the right hand or to the left. "No," says God, "speak to them to go forward, directly to the sea-side;" as if there had lain a fleet of transport-ships ready for them to embark in. Note, When we are in the way of our duty, though we meet with difficulties, we must go forward, and not stand in mute astonishment; we must mind present work, and then leave the event to God; use means, and trust him with the issue.

3. What he might expect God to do. Let the children of Israel go as far as they can, upon dry ground, and then God will divide the sea, and open a passage for them through it, v. 16... 18. God designs, not only to deliver the Israelites, but to destroy the Egyptians; and the plan of his counsels is accordingly. (1.) He will show favour to Israel, and provide water for them; and for this reason, v. 16. Note, (2.) He will let them have honour upon Pharaoh, if the due rent of honour be not paid to the great Lord, by and from whom we have and hold our beings and comforts, he will restrain for it, and recover it. God will be a loser by no man. In order to this, it is threatened, (v. 17.) I, behold I, will harden Pharaoh's heart. The manner of expression is observable; I, behold I, will do it. I, that is, to each of them with the language of Pharaoh, if we may not contribute to the hardening of any man's heart, nor withhold any thing that we can do toward the softening of it; but God's grace is his own, he hath mercy on whom he will have mercy, and whom he will, he hardeneth. 1, that can do it; so it is the language of his power; none but the Almighty can make the heart soft, (Job 23. 16.) nor can any other being make it hard. 2, that will do it; it is the language of his justice; it is a righteous thing with God, to put those under the impressions of his Ah, it even and II. The wheels, sea and cmd hypocrites.

It is spoken in a way of triumph over this obstinate and presumptuous rebel; "I, even I, will take an effectual course to humble him; he shall break, that would not bend." It is an expression like that, (Isa. 1. 24.) Ah, I will ease me of mine adversaries.

II. A guard set upon Israel's camp there where it now lay most exposed, which was in the rear, v. 19, 20. The angel of God, whose ministry was made use of in the pillar of cloud and fire, went from before the camp of Israel, where they did not move more wide, (there was no danger of missing their way through the sea, nor needed they any other word of command than to go forward,) and it came behind them, where now they needed a guard, (the Egyptians being just ready to seize the hindmost of them,) and so was a wall or partition between them. There, it was of use to the Israelites, not only to protect them, but to light them, through the sea, and, at the same time, it confounded the Egyptians, so that they lost the sight of their prey just then when they were ready to lay hands on it. The word and providence of God have a black and dark side toward sin and sinners, but a bright and pleasant side toward those that are Israelites indeed. That which is a suavor of life unto to some, is a suavor of death unto death to others. This was not the first time that He, who in the beginning divided between light and darkness, (Gen. 1. 4.) and still forms both, (Isa. 45. 7.) had, at the same time, allotted darkness to the Egyptians, and light to the Israelites; a specimen of the endless distinction which will be made between the inheritance of the saints in light, and that utter darkness which for ever will be the portion of hypocrites. God will separate between the precious and the vile.

21. And Moses stretched out his hand over the sea; and the Lord caused the sea to go back by a strong east wind all that night, and made the sea dry land, and the waters were divided. 22. And the children of Israel went into the midst of the sea upon the dry ground: and the waters were a wall unto them on their right hand and on their left. 23. And the Egyptians pursued, and went in after them to the midst of the sea, even all Pharaoh's horses, his chariots, and his horsemen. 24. And it came to pass, that in the morning-watch the Lord looked unto the host of the Egyptians through the pillar of fire and of the cloud, and troubled the host of the Egyptians, 25. And took off their chariot-wheels, that they drave them heavily: so that the Egyptians said, Let us flee from the face of Israel; for the Lord fighteth for them against the Egyptians. 26. And the Lord said unto Moses, Stretch out thine hand over the sea, that the waters may come again upon the Egyptians, upon their chariots, and upon their horsemen. 27. And Moses stretched forth his hand over the sea, and the sea returned to his strength when the morning appeared; and the Egyptians fled against it; and the Lord overthrew the Egyptians in the midst of the sea.

28. And the waters returned, and covered the chariots, and the horsemen, and all the host of Pharaoh that came into the sea after them: there remained not so much as one of them. 29. But the children of Israel walked upon dry land in the midst of the sea; and the waters were a wall unto them on their right hand, and on their left. 30. Thus the Lord saved Israel that day out of the hand of the Egyptians; and Israel saw the Egyptians dead upon the sea-shore. 31. And Israel saw that great work which the Lord did upon the Egyptians: and the people feared the Lord, and believed the Lord and his servant Moses.

We have here the history of that work of wonder, which is so often mentioned both in the Old and New Testament, the dividing of the Red-sea before the children of Israel. It was the terror of the Canaanites, (Josh. 2. 9. 10.) the praise and triumph of the Israelites, Ps. 114. 3.—106. 9.—136. 13, 14. It was a type of baptism, 1 Cor. 10. 1. 2. Israel's passage through it was typical of the total ruin of all impudent sinners, Rev. 20. 14. Here is,

I. An instance of God's almighty power, in the kingdom of nature, in dividing the sea, and opening a passage through the waters. It was a bay, or gulf, or arm of the sea, two or three leagues over, which was divided, v. 21. The instituted sign made use of was, Moses's stretching out his hand over it, to signify that it was done in answer to his prayer, for the confirmation of his mission, and in favour to the people which he led. The natural sign was a strong east-wind, signifying that it was done by the power of God, whom the winds and the seas obey. If there be any passage in the book of Job, which has reference to the miracles wrought for Israel's deliverance out of Egypt, it is that, (Job 26. 12.) He divideth the sea with his power, and by his understanding he smiteth through Rahab, (so the word is,) that is,rstrip. No, God can bring his people through the greatest difficulties, and force a way where he does not find it. The God of nature has not tied himself to its laws, but, when he pleaseth, dispenses with them, and then the fire does not burn, nor the water flow.

II. An instance of his wondrous favour to his Israel. They went through the sea to the opposite shore, (for I cannot suppose, with some, that they fetched a circuit and came out again on the same side,) v. 22. They walked upon dry land in the midst of the sea, v. 29. And the pillar of cloud, that glory of the Lord, being their re-ward, Isa. 38. 8. (that the Egyptians might not charge them in the flank,) the waters were a wall to them, (it is twice mentioned,) on their right hand, and on their left. Moses and Aaron, it is probable, went first into the midst of the sea, and led all Israel after them; and this march through the paths of the great waters would make their march afterward, through the wilderness, less formidable. They who had followed God through the sea, needed not to fear following him whithersoever he led them. This march through the sea was in the night, and not a moon-shiny night, for it was seven days after the full moon, so that they had no light of what they had from the pillar of cloud and fire. This made it the more awful; but where God leads, us, he will light us; while we follow his conduct, we shall not want his comforts. This was done, and recorded, in order to encourage God's people in all ages to trust in him in the greatest straits. What cannot he do, who did this? What will not he do for these that fear and love him, who did this for these murmuring unbelieving Israelites, who yet were beloved for their fathers' sake, and for the sake of a remnant among them? We find the saints, long afterward, making themselves sharers in the triumph of this march. (Isa. 26.) They went through the flood on foot, there did we rejoice in him: and see how this work of wonder is improved, Ps. 77. 11, 16, 19.

III. An instance of his just and righteous wrath upon his and his people's enemies, the Egyptians. Observe here,

1. How they were insatiable; in the heat of their pursuit, they went in after the Israelites into the midst of trouble, to be "case of Why," thought they, "no more will we venture where Israel did?" Once or twice, the magicians of Egypt had done what Moses did, with their enchantments; Pharaoh remembered that, but forgot how they were non-plussed at last. They were more advantageously provided with chariots and horses, while the Israelites were on foot. Pharaoh had said, I know not the Lord; and by this it appeared he did not, else he would not have ventured upon an enterprise that are blind. Rage against Israel made them thus daring and inconsiderate: they had long hardened their own hearts; and now God hardened them to their ruin, and h d from their eyes the things that belonged to their peace and safety. Surely in vain is the net spread in the sight of any bird; (Prov. 1. 17.) yet so blind were the Egyptians, that they hastened to the snare, Prov. 7. 20. Note, The ruin of sin is sought on by their own presumption, which Hurries them headlong into the pit. They are self-destructors.

2. How they were troubled and perplexed, v. 24. For some hours, they marched through the divided waters as safely and triumphantly as Israel did, not doubting but that, in a little time, they should gain their point. But in the morning-watch, the Lord struck the host of the Egyptians, and troubled them. Something or other they saw or heard from the pillar of cloud and fire, which put them into great consternation, and gave them an apprehension of their ruin, before it was brought upon them. Now it appeared that the triumphing of the wicked is short, and that God has ways to frighten sinners into despair, before he plunges them into destruction. He cuts off the spirit of princes, and is terrible in the earth. (1.) They had hectored and boasted, as if the day were their own; but now they were troubled and dismayed, struck with a panic fear. (2.) They had driven furiously; but now they drove heavily, and found themselves plunged and embarrassed at every step, the way grew deep, their hearts grew sad, their wheels dropped off, and the axe-trees failed. Thus can God work in the wilder of Egypt, and make the wheels of Egypt fall. (3.) They had been flying upon the back of Israel, as the hawk upon the trembling dove; but now they cried, Let us flee from the face of Israel, which was become to them like a torch of fire in a sheaf, Zech. 12. 6. Israel is now, all of a sudden, become as much a terror to them, as they had been to Israel. They might have got Israel, if they had adhered to it; but now they fly from the face of Israel and cannot. Men will not be convinced, till it is too late, that those who meddle with God's people, meddle to their own hurt; when the Lord shall come with ten thousands of his saints to execute judgment, the mighty men will in vain seek to shelter themselves under rocks and mountains from the face of Israel, and Israel's King, Rev. 6. 15. Compare with this story, Job 27. 20, 26, 28.

3. How they were all drowned; as soon as ever the children of Israel were got safe to the shore, Moses was ordered to stretch out his hand over the sea, and thereby give a signal to the waters to close again, as, before, upon the word of command, they had opened to the right and the left, v. 29. He did so, and immediately the waters returned to their place, and swallowed all the host of Egyptians, v. 27, 28. Pharaoh and his servants, who had hardened one another in sin, now fell together, and not one escaped. An ancient tradition says, that Pharaoh's magicians, Jannes and Jambres, perished with the rest, as Balaam with the Midianites whom he had seduced, Num. 31. 8. And now, (1.) God avenged upon the Egyptians the blood of the first-born whom they had drowned; and the principle is repaid with interest, it is recompensed double, full-grown Egyptians for new-born Israelites; thus the Lord is righteous, and precious is his people's blood in his sight, Ps. 72. 14. (2.) God reckoned with Pharaoh for all his proud and insolent conduct toward Moses his ambassador; mocking the messengers of the Lord, and playing the fool with them, bring ruin without remedy: now God give him honour, Rev. 19. 14. ring upon his praise and drowning him, Job 40. 12. Come and see the desolations he made, and write it, not in water, but with an iron pen in the rock for ever. Here lies that bloody tyrant who bid defiance to his Maker, to his demands, threatenings, and judgments; a rebel to God, and a slave to his own barbarous passions; perfectly lost to humanity, virtue, and all true honour; here he lies, buried in the deep, a perpetual monument of divine justice. Here he went down to the pit, though he was a terror of the mighty in the land of the living. This is Pharaoh and all his multitude, Ezek. 31. 18.

IV. Here is the notice which the Israelites took of this wonderful work which God wrought for them, and the good impressions which it made upon them, for the present.

1. The Egyptians dead upon the sands, v. 30. Providence so ordered it, that the next tide threw up the dead bodies, (1.) For the greater disgrace of the Egyptians. Now the beasts and birds of prey were called to eat the flesh of the captains and mighty men, Rev. 19. 17, 18. The Egyptians were very nice and curious in embalming and preserving the bodies of their great men, but here the utmost contempt is poured upon all the grandees of Egypt; see how they lie, heaps upon heaps, as dung upon the face of the earth. (2.) For the greater triumph of the Israelites, and to affect them the more with their deliverance; for the eye affects the heart. See Isa. 66. 24, They shall go forth, and look upon the carcases of the men that have transgressed against me. Probably, they stripped the slain, and, having borrowed jewels of their neighbours, they took them to ornament the Egyptians having by this hostile pursuit of them broken their faith with them) from henceforward they were not under any obligation to restore, they now got arms from them, which, some think, they were not before provided with. Thus when God broke the heads of Leviathan in pieces, he gave him to be meat to the people, Ps. 74. 14. Pharaoh.

2. The sight of this great work greatly affected them, and now they feared the Lord and believed the Lord, and his servant Moses, v. 31. Now they were ashamed of their distrusts and murmuring, and, in the good mind they were in, they would never again despair of help from Heaven, nor not in the greatest straits; they would never again quar-
In this chapter, 1. Israel looks back upon Egypt with a song of praise for their deliverance. Here is 1. The song of Moses, v. 1-19. 2. The solemn singing of it, v. 20, 21. II. Israel marches forward in the wilderness, (v. 22.) and there, 1. Their discontent at the waters of Marah, (v. 23, 24.) and the relief granted them, v. 25, 26. 2. Their satisfaction in the waters of Elim, v. 27.

Then sang Moses and the children of Israel this song unto the Lord, and spake, saying, I will sing unto the Lord, for he hath triumphed gloriously: the horse and his rider hath he thrown into the sea. 2. The Lord is my strength and song, and he is become my salvation: he is my God, and I will prepare him a habitation; my father's God, and I will exalt him. 3. The Lord is a man of war: the Lord is his name. 4. Pharaoh's chariots and his host he cast into the sea: his chosen captains also are drowned in the Red Sea. 5. The depths have covered them: they sank into the bottom as a stone. 6. Thy right hand, O Lord, is become glorious in power: thy right hand, O Lord, hast dashed in pieces the enemy. 7. And in the greatness of thine excellency thou hast overthrown them that rose up against thee: thou sentest forth thy wrath, which consumed them as stubble. 8. And with the blast of thy nostrils the waters were gathered together: the floods stood upright as a heap, and the depths were congealed in the heart of the sea. 9. The enemy said, I will pursue, I will overtake, I will divide the spoil; my lust shall be satisfied upon them; I will draw my sword, my hand shall destroy them. 10. Thou didst blow with thy wind, the sea covered them; they sank as lead in the mighty waters. 11. Who is like unto thee, O Lord, among the gods? who is like thee, glorious in holiness, fearful in praises, doing wonders? 12. Thou stretchedst out thy right hand, the earth swallowed them. 13. Thou in thy mercy hast led forth the people which thou hast redeemed: thou hast guided them in thy strength unto thy holy habitation. 14. The people shall hear, and be afraid: sorrow shall take hold on the inhabitants of Palestina. 15. Then the dukes of Edom shall be amazed; the mighty men of Moab, trembling shall take hold upon them: all the inhabitants of Canaan shall melt away. 16. Fear and dread shall fall upon them: by the greatness of thine arm they shall be as still as a stone; till thy people pass over, O Lord, till the people pass over which thou hast purchased. 17. Thou shalt bring them in, and plant them in the mountain of thine inheritance, in the place, O Lord, which thou hast made for thee to dwell in; in the sanctuary, O Lord, which thy hands have established. 18. The Lord shall reign for ever and ever. 19. For the horse of Pharaoh went in with his chariots and with his horsemen into the sea, and the Lord brought again the waters of the sea upon them: but the children of Israel went on dry land in the midst of the sea. 20. And Miriam the prophetess, the sister of Aaron, took a timbrel in her hand; and all the women went out after her with timbrels and with dances. 21. And Miriam answered them, Sing ye to the Lord, for he hath triumphed gloriously; the horse and his rider hath he thrown into the sea. Having read how that complete victory of Israel over the Egyptians was obtained, here we are told how it was celebrated; they that were to hold their peace while the deliverance was in working, (ch. 14. 14.) must not hold their peace now that it was wrought: the less they had to do then, the more they had to do now; if God accomplisht deliverance by his own immediate power, it redeems so much the more to his glory. Moses, no doubt, by divine inspiration, indited this song, and delivered it to the children of Israel, to be sung before they stirred from the place where they saw the Egyptians dead upon the shore. Observe, 1. They expressed their joy in God, and thankfulness to him, by singing; it is almost natural to us thus to give vent to our joy, and the exultations of our spirit. By this instance it appears, that the singing of psalms, as an act of religious worship, was in use in the church of Christ before the giving the ceremonial law, therefore was no part of it, nor abolished with it; singing is as much the language of holy joy, as praying is of holy desire. 2. Moses, who had gone before them through the sea, goes before them in the song, and composes it for them. Note, Those that are active in public services, should not be neutrals in public privileges. 3. Where this song was used, and they were much affected with it; then they sang this song. Note, When we have received special mercy from God, we ought to be quick and speedy in our returns of praise to him, before time and the deceitfulness of our own hearts efface the good impressions that have been made. David sang his triumphant song in the day that the Lord delivered him, 2 Sam. 22. 1. Bis dat, qui dat dat. —He gives twice, who gives quickly. 4. When they believed the Lord, (ch. 14. 31.) then they sang this song: it was a song of faith; this connexion is observed, (Ps. 105. 12.) Then believed they his words, they sang his praise: if with the heart man believes, thus confession must be made.

Here is,

1. The song itself: and it is, 1. An ancient song, the most ancient that we know of. 2. A most admirable composition, the style lofty and magnificent, the imagery lively and picturesque, and the whole very moving. 3. It is a holy song, consecrated to the honour of God, and intended to exalt his name, and celebrate his praise, and his only, not in the least to magnify any man: holiness to the Lord is engraven on it, and to him they made melody in the singing of it. 4. It is a typical song. The triumphs of the gospel-church, in the downfall of its enemies, are expressed in the song of Moses and the song of the Lamb put together, which songs are said to be sung upon a sea of glass, as this was upon the Red-sea, Rev. 15. 2, 3.

Let us observe what Moses chiefly aims at in this song.

(1.) He gives glory to God, and triumphs in him; this is first in his intention; (v. 1.) I will sing unto the Lord. Note, All our joy must terminate in God, and our praise. 33, 34. Deut. 32. 32., 39. The Lord, in triumphs; what is his honour, should be our joy. Israelites rejoice in God, v. 2. [1.] As their own God, and therefore their strength, song, and salvation: happy therefore the people whose God is the Lord, they need no more to make them happy; they have work to do, temptations to grapple with, and afflictions to bear, and are we in themselves; but he strengthens them, his grace is their strength. They are often in sorrow, upon many accounts, but in him they have comfort; it is their song; sin, and death, and hell, threaten them, but he is, and will be, their salvation; see Isa. 12. 2. [2.] As their fathers' God. This they take notice of, because, being conscious to themselves of their own unworthiness and provocations, they had reason to think that what God had now done for them was for their fathers' sake, Deut. 4. 37. Note, The children of the covenant ought to improve their fathers' relation to God as their God, for comfort, for caution, and for quickening. [3.] As a God of infinite power; (v. 3.) The Lord is a man of war, that is, well able to deal with all those that strive with their Maker, and will certainly be too hard for them. [4.] As a God victorious and incomparable in perfection; (v. 11.) Whose right hand doth discover God among the gods? This is pure praise, and a high expression of humble adoration. It is, First, a challenge to all other gods to compare with him: "Let them stand forth, and pretend their utmost; none of them dare make the comparison." Egypt was notorious for the multitude of its gods, but the God of the Hebrews was too hard for them, and baffled their wiles, Ex. 8. 8. 9, 21. The princes and potentates of the world are called gods, but they are feeble and mortal, none of them all comparable to Jehovah the almighty and eternal God. Secondly, It is a confession of his infinite perfection, as transcendental and unpalliated. Note, God is to be worshipped and adored as a Being of such infinite perfection, that there is none like him, nor comparable with him. If there be any thing in the things has, and must have, the pre-eminence, Ps. 89. 6. More particularly, 1. He is glorious in holiness: his holiness is his glory. It is that attribute which angels adore, Isa. 6. 3. His holiness appeared in the appearance of Pharaoh, his hatred of sin, and his wrath against obstinate sinners. It appeared in the deliverance of Israel, his delight in the holy seed, and his faithfulness to his own promise. God is rich in mercy, that is his treasure, glorious in holiness, that is his honour. Let us always give thanks at the remembrance of his holiness. 2. He is fearful in praises; that is the matter of our praise, though it is joyful to the servants of God, is dreadful and very terrible to his enemies, Ps. 66. 1, 3. Or, it directs us in the manner of our praising God; we should praise him with a humble, holy, and reverent spirit, and even our spiritual joy and triumph must be balanced with a religious fear. 3. He is doing wonders, wondrous to all, being above the power, and out of the common course, of nature; especially wondrous to us, in whose favour they are wrought, who are so unworthy, that we had little reason to expect them. They were wonders of power, and wonders of grace; in both God was to be humbly adored. (2.) He describes thedeliverance they were now triumphing in; because the song was intended, not only to express and excite their thankfulness for the present, but to preserve and perpetuate the remembrance of this work of wonder to after-ages.

Two things were to be taken notice of:

1. The destruction of the enemy; the waters were divided, v. 5. The floods stood upright as a heap, Pharaoh and all his hosts were buried in the waters. (v. 1.) The chariots, and the chosen captains; (v. 4.) they themselves went into the sea, and there they were overwhelmed, v. 19. The depths, the sea, covered them, and the proud waters went over the proud sinners, they sank like a stone, like lead, (v. 5, 10.) under the weight of their own guilt and God's wrath. Their sin had made them hard like stones, and now they justly sink like a stone. Nay, the earth itself swallowed them; (v. 12.) their dead bodies sank into the sands upon which they were thrown up, which sucked them in. Those whom the Creator fights against, the whole creation is at war with. All this was the Lord's doing, and his only. It was an act of his power; Thy right hand, O Lord, not our's, has dashed in pieces the enemy, v. 6. It was with the blast of thy nostrils, (v. 8.) and thy wind, (v. 10.) and the stretching out of thy right hand, v. 12. It was an instance of his transcendent power, (v. 7.) in the greatness of thine excellency; and it was the execution of his justice, Thou sentest forth thy wrath, v. 7. This destruction of the Egyptians was made the more remarkable by their pride and insolence, and their strange assurance of success; (v. 9.) The enemy said, I will pursue. Here is, First, Great confidence; when they were too sure, and too confident, they should overtake, and when they overtake, they do not question but they shall overcome, and obtain so decisive a victory as to divide the spoil. Note, It is common for men to be most elated with the hopes of success, when they are upon the brink of ruin, which makes their ruin so much the sorrier. See Isa. 37. 24, 25. Secondly, Great cruelty; nothing but destruction, and even extermination, would have satisfied his lust; and a barbarous lust that is, which so much blood must be the satisfaction of. Note, It is a cruel hatred with which the church is hated; its enemies are bloody men. This is taken notice of here, to show, 1. That God resists the proud, and delights to humble those who lift up themselves; he that says, I will, of course, that I will, is, in the estimation of God, "It is impossible that I should be angry with him, and that I should deal proudly, God is above him. 2. That those who thirst for blood shall have enough of it. They who love to be destroying, shall be destroyed, for we know who has said, Vengeance is mine, I will repay. [2.] The protection and guidance of Israel; (v. 13.) Thou in the midst hast led forth the people: led them forth out of the bondage of Egypt, led them forth out of the perils of the Red-sea, v. 19.
But the children of Israel went on dry land. Note, The destruction of the wicked serves for a foil to set off the goodness of God, and to make it the more illustrious, {Isa. 45. 13. 15.}

(3.) He sets himself to improve this wonderful appearance of God for them. [1.] In order to quicken them to serve God; in consideration of this, (v. 2.) I will prepare him a habitation. God having preserved them, and prepared a covert for them under which they had been safe and easy, the very terrors of Egypt were no cost or pains for the erecting of a tabernacle to his honour, and there they will exalt him, and mention, to his praise, the honour he had got upon Pharaoh. God had now exalted them, making them great and high, and therefore they will exalt him, by speaking of his infinite height and grandeur. Note, Our constant endeavour should be, by praising his name and serving his interests, to exalt God: and it is an advancement to us to be so employed. [2.] In order to encourage them to trust in God: so confident is this psalmist of the happy issue of the salvation which was so gloriously begun, that he looks upon it as in effect finished already; (v. 13.) "Thou hast guided me to thy holy habitation. Thou hast thus put them into the way to it, and wilt in due time bring them to the end of that way," for God's work is perfect. [3.] In order to quicken them to serve God, and be ready to serve any, (v. 14.) "Thou hast guided them to attend the holy habitation in heaven with their praises." Note, Those whom God takes under his direction, he will guide to his holy habitation, in faith now, and in fruition shortly.

Two ways, this great deliverance was encouraging.

First, It was such an instance of God's power, as would certify their enemies, and quite dishearten them, (v. 14. 15.) The very terrors of the overthrow of the Egyptians would be more than half the overthrow of all their other enemies; it would sink their spirits, and that would go far toward the sinking of their powers and interests; the Phinisees, Moabites, Edomites, and Canaanites, (with each of which nations Israel was to grapple,) would be alarmed by it, would be quite dispirited, and would conclude it was in vain to fight against Israel, when a God of such power stood forth to smite them. It had this effect; the Edomites were afraid of them, (Deut. 2. 4.) so were the Moabites, (Num. 22. 3.) and the Canaanites, Josh. 2. 9. 10. 11. Thus God sent his fear before them, (ch. 23. 27.) and cut off the spirit of princes.

Secondly, It was such a beginning of God's favour to them, as gave them an earnest of the perfection of his kindness. This was but in order to something further; (v. 17.) "Thou shalt bring them in. If he thus bring them out of Egypt, notwithstanding their unworthiness, and the difficulties that lay in the way of their escape, doubtless, he will bring them into Canaan; for he has begun, (so begun,) and will he not make an end? Note, Our experiences of God's power and favour should be integrally of our expectations; "Thou hast—therefore not only thou hast done it, but we trust thou wilt," is good arguing. Observe, Thou wilt plant them in the place where thou hast made for thee to dwell in. Note, It is good dwelling where God dwells, in his church on earth, (Ps. 27. 4.) in his church in heaven, John 17. 24. When he says, "This is my rest for ever," we should say, "Let it be ours."

Lastly, The great ground of the encouragement, which they draw from this work of wonder, is, v. 18. The Lord shall reign for ever and ever. They had now seen an end of Pharaoh's reign; but time itself shall not put a period to Jehovah's reign, which, like himself, is eternal, and not subject to change. Note, It is the unspeakable comfort of all God's faithful subjects, not only that he does reign universally, and with an incontestable sovereignty, but that he will reign eternally, and there shall be no end of his dominion.

II. The solemn singing of this song, v. 20. 21. Miriam (or Mary, it is the same name) presided in an assembly of the women, who, (according to the softness of their sex, and the common usage of those times for expressing joy) with timbrels and dances sang this song. Moses led the psalm, and gave it out for the men, and then Miriam for the women. Their famous victories were wont to be applauded by the daughters of Israel; (1 Sam. 16. 6.) so was this: when God brought Israel out of Egypt, it is said, (Mic. 6. 4.) He sent before them Moses, Aaron, and Miriam, though we read not of any thing remarkable that Miriam did but this. But those are to be reckoned great blessings to a people, who assist them, and go before them, in praising God.

22. So Moses brought Israel from the Red Sea; and they went out into the wilderness of Shur: and they went three days in the wilderness, and found no water. 23. And when they came to Marah, they could not drink of the waters of Marah, for they were bitter: therefore the name of it was called Marah. 24. And the people murmured against Moses, saying, What shall we drink? 25. And he cried unto the Lord; and the Lord showed him a tree, which when he had cast into the waters, the waters were made sweet; there made for them a statute and an ordinance, and there he proved them, 26. And said, If thou wilt diligently hearken to the voice of the Lord thy God, and wilt do that which is right in his sight, and wilt give ear to his commandments, and keep all his statutes, I will put none of these diseases upon thee, which I have brought upon the Egyptians for I am the Lord that healeth thee. 27. And they came to Elim, where were twelve wells of water, and threescore and ten palm-trees: and they encamped there by the waters.

It should seem, it was with some difficulty that Moses prevailed with Israel to leave that triumphal shore on which they sang the foregoing song. They were so taken up either with the sight, or with the song, or with the spoiling of the dead bodies, that they cared not to go forward, but Moses with much ado brought them from the Red-sea into a wilderness: the pleasures of our way to Canaan must not retard our progress, but quicken it, though we have a wilderness before us. Now here were told,

I. That in the wilderness of Shur they had no water, v. 22. This was a sore trial to the young travellers, and an allay to their joy; thus God would train them up to difficulties; David, in a dry and thirsty land where no water is, reaches forth toward God, Ps. 63. 1.

II. That at Marah they had water, but it was bitter, so that though they had been three days without water, they could not drink it, either because it was extremely unpleasant to the taste, or was likely to be prejudicial to their health, or was so brackish, that it would rather nauseate than agree with them. This is termed by the Hebrew, וּכְסּוֹמִית, casting up the waters, Deut. 29. 21. Note, God can imbibe that to us from which we promise ourselves most satisfaction, and often does so in the wilderness of this world, that our wants and disappointments in the creature may drive us to the Creator, in whose favour alone true comfort is to be had. Now in this distress,

2. Moses prayed; (v. 25.) He cried unto the Lord. The complaints which they brought to him, he brought to God, on whom, notwithstanding his elevation, Moses owned a constant dependence. Note, It is the greatest relief of the cares of magistrates and ministers, when they, under their charge make them uneasy, that they may have recourse to God by prayer: he is the Guide of the church's guides; and to him, as the Chief Shepherd, the under-shepherds must upon all occasions apply.

3. God provided graciously for them; he directed Moses to a tree which he cast into the waters; in consequence of which, all a sudden, they were made to drink, and find therein a virtue in it for this purpose, because it is said, God showed him the tree. God is to be acknowledged, not only in the creating of things useful for man, but in discovering their usefulness. Or perhaps this was only a sign, and not at all a means, of the cure, any more than the brazen serpent, or Elisha's casting one cruise full of salt into the waters of Jericho. So make this tree typical of the cross of Christ, which sweetens the bitter waters of affliction to all the faithful, and enables them to rejoice in tribulation. The Jews' tradition is, that the word of this tree was itself bitter, yet it sweetened the waters of Marah; the bitterness of Christ's sufferings and death alters the property of cur's.

4. Upon this occasion, God came upon terms with them, and plainly told them, now that they were got clear of the Egyptians, and were entered into the Promised Land, that they were under their second or new commandment, and that according as they carried themselves, so it would be well or ill with them; there he made a statute and an ordinance, and settled matters with them; there he forsook them, that is, there he put them up n the trial, admitted them as probationers for his favour. In short, he tells them, v. 26. (1.) What he expected from them, and that was, in one word, obedience. They must diligently hearken to his voice, and give ear to his commandments, that they might know their duty, and not transgress through ignorance; and they must take care in every thing to do that which was right in God's sight, and to keep all his statutes. They must not think, now that they were delivered from their bondage in Egypt, that they had no lord over them, but were their own masters; no, therefore they must look upon themselves as God's servants, because he had loosed their bonds, Ps. 116. 16. Luke, 1. 74, 75. (2.) What they might then expect from him; I will put none of these diseases upon thee, that is, "I will not bring upon thee any of the plagues of Egypt." This intimates, that, if they were rebellious and disobedient, the very plagues which they had seen inflicted upon their enemies, should be brought upon them; so it is threatened, Deut. 28. 60. God's judgments upon Egypt, as they were mercies to Israel, opening the way to their deliverance, so they were warnings to Israel, and designed to awe them into obedience. Let not the Israelites think, because God had thus highly honoured them in the great things he had done for them, and had proclaimed them to all the world his favourites, that therefore he would con-walk in my law or no. 5. And it shall come to pass, that on the sixth day they shall prepare that which they bring in; and it shall be twice as much as they gather daily. 6. And Moses and Aaron said unto all the children of Israel, At even, then ye shall know that the Lord hath brought you out from the land of Egypt; 7. And in the morning, then ye shall see the glory of the Lord; for that he heareth your murmurings against the Lord: and what are we, that ye murmur against us? 8. And Moses said, This shall be, when the Lord shall give you in the evening flesh to eat, and in the morning bread to the full; for that the Lord heareth your murmurings against the Lord: and what are we, that ye murmur against us? 9. And Moses spake unto Aaron, Say unto all the congregation of the children of Israel, Come near before the Lord; for he hath heard your murmurings. 10. And it came to pass, as Aaron spake unto the whole congregation of the children of Israel, that they looked toward the wilderness, and, behold, the glory of the Lord appeared in the cloud. 11. And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying, 12. I have heard the murmurings of the children of Israel: speak unto them, saying, At even ye shall eat flesh, and in the morning ye shall be filled with bread; and ye shall know that I am the Lord your God.

The host of Israel, it seems, took along with them out of Egypt, when they came thence on the fifteenth day of the first month, a month's provisions, which, by the fifteenth day of the second month, was all spent; and here we have,

I. Their discontent and murmuring upon that occasion, v. 2, 3. The whole congregation, the greatest part of them, joined in this mutiny; it was not immediately against God that they murmured, but (which was equivalent) against Moses and Aaron, God's vicerogents among them. 1. They counterfeited being killed in the wilderness; nothing less, at the first appearance of disaster. If the Lord had been pleased to kill them, he could easily have done that in the Red sea; but then he preserved them, and now could as easily provide for them. It argues great distrust of God, and of his power and goodness, in every distress and appearance of danger to deprive of life, and to talk of nothing but being speedily killed. 2. They insinuated that they gave Moses with a design to starve them when he brought them out of Egypt; whereas, what he had done, was both by order from God, and with a design to promote their welfare. Note, It is no new thing for the greatest kindnesses to be misconstrued, and basely represented as the greatest injuries. The worst colours are sometimes put upon the best actions. Nay, 3. They so far undervalue their delivery, that they wished they had died in Egypt, and died by the hand of the Lord too, that is, by some of the plagues which cut off the Egyptians, as if it were not the hand of the Lord, but of Moses only, that brought them into this hungry wilderness. It is common for people to say of that pain, or sickness, or sore, of which they see not the second causes, "It was what pleases God," as if that were not so likewise which comes by the hand of some visible accident. Prodigious madness! They will rather die by the flesh-pots of Egypt, where they found themselves with provision, than live under the guidance of the heavenly pillar in a wilderness, and be provided for by the hand of God; they pronounce it better to have fallen in the destruction of God's enemies, than to bear the fatherly discipline of his children. Supply, then, and feed them; and yet great plenty in Egypt; how largely soever they now talk of the flesh-pots, nor could they fear dying for want in the wilderness, while they had their flocks and herds with them; but discontent magnifies what is past, and vilifies what is present, without regard to truth or reason. None talk more absurdly than murmurers. Their impatience, ingratitude, and dissatisfaction, turn the worse, insomuch as they had lately received such manifold favours, and convincing proofs, both that God could help them in the greatest exigencies, and that really he had mercy in store for them. See how soon they forgot his works, and provoked him at the sea, even at the Red sea. Ps. 106. 7, 13. Note, Experiences of God's mercies greatly aggravate our distrusts and murmuring.

II. The Lord graciously took for their supply; justly he might have said, "I will rain fire and brimstone upon these murmurers, and consume them;" but, quite contrary, he promises to raise bread upon them. Observe,

1. How God makes known to Moses his kind intentions, that he might not be uneasy at their murmurings, nor be tempted to wish he had let them alone in Egypt. (1.) He takes notice of the people's complaint; Moses, v. 12. (2.) He have had mercy upon his blasphemies and gross murmurings of the children of Israel, as a God of pity, he took cognizance of their necessity, which was the occasion of their murmuring; as a just and holy God, he took cognizance of their base and unworthy reflections upon his servant Moses, and was much displeased with them. Note, When we begin to fret and be uneasy, we ought to consider that God hears all our murmurings, though silent, and only the murmuring of the best part. (3.) He promises them a speedy, sufficient, and constant supply, v. 4. Man being made out of the earth, his Maker has wisely ordered him food out of the earth, Ps. 104. 14. But the people of Israel, typifying the church of the first-born that are written in heaven, and born from above, and being themselves immediately under the conduct and government of heaven, receiving the food of life, the manna, from heaven, from heaven also received their food: their law being given by the disposition of angels, they did also eat angels' food. See what God designed in making this provision for them, That I may prove them whether they will walk in my law or no. [1.] Thus he tried whether they would trust him, and walk in the law of faith or no; whether they could live from hand to mouth, and (though now uneasy because their provisions were spent) could rest satisfied with the bread of the day in its hand, and depend upon God for fresh supplies to-morrow. [2.] Thus he tried whether they would serve him, and be always faithful to so good a Master, that provided so well for his servants; and hereby he made it appear to all the world, in the issue, what an ungrateful people they were, whom nothing could affect with a sense of obligation. Let favour be showed to them, yet let them not learn righteousness, Isa. 26. 10.

2. How Moses made known these intentions to Israel, as God ordered him; here Aaron was prophet, as he had been to Pharaoh; Moses directed Aaron what to speak to the congregation of Israel; (v. 9.) and some think, that, while Aaron was giving a public summons to the congregation to come near before the Lord, Moses retired to pray, and that the appearance of the glory of the Lord, (v. 10.) was in answer to his prayer. They are called to come near to God, that they might be consoled in their afflictions; and may be comforted with their Maker. Let this for ever stop the mouth of murmuring, that it is daring impiety to murmur at God, because he is God, and gross absurdity to murmur at men, because they are but men.

12. He assures them of the supply of the wants of their souls; that, since they had harped upon the flesh-pots so much, they should for once have flesh in abundance that evening, and bread the next morning, and so on every day thenceforward, v. 8, 12. Many there are, of whom we say, that they are better fed than taught; but the Israelites were thus fed, that they might be taught; he led him about, he instructed him; (Deut. 32. 10.) and as to this instance, see Deut. 8. 3. New God sent them manna, to prove that it was no less than infinite power and goodness that brought them out, and that could perfect what was begun. If Moses only had brought them out of Egypt, he could not thus have fed them; they must therefore own that that was the Lord's doing, because this was so, and both were marvellous in their eyes; yet, long afterward, they needed to be told that. New God sent them manna, to prove that it was no less than infinite power and goodness that brought them out, and that could perfect what was begun. If Moses only had brought them out of Egypt, he could not thus have fed them; they must therefore own that that was the Lord's doing, because this was so, and both were marvellous in their eyes; yet, long afterward, they needed to be told that. John, 6. 32. [2.] By this ye shall know that I am the Lord your God, v. 12. This gave proof of his power as the Lord, and his particular favour to them as their God; when God plagued the Egyptians, it was to make them know that he was the Lord; when he provided for the Israelites, it was to make them know that he was their God.

3. How God hides his manifestation of glory, to still the murmuring of the people, and to put a reputation upon Moses and Aaron, v. 10. While Aaron was speaking, the glory of the Lord appeared in the cloud. The cloud itself, one would think, was enough both to strike an awe upon them, and to give encouragement to them; yet, in a few days, it was grown so familiar to them, that it made no impression upon them, unless it shone with an unusual brightness. Note, What God's ministers say to us, is then like to do good, when the glory of God shines in it upon our souls.

13. And it came to pass, that at even the quails came up, and covered the camp; and in the morning the dew lay round about the host. 14. And when the dew that lay was gone up, behold, upon the face of the wilderness there lay a small round thing, as small as the hoar-frost, on the ground. 15. And when the children of Israel saw it, they said one to another, It is manna: for they wist not what it was. And Moses said unto them, This is the bread which the Lord had given you to eat: 16. This is the thing which the Lord hath commanded: Gather of it every man according to his eating; an omer for every man: according to the number of your persons, take ye every man for them which are in his tents. 17. And the children of Israel did so, and gathered some more, some less. 18. And when they did mete it with an omer, he that gathered much had nothing over, and he that gathered little had no lack: they gathered every man according to his eating. 19. And Moses said, Let no man leave of it till the morning. 20. Notwithstanding they hearkened not unto Moses; but some of them left of it until the morning, and it bred worms, and stank; and Moses was wrath with them. 21. And they gathered it every morning, every man according to his eating: and when the sun waxed hot, it melted.

Now they begin to be provided for by the immediate hand of God.

1. He makes them a feast, at night, of delicate fowl; for he fed them; (Ps. 78. 27.) therefore not locusts, as some think; quails, or pheasants, or some wild fowl, came up, and covered the camp, so that they might take it up as many of them as they pleased. Note, God gives us of the good things of this life, not only for necessity, but for delight, that we may not only serve him, but serve him cheerfully.

2. Next morning, he raised manna upon them, which was to be continued to them for their daily bread.

1. That which was provided for them was manna, which descended from the clouds, so that, in some sense, they might be said to live upon the air. It came down in dew that melted, and yet was itself of such a consistency as to serve for nourishing strengthening food, without any thing else. They called it Manah, Manah, "What is this? Either, "What a poor thing this is!" despising it; or, "What a strange thing this is!" admiring it; or, "It is a portion, no matter what it is; it is that which our God has allotted us, and we will take it, and be thankful," v. 14, 15. It was pleasant food: the Jews say, it was palatable to all, however varied their tastes. * It was wholesome food, light of di-
20. Thus remaineth the portion of a day in his day; v. 4. Thus they must live upon daily providence, as the fowls of the air, and the children of the earth, and the most ungodly; (Ps. 104. 28.) not to-day for to-morrow, the Lord take thought for the things of itself. To this daily raining and gathering of manna our Saviour seems to allude, when he teaches us to pray, Give us this day our daily bread. We are hereby taught, (1.) Prudence and diligence in providing food convenient for ourselves and our households; what God graciously gives, we must industriously gather, with quietness and working, and eating our own bread, not the bread either of idleness or deceit. God's bounty leaves room for man's duty; it did so even when manna was rained, they must not eat till they have gathered. (2.) Contentment and satisfaction with a sufficiency; they must gather, every man according to his eating; enough is as good as a feast, and more than enough is as bad as a surfeit. They were not to have too much for themselves, but food, and raiment, and mirth; and God, at least, generally have these: so that he who gathers much has nothing over, and he who gathers little has no lack. There is not so great a disproportion between one and another, in the comforts and enjoyments of the things of this life, as there is in the property and possession of the things themselves. (3.) Dependence upon Providence; "Let no man lament to-morrow, (v. 19.) but let them turn to the Lord, and cry in their trouble; (Ps. 104. 28.) for the Lord is a hea.

22. And it came to pass, that on the sixth day, they gathered twice as much bread, two omers for one man; and all the rulers of the congregation came and told Moses. 23. And he said unto them, This is that which the Lord hath said, To-morrow is the rest of the holy sabbath unto the Lord; take that which you will bake to-day, and seethe that ye will seethe; and that which remaineth over lay up for you, to be kept until the morning. 24. And they laid it up till the morning, as Moses bade; and it did not stink, neither was there any worm therein. 25. And Moses said, Eat that to-day; for to-day is a sabbath unto the Lord; to-day ye shall not find it in the field. 26. Six days ye shall gather it; but on the seventh day, which is the sabbath, in it there shall be none. 27. And it came to pass, that there went out some of the people on the seventh day for to gather, and they found none. 28. And the Lord said unto Moses, How long refuse ye to keep my commandments and my laws? 29. See, for that the Lord hath given you the sabbath, therefore he giveth you on the sixth day the bread of two days: abide ye every man in his place; let no man go out of his place on the seventh day. 30. So the people rested on the seventh day. 31. And the house of Israel called the name thereof Manna; and it was like coriander-seed, white; and the taste of it was like wafers made with honey.

We have here,

1. A plain intimation of the observing of a seventh-day sabbath, not only before the giving of the law upon mount Sinai, but before the bringing of Israel out of Egypt, and therefore from the beginning, Gen. 2. 3. If the sabbath had now been first instituted, how could Moses have understood what God said to him, (v. 5.) concerning a double portion to be gathered on the sixth day, without making any express mention of the sabbath? And how could the people so readily take the hint, (v. 22.) even to the surprise of the rulers, before Moses had declared that it was done with a regard to the sabbath, if they had not had some knowledge of the sabbath before? The setting apart of one day in the seven for holy work, and, in order to that holy rest, was a divine appointment ever since God created the world, that all mankind might understand the positive nature of the law. The way of sabbath-sanctification is the good old way. 2. The double provision which God made for the Israelites, and which they were to make for themselves, on the sixth day; God gave them on the sixth day the bread of two days, v. 29. Appointing them to rest on the seventh day, he took care that they should be no losers by it; and none ever will be losers by serving God. On that day, they were to fetch in enough for two days, and to pre-
32. And Moses said, This is the thing which the Lord commandeth, Fill an omer of it, to be kept for your generations; that they may see the bread wherewith I have fed you in the wilderness, when I brought you forth from the land of Egypt. 33. And Moses said unto Aaron, Take a pot, and put an omer full of manna therein, and lay it up before the Lord, to be kept for your generations. 34. As the Lord commanded Moses, so Aaron laid it up before the testimony, to be kept. 35. And the children of Israel did eat manna forty years, until they came to a land inhabited: they did eat manna until they came unto the borders of the land of Canaan. 36. Now an omer is the tenth part of an ephah.

God having provided manna to be his people’s food in the wilderness, and to be to them a continual feast, we are here told,

1. How the memory of it was preserved; an omer of this manna was laid up in a golden pot, as we are told, (Heb. 9. 4.) and kept before the testimony, or the ark, when it was afterward made, v. 32...34. The preservation of this manna from waste and corruption was a standing miracle, and therefore the more proper memorial of this miraculous food.

"Posterity shall see the bread," says God, "where I have fed you in the wilderness;" see what sort of food it was, and how much each man’s daily portion of it was, that it might appear they were not kept to hard fare, nor to short allowance, and then judge between God and Israel, whether they had any cause given them to murmur, and find fault with their provisions, and whether they, and their seed after them, had not a great deal of reason gratefully to own God’s goodness to them. Note, Eaten bread must not be forgotten; God’s miracles and mercies are to be had in everlasting remembrance, for our encouragement to trust in him at all times.

2. How the mercy of it was continued as long as they had occasion for it. The manna never ceased till they came to the borders of Canaan, where there was bread enough and to spare, v. 35. See how constant the care of Providence is; seed time and harvest fail not, while the earth remains. Israel was very provoking in the wilderness, yet the manna never failed them: thus still God causes his rain to fall on the just and unjust.

The manna is called spiritual meat, (1 Cor. 10. 3.) because it was typical of spiritual blessings in heavenly things; Christ himself is the true Manna, the Bread of life, of which this was a figure, John, 6. 49...51. The word of God is the manna by which our souls are nourished, Matth. 4. 4. The comfort of the Spirit is hidden manna, Rev. 2. 17.

These come from heaven, as the manna did, and are the support and comfort of the divine life in the soul, while we are in the wilderness of this world. It is food for Israelites, for those only that follow the pillar of cloud and fire; it is to be gathered, Christ in the word is to be applied to the soul, and the means of grace are to be used; we must every one of us gather for ourselves, and gather, in the morning of our days, the manna of appointed opportunities, which if we let slip, it may be too late to gather. The manna they gathered must not be hoarded up, but eaten; they that have received Christ, must by faith live upon him, and not receive his grace in vain; there was manna enough for all, enough for each, and none had too much; so in Christ there is a complete sufficiency, and no superfluity. But they that did eat manna because at first they had no mind to it, and with many of them God was not well-pleased; whereas they that feed on Christ by faith shall never hunger, and shall die no more, and with them God will be for ever well-pleased; the Lord evermore give us this bread!

CHAP. XVII.

Two passages of story are recorded in this chapter, I. The watering of the host of Israel. 1. In the wilderness they wanted water, v. 1. 2. In their want, they chid with Moses, v. 2. 3. Moses ran to God, v. 4. 4. God ordered him to smite the rock, and fetch water out of that; Moses did so, v. 5. 6. The place named from it, v. 7. II. The defeating of the host of Amalek. 1. The victory gained by the sword of Joshua, v. 8. 2. By the sword of Josue, v. 13. 3. A record kept of it, v. 14...16. And these things which happened to them are written for our instruction, in our spiritual journey and warfare.

AND all the congregation of the children of Israel journeyed from the wilderness of Sin, after their journeys, according to the commandment of the Lord and pitched in Rephidim: and there was no water for the people to drink. 2. Wherefore the people did chide with Moses, and said, Give us water, that we may drink. And Moses said unto them, Why chide you with me? wherefore do ye tempt the Lord! 3. And the people thirsted there for water; and the people murmured against Moses, and said, Wherefore is this that thou hast brought us out of Egypt, to kill us and our children and our cattle with thirst? 4. And Moses cried unto the Lord, saying, What shall I do unto this people? they be almost ready to stone me. 5. And the Lord said unto Moses, Go on before the people, and take with thee of the elders of Israel; and thy rod, wherewith thou smitest the river, take in thine hand; and go. Behold, I will stand before thee there upon the rock in Horeb; and thou shalt smite the rock, and there shall come water out of it, that the people may drink. And Moses did so in the sight of the elders of Israel.

And he called the name of the place Massah, and Meribah, because of the chiding of the children of Israel, and because they tempted the Lord, saying, Is the Lord among us, or not?

Here is, I. The strait that the children of Israel were in, for want of water; once before, they were in the like distress, and now, a second time, v. 1. They journeyed according to the commandment of the Lord, led by the pillar of cloud and fire, and yet they came to a place where there was no water for them to drink. Note, We may be in the way of our duty, and yet may meet with troubles, which Providence brings us into, for the trial of our faith, and that God may be glorified in our relief.

II. Their discontent and distrust in this strait: it is said, (v. 3.) They thirsted there for water. If they had no water to drink, they must needs thirst; but this intimates not only that they wanted water, and felt the inconvenience of that want, but that their passions sharpened their appetites, and they were violent and impatient in their desire; their thirst made them, outrageous; natural desires, and those that are most craving, have need to be kept under the check and guidance of religion and reason.

See what was the language of this inordinate desire.

1. They challenged Moses to supply them; (v. 2.) Give us water, that we may drink, demanding it as a debt, and strongly suspecting that he was not able to discharge it. Because they were supplied with bread, they insist upon it, that they must be supplied with water too; and indeed to those that by faith and prayer live a life of dependence upon God, one favour is an earnest of another, and may be humbly pleaded; but the unthankful and unbelieving have reason to think that the abuse of former favours is the forfeiture of further favours; Let not them think that they shall receive any thing, (Jam. 1. 7.) yet they are ready to demand everything.

2. They quarrelled with him for bringing them out of Egypt, as if, instead of delivering them, he designed to murder them, than which nothing could be more base and invidious, v. 3. Many that have not only designed well, but done well, for their generation, have had their best services thus misconstrued, and their patience thereby tried, by unthinking unthankful people. To such a degree their malice against Moses rose, that they were almost ready to stone him, v. 4. Many good works he had showed them; and for which of these would they stone him? John, 10. 32. Ungoverned passions, provoked by the crossing of unbridled appetites, sometimes make men like, or even become, the authors of the greatest absurdities, and act like madmen, that cast fire-brands, arrows, and death, among their best friends.

3. They began to question whether God were with them or not; (v. 7.) They tempted the Lord, saying, "Is the Lord among us, or not? Is Jehovah among us by that name by which he made himself known to us in Egypt? They question his especial presence, which, unless common to the whole world, would be the argument of a special providence, whether that God governs the world; and his special promise, whether he would be as good as his word to them. This is called their tempting God, which signifies, not only a distrust of God in general, but a distrust of him after they had received such proofs of his power and goodness, for the confirmation of his promise: they do, in effect, suppose that Moses was an impostor—Aaron a deceiver—the pillar of cloud and fire a mere sham and illusion, which imposed upon their senses—that long series of miracles which had rescued them, served them, and fed them, a chain of cheats—and the promise of Canaan, a banquet upon them; it was all so, if the Lord was not among them. Note, It is a great provocation to God, for us to question his presence, providence, or promise, especially as the children of Israel to do it, who are so peculiarly bound to trust him.

III. The course that Moses took, when he was thus set upon and insulted. 1. He reproved the murmurers; (v. 2.) Why chide ye with me? Observe how mildly he answered them; it was well that he was a man of extraordinary meekness, else their tumultuous conduct would have made him lose the possession of himself: it is folly to answer passion with passion, then in anger to do as you would not be done unto; but soft answers turn away wrath: he showed them whom their murmurings reflected upon, and that the reproaches they cast on him fell on God himself: Ye tempt the Lord, that is, "By distrusting his power, ye try his patience, and so provoke his wrath." 2. He made his complaint to God; (v. 4.) Moses cried unto the Lord: this servant came, and showed his Lord all these things, Luke, 14. 21. When God gives an object to his people, they should consult with him, and if God agrees with them, he will back them. He pleads the occasion, and says, "I am almost ready to stone me; Lord, if thou hast any regard to the life of thy poor servant, interpose now." IV. God's gracious appearance for their relief, v. 5, 6. He orders Moses to go on before the people, and venture himself in his post, though they spake of stoning him. He must take his rod with him, not (as God might justly have ordered) to summarily be sentenced to death for thus misleading, distrust and murmuring, but to fetch water for their supply. Oh the wonderful patience and forbearance of God toward provoking sinners! He loads those with benefits, that make him to serve with their sins, maintains these that are at war with him, and reaches out the hand of his bounty to these that lift up the heel against him. Thus he teaches us, if our enemy hunger, to feed him, and if he thirst, as Israel did now, to give him drink, Rom, 12. 20. Matth. 5. 44, 45. Will he fall there that trust him, when he was so liberal even to those that tempted him? If God had only showed Moses a fountain of hand, Amalek prevailed. 12. But Moses' hands were heavy; and they took a stone, and put it under him, and he sat thereon:

and Aaron and Hur stayed up his hands, the one on the one side, and the other on the other side; and his hands were steady until the going down of the sun. 13. And Joshua discomfited Amalek and his people with the edge of the sword. 14. And the Lord said unto Moses, Write this for a memorial in a book, and rehearse it in the ears of Joshua; for I will utterly put out the remembrance of Amalek from under heaven. 15. And Moses built an altar, and called the name of it JEHOVAH-nissi. 16. For he said, Because the Lord hath sworn, that the Lord will have war with Amalek from generation to generation.

We have here the story of the war with Amalek, which, we may suppose, was the first that was recorded in the book of the wars of the Lord, Numb. 21. 14. Amalek was the first of the nations that Israel fought with, Numb. 24. 20. Observe,

I. Amalek's attempt; they came out, and fought with Israel, v. 8. The Amalekites were the posterity of Esau, who hated Jacob because of the birthright and blessing, and this was an effort of the hereditary enmity; a malice that ran in the blood, and perhaps was now exasperated, by the working of the promise towards an accomplishment. Consider this, 1. As Israel's affliction; they had been quarrelling with Moses, (v. 2.) and now God sends Amalekites to quarrel with them: wars abroad are the just punishment of strifes and discontents at home. 2. As Amalek's sin; so it is reckoned, Deut. 25. 17, 18. They did not boldly front them, as a generous enemy, but, without any provocation given by Israel, or challenge given to them, basely fell upon their rear, and smote those that were faint and feeble, and could neither make resistance, nor escape; wherein they bade defiance to that Power which had so lately subdued the Egyptians: but in vain did they attack a camp guarded and victualled by miracles; verily they knew not what they did.

II. Israel's engagement with Amalek, in their own necessary defence against the aggressors; and there,

1. The post assigned to Joshua, of whom this is the first mention: he is nominated commander in chief in this expedition, that he might be trained up to the services he was designed for, after the death of Moses, and be a man of war from his youth. He is ordered to draw out a detachment of choice men from the thousands of Israel, and to drive back the Amalekites, v. 9. When the Egyptians pursued them, Israel must stand still, and see what God would do; but now it was required that they should bestir themselves. Note, God is to be trusted in the use of means.

2. The post assumed by Moses, (v. 9.) I will stand on the top of the hill, with the rod of God in my hand. See how God qualifies his people for, and calls them to, various services for the good of his church; Joshua fights, Moses prays, and both minister to Israel. Moses went up to the top of the hill, and placed himself, probably, so as to be seen by Israel; there he held up the rod of God in his hand; that wonder-working rod which had summoned the plagues of Egypt, and under which Israel passed out of the house of bondage. This rod Moses held up, (1.) To Israel, to animate them; the rod was held up as the banner to encourage the soldiers, who might look up, and say, "Yonder is the rod, and yonder the hand that used it, when such glorious things were wrought for us." Note, It tends much to the encouragement of faith to reflect upon the great things God has done for us, and review the mercies of his providence. (2.) To save his Israel from the一只手 of their appeal to him: "Is not the battle the Lord's? Is not he able to help, and engaged to help? Witness this rod, the voice of which, thus held up, is that, (Isa. 51. 9, 10.) Put on strength, O arm of the Lord; art not thou that hath cut Rahab?" Moses was not only a standard-bearer, but an intercessor, pleading with God for success and victory. Note, When the host goes forth against an enemy, eager and praying prayers should be made to the God of hosts, for his presence with them. It is here the praying legion that proves the thundering legion. There, in Salem, in Zion where prayers were made, there, the victory was won, there brake he the arrows of the bow, Ps. 76, 2, 3.

Observe, [1.] How Moses was tired, (v. 12.) his hands were trembling, so the strongest arm will fail with being long extended; it is God only whose hand is stretched out still. We do not find that Joshua's hands were heavy in fighting, but Moses's hands were heavy in praying; the more spiritual any service is, the more apt we are to fail and flag in it; praying work, if done with due intenseness of mind and vigour of affection, will be found hard work, and though the spirit be willing, the flesh will be weak: our great Intercessor in heaven faints not, nor is he weary, though he attends continually to this very thing.

[2.] What influence the rod of Moses had upon the battle; (v. 11.) When Moses held up his hand in prayer, (so the Chaldee explains it,) Israel prevailed, but when he laid down his hand from prayer, Amalek prevailed. To convince Israel that the hand of Moses (with whom they had just now been chiding) contributed more to their safety than their own hands, his rod than their sword, the success rises and falls, as Moses lifts up or lets down his hands. It seems, the scale wavered for some time, before it turned on Israel's side; even the best cause must expect disappointments as an ally to its success; though the battle be the Lord's, Amalek may prevail for a time; the reason was, Moses let down his hands. Note, The church's cause is, commonly, more or less successful, according to the church's friends are more or less strong in faith, and fervent in prayer.

[3.] The care that was taken for the support of Moses. When he could not stand any longer, he sat down, not in a chair of state, but upon a stone; (v. 12.) when he could not hold up his hands, he would have them held up; Moses, the man of God, is glad of the assistance of Aaron his brother, and Hur, who, some think, was his brother-in-law, the husband of Miriam. We should not be shy, either of asking help from others, or giving help to others, for we are members one of another. Moses's hands, thus stayed, were steady till the going down of the sun; and though it was with much ado that he held out, yet his willing mind was accepted. No doubt, it was a great encouragement to the people to see Joshua before them in the field of battle, and Moses above them upon the top of the hill; Christ is both to us; our Joshua, the Captain of our salvation, who fights our battles, and our Moses, who, in the upper world, ever lives, making intercession that our faith fail not.

III. The defeat of Amalek. Victory had hovered awhile between the camp; sometimes Israel prevailed, and sometimes Amalek, but Israel carried the day, v. 13. Though Joshua fought with great disadvantages—his soldiers undisciplined, ill armed, long incurred to servitude, and apt to murmur; yet by them God wrought a great salvation, and made Amalek pay dear for his insolence. Note, Weapons, formed against God's Israel, cannot prosper long, and shall be broken at last. The cause of God is sure to be victorious. Though God gave the victory, yet it is said, Joshua discomfited Amalek, because Joshua was a type of Christ, and of the same name, and in him it is that we are more than conquerors. It was his arm alone that spoiled principalities and powers, and routed all their force. IV. The trophies of this victory set up. 1. Moses took care that God should have the glory of it; he set up in instant a vineyard, as a trophy, to the honour of Joshua, (though it had been a laudable policy to put marks of honour upon him,) he builds an altar to the honour of God; and we may suppose it was not an altar without sacrifice; but that which is most carefully recorded, is the inscription upon the altar, Jehovah-nissi—The Lord is my banner; which, probably, refers to the lifting up of the rod of God as a banner in this action. The presence of our God is power. It was Amalek who had enlisted, by which they were animated and kept together, and therefore which they erected in the day of their triumph. In the name of our God we must always lift up our banners, Ps. 10. 5. It is fit that he who does all the work should have all the praise.

2. God took care that posterity should have the comfort and benefit of it; "Write this for a memorial, not in loose papers, but in a book; write it, and then rehearse it in the ears of Judah, let him be in trusted with this memorial, to transmit it to the generations to come." Moses must now begin to keep a diary or journal of occurrences; it is the first mention of writing that we find in scripture; and perhaps the command was not given till after the writing of the law upon the tables of stone; "Write it, in perpetuum rei memoriam—that the event may be had in perpetual remembrance," that which is written remains. (1.) Write what had been done, what Amalek had done against Israel; write in gall their bitter hatred, write in blood their cruel attempts, let them never be forgotten, nor yet what God had done for Israel in saving them from Amalek. Let ages to come know that God fights for his people, and he that teaches them, touches the apple of his eye. (2.) What a set of trophies was left in the camp. [1.] That in process of time Amalek should be totally ruined and rooted out, (v. 14.) that he should be remembered only in history. Amalek would have cut off the name of Israel, that it might be no more in remembrance, (Ps. 83. 4. 7.) and therefore God not only disappoints him in that, but cuts off his name. Write it for the encouragement of Israel, whenever the Amalekites are an annoyance to them, that Israel will not be regulated by the fall of Amalek. This sentence was executed in part by Saul, (1 Sam. 15.) and completely by David; (ch. 30. 2 Sam. 1. 1.—8.) after this time, we never read so much as of the name of Amalek. [2.] That in the mean time God would have a continual controversy with him; (v. 16.) Because his hand is upon the throne of the Lord, that is, against the camp of Israel, which holds the place of his sanctuary, and is therefore called a glorious high throne from the beginning, (Jer. 17. 12.) therefore the Lord will have war with Amalek from generation to generation. This was written for direction to Israel, never to make any league with the Amalekites, but to look upon them as irreconcilable enemies, doomed to ruin. Amalek's destruction was typical of the de-stuition of all the enemies of Christ and his kingdom. Whoever make war with the Lamb, the Lamb will overcome them.

CHAP. XVIII.

This chapter is concerning Moses himself, and the affairs of his own family. 1. Jethro, his father-in-law, brings to him his wife and children, v. 1, 2. Moses entertains his father-in-law with great respect, (v. 3.) with good discourse, (v. 8–11.) with a sacrifice and a feast, v. 12. 2. Jethro advises him about the management of his business, to take a judge in Israel, to take inferior judges in his assistance; (v. 13, 15.) Moses, after some time, takes his counsel, (v. 24.) and so they part, v. 27. 3. When Jethro, the priest of Midian, Moses' father-in-law, heard of all that God had done for Moses, and for Israel his people, and that the Lord had brought Israel out of Egypt, he came with his wife and his sons, (v. 1–6.) 4. Moses entertains his father-in-law with great respect, good discourse, sacrifice and a feast. 5. Jethro, Moses' father-in-law, came with his sons and his wife unto Moses into the wilderness, where he encamped at the mount of God. 6. And he said unto Moses, I thy father-in-law, Jethro, am come unto thee, and thy wife, and her two sons with her.

This incident may very well be allowed to have happened, as it is placed here, before the giving of the law, and not, as some place it, in connection with what is recorded, Numb. 10. 11, 29, 30. Sacrifices were offered before; in these mentioned here, (v. 13.) it is observable that Jethro is said to take them, not Aaron. And as to Jethro's advising Moses to constitute judges under him, though it is intimated, (v. 13.) that the occasion of his giving that advice was because Moses' sons, (v. 10–12.) it is observable that Jethro is said to take them, not Aaron. And as to Jethro's advising Moses to constitute judges under him, though it is intimated, (v. 13.) that the occasion of his giving that advice was on the morrow, yet it does not follow, as Moses' settling of that affair might be some time after, when the law was given, as it is placed, Deut. 1. 9. It is plain that Jethro himself would not have him make this alteration in the government, till he had received instructions from God about it, (v. 23.) which he did not, till some time after. Jethro comes, 1. To congratulate the happiness of Israel, and particularly the honour of Moses his son-in-law; and now Jethro thinks himself well paid for all the kindness he had showed to Moses in his distress, and his daughter better-matched than he could have expected. Jethro, though well satisfied not to hear all that the country rang of, the glorious appearances of God for his people Israel; (v. 1.) and he comes to inquire, and inform himself more fully thereof, (see Ps. 111. 2.) and to rejoice with them, as one that had a true respect both for them and for their God. Though he, as a Midianite, was not to share with them in the promised land, yet he shared with them in the joy of their deliverance. We must thus make the comforts of others our own, by taking pleasure, as God does, in the prosperity of the righteous. 2. To bring Moses' wife and children to the circumcision of her son he had like to have cost him his life; (ch. 3. 25.) he sent them home to his father-in-law, fearing lest they should prove a further hindrance; he foresaw what discouragements he was likely to meet with in the court of Pharaoh, and therefore would not take any with him in his own family. He was of that tribe that said to his father, I have not known him, when service was to be done for God, Deut. 33. 9. Thus Christ's disciples, when they went to go upon an expedition, not much unlike that of Moses, were to forsake wife and children. Matt. 19. 29. But though there might be a reason for the separation that was between Moses and his wife for a time, yet they must come together again, as soon as ever they could with any convenience. It is the law of the relation, Ye husbands, dwell with your wives, 1 Pet. 3. 7. Jethro, we may suppose, was glad of his daughter's company, and fond of her children, yet he would not keep her from her husband, nor them from their father; v. 3, 4. Moses must have his family with him, that, while he ruled the church of God, he might set a good example of prudence in family government, 1 Tim. 3. 5. Moses had now a great deal both of honour and care put upon him, and it was fit that his wife should be with him, to share with him in both.

Notice is taken of the significant names of his two sons. 1. The old midianite was called Gershom, (v. 3.) a stranger; Moses designing thereby, not only a memorial of his own condition, but a memorial to his son of his condition also; for we are all strangers upon earth, as all our fathers were. Moses had a great uncle almost of the same name, Gershom, a stranger; for though he was born in Canaan, (Gen. 46. 11.) yet even there the patriarchs confessed themselves strangers. 2. The other he called Eliezer, (v. 4.) My God a help; as we translate it; it looks back to his deliverance from Pharaoh, when he made his escape, after the slaying of the Egyptian; but, if this was (as some think) the son that was circumcised in the inn as he was going, I would rather translate it, so as to look forward, which the original will bear, The Lord is mine help, and will deliver me from the sword of Pharaoh, which he had reason to expect would be drawn against him, when he was going to fetch Israel out of bondage. Note, When we are undertaking any difficult service for God in our generation, it is good for us to encourage ourselves in God as our Help: he that has delivered, does, and will.

7. And Moses went out to meet his father-in-law, and did obeisance, and kissed him; and they asked each other of their welfare; and they came into the tent. 8. And Moses told his father-in-law all that the Lord had done unto Pharaoh and to the Egyptians for Israel's sake, and all the travail that had come upon them by the way, and how the Lord delivered them. 9. And Jethro rejoiced for all the goodness which the Lord had done unto Israel, whom he had delivered out of the hand of the Egyptians. 10. And Jethro said, Blessed be the Lord, who hath delivered you out of the hand of the Egyptians, and out of the hand of Pharaoh; who hath delivered the people from under the hand of the Egyptians. 11. Now I know that the Lord is greater than all gods: for in the thing wherein they dealt proudly he was above them. 12. And Jethro, Moses' father-in-law, took a burnt-offering and sacrifices for God; and Aaron came, and all the elders of Israel, to eat bread with Moses' father-in-law before God.

Observe here.

I. The kind greeting that was between Moses and his father-in-law, v. 7. Though Moses was a prophet of the Lord, a great prophet, and king in Jeshurun, yet he showed a very humble respect to his father-in-law. However God in his providence is pleased to advance us, we must make conscience of giving honour to whom honour is due, and never look with disdain upon our poor relations. Those that abound in spirit and wealth, are not therefore discharged from the duty they owe to men, nor will that justify them in a stately haughty carriage. Moses went out to meet Jethro, did obsequious to him, and kissed him. Religion does not destroy good manners. They asked each other of their welfare. Even the kind How-do-you's that pass between them are taken notice of, as the expressions and improvements of mutual love and friendship.

II. The narrative that Moses gave his father-in-law of the great things God had done for Israel, v. 8. This was one thing Jethro came for, to know more fully and particularly what he had heard the general report of. Note, Conversation concerning God's wondrous works is profitable conversation; it is good, and to the use of edifying, Ps. 103. 2. Compare Ps. 145. 11, 12. Asking and telling news, and discussing them, are the only entertainment of conversation, but are capable of being converted to a very good account, by taking notice of God's providence, and its operations and tendencies in all occurrences.

III. The impressions this narrative made upon Jethro. 1. He congratulated God's Israel; (v. 9.) Jethro rejoiced. He not only rejoiced in the honour done to his own-love, but in all the goodness done to Israel, v. 9. Note, Public blessings are the joy of public spirits. While the Israelites were themselves murmuring, notwithstanding all God's goodness to them, here was a Midianite rejoicing. This was not the only time that the faith of the Gentiles shamed the unbelief of the Jews; see Mat. 8. 10. Standers-by were more affected with the favours God had showed to Israel, than they were that received them. He gave the glory of the grace of God to whom it belonged, and not the glory of the grace of men, though they had been the instruments of it. (v. 10.) "Blessed be Jehovah." (By that name he is now known,) "who hath delivered you, Moses and Aaron, out of the hand of Pharaoh, so that through he designed your death, he could not effect it, and by your ministry has delivered the people." Note, Whatever we have the joy of, God must have the praise of. 3. His faith was hereby confirmed, and he took this occasion to make a solemn profession of it; (v. 11.) Now know I that Jehovah is greater than all gods. Observe, (1.) The matter of his faith: That the God of Israel is greater than all pretenders, all false and counterfeit deities, that usurp divine honours; he silences them, subdues them, and is too hard for them all, and therefore is himself the only living and true God. He is also higher than all princes and potentates, (who also are called gods,) and has both an unchangeable authority over them, and an irresistible power to control and over-rule them: he manages them all as he pleases, and gets honour upon them, how great soever they are. (2.) The confirmation and improvement of his faith; Now know I; he knew it before, but now he knew it better; his faith grew up to a full assurance, upon this fresh evidence. Those who sincerely acknowledge God as the only living and true God, who do not know that the Lord is greater than all gods. (3.) The ground and reason upon which he built it; for wherein they dealt proudly, the magicians, and the idols which the Egyptians worshipped, or Pharaoh and his grandees, (they both opposed God, and set up in competition with him,) he was above them. The magicians were baffled, the idols shaken, Pharaoh humbled, his powers broken, and, in spite of all their confederacies, God's Israel was rescued out of their hands. Note, Sooner or later, God will show himself above these that by their proud dealings contest with him. He that exalts himself against God shall be abused.

IV. The expressions of their joy and thankfulness; they had communion with each other, both in a feast and in a sacrifice; v. 12. Jethro, being hearty in Israel's interests, was cheerfully admitted, though a Midianite into fellowship with Moses and the elders of Israel, forasmuch as he also is a son of Abraham, though of a younger house.

1. They joined in a sacrifice of thanksgiving; Jethro took burnt-offerings for God, and, probably, offered them himself, for he was a priest in Midian, and a worshipper of the true God, and the priesthood was not yet settled in Israel. Note, Mutual friendship is sanctified by joint-worship. It is a very good thing for relations and friends, when they come together, to join in the spiritual sacrifice of prayer and praise, as those that meet in Christ, the Centre of unity.

2. They joined in a feast of rejoicing, a feast upon the sacrifice. Moses, upon this occasion, invited his relations and friends to an entertainment in his own tent, a laudable usage among friends, and which Christ beneded, and probably recommended, by his acceptance of such invitations. This was a temperate feast, They did eat bread; this bread, we may suppose, was manna. Jethro must see and taste that bread from heaven, and, though a Gentile, is as welcome to it as any Israelite; the Gentiles still are so to Christ, the Bread of life. It was a feast kept after a godly sort; they did eat bread before God himself not only warranted, but recommended, by his acceptance of such invitations. Thus we must eat and drink, to the glory of God, behaving ourselves at our tables as those who believe that God's eye is upon us.

13. And it came to pass on the morrow, that Moses sat to judge the people: and the people stood by Moses from the morning unto the evening. 14. And when Moses' father-in-law saw all that he did to the people, he said, What is this thing that thou dost to the people? Why sittest thou thyself alone, and all the people stand by thee from morning unto even? 15. And Moses said unto his father-in-law, Because the people come unto me to inquire of God: 16. When they have a matter, they come unto me; and I judge between one and another; and I make them know the statutes of God, and his laws. 17. And Moses' father-in-law said unto him, The thing that thou dost is not good. 18. Thou wilt surely wear away, both thou and this people that is with thee: for this thing is too heavy for thee; thou art not able to perform it thyself alone. 19. Hearken now unto my voice, I will give thee counsel, and God shall be with thee: Be thou for the people to God-ward, that thou mayest bring the causes unto God: 20. And thou shalt teach them ordinances and laws, and shall show them the way wherein they must walk, and the work that they must do. 21. Moreover, thou shalt provide out of all the people able men, such as fear God, men of truth, hating covetousness; and place such over them, to be rulers of thousands, and rulers of hundreds, rulers of fifties, and rulers of tens: 22. And let them judge the people at all seasons: and it shall be, that every great matter they shall bring unto thee; but every small matter they shall judge: so shall it be easier for thyself, and they shall bear the burden with thee. 23. If thou shalt do this thing, and God command thee so, then thou shalt be able to endure, and all this people shall also go to their place in peace. 24. So Moses hearkened to the voice of his father-in-law, and did all that he had said. 25. And Moses chose able men out of all Israel, and made them heads over the people, rulers of thousands, rulers of hundreds, rulers of fifties, and rulers of tens. 26. And they judged the people at all seasons: the hard causes they brought unto Moses, but every small matter they judged themselves. 27. And Moses let his father-in-law depart; and he went his way into his own land.

I. The great zeal and industry of Moses as a magistrate. Having been employed to redeem Israel out of the house of bondage, herein he is a further type of Christ, that he is employed as aadawgiver and a judge among them.

1. He was to answer inquiries, and acquaint them with the will of God in doubtful cases, and to explain the laws of God that were already given them, concerning the sabbath, the manna, &c. beside the laws of nature, relating both to piety and equity, v. 15. They came to inquire of God; and happy it was for them that they had such an oracle to consult; we are ready to wish, many a time, that we had some such certain way of knowing God's mind, when we are at a loss what to do. Moses was faithful both to him that appointed him, and to them that consulted him, and made them know the statutes of God, and his laws, v. 16. His business was, not to make laws, but to make known God's laws; his place was but that of a servant.

2. He was to decide controversies, and determine matters in variance, judging between a man and his fellow, v. 16. And if the people were as quarrel-some one with another, as they were with God, no doubt he had a great many causes brought before him; and the more, because their trials put them to no expense, nor was the law costly to them. When a quarrel happened in Egypt, and Moses would have reconciled the contenders, they asked, Who made thee a prince and a judge? But now it was past dispute that God had made him one; and they humbly attend him whom they had then proudly rejected.

This was the business Moses was called to, and it appears that he did it, (1.) With great consideration, which, some think, is intimated in his posture; he sat to judge, (v. 15.) composed and sedate. (2.) With great condescension to the people, who stood by him, v. 14. He was very easy of access, the meanest Israelite was welcome himself to bring his cause before him. (3.) With great constancy and closeness of application. [1.] Though Jethro, his father-in-law, was with him, which might give him a good pretence for a vacation, (he might have adjourned the court for that day, or, at least, have shortened it,) yet he sits, even the next day after his coming, from the morning unto the evening. Note, Necessary business must always take place of ceremonious attentions. It is too great a compliment to our friends, to prefer the enjoyment of their company before our duty to God, which ought to be done, while yet the other is left undone.

[2.] Though Moses was advanced to great honour, yet he did not therefore take his ease, and throw upon others the burthen of care and business; no, he thought his preferment, instead of discharging him from service, made it more obligatory upon him. Those think of themselves above what is meet, who think it below them to do good. It is a disgrace to honour, not to be serviceable. [3.] Though the people had been provoking to him, and were ready to stone him, (ch. 17. 4.) yet still he made himself the servant of all. Note, Though others fail in their duty to us, yet we must not therefore neglect our's to them. [4.] Though he was an old man, yet he kept to his business from morning to night, and made it his meat and drink to do it. God had given him great grace and power, and he made great use of them, to go through a great deal of work with ease and pleasure; and, for the encouragement of others to spend and be spent in the service of God, it proved, that, after all his labours, his natural force was not abated. They that wait on the Lord and his service shall renew their strength.

II. The great prudence and consideration of Jethro, as a friend. 1. He disliked the method that Moses took, and was so free with him as to tell him so, v. 14, 17, 18. He thought it was too much business for Moses to undertake alone, that it would be a prejudice to his health, and too great a fatigue to him; and also that it would make the administration of justice tiresome to the people. And therefore he tells him plainly, It is not good. Note, There may be over-doing even in well-doing, and therefore our zeal must be also governed by discretion, that our good may not be evil spoken of. Wisdom is profitable to direct, that we may neithercontent ourselves with less than our duty, nor over-task ourselves with that which is beyond our strength. 2. He advised him to such a model of government as would better answer the intention, which was, (1.) That he should reserve to himself all applications to God; (v. 19.) Be thou for them to Godward; that was, get them which it was not fit any other should share with him in, Numb. 12. 6. 8. Also, whatever concerned the whole congregation in general must pass through his hand, v. 20.

But, (2.) That he should appoint judges in the several tribes and families, who should try causes between man and man, and determine them, which would be done with less noise, and more dispatch, and keep the great courts in the presence of God himself from being overburdened. Thus they must be governed as a nation by a king as supreme, and inferior magistrates sent and commissioned by him, 1 Pet. 11. 13, 14. Thus many hands would make light work, causes would be sooner heard, and the people eased by having justice thus brought to their tent-doors. Yct, (3.) An appeal might be, if there were just cause for it, from these inferior courts to Moses himself; at least, if the judges were themselves at a loss; v. 22. Every great matter they shall bring unto thee. Thus, that great man would be the more serviceable by being employed only in great matters. Note, Those whose gifts and stations are most eminent, may yet be greatly furthered in their work, by the assistance of those that are every way their infe-

1. N the third month, when the children of Israel were gone forth out of the land of Egypt, the same day came they into the wilderness of Sinai. 2. For they were departed from Rephidim, and were come to the desert of Sinai, and had pitched in the wilderness; and there Israel camped before the mount. 3. And Moses went up unto God, and the Lord called unto him out of the mountain, saying, Thus shalt thou say to the house of Jacob, and tell the children of Israel: 4. Ye have seen what I did unto the Egyptians, and how I bare you on eagles' wings, and brought you unto myself. 5. Now therefore, If ye will obey my voice indeed, and keep my covenant, then ye shall be a peculiar treasure unto me above all people: for all the earth is mine: 6. And ye shall be unto me a kingdom of priests, and a holy nation. These are the words which thou shalt speak unto the children of Israel. 7. And Moses came, and called for the elders of the people, and laid before their faces all these words which the Lord commanded him. 8. And all the people answered together, and said, All that the Lord hath spoken we will do. And Moses returned the words of the people unto the Lord.

Here is,

1. The date of the great charter by which Israel was incorporated. 1. The time when it bears date; (v. 1.) in the third month after they came out of Egypt. It is computed that the law was given just fifty days after their coming out of Egypt, in remembrance of which, the feast of Pentecost was observed the fiftieth day after the passover; and, in compliance with which, the Spirit was poured out upon the apostles, at the feast of Pentecost, fifty days after the death of Christ. In Egypt, they had spoken of a three days' journey into the wilderness to the place of the sea; (Ex. 15. 4.) but it proved to be more than three months' journey; so often are we out in calculation of times; and things prove longer in the doing than we expected. 2. The place whence it bears date; from mount Sinai, a place which nature, not art, had made eminent and conspicuous, for it was the highest of all that range of mountains. Thus God put contempt upon cities, and palaces, and magnificent structures, setting up his pavilion on the top of a high mountain, in a waste and barren desert, there to carry on this treaty. It is called Smi, from the multitude of thorny bushes there.

2. The charter itself; Moses was called up to the mountain, (on the top of which God had pitched his tent, and at the foot of which Israel had pitched their's,) and was employed as the mediator, or rather no more than the messenger, of the covenant; (v. 3.) Thus shalt thou say to the house of Jacob, and tell the children of Israel. Here the learned Bishop Montfaucon shows us, that the names both of Jacob and Israel, to remind them, that they who had lately been as low as Jacob, when he went to Padan-aram, were now grown as great as God made him, when he came from thence, (justly enriched with the spoils of him that had oppressed him,) and was called Israel.

Now observe, 1. That the Maker, and the first Maker, of the covenant, was to be Israel, that nothing was said or done by this stupid and unhinking people themselves toward this settlement; no motion made, no petition put up for God's favour; but this blessed charter was granted ex nero motu—purely out of God's own good-will. Notice, In all our dealings with God, free grace prevents us with the blessings of goodness, and all our comfort is owing, not to our knowing God, but rather to our being known of him. Moses was sent, as God's firstborn, as a sign and covenant with him, because he first loved us, visited us, and covenanted with us. God is the Alpha, and therefore must be the Omega. 2. That the matter of the covenant is not only just and unexceptionable, and such as puts no hardship upon them, but kind and gracious, and such as gives them the greatest privileges and advantages imaginable. (1.) He reminds them of what he had declared to them in the last chapter. 4. He had sighted them and avenged them upon their persecutors and oppressors; "Ye have seen what I did unto the Egyptians, how many lives were sacrificed to Israel's honour and interests;" he had given them unparalleled instances of his favour to them, and his care of them; I bare you on eagles' wings, a high expression of the wonderful tenderness God had showed for them; it is explained, Deut. 32. 11, 12. It denotes great speed; God not only came upon the wing for their deliverance, (when the set time was come, he rode on a cherub, and did fly,) but he hastened them out, as it were, upon the wing; he did it also with great ease, with the strength, as well as with the swiftness, of an eagle. They that faint not, nor are weary, are said to mount up with wings as eagles, Isa. 40. 31. Especially, it denotes God's particular care of them, and affection to them. The Israelites were that iron found in the furnace, was the nest in which these young ones were hatched, where they were first formed as the embryo of a nation; when, by the increase of their numbers, they grew to some maturity, they were carried out of that nest. Other birds carry their young in their talons, but the eagle (they say) upon her wings, so that even those archers who shoot flying carp, and the like, whose arrows sometimes first wind up, but then shoot through the old one. Thus, in the Red-sea, the pillar of cloud and fire, the token of God's presence, interposed itself between the Israelites and their pursuers; (lines of defence which could not be forced, a wall which could not be penetrated;) yet this was not all; their way, so paved, so guarded, was glorious, but their end much more so; I brought you unto a holy place. They were brought not only into a state of liberty and honour, but into covenant and communion with God. This, this was the glory of their deliverance, as it is of our's by Christ, that he died, the just for the unjust, that he might bring us to God. This God aims at in all the gracious methods of his providence and grace, to bring us back to himself, from whom we have revolted, and to bring us home to himself, in whom alone we can be happy. He appeals to themselves, and their own observation, and experience, and the latter end of all things is here insisted on; Ye have seen what I did; so that they could not disbelieve God, unless they would first disbelieve their own eyes. They saw how all that was done was purely the Lord's doing. It was not they that reached toward God, but it was he that brought them to himself. Some have well observed, that the Old-Testament church is said to be borne upon eagles' wings, and to have the power of that dispensation which was carried on with a high hand and an outstretched arm; but the New-Testament church is said to be gathered by the Lord Jesus, as a hen gathers her chickens under her wings, (Matt. 23. 37.) denoting the grace and compassion of that dispensation, and the admirable condescension and humiliation of the Redeemer. (2.) He prepares them plainly what he expected and required from them; in one word, obedience, (v. 3.) that they should obey his voice indeed, and keep his covenant. Being thus saved by him, that which he insisted upon, was, that they should be ruled by him. The reasonableness of this demand is, long after, pleaded with them, that in the day he brought them out of the land of Egypt, this was the condition of the covenant, Obey my voice; (Jcr. 7. 23.) and this was the manner of his rule, through the law, Israel was, in the natural state, that law itself. Only obey indeed, not in profession and promise only, not in pretence, but in sincerity. God had showed them real favours, and therefore required real obedience.

3. He assures them of the honour he would put upon them, and the kindness he would show them, in case they did thus keep his covenant; (v. 5. 6.) Then ye shall be a peculiar treasure to me. He does not specify any one particular favour, as giving them the land of Canaan, or the like, but expresses it in that which was inclusive of all happiness, that he would be to them a God in covenant, that they should be to him a people. [1.] God here asserts his sovereignty over, and propriety in, the whole visible creation; All the earth is mine. Therefore he needed them not; He, that had so vast a dominion, was in a manner despised among them. They were not called to this treasure, without concerning himself for so small a despicable as Israel was. All nations on the earth being his, he might choose which he pleased for his peculiar, and set in a way of sovereignty. [2.] He appropriates Israel to himself. First, As a people dear unto him, You shall be a peculiar treasure; not that God was enriched by them, as a man is by his treasure, but he was pleased to value and esteem them as a man does his treasure, that were precious in his sight and honourable; (Isa. 43. 4.) he set his love upon them; (Deut. 7. 7.) took them under his special care and protection, as a treasure that is kept under lock and key. He looked upon the rest of the world but as trash and lumber in comparison with them. By giving them divine revelation, instituted ordinances, and promises inclusive of eternal life, by sending his Son to them, to triumph over them, he was pleased to hold them in his esteem, and to raise them above, all people. And this honour have we all the saints, they are unto God a peculiar people, (Tit. 2. 14.) his when he makes up his jewels. Secondly, As a people devoted to him, and to his honour and service, (v. 6.) a kingdom of priests, a holy nation, All the Israelites, if comp red with other people, were priests unto God, as well as unto men; we are not to them, (Ps. 148. 14.) so much employed in his immediate service, and such intimate communion they had with him. When they were first made free people, it was that they might sacrifice to the Lord their God as priests; they were under God's immediate government, and the tendency of the laws given them was to distinguish them from others, and engage... them for God as a holy nation. Thus all believers are, through Christ, made to our God kings and priests, (Rev. 1. 6.) a chosen generation, a royal priesthood, 1 Pet. 2. 9.

III. Israel's acceptance of this charter, and consent to the conditions of it. 1. Moses faithfully delivered God's message to them; (v. 7.) he laid before their faces all these words; he not only explained to them what God had given him in charge, but he put it to their choice, whether they would accept these promises upon these terms, or no. His laying it to their faces, bespeaks his laying it to their consciences. 2. They readily agreed to the covenant proposed. They would oblige themselves to obey the voice of God, and take it as a great favour to be made a kingdom of priests to him. They answered together as one man, semine contradicto — without a dissentient voice, (v. 8.) All that the Lord hath spoken we will do. Thus they strike the bargain, accepting the Lord to be to them a God, and giving up themselves to be to him a people. Oh that there had been such a heart in them! 3. Moses, as a mediator, returned the words of the people to God, v. 8.] Thus Christ, the mediator between us and God, as a Prophet, reveals God's will to us, his precepts and promises, and them as a Priest, offers up to God our spiritual sacrifices, not only of prayer and praise, but of devout affections, and pious resolutions, the work of his own Spirit in us. Thus he is that blessed Days-Man who lays his hand upon us both.

9. And the Lord said unto Moses, Lo, I come unto thee in a thick cloud, that the people may hear when I speak with thee, and believe thee for ever. And Moses told the words of the people unto the Lord.

10. And the Lord said unto Moses, Go unto the people, and sanctify them to-day and to-morrow, and let them wash their clothes, 11. And be ready against the third day: for the third day the Lord will come down in the sight of all the people upon mount Sinai. 12. And thou shalt set bounds unto the people round about, saying, Take heed to yourselves that ye go not up into the mount, or touch the border of it: who soever toucheth the mount shall be surely put to death: 13. There shall not a hand touch it, but he shall surely be stoned, or shot through; whether it be beast or man, it shall not live: when the trumpet soundeth long, they shall come up to the mount. 14. And Moses went down from the mount unto the people, and sanctified the people; and they washed their clothes. 15. And he said unto the people, Be ready against the third day: come not at your wives.

I. God signifies to Moses his purpose of coming down upon mount Sinai, in some visible appearance of his glory in a thick cloud; (v. 9.) for he said that he would dwell in the thick darkness, (2 Chron. 6. 1.) and he made it his pavilion, (Ps. 18. 11.) holding back the face of his throne, then when he set it upon mount Sinai, and spreading a cloud upon it, Job 26. 9. This thick cloud was to prohibit curious inquiries into things secret, and to command an awful adoration of that which was revealed. God would come down in the sight of all the people; (v. 11.) though they should see no manner of simili-

tude, yet they should see so much as would convince them that God was among them of a truth. And so high was the top of mount Sinai, that it is supposed that not only the camp of Israel, but even the countries about, might discern some extraordinary appearance of glory upon it, which would strike terror upon them. It seems also to have been particularly intended to put an honour upon Moses, (v. 9.) that they may hear when I speak with thee, and believe for ever. The event corresponded was to be first settled by a sensible appearance of the divine glory, which was afterward to be carried on more silently by the ministry of Moses. In like manner, the Holy Ghost descended visibly upon Christ at his baptism, and all that were present heard God speak to him, (M. th. 3. 17.) that afterward, without the repetition of such visible tokens, they might believe him. So likewise the Spirit descended in power upon the apostles, (Acts. 2. 3.) that they might be believed. Observe, When the people had declared themselves willing toobey the voice of God, then God promised they should hear his voice; for if any man be resolved to do his will, he shall know it, John 7. 17.

11. He ordered Moses to make preparation for this great solemnity, giving him two days' time for it. 1. He must sanctify the people, (v. 10.) as Job, before this, sent and sanctified his sons, Job, 1. 5. He must set bounds both concerning the place where the people should meet, and the manner how they should wash their clothes, and be ready against the third day. 2. He must set bounds about the mountain, v. 12. Probably, he drew a line, or ditch, round at the foot of the hill, which none were to pass, upon pain of death. This was to intimate, (1.) That humble awful reverence which ought to possess the minds of all those that worship God. We are mean creatures before a great Creator, vile sinners before a holy righteous judge; and therefore a ghastly fear should attend the worship of God, Heb. 12. 28. Ps. 2. 11. (2.) The distance which worshippers were kept at, under that dispensation, which we ought to take notice of, that we may the more value our privilege under the gospel, having boldness to enter into the holiest by the blood of Jesus, Heb. 10. 19.

3. He must order the people to attend upon the summons that should be given; (v. 13.) "When the trumpet soundeth loud, then let them take their places at the foot of the mount, and so sit down at God's feet," as it is explained, Deut. 33. 3. Never was so great a congregation called together, and preached to, at once, as this was here. No one man's voice could have reached so many, but the voice of God did.

16. And it came to pass on the third day, in the morning, that there were thunders and lightnings, and a thick cloud upon the mount, and the voice of the trumpet exceeding loud; so that all the people that was in the camp trembled.

17. And Moses brought forth the people out of the camp to meet with God; and they stood at the nether part of the mountain.

18. And mount Sinai was altogether on a smoke, because the Lord descended upon it in fire; and the smoke thereof ascended as the smoke of a furnace, and the whole mount quaked greatly.

19. And when the voice of the trumpet sounded long, and waxed louder and louder, Moses spake, and God answered him by a voice. 20. And the Lord came down upon mount Sinai, on the top of the mount: and the Lord called Moses up to the top of the mount; and Moses went up. 21. And the Lord said unto Moses, Go down, charge the people, lest they break through unto the Lord to gaze, and many of them perish. 22. And let the priests also, which come near to the Lord, sanctify themselves, lest the Lord break forth upon them. 23. And Moses said unto the Lord, The people cannot come up to mount Sinai: for thou charg-Aest us, saying, Set bounds about the mount, and sanctify it. 24. And the Lord said unto him, Away, get thee down; and thou shalt come up, thou, and Aaron with thee: but let not the priests and the people break through to come up unto the Lord, lest he break forth upon them. 25. So Moses went down unto the people, and spake unto them.

Now, at length, is come that memorable day, that terrible day of the Lord, that day of judgment, in which Israel heard the voice of the Lord God speaking to them out of the midst of the fire, and lord, Deut. 4. 35. Never was there such a sermon preached, before or since, as this which was here preached to the church in the wilderness. For, (v. 18.) The Lord descended in fire, and, (v. 20,) The Lord came down upon mount Sinai. The Shechinah, or Glory of the Lord, appeared in the sight of all the people; he shined forth from mount Paran, with ten thousands of his saints, (Deut. 33. 2.) that was, attended, as the Divine Majesty always is, with a multitude of the holy angels, who were both to grace the solemnity, and to assist it. Hence the law is said to be given by the dispensation of angels, Acts, 7. 53.

II. The pulpit (or throne rather) was mount Sinai; hung with a thick cloud, (v. 16,) covered with smoke, (v. 18,) and made to quake greatly. Now it was that the earth trembled at the presence of the Lord, and the mountains skipped like rams; (Ps. 46. 3.) that Sinai itself, the rough and rocky, melted from before the Lord God of Israel, Judg. 5.

5. New it was that the mountains saw him, and trembled, (Hab. 3. 10,) and were witnesses against a hard-hearted unmoved people, whom nothing would influence.

III. The congregation was called together by the sound of a trumpet, exceeding loud, (v. 15,) and waxing louder and louder, v. 19. This was done by the ministry of the angels, and we read of trumpets sounded by angels generally. It was the sound of the trumpet that made all the people tremble, as those who knew their own guilt, and that they had reason to expect that the sound of this trumpet should have been to them the alarm of war.

IV. Moses brought the hearers to the place of meeting, v. 17. He that had led them out of bondage of Egypt, now led them to receive the law from God's mouth. Public persons are then pub-lib blessings, when they lay out themselves in their places to promote the public worship of God. Mos es, at the head of an assembly worshipping God, was as truly great, as Moses at the head of an army in the field.

V. The introductions to the service were thunderers and lightnings, v. 16. These were designed to strike the people, and to keep them engaged their attention. Were they asleep? The thunders would waken them. Were they looking another way? The lightnings would engage them to turn their faces toward him that spake to them. Thunder and lightning have natural causes; but the scripture directs us in a particular manner to take notice of the power of God, and his terror, in them. Thunder is the voice of God, and lightning the fire of God, to prepare to engage the senses of sight and hearing, these senses by which we receive so much of our information.

VI. Moses is God's minister, who is spoken to, to command service, and keep the congregation in order; (v. 19.) Moses spake. Some think that it was now that he said, I exceedingly fear and quake; (Heb. 12. 21,) but God stilled his fear by his distinguishing ministry to him, in calling him up to the top of the mount, (v. 29,) by which also he tried his faith and courage. No sooner was Moses got up a little way toward the top of the mount, than he was sent down again to keep the people from breaking through to gaze, v. 21. Even the priests or princes, the heads of the houses of their fathers, who officiated for their respective families, and therefore are said to come near to the Lord at other times, must now keep their distance, and conduct themselves with a great deal of caution. Moses pleads that they needed not to have any further orders given them, effectual care was taken already to prevent any intrusions, v. 23. But God, who knew their wildness and presumption, and what was now in the hearts of some of them, hastens him down with this in charge, that neither the priest nor the people should offer to force the lines which were set, to come up unto the Lord, but Moses and Aaron only, the men whom God delighted to hear. Observe, 1. What it was that God forbade them—breaking through to gaze; enough was provided to awaken their consciences, but they were not allowed to gratify their vain curiosity. They might see, but not gaze. Some of them, probably, were desirous to see some similitude, that they might know how to make it. When he took care to prevent, for they saw no manner of similitude, Deut. 4. 15. Note, In divine things, we must not covet to know more than God would have us know; and he has allowed us as much as is good for us. A desire of forbidden knowledge was the ruin of our first parents. Those that would be wise above what is written, and intrude into those things which they have not seen, need this admonition, that they break not through to gaze. \(2\) Under what penalty it was forbidden,

\begin{equation}
\text{Lev. the Lord break forth upon them, (v. 22 - 24.) and many of them perish.}
\end{equation}

\((\text{Note.})\) The restraints and warnings of the divine law are all intended for our good, and to keep us out of that danger which otherwise we should, by our own folly, run ourselves into. \(2\) It is at our peril, if we break the bounds that God has set us, and intrude upon that which he has not allowed us; the Bethshemites and Uzzah paid dear for their presumption. And even when we are called to approach God, we must remember that he is in heaven, and we upon earth, and therefore it behoves us to exercise reverence and godly fear.

CHAP. XX.

All things being prepared for the solemn promulgation of the divine law, we have, in this chapter, \(1\) The ten commandments, as God himself spake them upon Mount Sinai; (v. 1 - 13.) as remarkable a portion of scripture as any in the Old Testament. \(2\) Their application and observance upon the people thereby, v. 18. \(3\) III. Some particular instructions, which God gave privately to Moses, to be by him communicated to the people, relating to his worship, v. 22 - 26.

\(1\) And God spake all these words, saying,

\begin{equation}
\text{I am the Lord thy God, which have brought thee out of the land of Egypt, out of the house of bondage. 3. Thou shalt have no other gods before me. 4. Thou shalt not make unto thee any graven image, or the likeness of any thing that is in heaven above, or that is in the earth beneath, or that is in the water under the earth: 5. Thou shalt not bow down thyself to them, nor serve them: for I the Lord thy God am a jealous God, visiting the iniquity of the fathers upon the children unto the third and fourth generation of them that hate me; 6. And showing mercy unto thousands of them that love me, and keep my commandments. 7. Thou shalt not take the name of the Lord thy God in vain; for the Lord will not hold him guiltless that taketh his name in vain. 8. Remember the sabbath-day, to keep it holy. 9. Six days shalt thou labour, and do all thy work: 10. But the seventh day is the sabbath of the Lord thy God: in it thou shalt not do any work, thou, nor thy son, nor thy daughter, thy man-servant, nor thy maid-servant, nor thy cattle, nor thy stranger that is within thy gates: 11. For in six days the Lord made heaven and earth, the sea, and all that is in them is, and rested the seventh day: wherefore the Lord blessed the sabbath-day, and hallowed it.} \end{equation}

Here is,

\(1\) The preface of the law-writer, Moses; (v. 1.) God spake all these words. The law of the ten commandments is, \(1\) A law of God's making. They are enjoined by the infinite eternal Majesty of heaven and earth. And where the word of the King of kings is, surely there is power. \(2\) It is a law of his own speaking. God has many ways of speaking to the children of men; (Jeb 33. 14.) once, you write, by his Spirit, by inspiration, by written, or by his voice; all which we are carefully to attend to; but he never spake, at any time, upon any occasion, so as he spake the ten commandments, which therefore we ought to hear with the more earnest heed. It was not only spoken audibly, (so he owned the Redeemer by a voice from heaven, Matte. 3. 17.) but with a great deal of dread and pomp. This law God had given to man before; (it was written in his heart by nature;) but sin had so defaced that writing, that it was necessary, in this manner, to revive the knowledge of it.

\(2\) The preface of the Law-Maker; (v. 2.) I am the Lord thy God. Herein, \(1\) God asserts his own authority to enact this law in general; "I am the Lord, who command thee all that follows." \(2\) He proposes himself as the sole Object of that religious worship which is enjoined in the four first of the commandments. They are here bound to obedience by a threefold cord, which, one would think, could not easily be broken. \(1\) Because God is the Lord Jehovah, self-existent, independent, eternal, and the Fountain of all being and power; therefore he has an incontestable right to command us. He that gives being, may give law; and therefore he is able to bear us out in our obedience, to reward it, and to punish our disobedience. \(2\) He was their God, a God of their own creation, and the royal Son of their own consent; and if they would not keep his commandments, who would? He had laid himself under obligations to them by promise, and therefore might justly lay his obligations on them by precept. Though that covenant of peculiarity is now no more, yet there is another, by virtue of which all that are baptized are taken into relation to him as his God, and are therefore unjust, unjustifiable, and ever unhappy, if they obey him not. "\(3\) I have brought them out of the land of Egypt; therefore they were bound in gratitude to obey him, because he had done them so great a kindness, had brought them out of a grievous slavery to a glorious liberty; they themselves had been eye-witnesses of the great things God had done, in order to their deliverance, and could not but have observed that every circumstance of it heightened this obligation; they were now established in the blessed fruit of his mercy, and in expectation of a speedy settlement in Canaan; and could they think any thing too much to do for Him that had done so much for them? Nay, by redeeming them, he acquired a further right to rule them; they owed their service to him to whom they owed their freedom, and whose they were by purchase. And thus, Christ, having rescued us out of the bondage of sin, is entitled to the best service we can do him, Luke 1. 74. Having loosed our bonds, he has bound us to obey him, Ps. 116. 16.

\(3\) The law itself. The four first of the ten commandments, which concern our duty to God, (commonly called the first table) we have in these verses. It was fit that those should be put first, because man had a Maker to love, before he had a neighbour to love. Charity and justice are the only acceptable acts of obedience to God, when they flow from the principles of piety. It cannot be expected that he should be true to his brother, who is false to his God. Now our duty to God is, in one word, to worship him, that is, to give to him the glory due to his name, the inward worship of our affections, the outward worship of our bodies and our substance. This is spoken of as the sum and substance of the everlasting gospel, (Rev. 14. 7.) Worship God. \(1\) The first commandment concerns the Object... of our worship, Jehovah, and him only; (v. 3.) They shall have no other gods before me. The Egyptians, and other neighbouring nations, had many gods, the creatures of their own fancy, strange gods: fine prey; this law was prefixed, because of that transgression, and Jehovah being the God of Israel, they must entirely cleave to him, and not be for any other, either of their own invention, or borrowed from their neighbours. This was the sin they were most in danger of, now that the world was so overspread with Polytheism, which yet could not be rooted out effectually, but by the gospel of Christ. [2.] The second commandment, which we are most in danger of, is, giving the glory and honour to any creature, which are due to God only. Pride makes a god of self, covetousness makes a god of money, sensuality makes a god of the belly; whatever is esteemed and loved, feared or served, delighted in, or depended on, more than God, that (whatever it is) we do in effect make a god of. This prohibition includes a precept which is the foundation of the whole law, that we take the Lord for our God, acknowledge that he is God, accept him for our's, adore him, with admiration and humble reverence, and set our affections entirely upon him. There is a reason intimated in the last words, before me; it intimates, (1.) That we cannot have any other god, but he will certainly know it. There is none beside him, (before him,) for he is before him; he was there before he came into the world secret; but shall not God search this out? (2.) That it is very provoking to him; it is a sin that dures him to his face, which he cannot, which he will not overlook, or connive at. See Ps. 44. 20. 21.

2. The second commandment concerns the ordinances of worship, or the way in which God will be worshipped, which it is fit that he himself should have the appointing of. Here is,

(a.) He here forbidden to worship even the true God by images, v. 4, 5. (1.) The Jews (at least after the captivity) thought themselves forbidden by this commandment to make any image or picture whatsoever. Hence the very images which the Roman armies had in their ensigns are called an abomination to them, (Matth. 24. 15.) especially when they were set up in the holy place, against the central image of God, (for to whom can we liken him? Isa. 40. 18, 25.) or the image of any creature for a religious use; it is called the changing of the truth of God into a lie, (Rom. 1. 25.) for an image is a teacher of lies; it insinuates to us that God has a body, whereas he is an infinite Spirit, Hab. 2. 18. It also forbids us to make images of God in our fancies, as if he were a man as we are. Our religious worship must be governed by the power of faith, not by the power of imagination. They must not make such images or pictures as the heathen worshipped, lest they also should be tempted to worship them. Those who were kept from sin, must keep themselves from the occasions of it. (2.) They must not bow down to them occasionally, that is, show any sign of respect or honour to them, much less to adore, and with the heart and soul entrench on, any other act of religious worship. When they paid their devotion to the true God, they must not have any image before them, for the directing, exciting, or assisting, of their devotion. Though the worship was designed to terminate in God, it would not please him if it came to him through an image. The best and most ancient lawgivers among the heathen, forbade the setting up of images in their temples: it was forbidden in Rome by Numa, a pagan prince; yet commanded in Rome by the Pope, a Christian bishop, but, in this, antichristian. The use of images in the church of Rome, at this day, is so plainly contrary to the letter of this command, and so impossible to be reconciled to it, that, in all their catechisms and books of devotion which they put into the hands of the people, they leave out this commandment, joining the reason of it to that first; and so the third commandment they call the second, the fourth the third, &c; only, to make up the number ten, they divide the tenth into two. Thus have they committed two great evils, in which they persist, and from which they hate to be reformed: they take away from God's word, and add to his worship. (2.) The reasons to enforce this prohibition, v. 5. (1.) The Lord Jehovah, and thy God, am a jealous God, especially in things of this nature. It intimates the care he has of his own institutions, his hatred of idolatry and all false worship, his displeasure against idolaters, and that he resents every thing in his worship that looks like, or leads to, idolatry. Jealousy is quick-sighted. Idolatry being spiritual adultery, as it is very often represented in scripture, the displeasure of God against it is fitly called jealousy. If God is jealous herein, we should be so, afraid of offering any worship to God otherwise than as he has appointed in his word. (2.) The punishment of idolaters. God looks upon them as haters of him, though they perhaps pretend love to him; he will visit their iniquity, that is, he will very severely punish it, not only as a breach against him, but as a violation of his covenant, and a blow at the root of all religion. He will visit it upon the children, that is, this being a sin for which churches shall be unchurched, and a bill of divorcement given them, together with the parents, the children also shall be cast out of covenant and communion, as with the parents the children were at first taken in. Or, he will bring such judgments upon a people as shall be the total ruin of families. If idolaters live to be old men, they see their children of the third or fourth generation, it shall be the vexation of their eyes, and the breaking of their hearts, to see them fall by the sword, carried captives, and enslaved. Nor is it an unrighteous thing with God, (if the parents died in their iniquity, and the children tread in their steps, and keep up false worship, because they received it from their parents;) if the third, fourth, and fifth generation be punished for the sin of the first generation, the measure is full, and God comes by his judgments to reckon with them, to bring into the account the idolaters their fathers were guilty of. Though he bear long with an idolatrous people, he will not bear always, but by the fourth generation, at furthest, he will begin to visit. Children are dear to their parents; therefore, to deter men from idolatry, and to show how much God is displeased with it, not only a byword of infamy is it casted upon families, but the judgments of God may for it be executed upon the poor children, when the parents are dead and gone. (3.) The favour God would show to his faithful worshipers, Keeping mercy for thousands of persons, thousands of generations of them that love me, and keep my commandments. This intimates that the second commandment, though, in itself, a very unimportant one, yet includes a precept of worshipping God in all those ordinances which he has instituted. As the first commandment requires the inward worship of love, desire, joy, hope, and admiration, so the second requires the outward worship of prayer and praise, and solemn attendance on God's word. Note, First, Those that truly love God will make it their constant care and endeavour to keep his commandments, particularly those that relate to his worship. Those that love God, and keep those commandments, shall receive grace to keep his other commandments. Gospel-worship will have a good influence upon all manner of gospel-obedience. &c.
condly, God has mercy in store for such; even they need mercy, and can not plead merit; and mercy they shall find with God; merciful protection in their obedience, and a merciful compen- sation of it. Thirdly, This mercy shall extend to thousands, much further than the wrath threatened to those that hate him, for that reaches but to the third or fourth generation. The streams of mercy run now as full, as free, and as fresh, as ever.

This discourse concerns the manner of our worship, that it be done with all possible reverence and seriousness, v. 7.

We have here, (1.) A strict prohibition; Thou shalt not take the name of the Lord thy God in vain. It is supposed, that, having taken Jehovah for their God, they would make mention of his name; (for thus all people will walk every one in the name of his God) this command gives a needful caution, to mention it in vain, and it is still as needful as ever. We take God’s name in vain, [1.] By hypocrisy, making a profession of God’s name, and a value for it, but not living up to that profession. They that name the name of Christ, but do not depart from iniquity, as that name binds them to do, name it in vain, their worship is vain, (Matt. 13. 7. 9.) their oblations vain, (Isa. 1. 15.) the earth itself is made to tremble戴, if we make promises to God, binding our souls with those bands to that which is good, and yet perform not to the Lord our vows, we take his name in vain, (Matt. 5. 33.) it is folly, and God has no pleasure in fools, (Ecc. 5. 4.) nor will he be mocked, Gal. 6. 7. [2.] By rash swearing, mentioning the name of God, or any of his attributes, in the form of an oath, without any just occasion for it, or due application in forming it, but by a by-word, to no purpose at all, or to no good purpose. [3.] By false swearing, which, some think, is chiefly intended in the letter of the commandment; so it was expounded by them of old time, Thou shalt not curse thyself, Matt. 5. 33. One part of the religious regard the Jews were taught to pay to their God, was, to swear by his name, Deut. 10. 20. But if they affirmed him, instead of doing him honour, if they called him to be Witness to a lie. [5.] By using the name of God lightly and carelessly, and without any regard to its awful significance. The profanation of the forms of devotion is forbidden, as well as the profanation of the forms of swearing; as also the profanation of any of those things whereby God makes himself known, his word, or any of his institutions; when they are either turned into charms and spells, or into jest and sport, the name of God is tarnished.

(2.) A severe penalty; The Lord will not hold him guiltless; magistrates, who punish other offences, may not think themselves concerned to take notice of this, because it does not immediately offer injury either to private property or the public peace; but God, who is jealous of his honour, will not thus censure at it. The sinner may perhaps hold himself safe, from fear of the divorces, on this account; he imagines that God will never call him to an account for it; to obviate which suggestion, the threatening is thus expressed, God will not hold him guiltless, as he hopes he will; but more is implied, namely, that God will himself be the Avenger of those that take his name in vain, and they will find it a fearful thing to fall into the hands of the living God.

This discourse concerns the time of worship; God is to be served and honoured daily, but one day in seven is to be particularly dedicated to his honour, and spent in his service. Here is,

(1.) The command itself; (v. 8.) Remember the sabbath-day, to keep it holy; and v. 10. In it thou shalt do no manner of work. It is taken for granted that the sabbath was instituted before; we read of God’s blessing and sanctifying a seventh day from the beginning, (Gen. 2. 3.) so that this was not the enacting of a new law, but the reviving of an old law. [1.] They are told what is the day they must religiously observe, a seventh, after six days’ labour; whether this was the seventh by computation from the first seventh, or from the day of their coming out of Egypt, or both, is not certain; now the seven preceding days were to make up the time of their escape from this they were to observe the seventh. [2.] How it must be observed. First, As a day of rest; they were to do no manner of work on this day, i. e. their callings or worldly business. Secondly, As a holy day, set apart to the honour of the holy God, and to be spent in holy exercises. God, by blessing it, had made it holy; they, by solemnly blessing it, must take it from all other purpose than that for which the difference between it and other days was instituted. [3.] Who must observe it; Thou, and thy son, and thy daughter; the wife is not mentioned, because she is supposed to be one with the husband, and present with him; and if he sanctify the sabbath, it is taken for granted that she will join with him; but the rest of the family are specified; children and servants must observe it; it is the object of public worship: in this, as in other instances of religion, it is expected that masters of families should take care, not only to serve the Lord themselves, but that their houses also should serve him, at least, that it may not be through their neglect if they do not, Josh. 24. 15. Even the proselyted strangers must observe a difference between this day and other days, which, if it laid some restraint upon them then, yet proved a happy ground of God’s peculiar purpose, in process of time, to bring the Gentiles in to the church, that they might share in the benefit of sabbaths. Compare Isa. 56. 6. 7. God takes notice of what we do on sabbath-days, though we should be where we are strangers. [4.] A particular memorandum put upon this duty, Remember it. It is intimated that the sabbath was instituted and observed before; but in their bondage in Egypt they had either lost their computation, or were restrained by their task-masters, or, through a great degeneracy and indifference in religion, they had let fall the observance of it, and therefore it was requisite they should be reminded of it. Note, Neglected duties remain duties still, notwithstanding our neglect. It also intimates that we are both apt to forget it, and concerned to remember it. Some think it doth it the poorer and not the less, for the sabbath; we must think of it before it comes, that, when it does come, we may keep it holy, and do the duty of it.

(2.) The reasons of this command; (1.) We have time enough for ourselves on the other six days; Six days must thou labour; time enough we have to serve ourselves in those six days, on the seventh day let us serve God; and time enough the ourselves, on the seventh. The sinner supposes that God will never call him to an account for it; to obviate which suggestion, the threatening is thus expressed, God will not hold him guiltless, as he hopes he will; but more is implied, namely, that God will himself be the Avenger of those that take his name in vain, and they will find it a fearful thing to fall into the hands of the living God.

placency in himself, and rejoiced in the work of his hand, to teach us on that day to take a complacency in him, and to give him the glory of his works, Ps. 92. 4. The sabbath began in the finishing of the work of creation, and will the everlasting sabbath in the finishing of the work of providence and redemption; and we observe the weekly sabbath in expectation of that, as well as in remembrance of the former; in both conforming ourselves to him we worship. [5.] He has himself blessed the sabbath-day, and sanctified it; he has put an honour upon it, by setting it apart for himself; it is the holy of the Lord and honourable, and he has put blessings into it, which he has encouraged us to expect from him in the religious observation of that day; it is the day which the Lord hath made, let not us do what we can to unmake it; he has blessed, honoured, and sanctified it, let us not profane it, dishonour it, and level that with common time, which God’s blessing has thus dignified and distinguished.

12. Honour thy father and thy mother; that thy days may be long upon the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee. 13. Thou shalt not kill. 14. Thou shalt not commit adultery. 15. Thou shalt not steal. 16. Thou shalt not bear false witness against thy neighbour. 17. Thou shalt not covet thy neighbour’s house, thou shalt not covet thy neighbour’s wife, nor his manservant, nor his maid-servant, nor his ox, nor his ass, nor any thing that is thy neighbour’s.

We have here the laws of the second table, as they are commonly called, the six last of the ten commandments, comprehending our duty to ourselves and to one another, and constituting a command upon the second great commandment, Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself. As religion toward God is an essential branch of universal righteousness, so righteousness toward men is an essential branch of true religion. Godliness and honesty must go together.

I. The fifth commandment concerns the duties we owe to our relations; that of children to their parents being the only duty specified; Honour thy father and thy mother, which includes, 1. A decent respect to their persons, an inward esteem of them, outwardly expressed upon all occasions in our conduct toward them; Fear them; (Lev. 19. 3.) Give them reverence, Heb. 12. 9. The contrary to this is, mocking at them and despising them, Prov. 30. 17. 2. Obedience to their lawful commands; so it is expounded; (Eph. 6. 1. 3.) Children, obey your parents, come when they call you, go where they send you, do what they bid you, refrain from what they forbid you; and this, as children, cheerfully, and from a principle of love. Though you have said, “We will not,” yet afterward repent and obey, Matth. 21. 29. 3. Submission to their rebukes, instructions, and corrections; not only to the good and gentle, but also to the foolish, out of conscience toward God. 4. Dispensing of themselves with the advice, direction, and consent, of parents, or alienating their property, but with their approbation.

5. Endeavouring in every thing to be the comfort of their parents, and to make their old age easy to them; maintaining them if they stand in need of support, which our Saviour makes to be particularly intended in this commandment, Matth. 15. 4. 6. The reason annexed to this commandment is a promise; That thy days may be long in the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee: having mentioned, in the preface to the commandments, his bringing them out of Egypt as a reason for their obedience, he here, in the beginning of the second table, mentions his bringing them into Canaan, as their reason; that good land they must habit upon their thoughts, and in their eye, now that they are in the wilderness. They must also remember, when they were come to that land, that they were upon their good behaviour, and that, if they did not conduct themselves well, their days should be shortened in that land; both the days of particular persons who should be cut off from it, and the days of their nation, which should be removed out of it. By which means the Lord, as a good, wise, and merciful God, would encourage them to make all manner of honest and religious attempts, putting all their expectation in the long life of this land; and, in like manner, to encourage their parents by the prospect of the same.

II. The sixth commandment concerns our own and our neighbour’s lives; (v. 15.) Thou shalt not kill; thou shalt not do any thing hurtful or injurious to the health, ease, and life, of thy own body, or any other persons, unjustly.” This is one of the laws of nature, and was strongly enforced by the precepts given to Noah and his sons, Gen. 9. 5, 6. It does not forbid killing in lawful war, or in our own necessary defence, or the magistrates’ putting offenders to death, for those things tend to the preserving of life; but it forbids all murder and miseducation, particularly to obedient children. They that do their duty to their parents are most likely to have the comfort of that which their parents gather for them, and leave to them: they that support their parents shall find that God, the common Father, will support them. This promise is expounded, (Eph. 6. 3.) That it may be well with thee, and thou mayest live long on the earth. Those will, in conscience toward God, keep this and the rest of God’s commandments, may be sure that it shall be well with them, and that they shall live as long on earth as Infinite Wisdom sees good for them, and that what they may seem to be cut short of on earth shall be abundantly made up in eternal life, the heavenly Canaan which God will give them.

III. The seventh commandment concerns our own and our neighbour’s chastity; (v. 14.) Thou shalt not commit adultery; this is put before the sixth by our Saviour, (Mark 10. 19.) Do not commit adultery, do not kill; for our chastity should be as dear to us as our lives, and we should be as much afraid of that which defiles the body as of that which destroys it. This commandment forbids all acts of uncleanness, with all those fleshly lusts which produce these acts, and war against the soul, and all those practices which cherish and excite those fleshly lusts, as looking, in order to lust, which Christ tells us, is forbidden in this commandment, Matth. 5. 28.

IV. The eighth commandment concerns our own and our neighbour’s wealth, estate, and goods; (v. 15.) Thou shalt not steal; though God had lately allowed and appointed them to spoil the Egyptians, in a way of just retribution, yet he did not intend that it should be drawn into a precedent, and that they should be allowed thus to spoil one another. This command forbids us to rob ourselves of what we have, by sinful spending, or of the use and comfort of it, by sinful sparing, and to others, by removing the use and work, inviolate to their neighbour’s rights, taking his goods from his person, or house, or field, forcibly or clandestinely, over-reaching in bargains, not restoring what is borrowed or tound, withholding just debts, rents, or wages; and it forbids us, what a worst of all, to rob the coin in or revenue, or that which is dedicated to the service of religion.

V. The ninth commandment concerns our own and our neighbour's good name; (v. 16.) *Thou shalt not bear false witness: this forbids, 1. Speaking falsely on any matter, lying, equivocating, and any way devising and designing to deceive our neighbour. 2. Speaking unjustly against our neighbour, to the prejudice of his reputation; and, 3. (which involves the guilt of both these offences,) Bearing false witness against him, laying to his charge things that he knows not, either judicially, upon oath, by which the third commandment, and the sixth or eighth, as well as this, are broken; or extrajudicially, in common converse, slanderimg, backbiting, tale-bearing, aggravating what is done amiss, and making it worse than it is, and any way endeavouring to raise our own reputation upon the ruin of our neighbours.

VI. The tenth commandment strikes at the root; (v. 17.) *Thou shalt not covet. The foregoing commands implicitly forbid all desire of doing that which will be an injury to our neighbour; this forbids all inordinate desire of having that which will be a gratification to ourselves. "Oh that such a man's house were mine! Such a man's wife mine! Such a man's estate mine!" This is certainly the language of discontent at our own lot, and envy at our neighbour's; and these are the sins principally forbidden here. St. Paul, when the grace of God caused the scales to fall from his eyes, perceived that this law, *Thou shalt not covet, forbids all those irregular appetites and desires which are the first-born of the corrupt nature, the first risings of the sin that dwelleth in us, and the first beginnings of all the sins that is committed by us: this is that lust which, he says, he had not known the evil of, if this commandment, when it came to his conscience in the power of it, had not showed it him, Rom. 7. 7. God give us all to see our face in the glass of this law, and to lay our hearts under the government of it!

18. And all the people saw the thunderings, and the lightnings, and the noise of the trumpet, and the mountain smoking: and when the people saw it, they removed, and stood afar off. 19. And they said unto Moses, Speak thou with us, and we will hear: but let not God speak with us, lest we die. 20. And Moses said unto the people, Fear not: for God is come to prove you, and that his fear may be before your faces, that ye sin not. 21. And the people stood afar off: and Moses drew near unto the thick darkness where God was.

Observe.

1. The extraordinary terror with which the law was given; never was any thing delivered with such awful pomp; every word was accented, and every sentence paused, with thunder and lightning, much louder and brighter, no doubt, than ordinary. And why was the law given in this dreadful manner, and with all this tremendous ceremony? 1. It was designed (once for all) to give a sensible discovery of the glorious majesty of God, for the assistance of our weakness in the knowledge of the Lord, we may be persuaded to live in his fear. 2. It was a specimen of the terrors of the general judgment, in which sinners will be called to an account for the breach of this law: the archangel's trumpet will then sound an alarm, to give notice of the Judge's coming, and a fire shall devour before him. 3. It was a specimen of the terror of these convictions which the law brings unto conscience, to prepare the soul for the comforts of the gospel. Thus was the law given by Moses in such a way as might startle, affright, and humble, men, that the grace and truth which come by Jesus Christ might be the more welcome. The apostle largely describes this instance of the terror of that dispensation, as a foil to set off our privileges, as Christians, in the light, Lev. Thirteenth, of the New-Testament dispensation, Heb. 12. 18, &c.

II. The impression which this made, for the present, upon the people; they must have had stupid hearts indeed if this had not affected them. 1. They removed, and stood afar off, v. 18. Before God began to speak, they were thrusting forward to gaze; (ch. 19. 21.) but now they were effectually cured of their presumption, and taught to keep their distance. 2. They entreated that the word should not be so spoken to them any more, (Heb. 12. 19.) but begged that God would speak to them by Moses, v. 19. Hereby they obliged themselves to acquiesce in the mediation of Moses, they themselves nominating him as a fit person to deal between them and God, and promising to hearken to him as to God's messenger; hereby also they taught their hearts to acquiesce in that method which Infinite Wisdom has taken of speaking by men like ourselves, whose terror shall not make us afraid, nor their hand be heavy upon us. Once, God tried the expediency of speaking to the children of men immediately, but it was found that they could not bear it, it rather drove men from God than brought them to him, and, as it proved in the issue, though it terrified them, it did not deter them from idolatry, for, after that, though they shipped the golden calf, let us therefore readily be satisfied with being instructed by us by the scriptures and the ministry; for, if we believe not them, neither should we be persuaded through God should speak to us in thunder and lightning, as he did from mount Sinai; here that matter was determined.

III. The encouragement Moses gave them, explaining the design of God in his terror; (v. 20.) *Fear not, nor be afraid. The Lord thy God is come among thee, to shew thee fire, which thou fearest, (v. 19.) lest we die; thunder and lightning constituted one of the plagues of Egypt; but Moses would not have them think it was sent to them on the same errand on which it was sent to the Egyptians: no, it was intended, 1. To prove them, to try how they would like dealing with God immediately, without a mediator, and so to convince them how admirably well, God had chosen for them, in putting Moses into that office. Ever since Adam fled, upon hearing God's voice in the garden, sinful man could not bear either to speak to God, or hear from him immediately. 2. To keep them to their duty, and prevent their sinning against God. He encourages them, saying, Fear not, and yet tells them that God thus spoke to them, that his fear might be before their face. We must not fear with amazement—with that fear which harasses, which only works upon the fancy for the present, which sets us a trembling, which genders to bondage, which betrays us to Satan, and alienates us from God; but we must always have in our minds a reverence of God's majesty, a dread of his displeasure, and an obedient regard to his sovereign authority over us; this fear will quicken us to our duty, and lift us circumspect in our walking; this stand in awe, and sin not, Ps. 4. 6.

IV. The progress of their communion with God by the mediation of Moses, v. 21. While the people continued to stand afar off, conscious of guilt, and afraid of God's wrath, Moses drew near unto the thick darkness; he was made to draw near, so the word is: Moses of himself durst not have ventured into the thick darkness, if God had not called him, and encouraged him, and, as some of the rabbins suppose, sent an angel to take him by the hand, and lead him up. Thus it is said of the great Mediator, I will cause him to draw near; (De 30. 21.) and by him it is that we also are introduced, Eph. 3. 12.

22. And the Lord said unto Moses, Thus thou shalt say unto the children of Israel, Ye have seen that I have talked with you from heaven. 23. Ye shall not make with me gods, nor carvings, thou sheep, and thine oxen, in all places where I record my name I will come unto thee, and I will bless thee. 25. And if thou wilt make me an altar of stone, thou shalt not build it of hewn stone: for if thou lift up thy tool upon it, thou hast polluted it. 26. Neither shalt thou go up by steps unto mine altar, that thy nakedness be not discovered thereon.

Moses being gone into the thick darkness where God was, God there spake in his hearing only privately and without terror, all that follows from hence to the end of ch. 23, which is mostly an exposition of the ten commandments; and he was to transmit it by word of mouth first, and afterward in writing, to the people. The laws in these verses related to God's worship.

I. They are here forbidden to make images for worship; (v. 22, 23.) Ye have seen that I have talked with you from heaven; (such was his wonderful condescension, much more than for some mighty prince to talk familiarly with a company of poor beggars;) now ye shall not make gods of silver. This repetition of the second commandment comes in here, either, 1. As pointing to that which God had chiefly in view in giving them this law in this manner, that is, their peculiar addictedness to idolatry, and the peculiar sinfulness of that crime. Ten commandments God had given them, but Moses is ordered to inculcate upon them especially the two first. They must not forget any of them, but they must be sure to remember those. Or, 2. As pointing to that which might properly be inferred from God's speaking to them as he had done. He had given them sufficient demonstration of his presence among them; they needed not to make images of him, as if he were absent. Besides, they had only seen that he talked with them, they had seen no manner of similitude, so that they could not make any image of God; and his manifesting himself to them only by a voice, plainly showed them that they must not make any such image, but keep up their communion with God by his word, and not otherwise.

Two arguments are here hinted against image-worship. (1.) That thereby they would affront God himself in this, Ye shall not make unto me gods: though they pretended to worship them as representations of God, yet really they made them rivals with God, which he would not endure. (2.) That thereby they would abuse themselves, intimated in that, Ye shall not make unto you gods; while ye think by them to assist your devotion, ye will really corrupt it, and put a cheat upon yourselves. At first, it should seem, they made their images for worship of gold and silver, pretending, by the richness of those metals, to honour God, and, by the brightness of them, to affect themselves with his glory; but even in these they changed the truth of God into a lie, and so by degrees were really given up to the most strong delusions as to worship images of wood or stone.

II. They are here directed in making altars for worship: it is meant of occasional altars, such as they reared now in the wilderness, before the tabernacle was erected, and afterward, upon special emergencies, for present use, such as Gideon built, (Judg. 6. 24.) Manoah, (Judg. 13. 19.) Samuel, (1 Sam. 7. 17.) and many others. We may suppose, not that the people of Israel generally, they must not so much as hew into shape the stones that they made their altars of, but pile them up as they were, in the rough. This rule being prescribed before the establishment of the ceremonial law, which appointed altars much more costly, intimates, that, after the period of that law, plainness should be accepted as the best ornament of the external services of religion, and that gospel-worship should not be performed with external pomp and gaiety. The beauty of holiness needs no paint, nor do those do any service to the spouse of Christ that dress her in the attire of a harlot, as the church of Rome does: an altar of earth does best.
